19 And they ſmote him on the head with a reed, and did ſpit upon him, and bowing their knees, worſhipped him.

20 And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him, and led him out to crucify him.

21 And they compel one Simon, a Cyrenian, who paſſed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear his croſs.

22 And they bring him unto the place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a ſcull.

23 And they gave him to drink wine mingled with myrrh; but he received it not.

24 And when they had crucified him, they parted his garments, caſting lots upon them, what every man ſhould take.

25 And it was the third hour, and they crucified him.

26 And the ſuperſcription of his accuſation was written over, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

27 And with him they crucify two thieves; the one on his right hand, and the other on his left.

28 And the ſcripture was fulfilled, which ſaith, And he was numbered with the tranſgreſſors.

29 And they that paſſed by, railed on him, wagging their heads, and ſaying, Ah, thou that deſtroyeſt the temple, and buildeſt it in three days,

30 Save thyſelf, and come down from the croſs.

Ver. 15. Willing to content the people] Pilate had given them too much cauſe of diſguſt before, as appears from what Joſephus ſays concerning him; and probably he was afraid of a general inſurrection, therefore he was deſirous to remove all cauſe of complaint: Notwithſtanding which, the complaints of this very people afterwards purſued him to his ruin. See on Matth. xxvii. 19. Whipping or ſcourging was a puniſhment frequently uſed both by the Jews and Romans; the Jews commonly inflicted it by a whip of three cords, and limited the number of ſtripes to thirty-nine, that they might not exceed the number ſentenced, Deut. xxv. 3. But the uſual way of ſcourging among the Romans was with ſuch rods or wands as the lictors carried in a bundle before the magiſtrates; and they were exceeding cruel in this kind of puniſhment, tearing with their ſcourges even to the veins and arteries, and laying the very bowels of the malefactors bare: and as our Saviour was ſcourged at Pilate's order, it was done moſt probably by his officers, after the Roman manner, and was therefore no leſs ſevere than diſgraceful; for Pilate intended hereby to have moved the compaſſion of the Jews towards him, in order to his releaſe, rather than to have him ſcourged preparatory to his crucifixion; as appears from Luke xxiii. 15, 16, 22. See Matth. xxvii. 26. Guyſe, and Calmet.

Ver. 19. A reed] A cane, Wat.

Ver. 21. The father of Alexander and Rufus] In the note on Matth. xxvii. 32. we have obſerved, that theſe two perſons were two noted men among the firſt Chriſtians, who reſided at Rome, and who being well known there, St. Mark makes this mention of them, on account of the Chriſtians at Rome and others, who were acquainted with them or their names.

Ver. 24. They parted his garments] They ſhared his garments, caſting lots for them, to decide what each man ſhould take; or, "They divided his garments into lots, and drew among themſelves which each of them ſhould take." See Heylin.

Ver. 25. And it was the third hour, &c.] The third Jewiſh hour ended at our nine o'clock in the morning; by St. Mark's account, therefore, the crucifixion and the lots may have been finiſhed at the ſtriking of eight, when the third hour, anſwering to our ninth, began. This indeed ſeems inconſiſtent with John xix. 13. who tells us, that when Pilate ſat on the judgement-ſeat in the pavement, and brought Jeſus out to the people the laſt time, it was about the ſixth hour, i. e. the ſixth Roman hour, the ſame with our ſix o'clock in the morning. But to reconcile theſe ſeemingly oppoſite accounts, the following ſeries of tranſactions ſhould be conſidered: After the governor brought forth Jeſus, he ſpoke both to the people and to the prieſts, before he finally condemned him; and though each ſpeech is diſcuſſed by the Evangeliſt in a ſingle ſentence, they may have been drawn out to ſome length, that if poſſible an impreſſion might thereby be made on the people. When Jeſus was delivered to the ſoldiers, they had to ſtrip him of the purple robe, and to cloath him in his own garments; the thieves were to be brought out of priſon; the neceſſary preparations for the crucifixion of the three were to be made; in particular, croſſes were to be provided; the crimes laid to the charge of the priſoners were to be written upon whitened boards, in black characters; the vinegar, punge, and reed were to be procured; ſoldiers were to be appointed for watching the croſſes, &c. &c. In travelling from the prætorium (which may have been ſituated in that quarter of the town fartheſt from the place of execution,) they could move but ſlowly; becauſe Jeſus being very much fatigued, muſt have born his croſs with difficulty. When he grew faint, it might be ſome time before they found one to aſſiſt him in bearing it; and being come to the place of execution, they had the croſſes to make ready, by fixing the tranſverſe beams on their proper ſupporters; the priſoners were to be ſtripped, and nailed to them; the titles were to be fixed, the holes for the croſſes to be dug, the croſſes themſelves to be erected and fixed; and laſt of all, the priſoners cloaths were to be divided by lot. Theſe, with other circumſtances unknown to us, accompanying executions of this kind, may be ſuppoſed to have filled up the whole ſpace between ſix in the morning, when the governer ſhewed Jeſus the laſt time, and the third Jewiſh hour, when Jeſus was crucified; that is to ſay, a ſpace leſs than two hours: for about the ſixth hour, the expreſſion in St. John, may ſignify "a while after the ſtriking of ſix, when the ſixth hour ends;" and the third hour, the expreſſion in St. Mark, anſwering the ninth Roman hour, may ſignify at the beginning thereof, or at the ſtriking of eight, when the eighth hour ends, and the ninth begins. See Macknight and Doddridge.

31 Likewiſe alſo the chief prieſts mocking, ſaid among themſelves, with the ſcribes, He ſaved others; himſelf he cannot ſave.

32 Let Chriſt, the king of Iſrael, deſcend now from the croſs, that we may ſee and believe. And they that were crucified with him, reviled him, 33 And when the ſixth hour was come, there was darkneſs over the whole land, until the ninth hour.

34 And at the ninth hour Jeſus cried with a loud voice, ſaying, Eloi, Eloi, lama ſabachthani? which is, being interpreted, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me?

35 And ſome of them that ſtood by, when they heard it, ſaid, Behold, he calleth Elias.

36 And one ran, and filled a ſpunge full of vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink, ſaying, Let alone; let us ſee whether Elias will come to take him down.

37 And Jeſus cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghoſt.

38 And the veil of the temple was rent in twain, from the top to the bottom.

39 And when the centurion, which ſtood over againſt him, ſaw that he ſo cried out, and gave up the ghoſt, he ſaid, Truly this man was the Son of God.

40 There were alſo women looking on afar off: among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the leſs, and of Joſes, and Salome;

41 Who alſo, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and miniſtered unto him; and many other women which came up with him unto Jeruſalem.

42 And now when the even was come, (becauſe it was the preparation, that is, the day before the ſabbath;)

43 Joſeph of Arimathea, an honourable counſellor, which alſo waited for the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jeſus.

44 And Pilate marvelled if he were already dead: and calling unto him the centurion, he aſked him whether he had been any while dead.

45 And when he knew it of the centurion, he gave the body to Joſeph.

46 And he bought fine linen, and took him down, and wrapped him in the linen, and laid him in a ſepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a ſtone unto the door of the ſepulchre.

REFLECTIONS ON CHRIST'S APPEARANCE BEFORE PILATE.

Theſe Jews well deſerved to be tributary: They had caſt off the yoke of their God, and had juſtly earned this Roman ſervitude. Tiberius had befriended them too well, with ſo favourable a governor as Pilate. If they had retained the power of life and death in their own hands, they would not have been beholden to an heathen for a legal murder.

But what is the cauſe, O ye rulers of Iſrael, that ye ſtand thus thronging at the door of the judgement-hall? Why do ye not go into that public room of judicature, to demand the juſtice for which you are come? Was it becauſe you would not defile yourſelves with the contagion of an heathen roof? Holy men,—your conſciences would not ſuffer you to yield to ſo impure an act! Your paſſover muſt be kept! your perſons muſt be clean! whilſt you expect juſtice from the man, you abhor the pollution of the place! Woe to you, prieſts, ſcribes, elders, hypocrites! can there be any roof ſo unclean as that of your own breaſts! Go out of yourſelves, ye falſe diſſemblers, if ye would not be unclean. Pilate hath moſt cauſe to fear, leſt his walls ſhould be defiled with the preſence of ſuch monſters of impiety, thirſting for innocent blood; the blood of the Son of the Bleſſed.

The plauſible governor condeſcends to humour their ſuperſtition: they dare not come in to him, he therefore yields to go forth to them. Even Pilate begins juſtly, What accuſation bring you againſt this man? See John xviii. 28, 29. There is no judging of religion by mens outward demeanour: There is more juſtice amongſt Romans than amongſt Jews. The malicious rabbies thought it enough that they had ſentenced Jeſus; no more was now expected than a ſpeedy execution: "If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up to thee. We have condemned him to death; we need no more than thy command for execution."

O monſters, whether of malice or injuſtice! muſt he then be a malefactor whom you will condemn? Is your bare word ground enough to ſhed blood? Whom did you ever kill but the righteous? By whoſe hands periſhed the prophets?—The word was but miſtaken; ye ſhould have ſaid, "If we had not been malefactors, we had never delivered up this innocent man to thee."

That muſt needs be notoriouſly unjuſt, which nature itſelf teaches pagans to abhor. Pilate ſees and hates this bloody ſuggeſtion and practice. "Do ye pretend holineſs, and urge ſo injurious a violence? If he be ſuch as you accuſe him, where is his conviction? If he cannot be legally convicted, why ſhould he die? If I muſt judge for you, why have you judged for yourſelves? Could ye ſuppoſe that I would condemn any man unheard? If your Jewiſh laws grant you this liberty, the Roman laws allow it not to me. Since you have gone ſo far, be your own carvers of juſtice: Take ye him, and judge him according to your law.

O Pilate! how happy had it been for thee, if thou hadſt continued ſteadfaſt to this determination! Thus thou hadſt waſhed thy hands more clear than in all the water in the world. Might law have been the rule of this judgement, and not malice, this blood had not been ſhed. How palpably doth their tongue betray their heart! It is not lawful for us to put any man to death. Pilate talks of judgement, they talk of death. This was their only aim; law was but a colour, judgement was but a ceremony.

Where death is fore-reſolved, there cannot want accuſations. They began to accuſe him, ſaying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, &c. Luke xxiii. 2. "What accuſation, ſaidſt thou, O Pilate?—Heinous and capital. Thou mighteſt have believed our confident intimation; but ſince thou wilt needs urge us to particulars, know that we come furniſhed with ſuch an indictment, as ſhall make thine ears glow to hear it. Beſides that blaſphemy whereof he hath been condemned by us, this man is a ſeducer of the people, a raiſer of ſedition, an uſurper of ſovereignty." O impudent ſuggeſtions! What wonder is it, bleſſed Saviour, if thine honeſt ſervants be loaded with ſlanders, when thy moſt innocent perſon eſcaped not accuſations, ſo palpably, ſo ſhamefully falſe!

Pilate now ſtartles at the charge: the name of tribute, the name of Cæſar is in mention. Theſe potent ſpells can bring him back, and call Jeſus to the bar. There meekly ſtands the Lamb of God to be judged, who ſhall once come to judge both the quick and dead. Then ſhall he, before whom the ſuffering Jeſus ſtood guiltleſs and dejected, ſtand before his dreadful Majeſty guilty and trembling. Pilate, however, hears, and fully acquits him of the charge: His declaration is, I find in him no fault at all. Noble teſtimony of Chriſt's innocency, from that mouth which afterwards doomed him to death!

I tremble to think how juſt Pilate as yet was; and how ſoon after depraved: How fain would he have freed Jeſus, whom he found faultleſs! But though he propoſed a Barabbas, a thief, a murderer, a ſeditionary,

47 And Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of Joſes, beheld where he was laid.

CHAP. XVI.

An angel declareth the reſurrection of Chriſt to three women. Chriſt himſelf appeareth to Mary Magdalene: to two going into the country: then to the apoſtles, whom he ſendeth forth to preach the goſpel: and aſcendeth into heaven.

AND when the ſabbath was paſt, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had bought ſweet ſpices, that they might come and anoint him.

2 And very early in the morning, the firſt day of the week, they came unto the ſepulchre, at the riſing of the ſun.

3 And they ſaid among themſelves, Who ſhall roll us away the ſtone from the door of the ſepulchre?

4 (And when they looked, they ſaw that the ſtone was rolled away:) for it was very great.

5 And entering into the ſepulchre, they ſaw a young man ſitting on the right ſide, Ver. 1. Matth. xxviii. 1. Luke xxiv. 1. John xx. 1. Luke xxiii. 56.—V. 2. Luke xxiv. 1. John xx. 1.—V. 5. John xx. 11.

a ſeditionary, infamous, and odious to all; yet they preferred even this Barabbas to the prince of life. Oh malice beyond all example, ſhameleſs and bloody! Who can but bluſh to think, that an heathen ſhould ſee Jews ſo impetuouſly unjuſt, ſo ſavagely cruel! He knew there was no fault to be found in Jeſus; he knew there was no crime that was not to be found in Barabbas: Yet he hears, and bluſhes to hear them ſay, Not this man, but Barabbas. What a killing indignity was this, O bleſſed Lord, for thee to hear from thine own nation! Haſt thou refuſed all glory, to put on ſhame and miſery for their ſakes? Haſt thou diſregarded thy bleſſed ſelf to ſave them, and do they now refuſe thee for Barabbas? Do ye thus requite the Lord, O fooliſh people, and unjuſt.

Pilate would have chaſtiſed thee, and let thee go; that cruelty had been true mercy to this of the Jews; whom no blood would ſatisfy but that of thy heart. He calls for thy fault; they clamour for thy puniſhment. They cried the more, Crucify him! crucify him!

As their outrage increaſed, ſo the preſident's juſtice declined; thoſe graces which lie looſe and ungrounded, are eaſily waſhed away with the firſt tide of popularity. Thrice had that man proclaimed the innocence of Him whom he now inclines to condemn, willing to content the people. Oh the fooliſh aims of ambition. Not God, not his conſcience come into any regard; but the people. What a baſe idol doth the proud man adore! even the vulgar, which a baſe man would deſpiſe. What is their breath, but an idle wind? or their anger, but a painted fire? O Pilate, where now are thyſelf and thy people?—Whereas a good conſcience would have ſtuck by thee for ever, and have given thee boldneſs before the face of God in glory.

Then Pilate took Jeſus, and ſcourged him. Thou that didſt ſo lately water Gethſemane's garden with the drops of thy bloody ſweat, now bedeweſt the pavement of Pilate's hall with the ſhowers of thy blood. Bleſſed Jeſus, why ſhould I think it ſtrange to be ſcourged with tongue or hand, when I ſee thee bleeding? What laſhes can I fear from heaven or earth, ſince thy ſcourges have been borne for me, and have ſanctified them to me? Now what a world of inſolent reproaches, indignities, tortures, art thou entering upon! To an ingenuous and tender diſpoſition ſcorns are ſufficient torment; but here, pain muſt help to perfect thy miſery and their deſpight.

O adorable Redeemer, was it not enough that thy ſacred body was ſtripped, and whealed with bloody ſtripes, but thy perſon muſt be made the mockery of inſulting enemies? Thy back diſguiſed with purple robes, thy temples wounded with a thorny crown, thy face ſpit upon, buffeted, ſmitten; thy hand ſceptred with a reed, thyſelf derided with grimace, bended knees and ſcoffing acclamation?

O whither doſt thou ſtoop, coeternal Son of the eternal Father, whither doſt thou abaſe thyſelf for me! I have ſinned, and thou art puniſhed; mine head hath deviſed evil, and thine is pierced with thorns; I have ſmitten thee, and thou art ſmitten for me; I have diſhonoured thee, and thou art made the ſport of men for me, that have deſerved to be inſulted on by devils!

Thus diſguiſed, bleeding, mangled, deformed, behold the man, brought forth to the furious multitude, whether for compaſſion, or for more cruel deriſion. Look upon him, O ye mercileſs Jews; ſee him in his ſhame, and in his wounds; his face all livid with blows; his eyes ſwoln, his cheeks beſmeared with ſpitting, his ſkin lacerated with ſcourges, his whole body bathed in blood;—and would ye yet have more? Behold the man, whom ye envied for his greatneſs, and feared for his uſurpation!

Yea, and behold him well, O thou proud Pilate; ye cruel ſoldiers, ye inſatiable Jews; ye ſee Him baſe, whom ye ſhall ſee glorious: The time is coming, wherein ye ſhall behold him in another garb; when ye who now bend the knee to him in ſcorn, ſhall ſee all knees in heaven and earth, and under the earth, bowing before him in aweful adoration; when ye who now ſee him with contempt, ſhall behold him with trembling and horror.

What an inward war do I yet find in the breaſt of Pilate? His conſcience bids him ſpare; his popularity bids him kill. His wife warned by a dream, cautions him to have no hand in the blood of that Juſt One; the importunate multitude preſs him for a ſentence of death. All ſhifts have been tried to free the man whom he hath pronounced innocent; all violent motives are urged to condemn the man whom malice pretends guilty.

Juſt in the height of this boſom-ſtrife, when conſcience and moral juſtice were ready to ſway Pilate's diſtracted heart, to an equitable diſmiſſion, the Jews are heard to cry out, If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæſar's friend. There is the word that ſtrikes it dead: In vain ſhall we hope that a carnal heart can prefer the care of his ſoul, to honourable ſafety; or God, to Cæſar.

Now Jeſus muſt die; Pilate haſtes into the judgement-hall; the ſentence ſticks no longer with him; let him be crucified.

Yet how foul ſoever his ſoul,—his hands ſhall be clean; he took water, and waſhed his hands before the multitude, ſaying, I am innocent, &c. Now all is ſafe; this is ſufficient expiation; water can waſh off blood; the hands cleanſe the heart: Proteſt thou art innocent, and thou canſt not be guilty.—Vain hypocrite! and canſt thou think to ſcape ſo? Is murder of no deeper die?—What miſerable ſhifts do fooliſh ſinners make, to beguile themſelves? Any thing will ſerve to charm the conſcience, when it chooſes to ſlumber and ſleep. O Pilate, if that very blood thou ſheddeſt, do not waſh off the guilt of thy bloodſhed, thy water—waſhing doth but the more defile thy ſoul.

Little did theſe deſperate Jews know the weight of that blood which they were ſo forward to imprecate upon themſelves and their children!—And have ye not now felt, O nation worthy of plagues, have ye not now felt what blood it was, whoſe guilt ye ſo furiouſly affected? Seventeen hundred years are now elapſed ſince ye thus wiſhed for wretchedneſs? And have ye not been ever ſince the hate and ſcorn of the world? Did ye not live, many of you, to ſee your city buried in aſhes, and drowned in blood? To ſee yourſelves no nation? Was there ever people under heaven made ſo eminent a ſpectacle of miſery and deſolation? Your former cruelties, uncleanneſſes, idolatries, coſt you but ſome ſhort captivities: God cannot but be juſt; this ſin under which ye now lie groaning and forlorn muſt need be ſo much greater than theſe, as your devaſtation is more unbounded; and what can that be, other than the murder of the Lord of Life? —Ye have what ye wiſhed, unhappy people! Be miſerable till ye be penitent.

Chap. XVI. Ver. 1. Had bought ſweet ſpices] Mr. Weſt obſerves that St. Mark, having wrote his Goſpel for the uſe of the Gentiles, who were ſtrangers to the Jewiſh cuſtoms and religion, (as may be inferred from ſeveral little explanatory notes dropped up and down in his Goſpel,) in order to give theſe ſtrangers a perfect intelligence of the fact related in this chapter, it was neceſſary for him to begin his account with that circumſtance of the women's having bought ſpices to anoint the body of Jeſus; that they might underſtand what buſineſs carried them ſo early to the ſepulchre, and ſee by the preparations made by thoſe women for the embalming the body of Jeſus, and the little credit given by the Apoſtles to the reports of thoſe who had ſeen our Lord on the day of reſurrection, That his riſing from the dead was an event, not in the leaſt expected by any of them, and not believed by the Apoſtles, even after ſuch evidence as Jeſus upbraided them for not aſſenting to: From all which it was natural for them to conclude, that this fundamental article of their faith was neither received nor preached, but upon the fulleſt conviction of its truth. See Obſervations on the reſurrection, p. 33. and the notes on Matth. xxviii.

Ver. 4. (And when they looked) &c.] 'Αναβλέψασαι, lifting up their eyes. The reader will obſerve, that the parentheſis at the end of this verſe, ſhould properly be read at the end of the third verſe, and is an inſtance of the ſame mode of expreſſion as that noted on ch. xi. 13.

Ver. 5. And entering into the ſepulchre, they ſaw, &c.] The circumſtance of the angel's being within the ſepulchre, expreſly mentioned by this apoſtle, is ſo far from being contradicted by St. Matthew, xxvii. 2, 6. as ſome have imagined, that it is plainly implied by the words He is not here; come,—(δεῦτε,—which might more properly be tranſlated, Come hither;) ſee the place where the Lord lay; as is alſo that other circumſtance of the women's entering into the ſepulchre, by the Greek word ἐξελθοῦσαι, which ſhould have been rendered they went out, inſtead of they departed; as it is in ver. 8. of this chapter. To which may be further added, that the deſcription of the angel's cloathing, which, according to St. Mark, was a long white garment, correſponds with the only particular relating to it, taken notice of by Matthew, which was its whiteneſs:—His raiment was white as ſnow. In the latter, indeed, this angel is painted with a countenance clothed in a long white garment: and they were affrighted.

6 And he ſaith unto them, Be not affrighted: Ye ſeek Jeſus of Nazareth, which was crucified: he is riſen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him.

like lightning. The purpoſes of the angel's deſcent are mentioned in the note on Matth. xxviii. 2—4. and as one of theſe was to ſtrike terror into the guards, it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe he might at firſt aſſume a countenance of terror, and after the reſurrection was accompliſhed, put on the milder appearance of a young man; in which form the women, as St. Mark ſays, ſaw him ſitting within the ſepulchre. That the angel was not ſeen by the women ſitting on the ſtone without the ſepulchre, is evident, not only from the ſilence of all the Evangeliſts, with regard to ſuch an appearance, but alſo from what will be obſerved concerning Mary Magdalen, John xx. 1. who, though ſhe ſaw the ſtone rolled away, yet ſaw no angel. Beſides, had the angel remained ſitting on the ſtone without the ſepulchre, with all his terrors about him, he would, in all probability, by frightening away the women and diſciples, as well as the ſoldiers, have prevented thoſe viſits to the ſepulchre, which he came on purpoſe to facilitate. It was neceſſary, therefore, either that he ſhould not appear at all to the women, or that he ſhould appear within the ſepulchre; and in a form which, although more than human, might however not be ſo terrible as to deprive them of their ſenſes, and render them incapable of hearing, certainly of remembering that meſſage, which he commanded them to deliver to his diſciples: From all which conſiderations it may be fairly concluded, that the appearance of the angel without the ſepulchre, mentioned by St. Matthew, was only to the keepers; and that when he was ſeen by the women, he was within the ſepulchre, as St. Mark expreſly ſays, and as the words above cited from St. Matthew ſtrongly imply: So that theſe two Evangeliſts agree in relating not only the words ſpoken by the angel, but the principal, and, as it were, characteriſtical circumſtances of the fact; which, from this agreement, we infer to be one and the ſame. The like agreement is alſo to be found in their account of the terror of the women, upon ſeeing the angel, their ſpeedy flight from the ſepulchre, and the diſorder and confuſion which ſo extraordinary an event occaſioned in their minds; a confuſed and troubled mixture of terror, aſtoniſhment, and joy; which, according to St. Mark, was ſo great, as to prevent their telling what had happened to thoſe they had met upon the way; for ſo muſt we underſtand the words, neither ſaid they any thing to any man, ver. 8. ſince it is not to be imagined that they never opened their lips about it. Their ſilence doubtleſs ended with the cauſe of it; namely, their terror and amazement: and theſe, in all probability, vaniſhed on their ſeeing Chriſt himſelf; who, as St. Matthew hath informed us, met them, as they were going to tell the diſciples the meſſage of the angels;—accoſted them with an all hail! and bade them diſmiſs their fears. See Weſt on the reſurrection, p. 35. The reader will find in Taſſo's Jeruſalem, b. i. cant. 1. and Milton's Parad. Loſt, b. xi. ver. 38. the amiable appearance of an angel like a youth, finely embelliſhed with poetical painting.

Ver. 6. Be not affrighted] The ſpeech of the angel in this and the next verſe to the women, informs them, in a conciſe and emphatical manner, of every particular that might ſatisfy their affectionate curioſity, and diſſipate their fears; for they were afraid to aſk him any queſtions. Mr. Weſt has obſerved, that the appearance of an angel upon this occaſion was highly proper, nay, we may almoſt ſay neceſſary. Jeſus had but two days before been put to death by the rulers of the Jews, as an impoſtor; one, who by the authority of Beelzebub caſt out devils, and by aſſuming the character of the Meſſiah, blaſphemed God. His ſepulchre alſo was guarded by a band of ſoldiers, under the pretence of preventing his diſciples from carrying on the impoſture begun by their maſter, by ſtealing away his body, and giving out that he was riſen from the dead, in conſequence of what he had ſaid before the crucifixion. Under theſe circumſtances the atteſtation of heaven was neceſſary, to ſhew that God, though he had ſuffered him to expire on the croſs, had not forſaken him; but on the contrary, had co-operated with him even in his ſufferings, his death, and burial, and reſurrection from the dead on the third day, having by the ſecret workings of his Providence, and his Almighty power, accompliſhed in every point the ſeveral predictions of Jeſus relating to each of thoſe events; events which, at the time of thoſe predictions, none but God, or an eye enlightened by his omniſcient Spirit could foreſee, and which nothing leſs than his all-contouling power could bring about. The deſcent therefore of the angel, and his rolling away the ſtone, was a viſible proof that the finger of God was in the great work of the reſurrection, was a proper honour done to him, who claimed to be the Son of God, and unanſwerably refuted the impious calumnies of thoſe, who upon account of that claim ſtiled him an impoſtor and blaſphemer. The next thing to be conſidered in this matter is, the internal evidence which the ſeveral appearances of angels to the women, &c. carry along with them of reality and truth; for by ſome they have been treated as mere illuſions, and by others as downright falſhoods. That theſe appearances were illuſions, the effects of ſuperſtition, ignorance, and fear, hath been inſinuated rather than aſſerted; but it is apprehended hath never been attempted to be proved. Waving therefore a vain ſearch after arguments which we preſume are not eaſy to be found, or they would have been produced by thoſe who have ſo diligently laboured to ridicule the Chriſtian faith, We will proceed to lay down a few obſervations, tending to prove the reality and truth of theſe appearances of the angels to the women.

The angel firſt ſeen by the women, was that deſcribed by St. Mark, in the form of a young man [ſitting within the ſepulchre] on the right ſide, cloathed in a long white garment; at the ſight of whom, the women [Mary and Salome,] diſcovering great ſigns of fear, he ſaith unto them, Be not affrighted, &c. That this was a real viſion, and no phantom of the imagination, is evident from theſe particulars. 1. As it does not appear from this or any other account, that the women, upon their coming to the ſepulchre, were under any ſuch terrors or perturbation, as are apt to fill the fancy with ſpectres and apparitions;—on the contrary, they went thither a little after day-break, prepared, and expecting to find the dead body of Jeſus there, and purpoſing to embalm it; about the doing of which they had been calmly conferring by the way:—So, 2dly, by their coming with a deſign to embalm the body, it is plain they had no notion either of his being already riſen, or that he would riſe from the dead. And therefore, 3dly, had the angel been only the creature of a diſturbed imagination, they would ſcarcely have put into his mouth a ſpeech that directly contradicted all the ideas upon which they proceeded but one moment before. 4thly, It is to be obſerved farther, that the illuſion muſt have been double; two ſenſes muſt have been deceived, the hearing and the ſight; for the angel was heard as well as ſeen: and though this frequently happens in dreams, and ſometimes perhaps in a delirium, or a fit of madneſs, yet I queſtion whether an inſtance exactly parallel in all its parts to the caſe here ſuppoſed, was ever known; for no two people dream together exactly alike, nor are affected in a delirium with exactly the ſame imaginations. 5thly, The words ſpoken by the angel refer to others ſpoken by Chriſt to his diſciples before his paſſion, in which he told them, that after he was riſen, he would go before them to Galilee. This promiſe or prediction, of which the angel here reminds them, bids them tell the diſciples, from him, to go into Galilee, and promiſes them that Chriſt will meet them there. Now as not only the reſurrection, but the perſonal appearance of Chriſt is implied in theſe words, the reaſon above given, and the 3d particular, concludes in the preſent caſe more ſtrongly againſt ſuppoſing them to have proceeded only from the imagination of the women; for the ſudden change of whoſe opinion, from a diſbelief of the reſurrection to a full and explicit belief of it, no adequate cauſe can be aſſigned. For if it ſhould be allowed that they knew of this prediction of Chriſt's (which however does not appear,) yet the buſineſs which brought them to the ſepulchre makes it evident, that till that inſtant they either did not recollect, not underſtand, or not believe it. And if it be farther ſaid, that upon their entering the ſepulchre, and not finding the body of Jeſus, this prediction might naturally come at once into their heads, and they might as ſuddenly and as reaſonably believe Chriſt to be riſen as St. John did, whoſe faith was built upon no other evidence than what theſe women had now before them; I anſwer, that allowing St. John, when he is ſaid to have firſt believed the reſurrecton, had no other evidence than thoſe women now had, or might have had; yet it is to be obſerved, that St. John was in a fitter diſpoſition of mind to reflect and judge upon that evidence than the women. St. John ran to the ſepulchre, upon the information given him by Mary Magdalen that the body of Jeſus was removed from thence, and laid ſhe knew not where, nor by whom; and as the ſepulchre was at ſome diſtance from his habitation, many thoughts muſt naturally have ariſen in his mind, tending to account for the removal of the body; and among the reſt, perhaps, ſome confuſed and obſcure hope that he might be riſen from the dead, purſuant to many predictions to that purpoſe delivered by him to his diſciples. But whatever his thoughts were at the time of his coming to the ſepulchre, (about which, it muſt be owned, nothing can be offered but mere conjecture) it is certain he had leiſure to reflect upon the predictions of his maſter, and to examine into the ſtate of the ſepulchre, which both he and Peter did, (and that implies ſome deliberation and preſence of mind,) and that after this deliberate examination, he departed quietly to his own home; whereas the women are repreſented as falling into the utmoſt terror and amazement immediately upon their entering into the ſepulchre, and continuing under the ſame conſternation till they were met flying from thence by Chriſt himſelf. Under ſuch a diſorder of mind, can we ſuppoſe them capable of recollecting the predictions of Chriſt about his reſurrection? of conſidering the proofs of their accompliſhment ariſing from the ſtate of the ſepulchre; and of perſuading themſelves at once that he was not only riſen from the dead, but would perſonally appear to his diſciples? And then, immediately upon this conviction, of fancying they ſaw an angel, and heard him aſſure them, in a diſtinct manner, that Chriſt was riſen; call them to review the place where he had been laid, and bid them tell his diſciples that he would meet them in Galilee?—In a word, if this ſuppoſed illuſion proceeded from a ſtrong perſuaſion that Chriſt was riſen from the dead, whence aroſe that belief? If it aroſe from cool reflection upon the predictions of our Saviour, and the ſtate of the ſepulchre (the cauſe of St. John's faith) whence came their terror? Which, if not previous to the apparition of the angel, was at leaſt prior to the words Be not affrighted, with which he firſt accoſted them. If it be urged, that this terror was of the nature of thoſe cauſeleſs and unaccountable terrors called panics, It may be anſwered, that this is giving a name inſtead of a reaſon; and is in effect ſaying nothing at all, or no more than that they were affrighted, but no body can tell why or wherefore. 6thly, It is obſervable, that the ſpeech of the angel to the women conſiſts of ten diſtinct particulars: As 1. Be not affrighted. 2. Ye ſeek Jeſus of Nazareth, who was crucified. 3. He is riſen. 4. He is not here. 5. Behold the place where they laid him. 6. But go your way, tell his diſciples. 7. And Peter. 8. That he goeth before you into Galilee. 9. There ſhall you ſee him. 10. As he ſaid unto you. The order and connection of which ſeveral particulars, are no leſs

7 But go your way, tell his diſciples, and Peter, that he goeth before you into Galilee: there ſhall you ſee him, as he ſaid unto you.

8 And they went out quickly, and fled from the ſepulchre; for they trembled, and were amazed: neither ſaid they any thing to any man; for they were afraid.

9 Now when Jeſus was riſen early, the firſt day of the week, he appeared firſt to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had caſt ſeven devils.

10 And ſhe went and told them that had been with him, as they mourned and wept.

11 And they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been ſeen of her, believed not.

12 After that, he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country.

13 And they went and told it unto the reſidue: neither believed they them.

14 Afterward he appeared unto the eleven, as they ſat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief, and hardneſs of heart, becauſe they believed not them which had ſeen him after he was riſen.

15 And he ſaid unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the goſpel to every creature.

16 He that believeth and is baptized ſhall be ſaved; but he that believeth not ſhall be damned.

17 And theſe ſigns ſhall follow them that believe; In my name ſhall they caſt out devils; they ſhall ſpeak with new tongues; leſs remarkable than their number; and therefore, taking both theſe conſiderations into the account, I leave any one to judge, whether it be conceivable, that women under ſo great a terror and diſtraction of mind, as to fancy they ſaw and heard an angel, when there was no ſuch thing, ſhould be able to compoſe a ſpeech for this phantom of their fear and imagination, conſiſting of ſo much matter, order, and reaſon, and proceeding upon the ſuppoſition that they were not then convinced that Chriſt was riſen from the dead, though the belief of his reſurrection is preſumed not only to have preceded, but even to have occaſioned this illuſion. I have dwelt the longer upon the examination of this firſt appearance of the angel to the women, becauſe the ſettling of the nature of that, will ſave us the trouble of entering into a particular diſcuſſion of the reſt, the ſeveral articles of which will fall under one or other of the foregoing obſervations. See Weſt on the Reſurrection, p. 143, &c.

Ver. 7. Tell his diſciples, and Peter, &c.] Peter is particularly mentioned, becauſe he had moſt need of comfort, under the anguiſh of his mind on account of his late denial.—As this Goſpel is ſuppoſed to have been dictated, or at leaſt reviſed by him, the addition of this circumſtance implies the deep ſenſe he had of the divine benevolence, in ſending this comfortable meſſage to him, which gave him to underſtand, that though he had ſo baſely denied his Lord, he had not intirely loſt his favour; and that as he had let in a gleam of light upon the darkneſs of his affliction, ſo he would for the future help and ſuccour thoſe who fell like him, if, like him, they repented them truly of their former ſins. It might have ſerved another end, and been intended by St. Peter to ſhew us, that though he had recovered his faith, and was reinſtated in the favour of his Maſter; yet he had not forgotten how baſely he had forfeited it, and how generouſly his maſter had reſtored him. Our Lord's promiſe of appearing to the diſciples in Galilee, referred to in the words as he ſaid unto you, was given to the twelve Apoſtles, Matth. xxvi. 32. yet the angel ſpeaks of it as made to the women, and to all the diſciples. Hence we learn, that every promiſe made to the Apoſtles, which had not an immediate relation to their office and character, was really made to all the diſciples, and was intended to be made known to them. This meſſage, as well as that from Jeſus himſelf, Matth. xxviii. 10. was ſent to all the diſciples, and not to the Apoſtles in particular. The reaſon may have been this: our Lord intending to viſit his Apoſtles that very evening, there was no occaſion to order them into Galilee to ſee him; but as moſt of his diſciples were now in Jeruſalem, celebrating the paſſover, it may eaſily be imagined, that on receiving the news of their Maſter's reſurrection, many of them would reſolve to tarry, in expectation of meeting with him: a thing which muſt have been very inconvenient for them at that time of the year, when the harveſt was about to begin; the ſheaf of the firſt-fruits being always offered on the ſecond day of the paſſover-week. Wherefore, to prevent their being ſo long from home, the meſſages mentioned were ſent, directing them to return into Galilee, well aſſured that they ſhould have the pleaſure of ſeeing their Lord there, and by that means be happily relieved from the ſuſpicion of his being an impoſtor, which no doubt had ariſen in their minds when they ſaw him expire upon the croſs. Accordingly he appeared to more than five hundred of them at once, who, in conſequence of his appointment, gathered together to ſee him. See Guyſe and Macknight.

Ver. 8. Neither ſaid they any thing to any man] If theſe words, agreeably to what we have obſerved on ver. 5. be conſtrued to ſignify that they did not tell, while their terror and amazement continued, what they had ſeen and heard to ſome whom they ſaw as they were flying from the ſepulchre, it ſeems rational to conclude, that theſe were ſome of the diſciples to whom they were ordered to deliver the meſſage of the angel, and to whom they would probably have delivered it, had they not been under the greateſt perturbation of mind. For had the perſons whom they ſaw been any other than the diſciples of Jeſus, it is not likely that St. Mark would have taken any notice of their not ſaying any thing to any man; ſince it is reaſonable to imagine they would not, even though they had not been affrighted, have told the meſſage of the angel to any but diſciples. And as the time of Peter and John's running to the ſepulchre, upon the firſt report of Mary Magdalen, coincides with that of theſe women flying from it, it is no improbable conjecture, that theſe were the perſons whom they ſaw in their way, at a diſtance perhaps, and coming by a different road to the ſepulchre; eſpecially if it be conſidered, that as the words of St. Mark, neither ſaid they, &c. ſeem to carry with them an imputation of neglect upon theſe women,—though he at the ſame time accounts for, and excuſes it, by adding, for they were afraid;—ſo the ſame Evangeliſt hath before acquainted us, ver. 7. that they were ordered by the angel to deliver the meſſage he gave to Peter in particular. See Weſt, p. 172. and for an explanation of the following verſes, the paſſages referred to in the margin.

Ver. 9. Now when Jeſus was riſen] Now Jeſus being riſen early on, &c.] Wat. MS. and Maii Obſerv. c. ii. p. 72. Now Jeſus being riſen, he appeared in the morning on the firſt day of the week to Mary Mary Magdalen. The earlineſs of his riſing was before expreſſed, ver. 2. λίαν πρωΐ, very early. This apearance after it, was πρωΐ, early, See Bengelius and Grotius.

Ver. 15. Every creature] Or, the whole creation; i. e. the bulk of mankind, or thoſe many nations to whom the Goſpel was afterwards to be preached. Clarke's Serm. iv. vol. ~~6.~~

Ver. 16. He that believeth, &c.] That is, "He who believeth the Goſpel, and entereth into a ſolemn obligation to obey it, and verifies that obligation by a ſuitable practice in the following part of his life,—ſhall be ſaved;" for ſo the Apoſtle expreſly explains it, that the baptiſm which ſaves us, is not the putting away the filth of the fleſh, but the anſwer of a good conſcience towards God.—"But he that believeth not, that is, who perſiſts in infidelity, ſubbornly refuſing to examine, ſhall be damned." See Dr. Clarke's Sermons, vol. 3. Macknight obſerves, that the laſt clauſe ſhould be explained by John iii. 19. where our Lord ſets forth the reaſon of the condemnation of ſuch unbelievers, as are damned for not believing the Goſpel when preached to them: This, ſays he, is the condemnation, the reaſon of the condemnation, (namely of thoſe whom in the preceding verſe he had repreſented as condemned for not believing in the name of the only-begotten Son of God) that light is come into the world, and men loved darkneſs rather than light, becauſe their deeds are evil. Thoſe who ſhall be condemned for not believing, are ſuch as diſbelieve merely becauſe their deeds are evil. Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that as to the objection which has been urged againſt the truth of Chriſtianity, from the damnatory ſentence which it here and elſewhere pronounces on thoſe who reject it, It is ſo far from being concluſive, that it would rather have been a great difficulty in the ſcheme of Chriſtianity if it had contained no ſuch argument; as he hath proved at large in his ſecond letter to the author of Chriſtianity not founded on argument, p. 28, 47. to which we refer the reader.

Ver. 17. Theſe ſigns ſhall follow, &c.] It is very evident that the word believe, in this place, muſt ſignify ſomething different from that faith which in the preceding verſe is required as indiſpenſably neceſſary to ſalvation, namely, that faith of miracles whereof we ſpoke on Matthew. xvii. 30. Beſides his promiſe of his perpetual preſence and ſuccours, Matth. xxviii. 20. our Lord here aſſures his diſciples, 18 They ſhall take up ſerpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it ſhall not hurt them; they ſhall lay hands on the ſick, and they ſhall recover.

19 So then after the Lord had ſpoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and ſat on the right hand of God.

20 And they went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with ſigns following. Amen.

Ver. 18. Luke x. 19. Acts xxviii. 5. Acts ix. 17. xxviii. 8.—V. 19. Acts i. 2, 3. Luke xxiv. 51. Pſ. cx. 1.—V. 20. Acts xiv. 3. Hebr. ii. 4.

that through the faith of him they ſhould work moſt aſtoniſhing miracles, which he here particularizes; a circumſtance, which not only contributed greatly, but was abſolutely neceſſary to the propagation of the Goſpel, while at the ſame time the performance of it is an irrefragable proof of the truth of Chriſtianity. That the ſigns here ſpecified were rendered illuſtrious in the days of the Apoſtles, appears ſufficiently from the book of the Acts, and the ſeveral epiſtles; and that they were not confined to their times, but continued in the two firſt ages of the church, there is the moſt ſufficient and undoubted proof. How much longer theſe extraordinary gifts were exerted, has been in our times a matter of great controverſy. Few readers are unacquainted with the famous "Inquiry into the miraculous powers," by Dr. Middleton, and the controverſy conſequent upon it; but perhaps there is nothing on this ſubject which will better repay a careful reading, than Dr. Whitby's general preface to the 2d volume of his Commentary, proving the truth and certainty of the Chriſtian faith.

Ver. 18. They ſhall take up ſerpents] Jamblicus, in his life of Pythagoras, tells us, that Pythagoras could do this; and very credible writers have aſſerted, that in the eaſtern nations there is an art of charming ſnakes and ſerpents by the force of muſic, ſo as for a while to ſuſpend their diſpoſition to hurt. But the power here referred to was undoubtedly exerted without any ſuch artifice, and included, as in the caſe of St. Paul, Acts. xxviii. 3—5. an ability to heal the moſt dangerous wounds given by the bite of the moſt noxious animals. We muſt underſtand the next clauſe with ſome reſtriction; as much as to ſay, "If by ſome ſecret or open attempt they drink any deadly poiſon, it ſhall not hurt them:" for it is not to be imagined, that God ever intended theſe miraculous powers ſhould be uſed merely for oſtentation, or to gratify the curioſity of ſpectators. Conſidering to what a degree of horrid refinement the art of poiſoning was by this time brought, as well as how frequently execution was done by giving poiſon to condemned perſons, in the age and country in which the Apoſtles lived, ſuch a promiſe as this will appear more important than the reader might at firſt apprehend. See Doddridge and Grotius.

Ver. 20. Preached every where] Through the whole Roman empire, or the then known world; and in ſpreading the knowledge of the Chriſtian religion in far diſtant countries, they met with great approbation and acceptance, both from Jews and Gentiles, who were not able to reſiſt the evidence of the miracles whereby they confirmed their doctrine. Thus St. Mark informs us; and it is reaſonable to conclude from hence, that he publiſhed his Goſpel pretty late.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XVI.

It is too juſt, however unpleaſing a remark, that while we conſider the lives of thoſe who profeſs a faith in the great doctrine of the reſurrection, and who received the ſacramental tokens of it in their baptiſm, there ſeems but too much reaſon to ſuſpect that they are not heartily convinced of its truth. For, after all the elaborate diſcourſes upon this ſubject, where is that indifference for the things of the world, that ſpiritual joy, that purity, that heavenly-mindedneſs, which the reſurrection of our Lord ſhould inſpire? Where is that ſelf-denial, that watchfulneſs over our own hearts, and attention to the omnipreſence of God, that exact juſtice in our dealing, that warm benevolence towards all men, and, in a word, that zealous preparation againſt the day of judgement, to which an effectual aſſurance of our own reſurrection would certainly oblige us?—I might aſk the greater part how they would live, if they did not believe any reſurrection:—What alteration would there be in their manners? Would they be more addicted to pleaſure, more intent upon their temporal intereſts, or leſs careful for the good of others? Yet they lay claim to the venerable name of Chriſtians, and repeat creeds, profeſſing their faith in our Lord's reſurrection. I dare not therefore ſay of ſuch, that they do not believe it; but I fear they have not duly thought about it; they are not ſufficiently apprized of the wondrous effects and conſequences of this great myſtery. For it is not enough that we know it by name, and by hearſay; all ſaving knowledge is experimental; and it is not ſufficient that we know the hiſtory, we muſt alſo feel the power, of our Lord's reſurrection; not only that he is riſen, but alſo that he is the reſurrection; as the ſun is light to himſelf, and the great ſource of day to all the worlds around him; ſo is our Lord reſurection to himſelf, and the cauſe and author of reſurrection in all others. Hence he ſaith of himſelf, I am the reſurrection and the life; which St. Paul clearly explains, Since by man came death, by man came alſo the reſurrection of the dead; for as in Adam all died, even ſo in Chriſt ſhall all be made alive.

This reſurrection to be wrought in us by Chriſt, is twofold, relating to the two conſtituent parts of man, the body and the ſoul; for to theſe two belong two diſtinct reſurrections, very different from each other.

The firſt reſurrection,—that of the ſoul,—is of a moral and ſpiritual nature. It is the riſing of the ſoul from the death of ſin, unto the life of righteouſneſs; States more different, and infinitely more important, than thoſe of natural life and death: It is peculiar to the ſaints of God; it requires our concurrence with the operations of grace, to which alone it is to be imputed; and bleſſed and holy is he, who has part in this firſt reſurrection.

The ſecond reſurrection is that of the body, after our natural death: It does not take place till the day of judgement: It is common to all men; it is neceſſary and inevitable; and is the effect of the juſtice, rather than of the grace of Almighty God.

Of both theſe reſurrections Jeſus Chriſt is the immediate cauſe and author: Of the firſt, as he is the Saviour of the world; and of the ſecond, as he is the Judge of it. For it is a prerogative very properly annexed to his office of univerſal Judge, that he ſhould by his own power ſummon all mankind to his tribunal.

This reſurrection from the natural death, is commonly well enough underſtood in the general. We can all, by a faith in the omnipotence of God, form ſatisfactory notions of our being raiſed again at the laſt day with our bodies; ſo that the whole man, which acted in this life, may be qualified for the rewards and puniſhments of the next.

But the ſpiritual reſurrection of our ſouls in this life, is a thing leſs thought of, and leſs underſtood by the generality of mankind. This is one of thoſe things of God, whereof the natural or animal man is ignorant; and requires a ſpiritual diſcernment, and ſome ſpiritual experience for the rightly apprehending it. The holy Scriptures treat of it very frequently, but no where more largely and clearly, than in the 6th chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans, (ver. 3—8, 10.) where a death to ſin is joined with the ſpiritual reſurrection, as a circumſtance indiſpenſably requiſite to, and implied in it: for no perſon is capable of a reſurrection till he is once dead.

It is neceſſary, therefore, that we conſider this death here mentioned, that we inquire what the old life is, and how it is extinguiſhed, before we can underſtand any thing of the ſpiritual reſurrection that follows it, and the new life to be conferred. The life to be loſt by this death, is ſaid to be that of our old man, which is a ſcriptural phraſe, ſignifying that nature, temper, or diſpoſition of mind, with which we are born, as we are the ſons of Adam, and heirs of original corruption; whereby, as the Scripture aſſures, and even our catechiſm inſtructs us, we are the children of wrath: it is this innate depravation which makes us ignorant of God, blind and ſtupid to all ſpiritual things, ſelfiſh, covetous, proud, unjuſt, deceitful, intemperate, impure, and hateful in the ſight of God.

But, as it would be an hard matter to make a blind man comprehend what darkneſs is, at leaſt to give him ſuch a notion of it as we have, though he lives in it continually; ſo it is alike difficult to give unconverted ſinners a right notion of what is here meant by the old man, becauſe this, as moſt other things, is beſt, if not only known by its contrary. But in general we are to know, that whatever tendency there is in our nature to the commiſſion of ſin, it is a part or member of the old man: While we are yet in our natural ſtate, unreformed by divine grace, this lives, this reigns in our mortal bodies. Why is this man a drunkard, that malicious, a third unjuſt in his dealings? The reaſon is, becauſe the reſurrection of Chriſt has not had its due effect; the mind is not renewed, and the old man of ſin is yet unmortified: That corrupt nature, which we received from Adam, is ſtill active and vigorous; lives and reigns in the hearts of unregenerate men; and would for ever reign there, did not Chriſt interpoſe, and by the virtue of his ſufferings and death communicate to believers ſuch powers of grace, as are ſufficient to deſtroy this root of evil in their ſouls. This corruption of our nature is ſuch as we cannot poſſibly reſiſt by our own ſtrength. In vain does the law encounter it with her impotent diſcipline; in vain does ſhe ſet before us her rigorous commands and prohibitions; in vain does ſhe diſplay her rewards and puniſhments. Theſe all ſerve only to ſhew us our guilt and danger, but cannot work our deliverance; we are ſtill the ſame men, and all our ſtruggles after virtue, are like the motions of a door upon its hinges, ſtill fixed to the ſame place.

But behold, a greater than Moſes is come in the Goſpel diſpenſation, even our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the fleſh, i. e. our corrupt nature, that, St. Paul ſaith God hath done for us, by ſending his own Son, in the likeneſs of ſinful fleſh. He has for and through him granted us new powers, whereby we are enabled to mortify and deſtroy our corrupt nature.

But this of itſelf is ſtill inſufficient to make us either holy or happy; it is at beſt but a negative goodneſs; there is more required of us than a mere abſtinence from vice; we muſt not only ceaſe to do evil, but learn to do well; and as the old man of ſin is to be deſtroyed, ſo the new man is to be raiſed up in us.

And this is a natural conſequence of the former: for if we be dead with Chriſt, we believe alſo that we ſhall be raiſed up with him. If we have been planted together in the likeneſs of his death, we ſhall alſo grow up in the likeneſs of his reſurrection. This is the language of the Holy Ghoſt, and the beſt interpretation to be given of it ſeems deducible from from the following principle: "That every act or ſuffering of Chriſt, as it is meritorious of grace, ſo alſo is it expreſſive of it: It repreſents that very kind of grace which it obtains for us." Thus Chriſt by his death put off all that mortal corruptible nature which he had received from Adam, with all its incident infirmities, and purchaſed for us thoſe graces, which are effectual for deſtroying in each of us the old Adam, the corrupt principles derived to us from our firſt parents; and in like manner at his reſurrection he reſumed a new nature, an incorruptible and glorious body; and thereby has obtained for us alſo a new nature, ſuch a diſpoſition and frame of ſoul, as will effectually produce all kinds of virtue, and richly abound in good works.

This is the great, the unſpeakable advantage which redounds to us from our Lord's reſurrection. It produces every thing that is truly great and glorious. It confers a divine life; it makes us partakers of the divine nature; ſtrong by the ſtrength, wiſe by the wiſdom, holy by the holineſs of God. But how few are there who rightly value it: The men of the world reliſh none of theſe things; they have no eyes to diſcern the beauty of holineſs; they fear the thoughts of it ſhould make them melancholy; all their concern is about the animal life, all their care is for the old man, his maintenance and ſupport, and how they may make proviſion for the fleſh to fulfil the luſts thereof. What wonder then that they feel no joy ariſe in their hearts at the news of our Lord's reſurrection, or at his aſſuring us, that He is the reſurrection, and will raiſe us up, as he did himſelf? They have no intereſt in it; they are not likely to be gainers by it; and therefore they ſee no glories in the Goſpel that relates it.

Others again, who pretend to have an higher opinion of virtue, and who own, by their words at leaſt, that it is the moſt noble acquiſition our nature is capable of, yet think that there is no ſuch great difficulty in attaining it; no need of ſuch heavenly machinery, as they may lightly term the myſteries of our redemption. "Good morality, ſay they, will carry us to heaven;" but they cannot ſee much ground for believing all the abſtruſe revelations of Chriſtianity, nor how we ſhall be made wiſer or happier by ſuch belief.

But let theſe men endeavour to live up even to their own notions of morality: Let them try how they can acquit themſelves in the duties of temperance, meekneſs, univerſal benevolence, and a ſuitable homage to the ſupreme being; and then, if they do not wilfully deceive themſelves, they will learn by their own experience, that they cannot do theſe things by their own ſtrength, and that they need divine ſupports and aſſiſtances in the arduous taſk of virtue. Then,—provided they be ſincere, and conſequently not indiſpoſed for the illumination of God's Holy Spirit,—then the Goſpel will appear to them in its proper beauty; and they will find it, according to its true interpretation, glad tidings; ſhewing them that Jeſus Chriſt is ready to do that for them, which they cannot do for themſelves; that by the merits and power of his death he will deſtroy their old man, the principle of evil that now tyrannizes in their ſouls; and by the power of his reſurrection work their ſpiritual reſurrection to the new life of righteouſneſs. The ſting of death is ſin; but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt!

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO SAINT LUKE.

CHAP. I.

The preface of Luke to his whole goſpel. The conception of John the Baptiſt, and of Chriſt. The prophecy of Elizabeth, and of Mary concerning Chriſt. The nativity and circumciſion of John. The prophecy of Zacharias concerning both Chriſt, and John.

FOraſmuch as many have taken in hand to ſet forth in order a declaration of thoſe things, which are moſt ſurely believed among us,

2 Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witneſſes, and miniſters of the word;

3 It ſeemed good to me alſo, having had perfect underſtanding of all things from the very firſt, to write unto thee in order, moſt excellent Theophilus,

Ver. 2. Hebr. ii. 3. 1 John i. 1. Mark i. 1. John xv. 27.—V. 3. Acts xv. 19, 25, 28. 1 Cor. vii. 40. Acts xi. 4. Acts i. 1.

LUKE] St. Luke is generally thought to have been a phyſician by profeſſion, Col. iv. 14. and is ſuppoſed to have been one of the ſeventy diſciples. He was the conſtant companion of St. Paul in his travels, and aſſiſted him at Rome for ſome time, as appears from Acts xxviii. 13—16. Col. iv. 14. and Phil. v. 24. From thence he is ſaid to have travelled into Africa, and to have preached the Goſpel at Thebes in Egypt. The ancients in general agree, that St. Luke wrote his Goſpel later than Matthew and Mark, though they aſſign a different year; but the moſt current opinion is, that he wrote it about the year 63; and according to the ſubſcription of the Syriac verſion, it was publiſhed at Alexandria in Egypt. Dr. Owen, however, is of opinion, that St. Luke wrote his Goſpel at Corinth about the year of our Lord 53, for the uſe of the Gentile converts. And Macknight conjectures, that it may be fairly inferred from St. Luke's preface, that he publiſhed his Goſpel before either Matthew or Mark wrote theirs. But theſe ſeveral opinions we ſhall examine in the Diſſertation on the Goſpels.

Chap. I. Ver. 1—3. Foraſmuch, &c.] Whereas many have undertaken to draw up a narrative of thoſe tranſactions which paſs current amongſt us, ver. 2. according as they were delivered to us by perſons who, &c. ver. 3. it ſeemed good to me alſo, having made a diligent inquiry into the whole matter, to write, &c. Wat. "This muſt refer, ſays Dr. Doddridge, to ſome hiſtories of the life of Chriſt which are now loſt; for Matthew and Mark, the only Evangeliſts who can be ſuppoſed to have written before Luke, could not with any propriety be called many; and of theſe two, Matthew at leaſt, wrote from perſonal knowledge, not the teſtimony of others. One muſt readily conclude, that the books referred to are loſt, as none of the apocryphal Goſpels now extant, publiſhed either by Fabricius, in his Cod. Apocryph. Nov. Teſt. or by Mr. Jones in his Hiſtory of the Canon, can with any ſhew of reaſon pretend to equal antiquity with this of Luke; but I cannot ſuppoſe, with ſome of the ancient fathers, that the Evangeliſt here intends the goſpels of Baſilides, Cerinthus, and ſome other early heretics, ſince he ſeems to allow theſe hiſtories, whatever they were, to have been at leaſt honeſtly written, according to information received from the moſt capable judges; and it is ſtrange that Euſebius ſhould imagine the words to be intended as a ſevere cenſure on the now-unknown compilers of theſe hiſtories, whoever they were." This appears to be a fair and candid ſtate of the caſe: Mr. Macknight, however, obſerves upon this preface, that at firſt ſight of it, one would be apt to think, that Luke ſpeaks here of the other Goſpels, and their authors; yet the character which he gives of the writers he had in view, makes it evident that they were hiſtorians of a different kind from the Evangeliſts, properly ſo called; for they wrote according to the information they had received from the eye-witneſſes and miniſters of the word, whereas the Evangeliſts, being eye-witneſſes themſelves, wrote from their own perſonal knowledge, improved by inſpiration; at leaſt Matthew and John were writers of this character; and as for Mark, though he was not an Apoſtle, he was moſt probably an early diſciple, and conſequently an eye-witneſs of the greateſt part of the things he has related. Epiphanius affirms, that he was one of the ſeventy. But, to ſet the matter in another light, if we interpret St. Luke's preface of the Evangeliſts, we muſt allow, that he had none but Matthew and Mark in view, ſince by the acknowledgment of all, John did not write his Goſpel till long after Luke's was publiſhed;—but that he ſhould call two hiſtorians many, is hard to be conceived. Further, if the Goſpels of Matthew and Mark were abroad when Luke was writing, we may be aſſured that he would peruſe them; and as he ſpeaks of perſons who had compoſed hiſtories of Chriſt's life, he could not by any means overlook authors of their character. On this ſuppoſition, can it be imagined, that while his own Goſpel was penned under the direction of the Spirit, according to the information he had received from thoſe who were eye-witneſſes, he would only ſay, of an eye-witneſs, and an Apoſtle, on whom the Spirit hath deſcended, or even of an Apoſtle's companion, that they had taken in hand to give the hiſtory of Chriſt's life, and not rather have mentioned both them and their works with particular approbation. The probability of this opinion is heightened by the following conſideration: It makes the Goſpels appear with a noble and beautiful propriety; for, on ſuppoſition that St. Luke wrote before the reſt, we conceive the reaſon why they have paſſed over in ſilence the many miraculous circumſtances with which the conception, birth, and circumciſion both of the Meſſiah's forerunner, and of the Meſſiah himſelf were honoured, together with the prophecies of Simeon and Anna uttered at our Lord's preſentation in the temple, as alſo the hiſtory of his childhood and private life: Luke had accurately, and at great length related all theſe things, without omitting any particular that deſerved to be mentioned. On the other hand, if we think Matthew and Mark wrote before Luke, their Goſpels will appear defective in theſe important points, and no reaſon will offer itſelf to juſtify ſuch material omiſſion. See more in Macknight's Prelim. Obſerv. 7. and the Diſſertation on the Goſpels. Inſtead of have taken in hand to ſet forth in order a declaration, Heylin, Doddridge, &c. read, have undertaken to compoſe an hiſtory. The word πεπληροφορημένων, Dr. Doddridge renders, confirmed with the fulleſt evidence: It implies both that fulneſs of evidence by which any fact is ſupported, and likewiſe that confidence, or fulneſs of aſſent, by which facts ſo ſupported are believed. Compare 2 Tim. iv. 5, 7. in the Greek.

Ver. 2. Miniſters of the word] Some have ſuppoſed, that by the word, St. Luke meant Chriſt himſelf. See John i. 1. Others however underſtand by the word, the tranſactions of our Lord's public life, or the Goſpel; called the word, as being the great ſubject of the preaching of the Apoſtles, who were eye and ear-witneſſes of theſe things. It ſeems as plain as poſſible, from this verſe, that they could not be falſe or heretical Goſpels to which St. Luke alludes.

Ver. 3. Having had perfect underſtanding from the very firſt, &c.] By tracing them from their firſt riſe. Wat. Having exactly traced all things from, &c. MS. Παρηκολουθηκότι πᾶσιν ἀκριβῶς, plainly ſignifies that accuracy of inveſtigation, on which the perfect underſtanding of his ſubject was built. Some pious and learned writers have pleaded this text as an argument for the inſpiration of St. Luke's Goſpel, and conſequently of the reſt; becauſe the word ἄνωθεν ſignifies from above, or from heaven, as it plainly does John iii. 31. James i. 17. iii. 15, 17. But St. Luke ſo evidently uſes it in the ſenſe here given from the firſt, or from their firſt riſe, Acts

4 That thou mighteſt know the certainty of thoſe things wherein thou haſt been inſtructed.

5 THERE was in the days of Herod the king of Judea, a certain prieſt named Zacharias, of the courſe of Abia: and his wife was of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Eliſabeth.

6 And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameleſs.

7 And they had no child, becauſe that Eliſabeth was barren, and they both were now well ſtricken in years.

8 And it came to paſs, that while he executed the prieſt's office before God, in the order of his courſe,

9 According to the cuſtom of the prieſt's office, his lot was to burn incenſe when he went into the temple of the Lord.

10 And the whole multitude of the people were praying without, at the time of incenſe.

11 And there appeared unto him an angel

Ver. 4. John xx. 31.—V. 5. Matth. ii. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 10. Neh. xii. 4, 17.—V. 10. Exod. xxx. 7. Lev. xvi. 17. Rev. viii. 3, 4.

xxvi. 5.) and that ſenſe is ſo common elſewhere, and ſeems ſo abſolutely neceſſary in this connection with παρηκολουθηκότι, that the text ſeems not at all to the purpoſe; the argument is one of thoſe, which, like pieces of ſuperfluous armour, incumber rather than defend. To write in order, may ſignify to give a particular detail, in oppoſition to an abridgement, or a conciſe account; and the Evangeliſt may, with great propriety, be ſaid to have given an orderly account of the hiſtory of Chriſt, as the leading facts are in their due ſeries, though ſome particulars are tranſpoſed. The title of moſt excellent, Κράτιστε, was commonly given to perſons in the higheſt ſtations of life. Accordingly St. Paul, ſpeaking to the governors Felix and Feſtus, uſes it in his addreſſes to them; wherefore their opinion ſeems to be groundleſs, who, attending to the ſignification of the Greek word Theophilus, "beloved of God," imagine that the Evangeliſt does not mean any particular perſon, but all true Chriſtians, and lovers of God. Theophilus ſeems to have been a Greek, and a perſon of high rank. Probably Luke, while in Greece with St. Paul, had received particular civilities from him, and in teſtimony of his reſpect, inſcribed his two books to him, beſtowing on him thereby a fame which will laſt while Chriſtianity ſubſiſts. St. Luke might have a thorough knowledge of the facts which he here refers to, by intimate converſation with the Apoſtles, and particularly St. Paul; or, he might have been preſent himſelf at a number of the tranſactions which he has recorded. The aſſurance with which he ſpeaks of his own knowledge of theſe things, leads us to think that he was an eye-witneſs of ſome of them. On this ſuppoſition, his reaſoning in the preface to his hiſtory will be more concluſive than on any other, and will ſtand thus: "Seeing many have written from the information of eye-witneſſes, and miniſters of the word, I, who from the very firſt have had perfect knowledge of all things, both by converſing with the eye-witneſſes, and by being preſent myſelf at many of the tranſactions of Jeſus, thought it incumbent on me to write his hiſtory, for the more certain information of mankind."

Ver. 4. Wherein thou haſt been inſtructed] Κατηχήθης, the original word, expreſſes with great accuracy the inſtructions given to thoſe who were training up for admiſſion into the Chriſtian church, whoſe name of catechumens was derived from hence, and applied without any particular regard to the age of the perſons concerned. See Acts xviii. 25. Rom. ii. 18. and Doddridge.

Ver. 5. In the days of Herod, &c.] See on Matth. ii. 1. The deſcendants of Aaron multiplied to ſuch a degree, that they could not all do duty in the temple at once; David therefore divided them into 24 courſes, who miniſtered weekly in their turns. The time of their miniſtration was called ἐφημερία, as was likewiſe the courſe itſelf; but the name belonged originally to the Athenian magiſtrates, called Prytaneis, who, being fifty men choſen by lot out of a tribe, and each man governing the city a ſingle day, the days which any tribe governed, as well as its fifty Prytaneis ſucceeding one another, were called ἐφημερία. Hence, becauſe the Jewiſh courſes of prieſts reſembled the Athenian Prytaneis in ſeveral reſpects, they had their name applied to them by thoſe who wrote in Greek; but with ſome impropriety, as their miniſtry laſted not for a day, but a week. The courſe of Abia, to which Zacharias belonged, was the 8th in David's regulation, but whether the courſes were the ſame now as at the firſt inſtitution, is impoſſible to determine. Comp. 1 Chron. xxiii. 6. and xxiv. 10. and ſee Macknight, and Potter's Antiquities.

Ver. 6. In the commandments and ordinances] The criticks are generally agreed that theſe words ſignify, the one the moral, the other the ceremonial precepts of the law; but they are greatly divided in fixing the particular ſenſe of each. The truth is, undoubted examples may be produced, to prove that both words were uſed promiſcuouſly in both ſenſes; for which reaſon, to diſpute nicely about them is needleſs. The plain meaning is, that this exemplary couple were faithfully obſervant both of the moral and ceremonial inſtitutions of the law; ſo that they were not only of a fair character in their dealings with men, but likewiſe illuſtrious for their piety, and ſincere in their worſhip of God. This appears to be St. Luke's meaning; not that they were abſolutely free from ſin, for he mentions a fault which Zacharias fell into on this occaſion, and which met with a remarkable chaſtiſement. See Bell's Enquiry into the Miſſions of St. John, &c. p. 46.

Ver. 9. His lot] Becauſe ſome parts of the ſacred ſervice were more honourable than others, both the prieſts and Levites divided the whole among them by lot. The Jews tell us, that there were three prieſts employed about the ſervice of the incenſe; one carried away the aſhes left on the altar at the preceding ſervice, another brought a pan of burning coals from the altar of ſacrifice, and having placed it on the golden altar, departed; a third went in with the incenſe, ſprinkled it on the burning coals, and while the ſmoke aſcended, made interceſſion for the people. This was the part that fell to Zacharias, and the moſt honourable in the whole ſervice. See Macknight. Dr. Heylin renders this verſe, According to the cuſtom of diſtributing the ſacerdotal functions, the lot fell upon him to enter into the ſanctuary, and offer incenſe.

Ver. 10. The whole multitude, &c.] Becauſe it ſometimes happened, that, on ordinary week-days, few or none of the people attended the morning and evening ſacrifices, there were four and twenty men employed to attend this ſervice, as repreſentatives of the people of Iſrael, to lay their hands on the heads of the ſacrifice, to pray; and to receive the bleſſing. Theſe were called, from their office, ſtationary men. Wherefore the manner in which the Evangeliſt has expreſſed himſelf on this occaſion—the whole multitude of the people, ſhews that an unuſual concourſe was in the temple when Zacharias had this viſion. Probably the day on which he burned this incenſe was a ſabbath, or ſome high feſtival, when there was always a great multitude aſſembled. This circumſtance, duly attended to, ſtrengthens the credibility of the facts reported by the Evangeliſt. Zacharias's tarrying in the temple beyond the uſual time, muſt thus have been taken notice of by many. See ver. 21. There were likewiſe many, who, upon his coming out dumb, conjectured that he had ſeen a viſion, ver. 22. Matters of ſo public a nature, the truth or falſhood whereof ſo many muſt have known, would never have been thus openly appealed to by St. Luke, if they had been falſe. The Evangeliſt adds, that the people were praying without at the time of incenſe.—As the daily ſacrifice repreſented the ſacrifice of Chriſt, and the incenſe the prayers of the ſaints, Rev. viii. 1—4. the incenſe was ordered to be burned while the ſacrifice was offering, to teach mankind that it was through the ſacrifice of Chriſt they had acceſs to the Deity. Accordingly, the ſacrifices and incenſe both morning and evening were fitly accompanied with the prayers of the people; and that not in the temple only, but every where elſe; pious men chooſing to put up their ſupplications at the hours of ſacrifice, while the miniſters of religion interceded for the nation. Hence theſe hours were called hours of prayer, Acts iii. 1. The half hour's ſilence mentioned Rev. viii. 1. ſeems to allude to the circumſtance of the prieſt's abſence while burning incence; and if that chapter be compared with Ecclus. l. 15, &c. it will receive no ſmall illuſtration. What is above-mentioned was the foundation of that elegant figure by which prayer is ſo often compared in Scripture to incenſe: perhaps one reaſon of ordaining incenſe might be to intimate the acceptableneſs of thoſe pious prayers which were to accompany it; and indeed burning fragrant perfumes was, and in eaſtern nations ſtill is, ſo important a part of the entertainment of illuſtrious families, that one might well expect it in the houſe of God. It is ſo plain that this was only an office of daily miniſtration, and that Zacharias was one of the ordinary prieſts, that one cannot but be ſurpriſed that any ſhould conclude from this circumſtance, that Zacharias was ſagan, or aſſiſtant to the high-prieſt, and was now performing his grand office on the day of atonement, and ſo on this foundation ſhould calculate the birth of John the Baptiſt and of Chriſt, and all the other feaſts which depend upon them; yet this is done in the calendars both of the Roman and Greek church. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Hammond.

Ver. 11. There appeared unto him an angel] It is altogether uncertain whether this happened at the morning or evening ſacrifice. Grotius thinks it was in the morning; others fancy it was in the evening; but neither opinion is properly ſupported. Perhaps therefore it may be more to the purpoſe to obſerve, that as all nations reckoned the right ſide of their temples and altars fortunate, the hiſtorian has mentioned the angel's appearing on the right ſide of the altar, to ſignify that it was a lucky omen, deſigned to encourage Zacharias, and to raiſe in him the expectation of good tidings. It is obſervable from the rabbinical writings, that theſe divine apparitions uſed generally to be made at the time of burning incenſe.

of the Lord, ſtanding on the right ſide of the altar of incenſe.

12 And when Zacharias ſaw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him.

13 But the angel ſaid unto him, Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Eliſabeth ſhall bear thee a ſon, and thou ſhalt call his name John.

14 And thou ſhalt have joy and gladneſs; and many ſhall rejoice at his birth.

15 For he ſhall be great in the ſight of the Lord, and ſhall drink neither wine nor ſtrong drink; and he ſhall be filled with the Holy Ghoſt, even from his mother's womb.

16 And many of the children of Iſrael ſhall he turn to the Lord their God.

17 And he ſhall go before him in the ſpirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the diſobedient to the wiſdom of the juſt; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

18 And Zacharias ſaid unto the angel, Whereby ſhall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well ſtricken in years.

19 And the angel anſwering, ſaid unto him, I am Gabriel, that ſtand in the preſence of God; and am ſent to ſpeak unto thee, and to ſhew thee theſe glad tidings.

20 And behold, thou ſhalt be dumb, and not able to ſpeak, until the day that theſe things ſhall be performed, becauſe thou believeſt not my words, which ſhall be fulfilled in their ſeaſon.

Ver. 11. Exod. xxx. 1.—V. 13. Ver. 60, 63.—V. 14. Ver. 58.—V. 15. Numb. vi. 3. Jer. i. 5. Gal. i. 15—V. 16. Mal. iv. 5, 6.—V. 17. Mal. iv. 5. Matth. xi. 14. Ecclus. xlviii. 10. Or, by.—V. 18. Gen. xvii. 17.—V. 19. Dan. viii. 16. ix. 21.—V. 20. Ezek. iii. 26. xxiv. 27.

Ver. 12. He was troubled, &c.] That is, according the Hebrew idiom, he was exceedingly afraid. The angel's form was ſuch, as ſhewed him plainly to be a being of a ſuperior nature. See Judges xiii. 6. But Zacharias neither knew of what kind he was, nor on what errand he was come: no wonder then that he was exceedingly terrified, eſpecially if he ſuſpected him to be an evil ſpirit. See ver. 18, 19.

Ver. 13. Thy prayer is heard] We cannot imagine that this holy man, at ſo advanced an age, and on ſuch an occaſion, would pray for the pregnancy of his wife, who was very old. The prieſts in this office conſidered themſelves as the mouth of the people, and made the welfare of the nation the ſubject of their prayers. Wherefore, ſince it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe that Zacharias now interceded for the coming of the Meſſiah, in whom all the families of the earth were to be bleſſed, we may conſider the angel's words as having a reference to ſuch a prayer, thus: "The Meſſiah, for whoſe coming thou prayedſt, is about to be born; for thy wife ſhall bring forth his forerunner." Some indeed are of opinion, that thoſe prayers are meant which Zacharias may have put up for offspring when he and his wife were young; yet the time and place of the viſion give reaſon to believe that the object of it was a matter of more general concernment. It was the office of the father to name the child, as appears from ver. 62. John, in the Hebrew tongue, ſignifies The grace of God. Hence it was fitly given to the Meſſiah's forerunner, who was ſent to proclaim the immediate accompliſhment of God's merciful intentions towards men, the expectation of which had been raiſed in them by all the preceding diſpenſations of religion. Αγαλλίασις, which we render gladneſs, in the next verſe, properly anſwers to the word exultation, or leaping for joy. See 1 Pet. i. 8. iv. 13. and Matth. v. 12.

Ver. 15. He ſhall be great, &c.] By this ſome underſtand that true greatneſs, whereof God is the ſovereign judge, in oppoſition to that greatneſs which men acknowledge, who often err in their opinion of things. "He ſhall be great in the ſight of God, not of man." But great in the ſight of God ſeems to be an Hebrew expreſſion of the ſame form with ἀστεῖος τῷ Θεῷ, Acts vii. 20. fair to God, or exceeding fair, and ſignifies, he ſhall be exceeding great; namely, in reſpect of his character, his office, his inſpiration, and the ſucceſs of his miniſtry, as it is explained by the angel himſelf. He was to drink neither wine nor ſtrong drink; that is, to convince mankind that he was ſeparated in a peculiar manner for the ſervice of God. He was to live the life of the Nazarites, Numb. vi. 3. who were eſteemed as devoted to God's ſervice in a particular manner. He was to be filled with the Holy Ghoſt, which, in Scripture, commonly ſignifies that degree of inſpiration by which the prophets anciently ſpake. Accordingly in this chapter it is applied to Elizabeth, to Mary, and Zacharias, in caſes where they all ſpake by a particular inſpiration. When the angel therefore told Zacharias that his ſon ſhould be filled with the Holy Ghoſt, even from his mother's womb, his meaning was, that he ſhould be very early inſpired to teach the doctrines and precepts of true religion; nor will this ſeem ſtrange, when it is remembered, that at the age of twelve years our Lord exerciſed his prophetical gifts among the doctors in the temple. Luke ii. 49.

Ver. 17. And he ſhall go before him, &c.] That is, before Jeſus Chriſt, here ſtiled the Lord their God. The ſon of Zacharias had the ſpirit of Elijah, equalling if not exceeding him, in the ſeverity of manners, in courage, and in ſuſtaining perſecutions; for he was clad in a garment of camel's hair, fed on locuſts and wild honey, rebuked ſinners of the higheſt diſtinction with great boldneſs, and was put to death on that account. He had the power alſo of Elijah; for though he did no miracle, he was honoured with the like ſucceſs in reſtoring the loſt ſpirit of true religion among his countrymen. Nay, he even excelled Elijah in that, which is properly the power of a prophet, and to which all his other gifts were ſubſervient,—the power of converting men; being in this more ſucceſsful without miracles, than Elijah had been with them. By his preaching he made ſuch a general change in the manners of the nation, that he turned the hearts of the fathers Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, to their children the Jews, from whom they had been alienated, on account of their wickedneſs; and the hearts of the children to their fathers, by begetting in them a love of religion and religious characters, and by ſo doing, prepared a people for the coming of the Lord. This is Macknight's interpretation. See the note on Mal. iv. 5, 9. and on Mark ix. 10. Dr. Waterland reads, To turn the hearts of the fathers with the children, and the diſobedient to a ſenſe of righteouſneſs, &c. Dr. Doddridge tranſlates and paraphraſes the paſſage thus: "He ſhall meet with ſuch glorious ſucceſs in his miniſtry, as to convert the hearts of the fathers, with thoſe of the children; that is, he ſhall bring many, both of the riſing and the declining age to that real piety towards God, which will be the fureſt band of their mutual duty towards each other: and many of thoſe who have hitherto been diſobedient to the wiſdom of the juſt (that is, inſenſible of the obligations to real religion, which is the greateſt wiſdom,) ſhall he make ready, as a people prepared for the Lord; raiſing in their minds an expectation of the Meſſiah, and a diſpoſition to welcome him, when he ſhall appear."

Ver. 18. And Zacharias ſaid, &c.] In the Old Teſtament there are inſtances of holy men, who, on occaſions like this, ſpake as Zacharias is ſaid to have done; and who, inſtead of being reproved, are greatly commended for their faith. (Compare Gen. xv. 8. with Rom. iv. 19, 20.) Nevertheleſs, the treatment which he met with will not appear hard, when it is conſidered that the diſpoſitions of his mind were very different from thoſe of the perſons mentioned. They believed the meſſages which were brought them, and deſired to be confirmed in the faith thereof; conſequently the language of their demand was, "Lord, I believe; help mine unbelief." Whereas Zacharias did not believe at all. This we are expreſly told, ver. 20. And as this want of faith could proceed from nothing but his fancying the angel to be an evil ſpirit, who deſigned to delude him, his ſin was great, and his puniſhment juſt; and the more ſo, as he could not but often have read the account which the Scripture gives of the births of Iſaac, Jacob, Joſeph, Sampſon, Samuel, &c. all deſcended from Mothers who had been long barren. The reſemblance in circumſtances might well have produced a peculiar regard to them, and one would have imagined that he ſhould immediately have recollected the ſtory of the Angel's appearance to Manoah in particular. See Judges xiii. 2—14. Macknight and Doddridge.

Ver. 19. I am Gabriel, that ſtand, &c.] As much as to ſay, "I am no evil ſpirit, as thou ſuppoſeſt, but the angel Gabriel, the ſame ſervant of God (ſo the name ſignifies, being by interpretation vir Dei, —a man, or ſervant of God) who, as the Scripture informs thee, appeared anciently to the prophet Daniel, with a meſſage concerning the Meſſiah. (See Dan. viii 16. ix. 21.) The truth of this thou mayeſt know from the place where I now ſtand, and from the time at which I appear to thee; for I am now in the preſence of God, even in his ſanctuary, where no evil ſpirit, pretending a commiſſion from him, can poſſibly enter. I, who now ſtand in the preſence of God, am Gabriel; (for ſo the words may be rendered.) Moreover, I am not come of myſelf, but I am ſent of God, to tell thee the glad tidings of the near accompliſhment of the things which I long ago ſhewed to Daniel at a great diſtance. Thou, therefore, whoſe advanced age ought to have been venerable by an advanced knowledge of divine things, as well as by a ſtrong faith in the power of God, art much to blame for calling in queſtion the truth of my meſſage; eſpecially as by the prophecies of Daniel thou mighteſt have underſtood that this is the period determined for the coming of the Meſſiah, and his forerunner."

Ver. 20. Thou ſhalt be dumb, and not able to ſpeak] The affirmation of a thing joined with the denial of its contrary, is an idiom peculiar to the 21 And the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried ſo long in the temple.

22 And when he came out, he could not ſpeak unto them: and they perceived that he had ſeen a viſion in the temple; for he beckoned unto them, and remained ſpeechleſs.

23 And it came to paſs, that as ſoon as the days of his miniſtration were accompliſhed, he departed to his own houſe.

24 And after thoſe days his wife Eliſabeth conceived, and hid herſelf five months, ſaying, 25 Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men.

26 And in the ſixth month, the angel Gabriel was ſent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, 27 To a virgin eſpouſed to a man whoſe name was Joſeph, of the houſe of David; and the virgin's name was Mary.

28 And the angel came in unto her, and ſaid, Hail, thou that art highly favoured! the Lord is with thee: bleſſed art thou among women!

29 And when ſhe ſaw him, ſhe was troubled at his ſaying, and caſt in her mind what manner of ſalutation this ſhould be.

30 And the angel ſaid unto her, Fear not, Mary; for thou haſt found favour with God.

31 And behold, thou ſhalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a ſon, and ſhalt call his name JESUS.

32 He ſhall be great, and ſhall be called the Son of the Higheſt: and the Lord God ſhall give unto him the throne of his father David.

33 And he ſhall reign over the houſe of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there ſhall be no end.

the Jewiſh language, and is the ſtrongeſt affirmation poſſible. The ſtyle of John is remarkable for the frequency of this idiom. See on ver. 22.

Ver. 21. The people waited for Zacharias] They waited for his bleſſing, and could not imagine what had detained him ſo much longer than uſual. See Numb. vi. 23—27. Lev. ix. 22, 23. All that is here recorded might have paſſed in a few minutes; it ſeems probable therefore, that, ſince the people took notice of his continuing ſo much longer than ordinary in the holy place, he ſpent ſome time in ſecret devotion, where in the mixture of holy affections ariſing on ſo great and extraordinary an occaſion, he might eaſily forget how faſt the moments paſſed away. See Doddridge.

Ver. 22. For he beckoned unto them] He made ſigns to them. The word Κωφὸς, rendered ſpeechleſs, ſignifies deaf, as well as dumb, the latter being generally the conſequence of the former; and accordingly it is concluded from ver. 62. that Zacharias loſt his hearing with his ſpeech during that interval.

Ver. 24, 25. And hid herſelf five months] The meaning is, either that ſhe ſaw no company, judging it proper to ſpend moſt of her time in the duties of devotion, and in meditating ſilently on the wonderful goodneſs of God; or that ſhe concealed her pregnancy for a while, leſt ſhe ſhould expoſe herſelf to ridicule, by ſpeaking of it before ſhe knew certainly that it was a real conception. That barrenneſs was a reproach amongſt the Jews, appears from Gen. xxx. 23. 1 Sam. i. 11. Iſai. iv. 1. liv. i. 4. and many other paſſages. That a branch of the family of Aaron ſhould fail, would alſo be looked upon as a particular calamity, and might, by ignorant and uncharitable people, be interpreted as a judgement; and ſo much the rather, conſidering the many promiſes God had made to increaſe the families of his obedient people. See Exod. xxxii. 13. Lev. xxvi. 9. Deut. vii. 13. and Pſ. cxxvii. 3, 4, 5. It may not be improper here juſt to obſerve, that conſidering how the whole Jewiſh policy was interwoven with thoſe acts of religion which were to be performed by the prieſts alone, it might ſeem wonderful that no proviſion at all ſhould be made for intailing the prieſthood on any other family, if that of Aaron ſhould happen to be extinct. Leaving this contingency unprovided for, was in effect reſting the whole credit of the Jewiſh religion upon the perpetual continuance of the male branches of that family; an iſſue, on which no man of Moſes's prudence, nor indeed of common ſenſe, would have reſted his legiſlation, if he had not been truly conſcious of its divine original; eſpecially after two of Aaron's four ſons had been cut off in one day, for a raſh act in the execution of their office as ſoon as they were initiated into it, and died without any children. See Numb. vi. 3, 4. and Doddridge.

Ver. 26. In the ſixth month] Namely, of Elizabeth's pregnancy. Galilee was the moſt northern part of Paleſtine. It was bounded on the north by Lebanon and Syria, on the weſt by Phœnicia, on the ſouth by Samaria, and on the eaſt, according to Joſephus, by Jordan and the ſea of Tiberias; yet from the Goſpel it appears, that a part of the country north of the ſea, and eaſtward of Jordan, was reckoned Galilee. Galilee therefore comprehended the poſſeſſions of the tribes of Iſſachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Aſher. It was divided into upper and lower Galilee, whereof the former was called Galilee of the Gentiles, (Matth. iv. 15.) becauſe it bordered upon the Gentile nations, and was partly inhabited by them. Joſephus tells us (Bel. l. iii. c. 2.) that the whole country was exceeding populous, and very fruitful; that the number of its towns and villages was great; and that even in the leſſer towns there were no leſs than fifteen thouſand inhabitants. See Macknight, and on Matth. ii. 23.

Ver. 27. To a virgin eſpouſed, &c.] It is of the greateſt conſequence to prove that Chriſt was lineally deſcended from David, this being one of the characteriſtics of the Meſſiah; but this cannot be inferred from the genealogy of Joſeph, becauſe he was only the reputed father of Chriſt. It would appear undeniably that Mary was of the houſe of David, if this verſe were rendered thus, to a virgin of the houſe af David, betrothed to a man, whoſe name was Joſeph; and the virgin's name was Mary. What makes for this interpretation is, that this and the preceding verſe refer wholly to the virgin; who is deſcribed by the place of her reſidence, Nazareth; by her relation to Joſeph, being eſpouſed to him; by her lineage and deſcent, of the houſe of David; and by her name, Mary. Whitby.

Ver. 28. Hail, thou that art highly favoured] Thou who haſt found favour, or mercy with God, as it is expounded ver. 38. It follows, Bleſſed art thou among women: So it is ſaid of Jael, Judg. v. 24. of Ruth, iii. 10. See alſo 1 Sam. xxv. 33. Again, the Lord is with thee, is ſaid to Gideon, Judg. vi. 12. and the words, ver. 30. thou haſt found favour with God, are ſaid of Noah, Gen. vi. 8. of Joſeph, Gen. xxxix. 4. and of David, Acts vii. 46. So that here is nothing ſaid of the bleſſed virgin in this ſalutation, which was not before ſaid of others. See Whitby. Inſtead of among women, Dr. Waterland reads above women; which appears a juſt tranſlation: for the Jews do not expreſs their degrees of compariſon by any change at the end of the words, like other nations, but by doubling or trebling the poſitive, or by adding a prepoſition, ſuch as with, or among; and accordingly this ſalutation, which is expreſſed in the Hebrew idiom, ſignifies, that ſhe was ſuperlatively bleſſed. This ſalutation gives no room for any pretence of paying adoration to the virgin, as having no appearance of a prayer, or of worſhip offered to her. See Bengelius.

Ver. 29. She was troubled, &c.] She was diſturbed at his diſcourſe, and reaſoned with herſelf, or revolved in her mind, what this ſalutation ſhould mean. Heylin, and Doddridge. The virgin ſeems to have ſuſpected that this might poſſibly proceed from the artifice of ſome evil ſpirit, to inſpire her with ſentiments of vanity and pride.

Ver. 33. And of his kingdom there ſhall be no end] So the prophet Iſai. xix. 6, 17. Unto us a child is born, &c. of the increaſe of his government and peace there ſhall be no end. The kingdom of Chriſt is twofold. 1. His ſpiritual kingdom, or the dominion of righteouſneſs in the minds of men. 2. His temporal kingdom, or the outward diſpenſation of the Goſpel, together with an exerciſe of government over the world, by which all events are ordered ſo as to promote the empire of righteouſneſs in the hearts of men. This diſtinction removes the difficulty ariſing from 1 Cor. xv. 28.—where we are told, that after the worlds are judged, Chriſt ſhall deliver up the kingdom to God the Father;—compared with what Gabriel ſaid to Mary on this occaſion, and with the other paſſages of Scripture, which affirm that our Lord's kingdom ſhall be everlaſting. His temporal kingdom, or the Goſpel diſpenſation, will end with the world, being of no farther uſe. At that period likewiſe, he will deliver up to God the government of the world, which was committed to him for the good of his church, after having accompliſhed the end of his coming, by putting down all rule and all authority and power oppoſite to God's. But his ſpiritual kingdom, or the dominion of righteouſneſs in the minds of reaſonable beings, which he came down 34 Then ſaid Mary unto the angel, How ſhall this be, ſeeing I know not a man?

35 And the angel anſwered and ſaid unto her, The Holy Ghoſt ſhall come upon thee, and the power of the Higheſt ſhall overſhadow thee: therefore alſo that holy thing which ſhall be born of thee, ſhall be called The Son of God.

36 And behold, thy couſin Eliſabeth, ſhe hath alſo conceived a ſon in her old age: and this is the ſixth month with her, who was called barren.

37 For with God nothing ſhall be impoſſible.

38 And Mary ſaid, Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word. And the angel departed from her.

39 And Mary aroſe in thoſe days, and went into the hill-country with haſte, into a city of Juda;

40 And entered into the houſe of Zacharias, and ſaluted Eliſabeth.

41 And it came to paſs, that when Eliſabeth heard the ſalutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb; and Eliſabeth was filled with the Holy Ghoſt:

42 And ſhe ſpake out with a loud voice, and ſaid, Bleſſed art thou among women, and bleſſed is the fruit of thy womb.

43 And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord ſhould come to me?

44 For lo, as ſoon as the voice of thy ſalutation ſounded in my ears, the babe leaped in my womb for joy.

45 And bleſſed is ſhe that believed: for there ſhall be a performance of thoſe things which were told her from the Lord.

46 And Mary ſaid, My ſoul doth magnify the Lord, to eſtabliſh, will continue with them to all eternity. Or we may ſuppoſe, that after the management of the world is delivered up to God, Jeſus will ſtill preſide as head over the redeemed ſociety of heaven, and perform ſuch acts of government as their condition allows, and circumſtances require, though ſtill in ſubordination to God. For the Apoſtle ſays expreſly, that then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject unto him that did put all things under him, that God may be all in all. Or the epithet, everlaſting, when applied to Chriſt's kingdom, may be taken in a popular ſenſe, for a duration to the end of time, in oppoſition to the ſhort continuance of earthly kingdoms. Macknight.

Ver. 37. Gen. xviii. 14. Jer. xxxii. 17. Zech. viii. 6. Matth. xix. 26. Ch. xviii. 27.—V. 39. Joſh. xxi. 10, 11.—V. 45. Or, which believed that there, &c.

Ver. 34, 35. Then ſaid Mary unto the angel, &c.] When Mary heard Gabriel ſay that ſhe was to conceive the Meſſiah, being conſcious of her virginity, ſhe found the matter above her comprehenſion, and therefore deſired him to explain it. Being young and unexperienced, it was not to be expected that ſhe could have a comprehenſion of mind and ſtrength of faith equal to that which the old prieſt Zacharias ought to have poſſeſſed. Beſides, this was a thing ſupernatural, and altogether without example. For though it is not diſtinctly mentioned by the Evangeliſt, it is plain from Mary's anſwer that the angel had let her know ſhe was to conceive forthwith, and without the concurrence of a man. Theſe ſeem to have been the reaſons why Gabriel, who had ſtruck Zacharias dumb for preſuming to aſk a ſign in proof of his wife's future pregnancy, bore with the virgin when ſhe deſired to know how her's could be brought about. In the mean time it ſhould be obſerved, that Mary did not, like Zacharias, inſinuate that ſhe would not believe till a miracle was wrought to convince her, but only that ſhe did not underſtand how her pregnancy could be effected in her virgin ſtate, and deſired him to explain it to her, not doubting but it was poſſible. Wherefore the weakneſs of her apprehenſion being conſiſtent with faith, and her requeſt being conceived with modeſty and humility, the angel told her that the wonderful event ſhould be accompliſhed by the interpoſition of the Holy Spirit, and ſpecial energy of the power of God, who would preſerve her reputation entire, at leaſt in the opinion of impartial judges, and protect her from any enquiry, to which this myſtery might expoſe her; For, by the Jewiſh law, a ſevere puniſhment was inflicted on women betrothed, who proved with child before cohabitation with their huſbands. This protection, perhaps, may be implied in the phraſe, overſhadow thee. To be under the ſhadow of wings, is a phraſe uſed in the Pſalms, to expreſs the tender affection with which God preſerves his ſervants. But, if the paſſage be only exegetical of the preceding clauſe, there may be a reference perhaps to Gen. i. 2. where the ſpirit of God is repreſented, as brooding or hovering over chaos; which Milton expreſſes thus:

> ——— Thou from the firſt
> Waſt preſent, and with mighty wings outſpread,
> Dove-like ſat'ſt brooding on the vaſt abyſs,
> And mad'ſt it pregnant. Par. Loſt, b. i. ver. 19.

It is added, That holy thing which ſhall be born of thee ſhall be called,—that is, ſhall be, the Son of God; becauſe thou ſhalt conceive him by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghoſt, cauſing him to exiſt in thy womb. Τὸ γεννώμενον, in the neuter gender, denotes the human nature of Chriſt, derived from his virgin mother:—born of thee.

Ver. 36. Thy couſin Elizabeth] Mary and Elizabeth might be couſins, as the text affirms, although the former was a deſcendant of David, and the latter a daughter of Aaron: Becauſe the law, Numb. xxxvi. 6. forbidding women to marry out of their own tribes, related only to heireſſes, and conſequently did not include the tribe of Levi, which had no particular heritable poſſeſſions that could be alienated by ſuch marriages. Accordingly, in Lev. xxii. 12. it is ſuppoſed, as a common caſe, that a prieſt's daughter might be married to a ſtranger. It is remarkable that Gabriel does not refer the virgin to Sarah or Rebekah, examples in former ages, but to a preſent one; and to magnify and heighten the miracle, he adds, that Elizabeth was advanced in years, and what was more, never had a child. See Macknight, and Grotius.

Ver. 38. Behold the handmaid, &c.] Mary expreſſed in this anſwer both great faith and great reſignation. She believed what the angel had told her concerning her conception, and wiſhed for it, not regarding the inconveniences to which ſhe might be expoſed thereby; as well knowing that the power of God could eaſily protect her. It is worthy of our remark, that Mary, though a young virgin, ſhould ſo readily believe an event, in itſelf ſo much more wonderful than that which Zacharias, though an aged prieſt, had found it ſo difficult to credit; and it may be obſerved, that the ſacred writers are particularly careful to record inſtances of this kind, in which God doth as it were out of the mouths of babes and ſucklings perfect his praiſe.

Ver. 38. Went into the hill country] This was a very wiſe determination, as it was very probable that by communicating the viſion ſhe had ſeen, and perhaps alſo deſcribing the form in which the angel appeared, ſhe might convince Zacharias and Elizabeth that there was ſomething ſingular in her caſe, and ſo might bring in the reputation of ſuch worthy and eminent perſons to eſtabliſh her own, in a circumſtance which might otherwiſe expoſe her to great ſuſpicion and cenſure. The city of Judah where Zacharias and Elizabeth lived, is thought to have been Hebron; becauſe Hebron was not only one of the cities appointed for the prieſts to dwell in, Joſh. xx. 7. but was ſituated in the mountains of Judah, Joſh. xi. 21. which running from ſouth to north, gave the name of the hill country to that part of Judea. Hebron lay ſouth from Jeruſalem, at the diſtance of about twenty-four miles, and was about ſeventy miles diſtant from Nazareth.

Ver. 42. Bleſſed art thou among women] It is remarkable that this is the ſalutation wherewith Gabriel had addreſſed Mary. The words, and bleſſed is the fruit of thy womb probably allude to the child's being the promiſed ſeed, in whom all the families of the earth were to be bleſſed, and who for that reaſon was bleſſed himſelf. See Pſalm lxxii. 17.

Ver. 43. That the mother of my Lord ſhould come, &c.] If Elizabeth had not ſpoken by inſpiration, as we are told, ver. 41. ſhe could not ſo much as have ſuſpected that Mary was to be the mother of the Meſſiah; but it being revealed to her, ſhe was greatly ſtruck with the honour that was done her, and expreſſed her ſenſe thereof by aſking, in a rapture of aſtoniſhment, how it came to be conferred upon her. "How have I deſerved this honour, that the mother of the Meſſiah, my Lord and Saviour, ſhould deign to viſit me?"

Vor. 45. And bleſſed is ſhe that believed, &c.] Dr. Heylin, in agreement with the margin, renders it, And bleſſed is ſhe who believed that there ſhall be, &c. Elizabeth in theſe words plainly commended the faith and humility which Mary had expreſſed, when the angel aſſured her that ſhe ſhould become pregnant in her virgin ſtate; with an oblique reference to the behaviour of Zacharias, who probably had informed her by writing of all that had happened; or, as is more likely, ſhe might attain the knowledge of the whole by revelation.

Ver. 46. And Mary ſaid, &c.] The virgin having heard Elizabeth ſpeak thus, was likewiſe filled with the Holy Ghoſt; ſo that being inſpired, ſhe expreſſed the deepeſt ſenſe of her own unworthineſs, and of the infinite goodneſs of God, in chooſing her to the 47 And my ſpirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour:

48 For he hath regarded the low eſtate of his handmaiden: for behold, from henceforth all generations ſhall call me bleſſed.

49 For he that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name.

50 And his mercy is on them that fear him, from generation to generation.

51 He hath ſhewed ſtrength with his arm: he hath ſcattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts.

52 He hath put down the mighty from their ſeats, and exalted them of low degree.

53 He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath ſent empty away.

54 He hath holpen his ſervant Iſrael, in remembrance of his mercy, 55 As he ſpake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his ſeed for ever.

56 And Mary abode with her about three months, and returned to her own houſe.

57 Now Eliſabeth's full time came, that ſhe ſhould be delivered; and ſhe brought forth a ſon.

58 And her neighbours and her couſins heard how the Lord hath ſhewed great mercy upon her; and they rejoiced with her.

59 And it came to paſs, that on the eighth day they came to circumciſe the child; and they called him Zacharias, after the name of his father.

60 And his mother anſwered and ſaid, Not ſo; but he ſhall be called John.

61 And they ſaid unto her, There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name.

high honour of being the Meſſiah's mother. This ſhe did in an hymn, which, though uttered extempore, is remarkable for the beauty of its ſtile, the ſublimity of its ſentiments, and the ſpirit of piety which runs through the whole. It is a proof how converſant the virgin was in the books of the Old Teſtament; for moſt of the expreſſions in this hymn are borrowed from thence, eſpecially from the ſong of Hannah, in which there are many paſſages remarkably ſuitable to her own caſe. See 1 Sam. ii. 1—10. and the paſſages in the margin.

Ver. 47. My ſpirit hath rejoiced] When a perſon, ſpeaking of himſelf, mentions his ſoul or ſpirit as doing a thing, it is the ſtrongeſt expreſſion in human language, and intimates his doing the thing mentioned with the utmoſt energy of all his faculties: Mary therefore, by ſaying, that her ſoul magnified the Lord, and that her ſpirit rejoiced in God, meant to declare, that ſhe exerted the utmoſt vigour of all her faculties in ſetting forth the perfections of God, which conſtitute his greatneſs: and that the conſideration of his goodneſs towards her, filled her with joy, to the utmoſt extent of her capacity.

Ver. 48. For he hath regarded] Ἐπέϐλεψεν; "he hath looked with a diſtinguiſhing regard, and wonderful condeſcenſion. Though I am a perſon in the loweſt ſtation, and had not the leaſt reaſon to expect that any thing extraordinary ſhould ariſe from me; yet God hath put ſuch honour on my condition, as to make me the inſtrument of bringing into the world the Meſſiah, the deſire of all nations; for which reaſon all generations ſhall eſteem me peculiarly happy."

Ver. 49. Hath done to me great things] Μεγαλεῖα, miracles. So Μεγαλα and Μεγαλεια often ſignify in the Old Teſtament, being applied to the miracles often wrought in Egypt, and in the wilderneſs. See Deut. x. 21. xi. 7. xxxiv. 12. Perhaps Mary had now in her thoughts the miraculous conception of the Meſſiah. She adds, and holy is his name, making this remark to ſignify her humble faith in God's wiſdom and goodneſs. She was aſtoniſhed that God ſhould have choſen her, a perſon of the meaneſt condition, to be the mother of the Meſſiah; yet, from her belief of the divine perfections, ſhe was convinced that all was done in wiſdom and truth.

Ver. 50. His mercy is on them that fear him] "So great is the goodneſs of God, that he rewards the piety of his ſervants upon their poſterity to the thouſandth generation." Exod. xx. 6. By making this obſervation, the virgin modeſtly inſinuated, that ſhe imputed the great honour that was done her not to any merit of her own, but to the piety of her anceſtors, Abraham and David, which God thus rewarded upon their lateſt poſterity.

Ver. 51. He hath ſhewed ſtrength, &c.] It is an obſervation of Grotius, that God's great power is repreſented by his finger, his greater, by his hand; and his greateſt, by his arm. The production of lice was the finger of God, Exod. vii. 18. and the other miracles in Egypt were done by his hand, Exod. iii. 20. but the deſtruction of Pharaoh and his hoſt in the Red-ſea was brought to paſs by his arm, Exod. xv. 16. Wherefore the virgin's meaning is, that in this diſpenſation of his Providence, God mightily manifeſted his ſovereign power. He hath ſcattered the proud, &c. means the proud great women, who indulged many fond imaginations concerning the honour that ſhould accrue to them from giving birth to the Meſſiah. "He hath filled them with ſhame to ſuch a degree, that they have ſcattered and hid themſelves;"—in alluſion to an army of cowards, who breaking their ranks, run off in deſpair. See Ecclus. x. 15. Dr. Doddridge explains the paſſage, "He hath often diſperſed the haughty ſinners who exalt themſelves againſt him, and confounded them in thoſe ſchemes which were the moſt laboured imaginations of their own hearts." Theſe words, ſays he, are thus peculiarly applicable to the Goſpel, in which God doth not only caſt down imaginations, and every high thing, 2 Cor. x. 5. by the humbling ſcheme of his recovering grace, but hath remarkably confounded his moſt inſolent enemies, in their own moſt elaborate projects, and eſtabliſhed his ſacred cauſe by the violent attempts which they have made to ſuppreſs it. Compare Pſ. ii. 1—3. The verſion of 1729 renders it, He hath confounded the proud by the devices of their own hearts.

Ver. 52. He hath put down the mighty, &c.] Δυνάςας ἀπὸ θρόνων, the rulers from their thrones. The kings who ſprung from David had, no doubt, one after another expected to be the parents of the Meſſiah; and when the kingdom was taken from them, ſuch of the royal progeny as were in the higheſt ſtation would reckon this their certain and greateſt privilege: but now their hope was wholly overthrown; they were brought down by God from that height of dignity, to which in their own imagination they had exalted themſelves; while a perſon in the meaneſt condition of all the royal ſeed was raiſed to it.

Ver. 53. He hath filled the hungry, &c.] Both the poor and the rich are here beautifully repreſented as waiting at God's gate in the condition of beggars; the rich, in expectation to receive the honour of giving birth to the Meſſiah; the poor, in expectation not of that bleſſing, but of ſuch ſmall favours as ſuited their condition. While they are thus waiting, God, by an exerciſe of his ſovereignty, beſtows the favour ſo much courted by the rich, on a poor family, to its unſpeakable ſatisfaction; and ſends away the rich, diſappointed, and diſcontented; for ſuch is the force of the original word ἐξαπέςειλε.

Ver. 54, 55. He hath holpen] Ἀντελάϐετο, here tranſlated He hath holpen, ſignifies properly "ſupporting a thing that is fallen, by taking hold of it on the falling ſide." The virgin's meaning therefore was, that God had now remarkably ſupported the Jewiſh nation, and hindered it from falling, by raiſing up the Meſſiah amongſt them, the matchleſs renown of whoſe undertaking would reflect infinite honour on the nation which gave him birth. Perhaps alſo, by his ſervant Iſrael, ſhe meant all thoſe who are ſpiritually ſo called. It is indeed in remembrance of his mercy. When men remember things which they ought to perform, they commonly perform them, eſpecially if no object lies in their way. For ſome ſuch reaſon as this the Scriptures ſay that God remembers his attributes, when he exerts them in a ſignal manner; and his promiſes, when he fulfils them in ſpite of all oppoſition. So he is ſaid to forget a thing when he acts outwardly as men do when they have forgotten; yet, properly ſpeaking, forgetting and remembering are both of them abſolutely inconſiſtent with the perfection of God, to whoſe view all things paſt, preſent, and to come are ever open. Mary adds, ver. 55, as he ſpake or promiſed to our Fathers, to Abraham and to his ſeed, i. e. to all his ſeed, Gentiles as well as Jews: for though the virgin might not have a diſtinct conception of what ſhe uttered, underſtood in this extenſive view; yet, as ſhe ſpoke by inſpiration, there is nothing to hinder us from affixing ſuch a meaning to her words, eſpecially as the conſtruction of the ſentence will ſcarce admit of any other. It might therefore be better tranſlated thus; In remembrance of his mercy to Abraham, and to his ſeed for ever, as he ſpake to our Fathers. See Doddridge. Macknight, Elſner, and Grotius.

Ver. 59. And they called him Zacharias] The law did not enjoin that the child ſhould have his name given him at circumciſion; it was an incidental circumſtance, which cuſtom had added; poſſibly becauſe at the inſtitution of the rite God changed the names of Abraham and Sarah, Gen. xvii. 5, 15.

62 And they made ſigns to his father, how he would have him called.

63 And he aſked for a writing-table, and wrote, ſaying, His name is John. And they marvelled all.

64 And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue looſed, and he ſpake, and praiſed God.

65 And fear came on all that dwelt round about them: and all theſe ſayings were noiſed abroad throughout all the hill-country of Judea.

66 And all they that heard them, laid them up in their hearts, ſaying, What manner of child ſhall this be! And the hand of the Lord was with him.

67 And his father Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghoſt, and propheſied, ſaying,

71 That we ſhould be ſaved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us;

72 To perform the mercy promiſed to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant:

74 That he would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might ſerve him without fear,

76 And thou, child, ſhalt be called the prophet of the Higheſt: for thou ſhalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways;

Ver. 64—66. And his tongue looſed, &c.] And his tongue alſo ſpake, praiſing God. Wat. and Elſner. Zacharias had no ſooner done writing, than he recovered his ſpeech, the angel's prediction being then fully accompliſhed. Accordingly, with an audible articulate voice, he praiſed God; probably, by acknowledging the juſtice of the puniſhment which had been inflicted upon him, and the greatneſs of that ſin which had procured it. By this open affectionate confeſſion, he impreſſed all his neighbours and acquaintance with fear; (ver. 65.) i. e. with religious awe and fear of offending God; and all theſe ſayings, or rather things, (See ch. ii. 15.) were noiſed abroad: being very extraordinary events, they were much talked of in that country; and people formed many conjectures concerning the child, with whom was the hand of the Lord, ver. 66. that is, (as it is explained ver. 80.) he was remarkable, even from his infancy, for the qualities both of his body and mind. He had an eminent degree of the protection, bleſſing, and aſſiſtance of God, viſibly beſtowed upon him. It ſhould be obſerved, that the extraordinary circumſtances recorded in this chapter, which attended the birth of the Baptiſt, were all wiſely ordered by Providence; that he who was the Meſſiah's forerunner, might not ſeem an obſcure and ordinary man, but one who was the peculiar object of the decrees and counſels of heaven. He was introduced into the world in this magnificent manner, that the attention of his countrymen being awakened, and high expectations of him raiſed, he might execute the duties of his miniſtry with greater advantage, and effectually prepare the people for receiving the Meſſiah himſelf, who was ſoon to appear in perſon. But ſee more on this ſubject in Jortin's Diſcourſes, p. 184. and Bell's Inquiry into the Divine Miſſions of John, &c.

Ver. 67. Zacharias—propheſied] Some imagine that by Zacharias propheſying, St. Luke means only that he celebrated the praiſes of God, with great elevation and affection of ſoul. And it muſt be acknowledged, that the word hath this ſenſe in other paſſages of Scriptures, particularly 1 Chron. xxv. 1. where Aſaph and Jeduthun are ſaid to propheſy with the harp and cymbal, which is explained ver. 3. by their giving praiſe and thanks to God. See likewiſe 1 Chron. x. 5. and 1 Cor. xi. 5. However, as Zacharias is ſaid on this occaſion to have been filled with the Holy Ghoſt, and to have uttered a prophecy concerning his ſon, the ordinary ſenſe of the word may very well be admitted here. See Macknight, and Hammond.

Ver. 68. Bleſſed be the Lord God of Iſrael] "Let all honour and glory be aſcribed to the Poſſeſſor and Governor of the world, the God of the people of Iſrael, becauſe he hath viſited and redeemed his people." For God to viſit his people, is a metaphorical expreſſion, ſignifying to ſhew them great favour: It is taken from the cuſtom of princes, who commonly viſit the provinces of their kingdom, in order to redreſs grievances, and to confer benefits. The great benefits accruing to the people of God from the viſitation which this holy man ſpeaks of here, is their redemption or deliverance from all their ſpiritual enemies, by the coming of the Meſſiah, the Horn of ſalvation; i. e. the power which works or brings ſalvation. See on Pſ. xviii. 2, &c. &c.

Ver. 70. Which have been ſince the world began] Ἀπ' αἰῶνος: "from the beginning of the world." By the world, in this paſſage, ſome underſtand the Jewiſh diſpenſation, becauſe before the giving of the law, no prophet ſpake either of God's raiſing up a Horn of ſalvation in the houſe of David, or of performing his covenant with Abraham; whereas Moſes, at the very beginning of that diſpenſation, often ſpake of the Iſraelites conquering their enemies, if they kept the law. And to theſe promiſes they ſuppoſe Zacharias now alluded, becauſe the general ſtrain of his diſcourſe ſeems to reſpect the temporal deliverance which the Jews imagined the Meſſiah would accompliſh for the Iſraelites. Nevertheleſs, if we carefully attend to the text, we ſhall be ſenſible that this 70th verſe is connected not with the verſe which precedes, but with that which follows it, in this manner: "He hath raiſed up an Horn of ſalvation for us in the houſe of his ſervant David, as he ſpake by the mouth of his holy prophets, &c. as the accompliſhment of a promiſe which he made by the prophets from the beginning of the world; which promiſe was, that we, the ſpiritual Iſrael, ſhould be ſaved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us." Accordingly we find that a promiſe of this ſort was made to the parents of mankind immediately after the fall, and by them handed down to their poſterity, that the ſeed of the woman ſhould bruiſe the ſerpent's head. This ſenſe renders Zacharias's words more conſiſtent than the other, which can never ſhew how a horn of ſalvation in the houſe of David was promiſed by the prophets from the beginning of the Jewiſh diſpenſation. And though it ſhould be granted that Zacharias had not now in his eye the general ſpiritual deliverance of the people of God, yet, as he ſpake by inſpiration, the meaning of the Holy Ghoſt here, as in many other prophecies, might be much more extenſive than the ideas of the prophet by whom he ſpake, and who often did not underſtand what he uttered; as St. Peter informs us, 1 Eph. i. 10, 11.

Ver. 71. That we ſhould be ſaved from, &c.] Salvation from, &c. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 74. Without fear] Ἀφόβως,—without a ſlaviſh fear, or that ſpirit of bondage, mentioned Rom. viii. 15. For the whole of this promiſe, both as it was originally made to Abraham, and as it is here applied to the coming of the Meſſiah, reſpected a ſpiritual deliverance; though the Jews generally underſtood it of a deliverance from their enemies on earth, as perhaps Zacharias alſo did.

Ver. 75. All the days of our life] All our days. Wat. and MS. Serving God in holineſs and righteouſneſs, as well as deliverance from enemies, being ſpoken of as in the merciful grant of God, we may reaſonably conclude that it refers to thoſe paſſages, in which God promiſed to pour out extraordinary degrees of a pious ſpirit on his people, under the reign of the Meſſiah. Comp. Iſai. xliv. 1—5. Jer. xxxi. 31, 34. and Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 27.

Ver. 76. And thou, child] Zacharias here either pointed to John, or took him in his arms: The meſſenger or forerunner in Malachi was to be a prophet; Zacharias ſays of his ſon, Thou ſhalt be called the prophet of the Moſt High; and our Saviour declares, that John was more than a prophet; that is, he was a great preacher of righteouſneſs, who called aloud unto the people to repent, that they might be forgiven, and declared that the kingdom of heaven was at hand. See Mal. iii. 1. iv. 5. Iſai. xl. 3. and Sharpe's ſecond Argument.

Ver. 78. The tender mercy] Σπλάγχνα ἐλέους, the bowels of mercy. Theſe

God, whereby the day-ſpring from on high hath viſited us;

79 To give light to them that ſit in darkneſs, and in the ſhadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace.

80 And the child grew, and waxed ſtrong in ſpirit, and was in the deſarts till the day of his ſhewing unto Iſrael.

Ver. 78. Or, ſun-riſing, or branch, Numb. xxiv. 17. Iſai. xi. 1. Zech. iii. 8. vi. 12. Mal. iv. 2.—V. 79. Iſai. ix. 2. Acts xxvi. 18.—V. 80. Ch. ii. 40. Matth. iii. 1.

These two words are often uſed in Scripture both jointly and ſeparately. They ſignify pity, becauſe that paſſion is commonly attended with a motion in the bowels, eſpecially when the object of it is one we have an intereſt in. See Iſai. lxiii. 15. Philip. ii. 1. Col. iii. 12. where the bowels of mercy ſignify the moſt tender mercy. The phraſe uſed by itſelf, ſignifies any ſtrong affection whatever. Thus Philem. ver. 7. The bowels of the ſaints are refreſhed by thee, brother. The day-ſpring from on high, is in the original, Ανατολη εξ υψους. As Ανατολη σεληνης the riſing of the moon, (Iſai. lx. 19.) ſignifies the moon herſelf; ſo ανατολη, the elliptical expreſſion here uſed for ανατολη ηλιου, may ſignify the ſun. For Zacharias is alluding to thoſe paſſages in the prophetic writings, which deſcribe the Meſſiah by the metaphors of the light and the ſun; particularly Mal. iv. 2. where he is called the ſun of righteouſneſs, both on account of the light of his doctrine, and of the joy produced by his appearing. See alſo Iſai. lx. 1, 2, 19. Indeed, no figure was ever more happily imagined, or more naturally applied than this, which repreſents the promiſed ſeed under the motion of the ſun. For moſt aptly may Jeſus be likened to the riſing ſun; his doctrine being to the ſouls of men what light is to their bodies. It is altogether neceſſary for directing our ſteps in the paths of truth and righteouſneſs; it is exceedingly pleaſant to the ſpiritual taſte, by diſcovering the moſt important and delightful truths; nay, like the light, it throws a beauty and pleaſantneſs upon every thing in this lower world, which, without the aſſurance of God's reconcileableneſs, would be but a dark and dreary ſcene to ſinners, however noble and beautiful in itſelf. Macknight. Dr. Doddridge renders Ανατολη by the dawning of the day; for it is well known, ſays he, that the word properly ſignifies that part of the heavens where the light begins to ariſe,—and the firſt ſhining of that light. Comp. Rev. vii. 3. The dawning of the day, ſeems therefore a very literal verſion; and I apprehend it more beautifully deſcribes the ſtate of things juſt at this interval, than if the ſun had been repreſented as actually riſen.

Ver. 79. Them that ſit in darkneſs, &c.] Theſe phraſes with peculiar propriety, deſcribe the ignorant and miſerable ſtate of the Gentile world, and perhaps the former part of the verſe may refer to them. But as Chriſt's preaching to the Jews in Galilee, (for it was only to Jews he applied) is ſaid, Matth. iv. 14—16. to be an accompliſhment of Iſai. ix. 1, 2. to which Zacharias here probably refers, we are not to confine the ſenſe to the Gentiles only; for indeed the ſad character and circumſtances of the Jews at this time, as deſcribed by Joſephus, do well ſuit the repreſentation here made.

Ver. 80. And was in the deſarts] Though the mother of Jeſus was related to Elizabeth, the mother of John; though ſhe viſited her in the hill-country, about the time of her own conception, and before the birth of John; it doth not appear, nor is it probable, that there was any intimacy, or any correſpondence between Jeſus and his forerunner: On the contrary, it is expreſly ſaid that John was in the deſarts till the time of his ſhewing unto Iſrael. The deſart here mentioned is generally thought to have been that of Ziph, or Maon, where Saul purſued David: Though there were ſeveral country towns and villages in theſe deſarts, as we have heretofore obſerved; yet, as they were but thinly peopled, they were in the Jewiſh idiom called deſarts. Now it was wiſely ordered, to prevent a perſonal acquaintance between them, that John ſhould continue in one of theſe deſarts, at the diſtance of at leaſt an hundred miles from Nazareth, till the time of his entering upon his miniſtry. See John i. 31. He went not into any of the great cities, but when he left the place where his father lived, withdrew from mankind, retired into the wilderneſs, and lived an auſtere life, that his character might be ſuited to his office,—the preaching of repentance. The Levites could not ſerve nor be numbered, according to the law of Moſes, and the example of David, till they were thirty years old. The Jews therefore would not have received any doctrines from John or Jeſus, if they had entered ſooner than they did upon their miniſtry: From what has been ſaid, it is evident that there could be no colluſion, no contrivance, no familiarity between the firſt and ſecond meſſenger;—the meſſenger who was to prepare the way, and the great meſſenger of the covenant. Elſner has ſhewn that the word 'Αναδειξις, rendered ſhewing, often ſignifies the inauguration of a public officer. See his Obſervations, Guyſe, Sharpe, and Bell.

REFLECTIONS ON THE ANGEL'S APPEARANCE TO ZACHARIAS.

The ſtate of the Jewiſh church was extremely corrupt immediately before the news of the Goſpel; yet, bad as it was, not only the prieſthood, but the courſes of attendance continued, even from David to Chriſt. Judea paſſed through many troubles and alterations; yet this œconomy laſted about eleven hundred years. A ſettled good will not eaſily be defeated; but in the change of perſons will remain uncharged, and if it be forced to give way, leave memorable footſteps behind it.

The ſucceſſive turns of the legal miniſtration held on in an uninterrupted line; but how little were the Jews better for this, when they had loſt the urim and thummim,—ſincerity of doctrine and manners! It is a ſucceſſion of truth and holineſs, that makes or inſtitutes a church, whatever may become of the perſons: never times were ſo barren, as not to yield ſome good; the greateſt dearth affords ſome few good ears to the gleaners. Chriſt would not come into the world without having ſome faithful to entertain him; there would have been no equality, if all had either preceded or followed, and none had attended him.

Zacharias and Elizabeth are juſt, both of Aaron's blood, and John Baptiſt of theirs. It is not in the power of parents to tranſmit holineſs to their children; but though there is no certainty, there is a likelihood of an holy generation, when the parents are ſuch. If the ſtock and the graft be not both good, there is much danger of the fruit. Elizabeth was juſt, as well as Zacharias, that the forerunner of the Saviour might be holy on either ſide. It is obſervable that the New Teſtament affords greater ſtore of good women than the Old; Elizabeth leads the number, whoſe barrenneſs ended in a miraculous fruit, both of the body, and of her time. Amongſt the Jews, barrenneſs was not a defect only, but a reproach (ver. 25.) yet while this good woman was fruitful of obedience, ſhe was barren of children: a juſt ſoul and a barren womb may well agree together.

None but a ſon of Aaron might offer incenſe to God in the temple, and not every ſon of Aaron, and not any one at all ſeaſons. God is a God of order, and hates confuſion no leſs than irreligion: and though he hath not ſo ſtraightened himſelf under the Goſpel, as to tie his ſervice to perſons or places, yet is his choice now no leſs curious. He allows none but the authorized; he authorizes none but the worthy. The incenſe doth ever ſmell of the hand that offers it; that perfume doubtleſs was ſweet and acceptable, which aſcended up from the hand of a juſt Zacharias; but the ſacrifice of the wicked is only abomination to God.

As Zacharias had a courſe in God's houſe, ſo he carefully obſerved it; the favour of theſe reſpites doubled his diligence. The more high and ſacred our calling is, the more dangerous is neglect. Woe be to us, if we ſlacken thoſe duties, wherein God honours us more than we can honour him!

The lot of this day called Zacharias to offer incenſe in the outer temple. We do not find any preſcription the ſons of Aaron had from God for this particular manner of deſignation; whence we learn that matters of good order in holy affairs may be ruled by the wiſe inſtitution of men, according to reaſon and expediency. It fell out happily that Zacharias was choſen by lot to this miniſtration, that God's immediate hand might be ſeen in all the paſſages which concerned his great prophet, and that as the perſon, ſo the occaſion might be of God's own chooſing.

Every morning and evening their law called the Jews to offer incenſe to God, that both parts of the day might be conſecrated to the author of time. Nothing can better reſemble our faithful prayers than ſweet perfumes, and theſe God expects his whole church ſhould ſend up to him morning and evening. The elevations of our hearts ſhould be perpetual; but if twice in the day we do not preſent God with our ſolemn invocations, we make the Goſpel leſs dutiful than the Law.

While the prieſt ſends up his incenſe within the temple, the prople muſt ſend up their prayers without. Their vows and that incenſe, though remote in their firſt riſing, met ere they went up to heaven. The people might no more go into the holy place to offer up the incenſe of prayer to God, than Zacharias might go into the holy of holies. But now, every man is a prieſt unto God;—Every man, ſince the veil was rent, prays within the temple. What are we the better for our greater freedom of acceſs to God under the Goſpel, if we do not make uſe of our privilege?

Whilſt they were praying to God, he ſees an angel of God. As Gideon's angel went up in the ſmoke of the ſacrifice, ſo did Zacharias's deſcend, as it were, in the fragrant ſmoke of his incenſe. The preſence of angels is no novelty, but their apparition; they are always with us, but rarely ſeen, that we may awefully reſpect their meſſages when they are ſeen. In the mean time, our faith may ſee them, though our ſenſes do not; their aſſumed ſhapes do not make them more preſent, but viſible only.

There is an order in that heavenly hierarchy, though we know it not. This angel that appeared to Zacharias was not with him in the ordinary courſe of his attendances, but was purpoſely ſent from God with this meſſage. When could it be more fit for the angel to appear unto Zacharias, than when prayers and incenſe were offered by him? and in the temple,—and at the altar of incenſe,—and on the right ſide of the altar? Thoſe glorious ſpirits, as they are always with us, ſo moſt in our devotions; and as in all places, ſo moſt of all in God's houſe. They rejoice to be with us, while we are with God; as, on the contrary, they turn their faces from us, when we go about to commit ſin.

He that had wont to live and ſerve in the preſence of the maſter, was now aſtoniſhed at the preſence of the ſervant; ſo much difference is there betwixt our faith and our ſenſes, that the apprehenſion of the preſence of the God of ſpirits by faith, goes down ſweetly with us, whereas the ſenſible apprehenſion of an angel diſmays. In vain do we look for ſuch miniſters of God as are without infirmities, when a juſt Zacharias was troubled in his devotions with that wherewith he ſhould have been comforted.

The good angel was both apprehenſive and compaſſionate of the good old man's weakneſs, and preſently encourages him with a chearful excitation,—fear not, Zacharias; Thy prayer is heard.

There was not more fear in the human face, than comfort in the angelic ſpeech. No angel could have told him better news: what can we wiſh, but to have what we would? Many good ſuits had Zacharias made, and, amongſt the reſt, for a ſon. Doubtleſs it was now ſome years ſince he had urged that requeſt; for he was now ſtricken in age, and had ceaſed to hope;—and yet had the All-wiſe laid it up all the while in remembrance, and, when no longer thought of, brought it forth in effect: Thy wife Elizabeth ſhall bear thee a ſon. Thus doth the mercy of God deal with his patient and faithful ſuppliants; and it may be, he hath long granted our ſuit, ere we ſhall know of his grant.

Many a father repents him of his fruitfulneſs, and hath ſuch ſons as he wiſhes unborn; but to have ſo gracious and happy a ſon as the angel foretold, could not be leſs comfort than honour to the age of Zacharias. To hear he ſhould have ſuch a ſon;—a ſon whoſe birth ſhould concern the joy of many;—a ſon who ſhould be great in the ſight of the Lord;—a ſon who ſhould be ſacred to God, filled with God, beneficial to man,—was news enough to anticipate the angel's ſentence to take away that tongue with amazement, which was ſoon after loſt by incredulity.

The ſpeech was ſo good, that it found not a ſudden belief; like a man maſked with the ſtrangeneſs of what he heard and ſaw, he miſtruſts the meſſage, and aſks, How ſhall I know? ver. 18. Nature was at his ſide, and alledged the impoſſibility of the event; and reaſon, with miſ-timed heſitation, joined in to miſlead him. I am old,—and my wife alſo is of a great age. Faith and reaſon have their limits, but if reaſon will be incroaching upon the bounds of faith, no wonder if ſhe is ſoon taken captive by infidelity. The authority of the reporter makes way for belief in things otherwiſe hard to credit. The angel condeſcendingly tells his name, place, office, unaſked, that Zacharias might not think any news impoſſible which was brought him by ſo heavenly a meſſenger; but leſt he ſhould no leſs doubt of the ſtile of the meſſenger than of the errand itſelf, he is at once confirmed and puniſhed with dumbneſs. He ſhall aſk no more queſtions for forty weeks, who hath adventured to aſk this one diſtruſtfully.

Neither did Zacharias loſe his tongue only for the time, but his ears alſo; for otherwiſe, when they came to aſk his allowance for his ſon's name, they needed not to have demanded it by ſigns, ver. 62. How ſtriking the reflection!—It is not our holy intireneſs with God which can bear us out in the leaſt ſin; yea, rather, the more acquaintance we have with his Majeſty, the more ſure we are of correction when we offend.

Zacharias ſtaid, the people waited, (ver. 21.) The multitude thought him long; yet, though they could but ſee afar off, they would not depart, till he returned to bleſs them. How does their patient attendance without ſhame us, who are hardly perſuaded to attend within the holy place, whilſt both our ſenſes are employed in the divine ſervices, and we are admitted to be co-agents with our miniſters!

At laſt Zacharias comes out, ſpeechleſs; (ver. 22.) and more amazes them with his preſence, than with his delay. The eyes of the multitude, which were not worthy to behold his viſion, yet ſee the ſigns of the viſion, that the world might be put in expectation of ſome extraordinary ſequel. Zachary's ſpeech could not have ſaid ſo much as this dumbneſs. He would fain have ſpoken, and could not:—with us how many are dumb, and need not! how many mouths are ſtopped by negligence, fear, partiality, which ſhall once ſay, "woe is me, becauſe I held my peace!" Zacharias's hand ſpeaks that, which he cannot utter with his tongue; and he makes them by ſigns underſtand: that, which they might read in his face thoſe powers we have, we muſt uſe.

But though he had ceaſed to ſpeak, yet he ceaſes not to miniſter: he takes not this dumbneſs for a diſmiſſion, but ſtays out the eight days of his courſe, (ver. 23.) as one who knew that the eyes, the hands, the heart, would be accepted of that God, who had bereaved him of his tongue: we are not haſtily to take occaſions of withdrawing ourſelves from the public ſervices of God,—much leſs under the goſpel. The law, which ſtood much upon bodily perfection, diſpenſed with age for attendance: the goſpel, which is all for the ſoul, regards thoſe inward powers, which while they are vigorous, exclude all excuſes of abſence from our miniſtration.

CHAP. II. Ver. 1. And it came to paſs, &c.] At that time an edict was publiſhed by Cæſar Auguſtus, that all the provinces of the Roman empire ſhould be regiſtered, or enrolled,—as in the margin of our verſion. Heylin. This was the enrollment of the Cenſus, firſt practiced by Servius Tullus, the ſixth king of Rome, who ordained, that the Roman people, at certain ſeaſons, ſhould upon oath give an account of their names, qualities, employments, wives, children, ſervants, eſtates, and places of abode. By this inſtitution, Servius deſigned to put thoſe who had the adminiſtration of public affairs in a condition to underſtand the ſtrength of every particular part of the community; that is, what men and money might be raiſed from it; and according to thoſe aſſeſſments or eſtimates, men and money were levied afterwards, as occaſion required.

Our verſion extends this enrollment to all the world; that is, agreeable to Dr. Heylin's explanation, to all the provinces of the Roman empire; but it ſeems moſt probable, according to Dr. Lardner's ingenious obſervations, that 'Οικουμένη, is to be taken in a more limited ſenſe,—as it is plainly, chap. xxi. 26. and in other places,—for the land of Iſrael only. The Evangeliſt obſerves, that the emperor's edict extended to the whole land, to ſhew that Galilee, Joſeph's country, was comprehended in it. That this was an inrollment of the inhabitants of Paleſtine only is probable, becauſe no hiſtorian whatſoever ſays that Auguſtus made a general inrolment of the empire: whereas if any ſuch had happened, they would ſcarce have failed to gratify their readers with an account of the numbers of the perſons, &c. that being a particular which every one muſt have been curious to know. If St. Luke therefore is ſuppoſed to ſpeak of a general enrollment, the ſilence of antiquity would be a very great objection againſt it. But if a particular enrollment of the land of Iſrael only was meant, this ſilence would be no objection at all, becauſe there muſt have been ſurveys of provinces, which the Greek and Roman hiſtorians now extant had no occaſion to mention. An account of it might be expected indeed in Joſephus; yet his ſilence will in nowiſe prejudice St. Luke's authority, if it be remembered that it cannot be ſuppoſed any ſingle hiſtorian can relate all the affairs of the country whoſe hiſtory he writes. There is frequent mention of the Cenſus at our Lord's nativity, in the moſt early apologies of the fathers; and as ſome of theſe apologies were addreſſed to the Roman emperors themſelves, ſuch appeals to a public fact imply that it was a thing well known, and are a ſufficient confirmation of St. Luke's hiſtory. At this time Auguſtus was much incenſed againſt Herod, and probably ordered this cenſus as a token of his diſpleaſure, and as an intimation that he intended ſoon to lay the Jews under a tax: Herod, perhaps, regaining the emperor's favour, prevailed with him to ſuſpend his intention; and this poſſibly, together with the diſgracefulneſs of the thing, may have been one reaſon why the cenſus was paſſed over in ſilence by Nicholas of Damaſcus, one of Herod's ſervants and flatterers, in the hiſtory he wrote of his affairs. It might likewiſe be the reaſon why Joſephus, who copied from Nicholas, omitted the mention of it, or at beſt repreſented it ſimply by the taking of an oath, rather than by the offenſive name of a cenſus, (ſee Antiq. l. xvii. c. 2. ſect. 6.) ſuppoſing it to have been at this enrollment that the oath which Joſephus ſpeaks of was impoſed, which the whole Jewiſh nation, except ſix thouſand phariſees, took, to be faithful to Cæſar, and the intereſts of the king. Now, that this oath was impoſed at the time of the inrollment, appears probable, becauſe the events which followed it are the ſame which happened after the inrollment. The phariſees who refuſed to ſwear, from the imagination that the law, Deut. xvii. 15. forbad them, were fined; but the wife of Pheroras, paid the fine for them; and they in return predicted that God had determined to put an end to Herod's government, and that the kingdom ſhould be transferred to her family; proceeding farther to characterize the new king by the expreſſion, that "all things ſhould be in his power," a characteriſtic of the Meſſiah. The diſturbances which happened in Jeruſalem after this, and the ſlaughter made in Herod's family, were all on account of the birth of this new king. It is probable this was the perplexity referred to Matth. ii. 3. And as for the ſlaughter of the infants, tho' Joſephus has paſſed it over, Herod's cruelties recorded by that hiſtorian, render it abundantly probable. The perſons who predicted the birth of this king were the phariſees, according to Joſephus: In the Goſpel they are called the chief prieſts and ſcribes, who, from the ancient prophecies informed Herod, that his rival king was to be born in Bethlehem. Indeed, the whole affair is but ſlightly handled; but it muſt be remember'd, that Joſephus, being a Jew, would conſult the reputation of his country, and conceal the taxing, or, at leaſt, give it a favourable turn; and being alſo an enemy to Chriſtianity, he cannot be ſuppoſed to have related ſuch particulars as had any ſtrong tendency to ſupport it. The reader deſirous of entering more fully into this ſubject, will meet with ample ſatisfaction in b. ii. c. 1. of Lardner's credibility of the Goſpel hiſtory; where the point is diſcuſſed with equal learning and and accuracy. It may be proper juſt to add, that this affair of the taxing is mentioned by St. Luke, not ſo much to mark the time of Chriſt's birth, as to prove two things; firſt, that he was born in Bethlehem; ſecondly, that his parents were at that time univerſally known to be branches of the royal family of David. The importance of aſcertaining theſe points aroſe from hence, that they were fixed by the prophets as expreſs characters of the Meſſiah; Hath not the Scripture ſaid that Chriſt cometh of the ſeed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was? John vii. 42. By the particular deſtination of Providence, therefore, while Joſeph and Mary were attending the inrolment at Bethlehem, Mary brought forth her ſon. See Macknight's firſt Chronological Diſſertation.

Ver. 2. (And this taxing, &c.] To this verſe it has been objected that Joſephus (Antiq. l. xvii c. 6.) ſays, "After Archelaus was baniſhed into Gaul, his country was annexed to the country of Syria; and Cyrenius, a perſon of conſular dignity, was ſent by Cæſar to make aſſeſſments in Syria, and to put Archelaus's eſtate to ſale:"—But Archelaus reigned ten years after the death of Herod, in the end of whoſe reign Jeſus was born; Quintilius Varus, not Cyrenius, being preſident of Syria. Many different tranſlations of the verſe before us have been propoſed, in order to remove this objection. They may all be ſeen at large, with their proofs, in Lardner's Credibility, as referred to in the former note. The tranſlation eſpouſed by the learned author of that work, appears to be a ſolution of the difficulty;—This was the firſt inrolment of Cyrenius, governor of Syria; and the rather, as it is favoured by the vulgar verſion, which runs thus, Hæc deſcriptio prima facta eſt a præſide Syriæ Cyrino. Dr. Lardner ſuppoſes, that Cyrenius came, in the latter end of Herod's reign, to tax Judea by order of Auguſtus; and that it is called Cyrenius's firſt inrolment, to diſtinguiſh it from that which he made after Archelaus was baniſhed; and on the ſuppoſition of two inrolments made by Cyrenius, the diſtinction was proper, the latter being the moſt remarkable, as it gave riſe to the ſedition of Judas the Galilean, from which, as Joſephus tells us, all their future troubles took their riſe. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1. Dr. Lardner ſuppoſes further, that St. Luke gives Cyrenius the title of an office, which he did not bear till afterwards—the governor of Syria; as we ſay Cato the cenſor, to diſtinguiſh him from others of the ſame name,—even in a period of his life before he obtained that office. The interpretation which Valerius, Prideaux, Bp. Chandler, and others have eſpouſed, deſerves likewiſe to be mentioned, becauſe it removes the difficulty under conſideration. It is as follows: Now this inrolment was firſt performed, or took effect, when Cyrenius was governor of Syria: So the word ἐγένετο is uſed in various paſſages. See ch. i. 20. Matth. v. 18. The inrolment was made in Herod's time, but the taxation according to the inrolment not till Cyrenius was governor of Syria. Perizonius, Bos, Heylin, and others render the paſſage, This taxation was made before Cyrenius was governor of Syria. They ſuppoſe that πρώτη is uſed by St. Luke for προτέρα; which ſenſe it has ſometimes. See ch. xvii. 25. John i. 15. xv. 18. Some one or other of theſe interpretations muſt be eſpouſed; the firſt appears to me moſt natural and judicious; for, as St. Luke affirms, that Jeſus was conceived in the days of Herod King of Judea, ch. i. 5, 26. by conſequence, according to St. Luke himſelf, the inrolment under which he was born muſt have happened in Herod's reign, or ſoon after; whereas the taxation under Cyrenius did not happen till Archelaus was baniſhed: but Archelaus, according to Joſephus, reigned ten years; it is evident therefore that Luke cannot be ſuppoſed to connect Cyrenius's government of Syria with the birth of Jeſus, which he has fixed to the end of Herod's reign. See Macknight's firſt Chronological Diſſertation.

Ver. 3. And all went to be taxed] When the cenſus was made in any country under the dominion of the Romans, the inhabitants were obliged to attend in the cities to which they belonged. See Livy, l. xlii. c. 10. The reaſon was, that without a precaution of this kind, the cenſus would have been exceſſively tedious, and people who were abroad might have been omitted, or ſet down among the inhabitants of other cities, where they would not have been found afterwards; or they might have been inrolled twice, which would have bred confuſion in the regiſters. Herod, who, it is probable, executed the cenſus in his own dominions by the appointment of Auguſtus, ſeems to have made a ſmall alteration in the mode of it; for inſtead of ordering the people to appear, as uſual, in the cities where they reſided, or to whoſe juriſdictions the places of their abode belonged, he ordered them to appear according to their families; perhaps becauſe it was the ordinary way of claſſing the Jewiſh people, or becauſe he deſired to know the number and ſtrength of the dependants of the great families in his dominions. But on whatſoever account the alteration was made, it appears to have been owing to a providential interpoſition; for otherwiſe Chriſt might not have been born at Bethlehem; his parents having long reſided at Nazareth, and having no other cauſe for changing their ſituation, when Mary was ſo near her time, unleſs ſome ſuch neceſſity. We may juſt obſerve further, that this obedience of the Jews to the decree of Cæſar is a plain proof that they were now dependant on the Romans, and that the ſceptre was departing from Judah. See Lightfoot's Harmony, and compare Gen. xlix. 10. and Numb. xxiv. 24.

Ver. 4, 5. And Joſeph alſo went up] Herod's order for the taxation being, as we obſerved on the laſt verſe, that every one ſhould repair to the city of his people to be inrolled, Joſeph and Mary, the deſcendants of David, went from Nazareth, the place of their abode, to Bethlehem, the city where David and his anceſtors were born: 1 Sam. xx. 6, 29. Accordingly Boaz, David's great-grandfather, calls it the city of his people; Ruth iii. 11. See on Matth. ii. 1. Joſeph is ſaid to be of the houſe and lineage of David, which Doddridge renders, of the family and houſhold of David; ſuppoſing, with Grotius, that it refers to the diviſions of the tribes into families and houſholds. Compare Numb. i. 18, &c. and John vii. 17, 18. In this ſenſe of the words, after having told us that Joſeph was of the houſe of David, it would have been very unneceſſary to add, he was alſo of his family; but it was not improper to ſay, that, he was of his family and houſhold. Joſeph went to be taxed with Mary his eſpouſed wife; the propriety of which expreſſion appears from Matth. i. 25. where we are told, that Joſeph knew not his wife till ſhe had brought forth her firſt-born ſon. It may ſeem ſtrange that Mary, in her condition, ſhould have undertaken ſo great a journey: Perhaps the order of the cenſus required, that the wife as well as the huſband ſhould be preſent; or the perſons to be taxed being claſſed in the roll according to their lineage, Mary might judge it proper on this occaſion to claim her deſcent from David, in order to her being publickly acknowledged as one of his poſterity; and the rather, as ſhe knew herſelf to be miraculouſly with child of the Meſſiah. It is however moſt probable that all this was done by the divine direction; for queſtionleſs, whatever the emperor's commands were, ſuch a caſe as Mary's muſt have been admitted as a full excuſe for her not complying with it.

Ver. 7. And ſhe brought forth her firſt-born ſon] The words might be rendered literally, ſhe brought forth her ſon, the firſt born: and as there is a peculiar emphaſis laid upon the laſt word of this ſentence, the Evangeliſt poſſibly might allude to that character of Chriſt, whereby he is deſcribed as the firſt-born of every creature, Rom. viii. 29. Col. i. 15. Heb. i. 6. The word firſt-born is ſometimes uſed to ſignify that which is of ſuperior excellence; and if it be applied to Chriſt in that ſenſe, it will denote his ſuperiority to all the ſons of Adam, as well as to Adam himſelf. Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that the bleſſed virgin was ſo miraculouſly ſtrengthened by God in her hour of extremity, as to be able to perform herſelf the neceſſary offices for her new-born infant. The vaſt concourſe of people coming from all parts to be regiſtered in the city belonging to their reſpective families, muſt inevitably have expoſed thoſe who came lateſt to the inconveniencies mentioned in the text. The probability of this circumſtance will appear greater, when we conſider, that it is no uncommon thing, in the eaſt and other countries, for travellers to lie in the ſame apartment with their camels, horſes, &c. Even in Europe, particularly in Germany, many inns may be met with, where the ſtable is the firſt room you come into, and there the veturini or carriers uſually lodge with their beaſts. Tradition informs us, that the ſtable in which the holy family was lodged was, according to the cuſtom of the country, hollowed out of a rock; and conſequently the coldneſs of it, at leaſt by night, muſt have greatly added to its other inconveniencies. It is aſſerted by the beſt civilians and hiſtorians, that at ſuch public inrolments as that referred to in this chapter, it was cuſtomary to regiſter children of all ages, as well as their parents. This circumſtance muſt have afforded the greateſt proof to aſcertain the place of Chriſt's birth; for it was cuſtomary to ſuſpend the tables on which the inrolment was taken, in ſome public place; and we find Juſtin, Tertullian, and Chryſoſtom appealing to the tables extant in their days, as really containing the name of Jeſus. Upon this humiliating circumſtance of our Saviour's birth in a ſtable, we may obſerve, how much the bleſſed Jeſus, through the whole courſe of his life, deſpiſed the things moſt eſteemed by men; for though he was the Son of God, when he became man he choſe to be born of parents in the meaneſt condition of life; though he was heir of all things, he choſe to be born in an inn; nay in the ſtable of an inn, where, inſtead of a cradle, he was laid in a manger. The angels reported the good news of his birth; not to the rabbies and great men, but to ſhepherds, who, being plain honeſt people, were unqueſtionably good witneſſes of what they heard and ſaw. When he grew up, he wrought with his father as a carpenter; and afterwards, while he executed the duties of his miniſtry, he was ſo poor, that he had not a place where to lay his head, but lived on the bounty of his friends. Thus by going before men in the thorny path of poverty and affliction, he hath taught them to be contented with their lot in life, however mean and humble, and laid him in a manger; becauſe there was no room for them in the inn.

8 And there were in the ſame country ſhepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night.

9 And lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord ſhone round about them: and they were ſore afraid.

10 And the angel ſaid unto them, Fear not: for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which ſhall be to all people.

11 For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Chriſt the Lord.

12 And this ſhall be a ſign unto you; Ye ſhall find the babe wrapped in ſwaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

13 And ſuddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly hoſt, praiſing God, and ſaying, 14 Glory to God in the higheſt, and on earth peace, good will towards men!

Ver. 8. Or, the night-watches.—V. 11. Iſai. ix. 6. Ch. i. 43.—V. 14. Ch. xix. 38. Iſai. lvii. 19. Epheſ. ii. 17.

Ver. 8. Keeping watch, &c.) Literally, Watching the watches of the night; which intimates their taking it by turns to watch, according to the uſual diviſions of the night; and as it is not probable that they expoſed their flocks to the coldneſs of winter-nights in that climate, where, as Dr. Shaw has ſhewn, they were very unwholeſome,—(ſee his travels, p. 379.) it may be ſtrongly argued from this circumſtance, that thoſe who have fixed upon December for the birth of Chriſt, have been miſtaken in the time of it. But ſee more on this head in the note on ver. 11.

Ver. 9. Came upon them] Stood over them,—ἐπέστη αὐτοῖς, hovered in the air over their heads, ſurrounded with a glorious effulgence; like that ſhechinah, which, during the tabernacle, and the temple of Solomon, was the ſymbol of the divine preſence.

Ver. 10. Which ſhall be to all people] This plainly refers to the promiſe made to the patriarch, that in his ſeed all nations ſhould be bleſſed. And as the Jews interpreted this prophecy of the Meſſiah, the angel's addreſs could not but be an intimation that this prophecy was now fulfilled; and certainly this declaration of the angel's muſt for ever remain an invincible barrier againſt their opinion, who believe a partial redemption. The joy which the birth of Chriſt ſhould occaſion amongſt them, according to the angel, is univerſal joy,—to all people; but how could it be ſo to thoſe, who from all eternity were reprobated, and conſequently rendered incapable of any of the bleſſings and benefits of the Goſpel?

Ver. 11. For unto you is born, &c.] Becauſe one of the Bodleian MSS reads this ἡμῖν, to us, Mr. Fleming has conjectured, that the angel who ſpoke was a glorified human ſpirit, perhaps that of Adam, all whoſe happy deſcendants might, he thinks, make up the chorus, ver. 13. But conſidering the great aſſent of copies to the preſent reading, this conjecture leans upon a very ſlender ſupport. Grotius imagines (which is more probable) that this angel was Gabriel. Almoſt all the Greek fathers, after the fourth century, taught that this day, upon which our Saviour was born, was the ſixth of January; but the Latins fixed his birth to the twenty-fifth of December. However, the principles upon which both the one and the other proceeded, clearly prove their opinion to be without foundation. They imagined that Zacharias, John the Baptiſt's father, enjoyed the dignity of high-prieſt, and that he was burning incenſe on the day of expiation when the angel appeared to him in the temple; and as the national expiation was always made on the tenth of Tiſri, anſwering to the twenty-fifth of September, they fixed Elizabeth's pregnancy to that day, and ſuppoſed that Gabriel appeared to Mary preciſely ſix months after; ſo that reckoning nine months forward, they brought the birth of Chriſt exactly to the twenty-fifth of December. The Greek fathers, though they proceeded upon the very ſame principles, were not ſo exact in their calculations, making the birth to happen ten days later; but the uncertainty, or to expreſs it better, the fallacy of thoſe principles, has induced Scaliger, Calviſius, and moſt learned men ſince that time, to maintain, in oppoſition to the ancient doctors of both churches, that our Lord was born in September. The writers mentioned ſupport their opinion by the following calculation: When Judas Maccabeus reſtored the temple worſhip on the twentieth of the month Caſleu, anſwering to the beginning or middle of our December, the courſe of Joarib, or firſt courſe of prieſts, (according to 1 Chron. xxiv. 7.) began the ſervice, the reſt ſucceeding in their turns. By making computations according to theſe ſuppoſitions, it is found, that the courſe of Abia, to which Zacharias belonged, ſerved in the months of July or Auguſt, at which time the conception of the Baptiſt happened. And as Mary had her viſion in the ſixth month of Elizabeth's pregnancy, that is to ſay, about the beginning of January, ſhe conceived ſo as to bring forth our Lord in the September following. To this agrees the circumſtance of the ſhepherds lying out in the fields the night of the nativity, which might happen in the month of September, but not in January. So likewiſe the taxation at Chriſt's birth, which might be executed more conveniently in autumn than the depth of winter, eſpecially as the people were obliged to repair to the cities of their anceſtors, which were often at a great diſtance from the places of their abode.

After the time, the angel mentions the place of the Saviour's nativity,—in the city of David; informing us, that thus it pleaſed God, that He who is deſcribed as of the houſe and lineage of David, and of whom David himſelf was but a type, ſhould have his birth in the ſame city where David had, to make the parallel more complete and exact. But there is yet ſomething further in the caſe; for this city of David was Bethlehem, whence we find his father called Jeſſe the Bethlehemite; and from hence it was that the prophet Micah foretold that the ruler in Iſrael ſhould come forth, ch. v. 2. Now ſince Hebrew names are uſually ſignificant, and impoſed to ſome ſpecial end or purpoſe, we may obſerve that the name of this city ſignifies the houſe or place of bread; and what place fitter for His birth and reception, who was and is the living bread which came down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die? After the place, the angel makes out the great characteriſtics of the Saviour,—who is Chriſt the Lord,—the Meſſiah, or Anointed. The natural properties of things, though ſeparated from common to religious uſe, continue the ſame. They are hallowed by ſuch ſeparation; they are applied to greater objects, and employed in the higheſt ſervice; but are not altered in themſelves. The frankincenſe, the ſalt, the oil are the ſame, whether in the temple or the cottage, and are ſubſervient to like purpoſes. The properties of oil are ſuch, as have recommended it to various offices, civil and religious. It not only preſerves itſelf, but alſo gives a luſtre to other bodies; is a proper vehicle for odoriferous perfumes, is ſoft and bright, and makes the face to ſhine, which was of old eſteemed a ſymbol of joy and magnificence; to which may be added, that as it feeds and maintains life in the lamp, ſo it ſerved to denote the influences of the Spirit in inſpired men. Hence the king, the prophet, the prieſt, conſecrated perſons, and things were anointed, to give them a luſtre, and to denote and publiſh the ſeparation of them from common men, and common uſe. Hence the offerings of a ſweet ſavour were with oil and frankincenſe; but the ſin offering was without them, Lev. v. 11. Oil was poured on the head of Aaron with ſuch profuſion, as to run down upon his beard, and the ſkirts of his garments. His ſons were anointed with oil; the altar and all its veſſels, the tabernacle, the laver, and its foot were anointed. We have alſo, in ſacred and profane hiſtory, many examples of anointing with oil. See Gen. xxv. 14. Luke x. 34. Homer's Iliad. T. 38. Σ. 350. It has been ſaid, that kings, prieſts, and prophets were anointed. The word anointed was often uſed for prince or king. Cyrus is called the Lord's anointed: Saul was anointed captain before he was king: Zerubbabel, with his crown of gold, and Joſhua the high-prieſt, with his crown of ſilver, are the two anointed ones in Zechariah iv. 14. See alſo Iſai. lxi. 1. So uſual was the phraſe of the anointed for kings, that in the parable of the trees, Judges ix. 9. they are ſaid to go forth to anoint a king. Hence it follows, that the expected king of the Jews, their greateſt prince, prophet, legiſlator, prieſt,—each of which offices alone would have intitled him to the name of Meſſiah, or Anointed,—ſhould eminently be called by the Jews the Meſſiah, or Chriſt. It is not without particular emphaſis that the angel has added to this character that he is the Lord. The title of Anointed, or Anointed of the Lord, is, as we have ſhewn, given to kings and God's vicegerents upon earth; but the character of Chriſt the Lord is more exalted and ſublime, and belongs only to Him, whom the prophet calls Jehovah our righteouſneſs; and the Apoſtle, the Lord from heaven; and who, being co-equal and co-eternal with the Father, is God of gods, or Lord of lords. He was the Lord, the Jehovah, who appeared ſo often under the firſt diſpenſation; to Abraham, in the plains of Mamre; to Iſaac, in Gerar; to Jacob, in Bethel; to Moſes, in the Wilderneſs. He is the leader of the hoſt of Iſrael; the word of God, by whom he made the world; by whom he converſed with the firſt and beſt of mankind; whom he ſent as a Saviour to redeem his people from their ſervitude in Egypt, their captivity in Babylon, and at laſt in the fleſh, to redeem the world from the pollution of ſin, and the dominion of death. See Macknight, Fleming's Chronology, vol. i. Sharpe's ſecond Argument, p. 65. and Berriman's Sermons, vol. ii. ſerm. 7.

Ver. 14. Glory to God in the higheſt, &c.] This verſe is very differently underſtood. 1. Dr. Heylin renders it thus, Glory to God in the higheſt, and on earth peace to men of good will. Beſides the manuſcripts and ancient verſions, ſays he, authoriſing the reading which I here prefer to that in the printed Greek, M. Beauſobre has added the following reaſons to ſupport it: "If the words ἐν ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκία, are a third clauſe in the period, and not to be joined with the ſecond, they would have been diſtinguiſhed by a new καὶ, as the two firſt are. And beſides, the ſenſe requires that this peace on earth ſhould be only for men well-pleaſing to God; i. e. acceptable to him. Ἄνθρωποι εὐδοκίας, is the ſame as Ἄνθρωποι εὐδόκητοι: So Ecclus. xv. 15. Πίστις εὐδοκίας, is the ſame as Πίστις εὐδοκητός." In fact, the birth of Chriſt has not been the occaſion of peace on earth to any but men of good will; i. e. men acceptable to God, and objects of the divine complacence [εὐδοκίας,—as Matth. iii. 17.]; nor is it matter of joy to any others: And therefore, the angel had before ſpecified theſe at the 10th verſe by their uſual denomination, the people;—ſo called here

15 And it came to paſs, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the ſhepherds ſaid one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and ſee this thing which is come to paſs, which the Lord hath made known unto us.

16 And they came with haſte, and found Mary and Joſeph, and the babe lying in a manger.

17 And when they had ſeen it, they made known abroad the ſaying which was told them concerning this child.

18 And all they that heard it, wondered at thoſe things which were told them by the ſhepherds.

19 But Mary kept all theſe things, and pondered them in her heart.

20 And the ſhepherds returned, glorifying and praiſing God for all the things that they had heard and ſeen, as it was told unto them.

21 And when eight days were accompliſhed for the circumciſing of the child, his name was called JESUS, which was ſo named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb.

22 And when the days of her purification, according to the law of Moſes, were accompliſhed, they brought him to Jeruſalem, to preſent him to the Lord;

23 (As it is written in the law of the Lord, Every male that openeth the womb ſhall be called holy to the Lord;)

24 And to offer a ſacrifice, according to that which is ſaid in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.

25 And behold, there was a man in Jeruhere by way of eminence, as elſewhere the peculiar people, and the people of God, to diſtinguiſh them from the heathen. See a remarakble inſtance, Acts xxvi. 17, 23. When all men are meant, λαὸς is uſed in the plural, as at ver. 31. of this chapter; and the following verſe ſo explains it. II. But, taking the original as it ſtands, it is certainly capable of different ſenſes. Some chooſe to render it, Glory to God in the higheſt, i. e. in heaven,—and on earth; peace, yea favour towards men: But then, inſtead of ἐν ὑψίϛοις, would it not rather have been ἐν οὐρανῷ?—for ſo it is always uſual to expreſs in heaven and upon earth. Others have given as the ſenſe of it, That the good will or favour which is now ſhewn to men, is the glory of God in the higheſt, and is the peace and happineſs of thoſe who dwell on earth: Which is indeed an important ſenſe, and what the original will well enough bear; but thus to change the doxology into a kind of proverb or aphoriſm, ſeems to deſtroy much of its beauty. I rather think, ſays Dr. Doddridge, that they are all to be conſidered as the words of a rejoicing acclamation, and that they ſtrongly repreſent the piety and benevolence of theſe heavenly ſpirits, and their affectionate good wiſhes for the proſperity of the Meſſiah's kingdom. See Luke xxix. 38. As if they had ſaid, "Glory be to God in the higheſt heavens; and let all the angelic hoſt reſound his praiſes in the moſt exalted ſtrains; for, with the Redeemer's birth, peace, and all kinds of happineſs come down to dwell upon earth; yea, the overflowings of divine benevolence and favour, are now exerciſed towards ſinful men; who, through this Saviour, become the objects of his complacential delight." We may obſerve, that the ſhouts of a multitude are generally broken into ſhort ſentences, and are commonly elliptic; which is the only cauſe of the ambiguity here. Mr. Macknight gives a ſomewhat different turn to the paſſage, explaining it thus: "Glory to God in the higheſt heavens, or among the higheſt order of beings: let the praiſes of God (ſo the word glory ſignifies, Pſ. l. 23.) be eternally celebrated by the higheſt orders of beings, notwithſtanding they are not the immediate objects of his infinite goodneſs on earth: let all manner of happineſs (ſo peace ſignifies in the Hebrew language) from henceforth prevail among men for ever; becauſe the deſigns of the devil againſt them are utterly overthrown. And as they departed, they ſhouted in the ſweeteſt, moſt ſonorous, and ſeraphic ſtrains, BENEVOLENCE; expreſſing the higheſt admiration of the goodneſs of God, which now began to ſhine with a brighter luſtre than ever, on the arrival of his Son to ſave the world."

Ver. 15. As the angels] As ſoon as, &c. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 19. But Mary, &c.] But Mary obſerved all thoſe ſayings, perceiving their meaning in her own mind. Wat. and Elſner. Mary was greatly affected with, and thought upon the ſhepherds' words; the ſenſe of which ſhe was enabled to enter into by what had been revealed to herſelf. She ſaid nothing, however, being more diſpoſed to think than to ſpeak; which was an excellent inſtance of modeſty and humility in ſo great a conjuncture.

Ver. 20. For all the things, &c.] Beſides what they had heard from the angel, and ſeen at Bethlehem, Joſeph and Mary would, no doubt, upon ſuch an occaſion, give them an account of thoſe particulars, which the ſacred hiſtorian has related above, reſpecting the conception of this divine infant; and this interview muſt have greatly confirmed and comforted the minds of all concerned.

Ver. 21. When eight days were accompliſhed] Among the Jews it was reckoned diſhonourable to keep company with perſons uncircumciſed, Acts xi. 3. wherefore, to render Jeſus acceptable to the Jews, to fit him for converſing familiarly with them, and to qualify him for diſcharging the other duties of his miniſtry, it was neceſſary that he ſhould be circumciſed. Beſides, as the Meſſiah was to be the deſcendant of Abraham, whoſe poſterity was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of mankind by this rite, he received the ſeal of circumciſion, to ſhew that he was rightly deſcended from that patriarch. And further it was neceſſary that Jeſus ſhould be circumciſed, becauſe thereby he was ſubjected to the law of Moſes, and put into a condition to fulfil all righteouſneſs. See Macknight, Guyſe, and Calmet.

Ver. 22. And when the days of her purification] The Alexandrian, and ſome other MSS read αυτῶν,—their purification; and as it muſt be owned, that both mother and child for a while after the birth were looked upon as ceremonially unclean, it might not be improper to admit this reading: For notwithſtanding it is true that Chriſt had no moral impurity from which he needed to be cleanſed, yet we may well enough ſuppoſe him, as he bore our ſins, to have ſubmitted to this ordinance, as well as circumciſion; and as he came into the world made of a woman, made under the law, he would be ready to comply with any inſtitution of the law, that thus he might fulfil all righteouſneſs. However, it ſhould be obſerved, in favour of the common reading, that the law referred to in this place ſpeaks only of the woman, and of the ſacrifice that was appointed for her purifying; ſee Lev. xii. 1—6. from whence it appears, that for the firſt ſeven days after child-bearing, whoever touched the woman, or converſed with her, was deemed unclean; for thirty-three days more ſhe was ſtill unclean, though in an inferior degree, becauſe ſhe could not all that time partake in the ſolemnities of public worſhip. At the concluſion of this term, ſhe was commanded to bring certain ſacrifices to the temple, by the offering of which, the ſtain laid on her by the law was wiped off, and ſhe reſtored to all the purity and cleanneſs ſhe had before. Now, as Jeſus was circumciſed, though perfectly free from ſin, ſo his mother ſubmitted to the purifications preſcribed by the law, notwithſtanding ſhe was free from the pollutions common in other births. It was evident, indeed, that ſhe was a mother,—but her miraculous conception was not generally known,—becauſe the law required that the child ſhould be preſented in the temple at the end of forty days from his birth, and that the uſual offering ſhould be made: Our Lord's parents would therefore find it more convenient to go up with him from Bethlehem, where he was born, at the diſtance of ſixty miles only, than after Mary's recovery to carry him firſt to Nazareth, which was a great way from Jeruſalem: So that we may ſuppoſe reaſonably enough, that they tarried in Bethlehem all the days of the purification; and that from Bethlehem they went ſtraightway to Jeruſalem. See Macknight, and Mann's Diſſertation on the Birth of Chriſt, p. 42.

Ver. 23. Every male, &c.] God having acquired a peculiar right to the firſt-born of Iſrael by preſerving them amidſt the deſtruction brought on the firſt-born of the Egyptians, though he had accepted of the tribe of Levi as an equivalent, yet would have the memory of it preſerved by the little acknowledgement of five ſhekels, or about 12s. 6d. of our money (ſee Numb. xviii. 15, 16.); and in caſe of an omiſſion herein, it might reaſonably have been expected that the child ſhould be cut off by ſome judgement. The firſt-born, therefore, were redeemed, by paying this money, in ſuch a ſenſe as all the people were, when at the time that they were numbered, each of them paid half a ſhekel, as a ranſom for their ſouls, that there might be no plague among them. See Exod. xxx. 12—16.

Ver. 24. A pair of turtle doves, &c.] This was the offering appointed for the poorer ſort, Lev. xii. 6—8. It is evident, therefore, that although Joſeph and Mary were both of the ſeed royal, they were in very mean circumſtances. The Evangeliſt mentions the preſentation of the child to the Lord, before the offering of the ſacrifice for the mother's purification; but in fact this preceded the preſentation, becauſe, till it was performed, the mother could not enter the temple; accordingly St. Luke himſelf introduces both the parents preſenting Jeſus, ver. 27.

ſalem, whoſe name was Simeon: and the ſame man was juſt and devout, waiting for the conſolation of Iſrael: and the Holy Ghoſt was upon him.

26 And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghoſt, that he ſhould not ſee death, before he had ſeen the Lord's Chriſt.

27 And he came by the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jeſus, to do for him after the cuſtom of the law,

28 Then took he him up in his arms, and bleſſed God, and ſaid,

29 Lord, now letteſt thou thy ſervant depart in peace, according to thy word:

30 For mine eyes have ſeen thy ſalvation,

31 Which thou haſt prepared before the face of all people;

32 A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Iſrael.

33 And Joſeph and his mother marvelled at thoſe things which were ſpoken of him.

34 And Simeon bleſſed them, and ſaid unto Mary his mother, Behold, this child is ſet for the fall and riſing again of many in Iſrael, and for a ſign which ſhall be ſpoken againſt;

Ver. 25. The conſolation of Iſrael] This is a phraſe frequently uſed both by the ancient and modern Jews, for a deſcription of the Meſſiah. The days of conſolation is a common phraſe among them to ſignify the days of the Meſſiah; nor is there any thing more uſual with them than to ſwear by their deſire of ſeeing this conſolation. The Meſſiah was very fitly called the conſolation of Iſrael, becauſe in all ages the prophets had been ſent, with expreſs promiſes of his coming, to comfort the people of God under their afflictions. See Iſai. xlix. 13. lii. 9. lxii. 13. Jer. xxxi. 13. Zech. i. 17, &c.

Ver. 29. Lord, now letteſt thou thy ſervant depart, &c.] The word rendered depart, or diſmiſs, is generally uſed to expreſs death; and joined to the word peace, ſignifies a happy and contented death. There may, perhaps, be an alluſion here to the cuſtom of ſaying, eſpecially to an inferior when parting, Go in peace. See ch. vii. 50. Tobit iii. 6. This good old man, having attained the utmoſt pitch of felicity, in the gratification of that which had always been his higheſt wiſh, and having no farther uſe for life, deſired immediate death; yet he would not depart of himſelf, knowing that no man can lawfully deſert his ſtation, till diſmiſſed by the ſovereign Maſter who placed him there.

Ver. 30—32. Mine eyes have ſeen, &c.] Simeon, being well acquainted with the prophetic writings, knew from them that the Meſſiah was to be the Author of a great ſalvation, which, becauſe it was planned by God, this pious man very properly refers to God;—thy ſalvation. He knew likewiſe that this ſalvation was not deſigned for the Jews only, but for all mankind; therefore he ſays, ver. 31. that it was prepared by God, to ſet before the face of all people, as the glorious object of their faith and hope: Withal, becauſe in the prophecies the Meſſiah is introduced teaching and ruling the Gentiles, he calls him after Iſaiah, A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Iſrael; whom he greatly honoured by condeſcending to ariſe among them. See Macknight.

Ver. 34, 35. Behold, this child is ſet for the fall, &c.] In this prediction Simeon was directed to uſe a metaphor, correſponding to that found Iſai. viii. 14. xxviii. 16. which paſſages St. Paul has joined in one citation, and applied to the Meſſiah, Rom. ix. 33. Behold, I lay in Sion a ſtumbling ſtone, and rock of offence; and whoſoever believeth on him ſhall not be aſhamed. In alluſion to this metaphor, Simeon, holding up the child in his arms, cried, Behold, He is ſet for the fall and riſing again of many in Iſrael. This is the ſtumbling ſtone and rock of offence, which God hath long ago foretold he will lay in Sion, and by whom many in Iſrael ſhall fall; for they ſhall reject him on account of the meanneſs of his birth and fortune: At the ſame time, this is a ſtone ſet for the riſing again of many in Iſrael; becauſe, thoſe who are fallen may raiſe themſelves up by leaning upon it; that is, receiving and obeying his religion; or as the Apoſtle has expreſſed it, Whoſoever believeth on him ſhall not be aſhamed. Simeon adds, for a ſign which ſhall be ſpoken againſt;—εἰς σημεῖον ἀντιλεγόμενον; that is, "for a mark to be ſhot at,"—the butt of the malice of wicked men. The phraſe finely intimates the deliberate and helliſh artifice with which the character and perſon of Chriſt were aſſaulted, while he endured the contradiction of ſinners againſt himſelf. In theſe words, which he addreſſed to Mary, he foretold the reception which her Son was to meet with from his countrymen; he added, ver. 35. Yea, a ſword,—[ῥομφαία, a javelin, a dart; properly a Thracian javelin] ſhall pierce through thine own ſoul alſo. This ſeems, as M. L'Enfant obſerves, to be a beautiful alluſion to the preceding figure; as if it had been told the holy mother, that the darts levelled at her Son, ſhould be reflected from his breaſt to hers in ſuch a manner, as to wound her very heart. Whether it be rendered ſword or dart, it muſt undoubtedly refer to the part which the bleſſed virgin took in all the reproaches and perſecutions which Jeſus met with: But never was it ſo ſignally fulfilled, as when ſhe ſtood by the croſs, and ſaw him at once moſt ſcornfully inſulted, and cruelly murdered. See John xix. 25. It is added, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed: i. e. "All theſe things are ordered by Providence, that the diſpoſitions of men, whether good or bad, may be made to appear." See Grotius, Doddridge, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 36, 37. And there was one Anna] While theſe things were tranſacting, there came into the temple an aged woman named Anna, whoſe mortification to the world appeared by her having lived a widow ever ſince her huſband's death; which happened while ſhe was very young, for ſhe had been a widow fourſcore and four years;—as did her piety likewiſe towards God, by the conſtancy with which ſhe waited on the temple, both night and day. The meaning is not, that Anna abode continually in the temple, for none lived there ſave the prieſts and Levites; but, ſhe attended conſtantly at the morning and evening ſacrifices, (ſee ch. xviii. 1.) and was often in the exerciſe of private prayer and faſting; ſpending the greateſt part of her time in the temple, as we find the Apoſtles doing, Acts ii. 46. Perhaps ſhe might ſometimes attend thoſe anthems, which the prieſts ſung in the temple during the night-watching, Pſ. cxxxiv. 1, 2. to which David may alſo allude, Pſ. cxix. 62. Dr. Waterland and the Manuſcript, inſtead of departed not, read abſented not,—ſtrayed not away.

Ver. 38. Gave thanks likewiſe] The verſion of 1729 renders it, ſhe expreſſed her thanks to the Lord, and ſpoke of Jeſus; and it muſt be acknowledged that there are in ver. 22. and 27. inſtances, in which the relative pronoun refers to a remote, and not immediately-preceding ſubſtantive: But it is ſo evident, that Chriſt is ſo often called the Lord by St. Luke, as well as by the other ſacred writers, that there can be no neceſſity for giving the paſſage ſuch a turn. If it be objected, that the infant Jeſus did not ſeem capable at that time of reſenting her gratitude, as a rational agent, We anſwer, that Anna might properly be ſaid to make her acknowledgements to the Lord, if ſhe addreſſed herſelf to the child; as Simeon had done, confeſſing him to be the Meſſiah. The original phraſe, ἀνθωμολογεῖτο, may have reference to Simeon's ſpeech, and might be intended to intimate that this of Anna was a kind of reſponſe or counterpart to his; and it is not improbable that ſhe, like Simeon, might alſo addreſs ſome lofty hymn of praiſe to the God of Iſrael on this great occaſion: At leaſt this may be inferred from the words, "She ſpoke of him to all them of her acquaintance in Jeruſalem who were waiting, like herſelf, for the promiſed redemption of Iſrael by the Meſſiah;" of whoſe ſpeedy appearance there was an earneſt expectation raiſed amongſt the pious and devout, as the appointed period of his coming now evidently approached. For the ſceptre appeared to be departing from Judah, though it was not actually gone; Daniel's weeks were plainly near their period; and the revival of the ſpirit of prophecy, joined with the memorable occurrences relating to the birth of John the Baptiſt and of Jeſus, could not but encourage and quicken the expectation of pious perſons at this time. See Doddridge and Bp. Chandler. An old copy mentioned by Dr. Mill, reads the laſt clauſe in this verſe thus; to all who looked for the redemption of Iſrael. The example of theſe aged ſaints ought to impreſs and animate thoſe whoſe hoary heads, like theirs, are a crown of glory, being found in the way of righteouſneſs.

of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jeruſalem.

39 And when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth.

40 And the child grew, and waxed ſtrong in ſpirit, filled with wiſdom: and the grace of God was upon him.

41 Now his parents went to Jeruſalem every year at the feaſt of the paſſover.

42 And when he was twelve years old, they went up to Jeruſalem, after the cuſtom of the feaſt.

43 And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jeſus tarried behind in Jeruſalem; and Joſeph and his mother knew not of it.

44 But they ſuppoſing him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they ſought him among their kinsfolk and among their acquaintance.

45 And when they found him not, they turned back again to Jeruſalem, ſeeking him.

46 And it came to paſs, that after three days they found him in the temple, ſitting in the midſt of the doctors, both hearing them, and aſking them queſtions.

47 And all that heard him were aſtoniſhed at his underſtanding and anſwers.

48 And when they ſaw him, they were amazed: and his mother ſaid unto him, Son, why haſt thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have ſought thee ſorrowing.

49 And he ſaid unto them, How is it that ye ſought me? wiſt ye not that I muſt be about my Father's buſineſs?

50 And they underſtood not the ſaying which he ſpake unto them.

51 And he went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was ſubject unto them: but his mother kept all theſe ſayings in her heart.

52 And Jeſus increaſed in wiſdom and ſtature, and in favour with God and men.

ouſneſs. Thoſe venerable lips, ſo ſoon to be ſilent in the grave, ſhould now be employed in the praiſes of their Redeemer, that they may have the pleaſure to ſee, through their pious attempts, the riſing generation improved in true religion, and that they may quit the world with the greater tranquility in the view of leaving thoſe behind them, to whom Chriſt will be as precious as he hath been to them, and who will be waiting for God's ſalvation, while they are gone to enjoy it.

Ver. 40. And the grace of God was upon him] See the note on ver. 52.

Ver. 42. And when he was twelve years old] To ſhew how eminent Jeſus was for wiſdom even in his childhood, the Evangeliſt gives us the remarkable inſtance here recorded. When he was twelve years of age his parents carried him up to the paſſover, with a view to inſtil an early regard for religion and its precepts into his tender mind. See Exod. xxxiv. 23. Deut. xvi. 16. It is generally allowed by learned men that twelve was the age when young people, according to the Jewiſh maxims, came under the yoke of the law. See Lightfoot Hor. Heb. on the place, and Wotton's Miſcel. vol. i. p. 320.

Ver. 44. Suppoſing him to have been in the company] Several families then travelled together, as they do at preſent on ſuch occaſions, in companies, or caravans, as they are called in the eaſt. In theſe companies it was not unuſual for perſons to leave their own families, and mix with others, for the ſake of converſation, in the day-time; but at night they always joined their own families again. The parents therefore of Jeſus ſuppoſing him to have been among their relations, were not ſolicitous about him in the day; but not finding him at night, they became anxious on account of his abſence; and thus having ſpent one day on their journey, they reached Jeruſalem on the ſecond, and ſpent the third in ſearching after him there. See ver. 49. Grotius, and Shaw's Travels, pref. p. 9.

Ver. 46. They found him in the temple] On the morrow after their arrival, the parents of Jeſus, to their great joy, found him in one of the chambers of the temple, ſitting among the doctors, who at certain ſeaſons, and particularly at the great feſtivals, taught there publickly; a cuſtom hinted at Jer. xxvi. 5—10. See alſo John xviii. 20. There were no leſs than three ſanhedrim, or aſſemblies of the doctors, who had apartments in the temple; two of theſe conſiſted of twenty-three perſons each, one of which ſat at "the eaſt-gate of the mountain of the houſe;" the other, at "the gate of Nicanor," or, "the eaſt-gate of the court of Iſrael;" as the great ſanhedrim, conſiſting of ſeventy-one, did in the room named Gazith, near the great altar. The doctors ſat on ſeats in the form of a creſcent, but the diſciples on the ground, till after the death of Gamaliel. Into which of theſe courts our Lord came, is quite uncertain: however, it was cuſtomary in theſe aſſemblies to propoſe doubts concerning the meaning of the precepts of the law, and the traditions of the elders, which was generally done by way of queſtion. The word hearing is uſed in the rabbinical writings to imply ſuch ſkill in the traditions of the elders, as to be capable of propoſing any queſtions concerning them, and likewiſe of giving anſwers to ſuch as were propoſed. It is certainly a great injury to the character of our bleſſed Redeemer, to repreſent this ſtory, whether in pictures or words, as if Chriſt went up into the ſeats of the doctors, and there diſputed with them. Not one word is ſaid of his diſputing by the Evangeliſt; but only of his aſking ſome queſtions, and anſwering others. It was a very uſual thing in theſe aſſemblies, and indeed the very end of them; for they were principally deſigned for the catechetical examination and inſtruction of young people. All was conducted, no doubt, with the utmoſt modeſty and decorum; and if Jeſus were with others at the feet of theſe teachers, where, as we obſerved, learners generally ſat, he might be ſaid to be in the midſt of them, as they ſat on benches of a ſemicircular form, raiſed above their auditors and diſciples. See Lightfoot, Druſius, and Doddridge.

Ver. 47, 48. And all that heard him were aſtoniſhed] The words rendered aſtoniſhed in this verſe, and amazed in the next, are much more forcible than our tranſlation of them. They import, that they were in a tranſport of aſtoniſhment, and were ſtruck with admiration. As our Lord himſelf hath told us, that on this occaſion he was employed in his Father's buſineſs, it is probable that in theſe his anſwers and objections, he modeſtly inſinuated corrections of the errors wherewith the Jewiſh teachers had now greatly disfigured religion. If we recollect that the ſchool learning of the Jews was at this time at its higheſt pitch, and that our Lord, at the age of twelve years, was ſuperior to the greateſt doctors which the Jews could boaſt of, there will appear very juſt grounds for the admiration here mentioned. His parents were particularly and beyond meaſure ſurpriſed, to find him engaged in ſuch an employment; and his mother in particular, not able to repreſs the emotion ſhe was in, chid him with a tender vehemence for leaving them without their knowledge, and putting them to ſo much pain. The word rendered ſorrowing, ὀδυνώμενοι, is expreſſive of the moſt racking anguiſh, and is often applied to the diſtreſs and pains of a woman in travail; it has therefore been rendered, with great concern,—with inexpreſſible anxiety and diſtreſs.

Ver. 49. Wiſt ye not, &c.] Knew ye not that I muſt be in my Father's houſe? Wat. In this tranſlation Dr. Waterland follows the Syriac; and it is certain that the Greek will well bear this tranſlation, and that the reply appears with greater propriety, if it be ſuppoſed to ſignify, that though they thought him loſt, yet he was at home; he was in his Father's houſe. He calls the temple his Father's houſe, John ii. 16. and thus gives a tacit hint, that in ſtaying behind at Jeruſalem, he had not left his true Father. It is to be remembered, that this is the firſt viſit Chriſt had ever made to the temple ſince he was a child in arms; and it is no wonder therefore, that the delight he found here inclined him to prolong it. How happy thoſe children, who, like the holy Jeſus, love the houſe and ordinances of God, and thirſt for the inſtructions of his good word!

Ver. 50 They underſtood not the ſaying] They did not fully comprehend the meaning of this expreſſion. The phraſe implies, that there was ſomething more in Chriſt's words than at firſt appeared. His parents did not underſtand him, perhaps becauſe they now doubted his being the Meſſiah, in regard he had not diſappeared,—according to the notion of the Scribes; or rather becauſe they had few juſt conceptions of the end for which the Meſſiah was ſent into the world.

Ver. 51. But his mother] And his mother. Wat.

Ver. 52. And Jeſus increaſed in wiſdom, &c.] The word ſignifies either age or ſtature; but the latter ſeems evidently to be here meant. Eraſmus remarks, that all the endowments of the man Chriſt Jeſus were were owing to the divine beneficence, and that the Deity communicated itſelf in a gradual manner to that human nature which it had aſſumed. Some perhaps may wiſh to know the hiſtory of our Lord's childhood and private life; what early proofs he gave of his having the divine nature united to the human; what proficiency he made in knowledge, and the methods by which he advanced therein; what way he employed himſelf when he arrived at man's eſtate; what notions his acquaintance formed of him; the manner of his converſing with them, and other things of a like nature,—which the Holy Spirit has not thought fit to explain. The following particulars only are left upon record:—That he had not the advantage of a liberal education, (John vii. 15.) receiving no inſtructions, probably, but what his parents gave him according to the law; (Deut. iv. 9, 10. vi. 7.) yet that at the age of twelve years, when carried up to Jeruſalem, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the doctors by ſuch a degree of wiſdom and penetration, as far exceeded his years. That he very early underſtood the deſign on which he was come into the world;—Wiſt ye not that I muſt be about my Father's buſineſs? That, as he grew in years, he became remarkable for his wiſdom and ſtature, advancing gradually in the former as well as in the latter; and that by the comelineſs of his perſon, the ſweetneſs of his diſpoſition, and the uncommon vigour of his faculties, he engaged the affections of all who had the happineſs to be acquainted with him. That as his mind was filled with wiſdom, and always ſerene, being perfectly free from thoſe turbulent paſſions which diſtract other men, his countenance no doubt muſt have been compoſed and agreeable, ſuch as did betoken the ſtrength of his underſtanding, and the goodneſs of his heart. This may be implied by the expreſſion, the grace of God was upon him, ver. 40. unleſs it be thought an explication of the precedent clauſe, He waxed ſtrong in ſpirit, and was filled with wiſdom. Raphelius, Not. Polyb. p. 186. makes it probable that the grace of God, in that paſſage, is the higheſt Hebrew ſuperlative, being an expreſſion of the ſame form with, the mountains of God, i. e. exceeding high mountains,—and ſo is equivalent to the deſcription which Stephen gave of Moſes's beauty, Acts vii. 20. He was αϛειος τῳ Θεῳ, fair to God,—exceeding fair. Beſides, we find the word χαρις, grace, uſed in a ſimilar ſenſe by Luke iv. 22. and all—wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth, επι τοις λογοις της χαριτος, at the harmony and beauty of his diction, as well as the importance of his ſubject. However ſingular this obſervation concerning our Lord's form may appear, yet a nearer view of it will conciliate our approbation: for if his ſtature was ſo remarkable in his youth, that it twice deſerved the notice of the Evangeliſt, ver. 40, 52. his comelineſs might be ſo likewiſe. Nor is any thing which the prophets have ſaid of him, as for inſtance, Iſai. lii. 14. inconſiſtent with this conjecture: for the meanneſs of the Meſſiah's condition, and the diſpoſition of the Jews towards him, are deſcribed in that prophecy, rather than the form of his perſon. Juſt as Pſ. xlv. 3. deſcribes the triumphs of his religion, rather than the majeſty and glory of his outward form. The Evangeliſts tell us farther, that Jeſus was poſſeſſed of an uncommon and prevailing eloquence, inſomuch that his hearers were often amazed at the beauty of his diſcourſes, (chap. iv. 22.) and ſome of them made to cry out, Never man ſpake like this man, John vii. 46.—That he remained ſubject to his parents, and lived with them in humble obſcurity, till he entered on his public miniſtry, which commenced about the thirtieth year of his age; the excellencies of his divine nature having been for the moſt part veiled during the whole courſe of his private life:—and That as ſoon as his ſtrength permitted, he wrought with his father at his occupation of a carpenter, Mark vi. 3. leaving us an admirable example both of filial duty, and prudent induſtry. Theſe are all the particulars which the Holy Spirit has thought fit to communicate to us concerning our Lord's life.

REFLECTIONS ON CHRIST'S SITTING AMONG THE DOCTORS.

Even the ſpring ſhews us what we may hope for from the tree in ſummer. In his nonage, therefore, would our Saviour give us a taſte of his future excellence, leſt if his perfection ſhould have ſhewed itſelf without warning to the world, it might have been entertained with more wonder than belief. If, after all this early demonſtration of his divine graces, the incredulous Jews would nevertheleſs ſay, Whence hath this man his wiſdom and his mighty works? Let us aſk what would they have ſaid, had he ſuddenly leaped forth into the clear light of the world?—The ſun would dazzle all eyes, were he to break forth at his firſt riſing into his full ſtrength: now, he hath both the day-ſtar to go before him, and to bid men look for that glorious day, and the lively colours of the day to publiſh his approach. The eye is comforted, not hurt, by his appearance.

The law of the paſſover extended only to the males; I do not find the bleſſed virgin bound to this annual voyage; the weaker ſex received indulgence from God; but ſhe, knowing the ſpiritual profit of the journey, takes the voluntary pains of meaſuring that long way every year. Piety regards not, any more than God's gracious acceptation, the diſtinction of ſexes or degrees. It could not be but that ſhe whom the Holy Ghoſt had overſhadowed, ſhould be zealous of God's ſervice. They who would go no farther than they are dragged, in their religious exerciſes, are not at all of kin to her, whom all generations ſhall call bleſſed.

In all his examples the bleſſed Jeſus meant our inſtruction; this pious act of his nonage was intended to lead our firſt years into timely devotion, and ſet them on their way to Jeruſalem. The firſt liquor ſeaſons the veſſel for a long while after. It is every way good for a man to bear God's yoke even from his infancy. He that ſets out betimes in the morning, is more likely to diſpatch his journey, than he who lingers till the day be ſpent.

This holy family came not to look at the feaſt only, and be gone; they duly ſtaid out all the appointed days of unleavened bread: their worldly buſineſs, their ſecular concerns could not either keep them from Jeruſalem, or ſend them away immaturely. Worldly cares muſt give way to ſacred; and except we will depart unbleſſed, we muſt attend God's ſervice till we may receive his diſmiſſion; and can indeed ſay with Simeon, Lord, now letteſt thou thy ſervant depart in peace.

The feaſt ended, what ſhould they do but return to Nazareth? God's ſervices may not be ſo attended, as that we ſhould neglect our particular callings. They are grievouſly miſtaken, to their own hurt, and the diſhonour of the Almighty, who think God cares for no other trade but devotion. Piety and diligence muſt keep due interchange with each other; nor doth God leſs approve of our return to Nazareth, than of our going up to Jeruſalem.

We cannot think that the bleſſed virgin, or the good and ſolicitous Joſeph, could be ſo neglectful of their divine charge, as not to call him to them on their ſetting forth from Jeruſalem; but their back was no ſooner turned upon the temple, than his face was towards it. He had buſineſs to do, and meat to eat in that place, where their ſervices and their feaſts were ended. He in whom the Godhead dwelt bodily could do nothing without God: His true Father led him away from his ſuppoſed: Sometimes the affairs of our ordinary vocation may not grudge to yield unto ſpiritual occaſions.

The parents of Chriſt knew him well to be of a diſpoſition not ſtrange, nor ſullen, but ſweet and ſociable. They ſuppoſed therefore that he had ſpent his time on the way in the company of their friends and their neighbours; and when evening came, they go to ſeek him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance. He had not been ſought amongſt them now, had he not been wont to converſe with them heretofore. Neither as God, nor man, doth he take pleaſure in a ſtern, froward auſterity, and wild retirement; but in a mild affability, and amiable converſation.

But, O bleſſed virgin! who can expreſs the ſorrow of thy perplexed ſoul, when all that evening ſearch could afford thee no news of thy ſon Jeſus! Was not this one of thoſe ſwords of Simeon which ſhould pierce through thy tender breaſt? How muſt thou have chided thy credulous neglect in not obſerving ſo precious a charge, and blamed thine eye for once looking beſide this deareſt object of thy love! How muſt thou, with thy careful huſband, have ſpent that reſtleſs night in mutual expoſtulations and bemoanings of your loſs?

Gracious Saviour! who can miſs, and not mourn for thee? Never did any ſoul conceive thee by faith, that was leſs afflicted with the ſenſe of thy deſertion, than comforted with the joy of thy preſence. Juſt is that ſorrow, and ſeaſonable thoſe tears, which are beſtowed upon thy loſs. Of what comfort are we capable, whilſt we want thee? O let thyſelf looſe, my ſoul, to the fulneſs of ſorrow, when thou findeſt thyſelf bereaved of him, in whoſe preſence is fulneſs of joy; and deny to receive comfort from any thing but his return.

In vain is Chriſt ſought among his kindred according to the fleſh. So far, alas! are they ſtill from giving us their aid to find the true Meſſiah, that they are but too apt to lead us from him. Back again therefore muſt Joſeph and Mary be gone, to ſeek him in Jeruſalem whom their ſoul loved. At laſt, the third day, ſhe finds him in the temple. He who could riſe again the third day, and be found among the living, would now alſo the third day be found of his parents, after the ſorrow of his abſence.

But where wert thou, and how tended, O bleſſed Jeſu, for the ſpace of theſe three days? I know, if Jeruſalem ſhould have been as unkind and niggardly to thee as Bethlehem, thou couldeſt have commanded the heavens to harbour thee; and if men did not miniſter unto thee, thou couldſt have commanded the ſervice of angels:—But further I inquire not—for thou revealeſt not. This only I know, that hereby thou intendedſt to teach thy parents that thou couldſt live without them; and that not out of any indigency, but out of a gracious diſpenſation alone, thou chooſedſt ordinarily to depend on their care.

In the mean time, thy divine wiſdom could not but foreknow all thoſe corroding thoughts wherewith the heart of thy mother muſt needs bleed:—yet wouldſt thou leave her for the time to ſorrow, and viſit her who bore thee with this earthly affliction. Never any loved thee, whom thou didſt not ſometimes exerciſe with the grief of miſſing thee, that both we may be more careful to hold thee, and more joyful in recovering thee. But if thou leave us, thou wilt not forſake us: Thou mayeſt hide thee for three days; but then, if we ſeek thee, we ſhall find thee. None ever ſought thee with a ſincere deſire, of whom thou wert not found; and where ſhould we rather hope to find thee, than in the temple?—There is the habitation for the God of Iſrael; there is his reſting-place for ever.—O all ye who are grieved with the want of your Saviour, ſee then where you muſt ſeek him: In vain ſhall you hope to find him in the ſtreets, in the taverns, in the theatres: Seek him in his holy temple; ſeek him

NOW in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæſar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Iturea, and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lyſanius the tetrarch of Abilene,

2 Annas and Caiaphas being the high prieſts, the word of God came unto John the ſon of Zacharias in the wilderneſs.

Ver. 2. John xi. 49, 51. xviii. 13. Acts iv. 6.

with piety; ſeek him with faith; there ſhall ye aſſuredly meet and recover him.

Whilſt children of that age were playing in the ſtreets, Chriſt was found ſitting in the temple, to hear and oppoſe the doctors of the law. He who, as God, gave them all the wiſdom they had, as the ſon of man, hearkens to the wiſdom he had given them. He who ſat in their hearts, as the author of all knowledge, ſits in the midſt of their ſchools an humble diſciple, that by learning from them, he might teach all the younger ſort humility and due attendance on their inſtructors: He contents himſelf to hear with diligence, to aſk with modeſty, and to teach only by inſinuation. Let thoſe conſider this, who will needs run as ſoon as they can go, and when they find ability, think they need not ſtay for a further vocation for God or men. Behold him, that could have taught the angels, liſtening, in his minority, to the voice of men. Firſt he hears, then he aſks, (ver. 46.) after that, he anſwers. How much more then doth it concern us to be hearers, ere we offer to be teachers of others? He gathers that hears; he ſpends that teaches. If we ſpend before we gather, no wonder if we ſoon prove bankrupts.

What marvel was it that theſe great rabbins all wondered at the underſtanding and anſwers of this infant tutor? ver. 47. Their eyes ſaw nothing but human weakneſs; their ears heard divine ſublimity of matter. And why then did ye not remember, O ye Jewiſh teachers, that to us a child was born, that to us a child is given, whoſe name ſhall be called Wonderful, Counſellor, the Mighty God, the Everlaſting Father, the Prince of Peace? Why did ye not now bethink yourſelves of what the ſtar,—the ſages,—the angels,—the ſhepherds,—Zachary, Simeon, Anna had pre-admoniſhed you? Fruitleſs is the wonder, that endeth not in faith. No light is ſufficient, where the the eyes are held through prejudice or unbelief.

The doctors were not more amazed to hear ſo profound a childhood, than the parents of Chriſt were to ſee him among the doctors, ver. 48. And now, not Joſeph,—he knew how little right he had to that divine offspring,—but Mary, breaks forth into that loving expoſtulation, Son, why haſt thou dealt ſo with us? Wherein ſhe evidently meant to expreſs rather grief than correction and reproach. Herein, only, the bleſſed virgin appears to have offended, in that her inconſideration did not recollect, that ſome higher reſpects than could be due to fleſh and blood muſt have called away the Son of God from her, who was the daughter of a man. How naturally are we all partial to ourſelves! how prone to the regard of our own ſuppoſed rights! Queſtionleſs this gracious ſaint would by no means wilfully have preferred her own attendance to that of her God: through heedleſſneſs, however, even Mary offends. Her Son and Saviour is her monitor, and out of his divine love reforms her natural. How is it that ye ſought me? Knew ye not that I muſt be about my Father's buſineſs?

Immediately before, the bleſſed virgin had ſaid, thy father and I had ſought thee with heavy hearts. The Son of God ſtands not upon contradiction to his mother in this caſe; but leading her thoughts from his ſuppoſed father to his true; from earth to heaven, He anſwers, Knew ye not that I muſt be about my Father's buſineſs? It was honour enough for her to hear, that he had vouchſafed to take fleſh of her. It was His eternal honour, that he was God of all, the everlaſting Son of the heavenly Father. Good reaſon therefore was it, that the reſpects of fleſh ſhould give place to the God of ſpirits. How well contented was holy Mary with ſo juſt an anſwer! How doth ſhe now again in her humble heart renew her reply to the angel, Behold the ſervant of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word!

We are all the ſons of God in another kind; nature and the world think we ſhould attend them; but we are not worthy to ſay, we have a Father in heaven, if we cannot ſteal away from theſe earthly diſtractions, and employ ourſelves in the ſervice of God, in the all-important buſineſs of our heavenly and eternal Father.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. Now in the fifteenth year, &c.] Though the Evangeliſt has told us in what year the Baptiſt made his firſt public appearance, he has not intimated in what period of his miniſtry Jeſus came to be baptized; (ſee ver. 21.) wherefore, ſeeing the Baptiſt's fame had ſpread itſelf into every corner, and brought people to him from all quarters, it is probable that he had preached at leaſt ſeveral months before our Lord arrived at Bethabara. If ſo, as it is natural to think that John came abroad in the ſpring, Jeſus could not be baptized by him ſooner than in ſummer or autumn. The reign of Tiberius had two commencements; one when Auguſtns made him his colleague in the empire, and another when he began to reign alone after Auguſtus's death. If, as hiſtorians tell us, Tiberius's proconſular empire began about three years before Auguſtus died, that is to ſay, Auguſt 28. A. U. 764. A. D. 11. the whole of that year would, by common computation, be reckoned the firſt of Tiberius; and conſequently, his fifteenth year, though really beginning Auguſt 28, A. U. 778. A. D. 24. would be reckoned from the January preceding. Suppoſing then, that the Baptiſt began to preach in the ſpring of this fifteenth year, according to common computation, and that Jeſus came to him in the ſummer or autumn following, the latter would be, at his baptiſm, 30 years of age, a few days more or leſs, provided we fix his birth to September, A. U. 748. that is, a little more than a year before Herod died;—or, but 29 years of age, if we ſuppoſe that he was not born till September, A. U. 749. that is, a few months only before Herod died.

At this period Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea: after the death of Herod the Great Auguſtus confirmed the partition which that prince by his latter will had made of his dominions among his children. According to this partition, Archelaus obtained Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, with the title of Ethnarch; for though his father had called him king in his teſtament, the emperor would not allow him that dignity, till he ſhould do ſomething for the Roman ſtate which deſerved it. Archelaus, after a tyrannical reign of ten years, was depoſed for his mal-adminiſtration; and his country was made a province of the Roman empire, under the name of Judea. Properly ſpeaking, indeed, Judea was an appendage to the province of Syria, being governed by a procurator, ſubject to the preſident of that province. Yet the procurators of Judea were always veſted with the power of preſidents or governors; that is to ſay, gave final judgement in every cauſe, whether civil or criminal, without appeal, unleſs to the emperor, by whom Roman citizens, in whatever part of the empire they lived, had a right to be tried, if they demanded it. Judea therefore was, in effect, a diſtinct province or government from Syria. Accordingly the Evangeliſts give its procurators, when they have occaſion to mention them, the title of governors, as that which beſt expreſſed the nature of their dignity. The proper buſineſs of a procurator was, to take care of the emperor's revenues in the province belonging to him, as the quæſtor's buſineſs was to ſuperintend the ſenate's revenue, in the province belonging to them. But ſuch procurators as were the chief magiſtrates of a province, had the the dignities of governor and quæſtor united in their perſons, and enjoyed privileges accordingly.

By virtue of the partition above-mentioned, Herod Antipas, another of the firſt Herod's ſons, governed Galilee and Perea, or the country beyond Jordan, with the title of Tetrarch; which, according to ſome, was the proper denomination of the fourth dignity in the empire; or, as others think, the title of one, who had only the fourth part of a country ſubject to him; though in proceſs of time it was applied to thoſe who had any conſiderable ſhare of a kingdom in their poſſeſſion. This is the Herod, under whoſe reign John began his miniſtry, and by whom he was beheaded. It was to him likewiſe that Pilate ſent our Lord, in the courſe of his trial.

St. Luke tells us, that Philip's dominions were Iturea and Trachonitis: But Joſephus ſays, they were Auranitis and Trachonitis. Reland reconciles the hiſtorian with the Evangeliſt, by ſuppoſing that Iturea and Auranitis were different names of the ſame country. The Itureans are mentioned with the Hagarites, 1 Chron. v. 19. and the half tribe of Manaſſeh is ſaid to have ſeized upon their territories. Jetur, the ſon of Iſhmael, the ſon of Hagar, was their father, and gave them their name. Trachonitis was ſituated between Paleſtine and Cœlo-Syria; its ancient name was Argob, Deut. iii. 13. It was full of rocky hills, which in Herod the Firſt's time afforded ſhelter to bands of robbers, whom he was at great pains to extirpate. Abilené was a conſiderable city of Syria, whoſe territories reached to Lebanon and Damaſcus, and were peopled with great numbers of Jews. See Macknight, and Lardner's Credib. part i. vol. 2.

Ver. 2. Annas and Caiphas being the high-prieſts] According to the inſtitutions of the Jewiſh religion, there could be only one high-prieſt, properly ſo called, at a time; that miniſter being typical of the one mediator between God and man. The moſt probable ſolution therefore of the difficulty in the text, is, that Annas was the high-prieſt, and Caiaphas his ſagan, or deputy; to whom alſo the title of high-prieſt might improperly be given. Aaron, the firſt high-prieſt, left two ſons, Eleazar and Ithamar; Eleazar, the eldeſt, obtained the ſacerdotal tiara by birthright; but under the Judges it was tranſlated from his family to that of his brother; for Eli, who was both high-prieſt and judge, is not mentioned among Eleazar's poſterity; (See 1 Chron. vi. 4, &c.) So that he muſt have been of Ithamar's family, as indeed Joſephus expreſly affirms. Accordingly Ahimelech, the father of that Abiathar (1 Sam. xxii. 20.) whoſe depoſition by Solomon is declared to have been an accompliſhment of the word of the Lord, concerning the houſe of Eli, 1 Kings ii. 26, 27. and who, for that reaſon, muſt have been one of Eli's deſcendants, is ſaid to have been of the ſtock of Ithamar, 1 Chron. xxiv. 3. But the high-prieſthood paſſed from one family to the other more than once; either through the legal incapacity of him to whom it pertained by right of ſucceſſion, or by the decree of the chief magiſtrates, who ſeem to have claimed the diſpoſal of this dignity; for it was brought back to the family of Eleazar, in the perſon of Zadok, by Solomon, 1 Kings ii. 27—35. In latter times, the high-prieſthood was poſſeſſed by the Aſmoneans, who were neither of the one family nor the other, but common prieſts of the courſe of Joarib. The dignity of the high-prieſthood made him who enjoyed it, whether he was of the poſterity of Eleazar or Ithamar, the firſt of the ſacerdotal order; the head of the other family being ſecond only, and next to him. It is

3 And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptiſm of repentance, for the remiſſion of ſins;

4 As it is written in the book of the words of Eſaias the prophet, ſaying, The voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths ſtraight.

5 Every valley ſhall be filled, and every mountain and hill ſhall be brought low; and the crooked ſhall be made ſtraight, and the rough ways ſhall be made ſmooth;

6 And all fleſh ſhall ſee the ſalvation of God.

7 Then ſaid he to the multitude that came forth to be baptized of him, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?

8 Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance, and begin not to ſay within yourſelves, We have Abraham to our father: for I ſay unto you, That God is able of theſe ſtones to raiſe up children unto Abraham.

9 And now alſo the ax is laid unto the root of the trees: every tree therefore which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and caſt into the fire.

10 And the people aſked him, ſaying, What ſhall we do then?

11 He anſwereth and ſaith unto them, He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do likewiſe.

12 Then came alſo publicans to be baptized, and ſaid unto him, Maſter, what ſhall we do?

13 And he ſaid unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you.

ſuppoſed that the prophet Jeremiah ſpeaks of both, when he mentions a chief-prieſt, and a ſecond prieſt, ch. lii. 24. In like manner, notwithſtanding Abiathar, of the line of Ithamar, was depoſed from the high-prieſthood, he is honoured with the title which in thoſe days was given to the high-prieſts, and ſet almoſt on an equality with his ſucceſſor Zadok, of the line of Eleazar, 1 Kings iv. 4.—And Zadok and Abiathar the prieſts. If therefore Caiaphas was the ſecond prieſt, as is probable from his ſucceeding Annas, he might be called the high-prieſt in a leſs proper ſenſe. Or, if Annas was removed, and Caiaphas ſucceeded him before the year expired, they might both properly be ſaid to have been high-prieſts that year: But though Annas was depoſed, to make way for Caiaphas, he was reſtored to his dignity ſoon after our Lord's death, Acts iv. 6. It ſhould be obſerved, that thoſe who once bore the office of high-prieſts, always retained the title afterwards; and Annas having enjoyed it before Caiaphas, might for that reaſon have been honoured with the title. It has been ſuggeſted that Annas repreſented Moſes, as the naſi, prince, or head of the ſanhedrim; and Caiaphas Aaron, as the proper high-prieſt; and that they both continued in their office till the death of Chriſt. See John xviii. 13. Grotius, Lightfoot, and Macknight.

Ver. 3. And he came into all the country about Jordan] What St. Luke terms the country about Jordan, St. Matthew calls the hill-country of Judea: Their accounts may be illuſtrated from Joſephus, who tells us, that the mountains above Jericho ran north as far as Scythopolis, and ſouth to the territory of Sodom, at the bottom of the Aſphaltic lake; oppoſite to this there was another range of mountains on the other ſide of Jordan, beginning at Julias, where the river falls into the ſea of Galilee, and extending themſeves ſouthwards to the extremity alſo of the Aſphaltic lake. The plain between theſe mountains, and through which the Jordan ran, was called the Aulon, alſo the Campus Magnus, or Great Plain; and is often mentioned in the Jewiſh hiſtory. According to Joſephus, the length of the Aulon was from the village Ginnabris, to the northern extremity of the Aſphaltic lake, and meaſured 1200 ſtadia; but its breadth between the mountains was only 120 ſtadia. The Scriptures, however, extend the Campus Magnus to the ſouthern extremity, or bottom of the Dead Sea; Deut. xxxiv. 1—3. which for that reaſon they call the ſea of the plain. There is another Campus Magnus mentioned by Joſephus, called alſo The Plain of Eſdraelon, from the city of Jezreel. This plain extended itſelf from Scythopolis on the eaſt, to the plain of Ptolemais, or Acra, on the weſt. The plain of Acra on the north was bounded by a range of hills, and to the ſouth by mount Carmel, but eaſtward it was joined to the plain of Eſdraelon by a narrow way. Beſides the above-mentioned, there is a large extent of flat country lying along the Mediterranean, from mount Carmel to the utmoſt boundary of the land ſouthward. In this plain there were no mountains, only a few ſandy hillocks, ſuch as at Joppa, on which Gath of the Philiſtines is ſaid to have been built. Theſe were all the remarkable plains in the land of Iſrael; the reſt of the country was high and mountainous, having but ſmall openings or flats between the ridges of the hills. With reſpect to the Jordan, we learn from Joſephus, as well as from modern travellers, that it was a very large and rapid river. See his Wars, b. iii. c. 18. Shaw's Travels, p. 373. Maundrel's Journey, p. 81. and the notes on Joſh. iii. 15. Jer. xlix. 19. The particular part of the river where John baptiſed, was called Bethabara, or the houſe of the paſſage; either becauſe the Iſraelites anciently paſſed over at that place, or becauſe it was the common fording or ferrying place, to and from Judea. On either ſuppoſition, the banks of the river there muſt have been free of wood, and not ſo ſteep as thoſe deſcribed in the place above referred to. If Bethabara was the place where the people under Joſhua paſſed the river, it ſtood directly oppoſite to Jericho. If it was the then common ferrying-place, we may ſuppoſe that the Baptiſt choſe it for the ſake of making himſelf better known, and that he might have an opportunity of redreſſing greater numbers of his countrymen, as they travelled from one part of the country to another. See Macknight.

Preaching the baptiſm of repentance] John being called to prepare the Jews for the reception of the Meſſiah, he atchieved this work by preſſing all ranks of men to repent,—Μετανοειν, i. e. to alter their practical judgements concerning things, becauſe ignorance and error are the ſources of ſin; and to be ſuitably affected with remorſe and ſhame for their paſt miſconduct: But the Baptiſt did not ſtop here; he required all his hearers to bring forth fruits meet for repentance; (ver. 8.) that is, enjoined them to make a thorough reformation in their lives: and all this is well deſcribed, and fully expreſſed, in the metaphorical language of the prophet, quoted in the next verſes. The Baptiſt inculcated likewiſe this doctrine by the rite of baptiſm, which repreſented the nature and neceſſity of repentance to mens ſenſes, as his ſermons ſet theſe things before their underſtandings. See the notes on Matthew, and on Iſai. xl. 3.

Ver. 6. And all fleſh ſhall ſee the ſalvation of God] The Evangeliſt ſeems to have quoted theſe words from Iſai. lii. 10. though they may very well agree with ch. xl. 5. where the prophet ſays, all fleſh ſhall ſee together, i. e. the glory of the Lord, amply revealed in the ſalvation of mankind. See ch. ii. 30. St. Luke ſeems to have taken in this part of the prophecy, which is omitted by St. Matthew, in order to point out its accompliſhment, by the admiſſion of the Gentiles into the church of Chriſt; for it plainly appeared at the time he wrote, that all fleſh was to ſee the ſalvation of God, and to partake of its ineſtimable benefits.

Ver. 7. O generation] Ye brood. Wat. Some would read the laſt clauſe, τις ὑποδειξει;—Who will warn you to flee? A mere ſervile fear of puniſhment, ſays Dr. Heylin, was not a ſufficient motive to a total reformation, and would ſoon wear out of their minds; John therefore cenſures it as defective.

Ver. 10. What ſhall we do then?] Ποιήσομεν, the ſame word as that uſed in ver. 8. and rendered bring forth; and conſequently it ſhould be tranſlated in the ſame manner, to make the propriety of the reply more conſpicuous.—Bring forth therefore fruits, ver. 8.—Ver. 10. What fruits ſhall we bring forth?—And accordingly, to convince them that their acceptance with God, and ſecurity from their impending calamities, did not depend upon flowing garments, broad philacteries, frequent abſolutions, much faſting, and long prayers, he informs them that good works, proceeding from faith and love, were abſolutely neceſſary thereto.

Ver. 12. Then came alſo publicans] The publicans, or tax-gatherers, wiſhing by all means to keep their places under the Meſſiah, might be anxious to know what qualifications were neceſſary for that purpoſe: Or rather, ſince our Lord hath elſewhere declared, that the tax-gatherers, with the reſt of the people, were ſincere in their profeſſions of repentance, Matth. xxi. 32. we may believe that the gravity of the Baptiſt's exhortation, the vehemence with which he delivered his threatenings, and his character for ſanctity, affected them to ſuch a degree, that many, who till then had looked on ceremonial righteouſneſs as a principal requiſite to ſalvation, ſenſible of their error, came to him, and ſaid, "If matters are ſo, what muſt we do?" Indeed the tax-gatherers and others who thus addreſſed the Baptiſt were people of infamous characters; yet he did not, like the Phariſees, ſhun their company for that reaſon: on the contrary, he received them with great humanity, and recommended to them equity in the diſcharge of their office, Exact no more, &c. i. e. "In levying the taxes, compel no man to pay you more than his juſt proportion of the ſum which you are allowed by the law to raiſe."

14 And the ſoldiers likewiſe demanded of him, ſaying, And what ſhall we do? And he ſaid unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuſe any falſely; and be content with your wages.

15 And as the people were in expectation, and all men muſed in their hearts of John, whether he were the Chriſt, or not;

16 John anſwered, ſaying unto them all, I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whoſe ſhoes I am not worthy to unlooſe: he ſhall baptize you with the Holy Ghoſt and with fire:

17 Whoſe fan is in his hand, and he will throughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner; but the chaff he will burn with fire unquenchable.

18 And many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people.

19 But Herod the tetrarch, being reproved by him for Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, and for all the evils which Herod had done, 20 Added yet this above all, that he ſhut up John in priſon.

21 Now when all the people were baptized, it came to paſs that Jeſus alſo being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened,

22 And the Holy Ghoſt deſcended in a bodily ſhape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, which ſaid, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleaſed.

23 And Jeſus himſelf began to be about thirty years of age, being (as was ſuppoſed) the ſon of Joſeph, which was the ſon of Heli,

Ver. 14. And the ſoldiers likewiſe] It was the cuſtom of the Romans to recruit their armies in the conquered provinces; wherefore, as the Jews did not ſcruple to engage in a military life, many of them might now have been in the emperor's ſervice. Or we may ſuppoſe, that after Judea was made a province, the Romans took into their pay the Jewiſh troops, which Herod and his ſon Archelaus had maintained; for it is certain that the ſoldiers who now addreſſed the Baptiſt were not heathens, otherwiſe his advice to them would have been, that they ſhould relinquiſh idolatry, and embrace the worſhip of the true God. The word rendered do violence, διασείσητε, properly ſignifies to ſhake, and ſometimes "to take a man by the collar and ſhake him:" and it ſeems to have been uſed proverbially for that violent manner in which perſons in this ſtation of life are often ready to bully thoſe about them, whom they imagine their inferiors in ſtrength and ſpirit; though nothing is an argument of a meaner ſpirit, or more unworthy that true courage which conſtitutes ſo eſſential a part of a good military character. The word Συκοφαντεῖν, which we render to accuſe falſely, anſwers to the Hebrew עשק oſhek, and ſignifies not only to accuſe falſely, but to circumvent and oppreſs. "Do not turn informers, and give falſe evidence againſt innocent perſons, in order that, with the protection of law, you may oppreſs them, and enrich yourſelves with their ſpoils." He adds, and be content with your wages: "Live quietly on your pay, and do not mutiny, when your officers happen not to beſtow on you donations and largeſſes to conciliate your favour." It ſeems the Baptiſt, in his exhortations to penitents who aſked his advice, did not follow the example of the Jewiſh teachers; for he was far from recommending the obſervation of ceremonies, and the little precepts of men's invention. He attended to the character of the perſons; he conſidered the vices to which they were moſt addicted; and he ſtrenuouſly enjoined the great duties of juſtice, charity, moderation, and contentment, according as he found thoſe who applied to him had failed in them; and ſo by giving Phariſees, Sadducees, publicans, ſoldiers, and all ſorts of perſons inſtructions adapted to their circumſtances and capacities, he prepared them for receiving the Meſſiah, who he was ſure would ſoon appear, although he did not know the perſon particularly who was to ſuſtain that high character.

Ver. 15. And as the people were in expectation] John had now acquired an extraordinary reputation by the auſterity of his life, the ſubject of his ſermons, the fervency of his exhortations, and the freedom, impartiality, and courage with which he rebuked his hearers; yet his fame received no ſmall addition from the various rumours current in the country at that time: for the viſion which his father Zacharias had ſeen in the temple, the coming of the eaſtern philoſophers to Jeruſalem, the prophecies of Simeon, the diſcourſes of Anna, the perplexities of Jeruſalem, and Herod's cruelty, though they had happened full thirty years before this, muſt ſtill have been freſh in the memories of the people, who no doubt applied them all to John. Their expectations therefore being raiſed to a very high pitch, they began to think he might be the Chriſt, and were ready to acknowledge him as ſuch: ſo that had he aſpired after grandeur, he might, at leaſt for a while, have poſſeſſed honours greater than any of the ſons of men could juſtly claim. But the Baptiſt was too ſtrictly virtuous, to aſſume what he had no title to, and therefore he declared plainly, that he was not the Meſſiah, but the loweſt of his ſervants; one ſent to prepare the way before him. See the next verſe, and Bell's Inquiry.

Ver. 17. Purge his floor] Cleanſe, &c. Wat.

Ver. 18. Preached he] Εὐηγγελίζετο, He evangelized, or preached as an Evangeliſt. See ch. ii. 10. It is obſervable, that in the parallel place, Matth. iii. 1. the word κηρύσσων is uſed, which implies the notice given by Chriſt's herald, who is ſent before to make preparation for his prince, and to announce his approach. Doddridge renders and paraphraſes the preſent verſe thus: And offering many other exhortations to them, to the ſame effect, he publiſhed to the people theſe glad tidings of the Meſſiah's approach, and endeavoured to prepare them to receive him in a proper manner." Heylin renders it, And with many other exhortations, he preached the Goſpel to the people: For, ſays he, the doctrine of a ſecond baptiſm, or purification, &c. is purely evangelical.

Ver. 21. Now when all the people were baptized] Now while all the people were baptizing, Wat. and MS. Were receiving baptiſm. Heylin. If we reflect upon the number of the people who followed John, and were baptized by him, and the regard they expreſſed for him before and after his death, and yet no ſect produced in conſequence of ſuch belief and baptiſm, it will afford a very good argument in favour of the ſuperior power, dignity, character, and office of Jeſus. See Sharpe's ſecond Argument, and Bell's Inquiry. It is obſervable that all the three voices from heaven, by which the Father bore witneſs to Chriſt, were pronounced while he was praying, or very quickly after it. Compare ch. ix. 29—35. and John xii. 38.

Ver. 22. Thou art my beloved Son] See on Matth. iii. 17. The epithet beloved given to the Son on this occaſion, marks the greatneſs of the Father's affection for him, and diſtinguiſhes him from all others to whom the title of God's ſon had been given. Accordingly we find our Lord alluding to it with peculiar pleaſure, in his interceſſory prayer, John xvii 26. It was therefore the voice of God the Father which was heard at Chriſt's baptiſm; probably loud like thunder, as in the inſtance recorded John xii. 29. making a ſound which no human organ of ſpeech was able to form, and conſequently it could not be miſtaken for the whiſpering voice of any of the multitude preſent. See Prov. viii. 30. to which it is thought the voices allude. The Son of God was one of the Meſſiah's known titles, founded on Pſ. ii. 7. Iſai. vii. 14. where it is expreſly attributed to him; and therefore, according to the received language of the Jews, Jeſus was on this occaſion declared from heaven to be their long-expected deliverer, and his miſſion received a moſt illuſtrious confirmation from the Father Almighty; a confirmation on which Jeſus himſelf laid great ſtreſs, as abſolutely deciſive, John v. 37. For, leſt the people might have applied the words of the voice to the Baptiſt, the Holy Spirit alighted upon Jeſus, and remained viſible for ſome time in the above-mentioned ſingular ſymbol, ſee John i. 33. which probably ſurrounded his head in the form of a large glory, and pointed him out as God's beloved Son, in whom the richeſt gifts and graces reſided. Thus all preſent had an opportunity to hear and ſee the miraculous teſtimony; particularly the Baptiſt, who, as ſoon as he beheld the Spirit remaining upon Jeſus, is ſuppoſed to have made uſe of the words, this is he of whom I ſpake, &c. John i. 15. The deſcent of the Spirit on Jeſus was predicted Iſai. xlii. 1. lxi. 1. In like manner, the voice from heaven is ſuppoſed to be predicted Pſ. ii. 7. See Macknight.

Ver. 23. And Jeſus himſelf began to be, &c.] Our Lord having received theſe different teſtimonies from his Father, from the Spirit, and from John the Baptiſt, all given in preſence of the multitudes aſſembled to John's baptiſm, began his miniſtry when he was about thirty years old, the age at which the prieſts entered on their ſacred miniſtrations in the temple. See the beginning of the firſt note on this chapter. To underſtand St. Luke's account of our Lord's age at his baptiſm aright, we muſt take notice, that his words ſtand thus in conſtruction: Καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀρχόμενος, ἦν ὡσεὶ ἐτῶν τριάκοντα: And Jeſus himſelf, when he began, was about thirty years of age; i. e. when he began his miniſtry,—in oppoſition to the commencement of the Baptiſt's miniſtry, the hiſtory of which is given in the preceding part of this chapter. The word ἀϱχόμενος is uſed in this ſenſe, ch. xxiii. 25. particularly in Acts i. 21, 22. Wherefore, of thoſe men who accompanied with us, all the time that the Lord Jeſus went in and out among us, beginning [αϱξαμενος] from the baptiſm of John, until the ſame day that he was taken up from us, &c. Here Chriſt's miniſtry is evidently ſaid to have commenced at the baptiſm of John,—the time that John baptized him, and to have ended at the day of his aſcenſion. The author of the Vindication of the beginning of St. Matthew's and Luke's Goſpels, would render the words, and Jeſus was obedient (or lived in ſubjection to his parents) about thirty years: and he produces ſeveral paſſages from approved Greek authors, in which αϱχομενος ſignifies ſubject; but in all thoſe places it is uſed in ſome connection or oppoſition which determines the ſenſe, and therefore none of them are inſtances parallel to this; and ſince the Evangeliſt had before expreſſed our Lord's ſubjection to his parents by the word ὑποτασσόμενος, ch. ii. 51. there is great reaſon to believe he would have uſed the ſame word here, had he intended to give us the ſame idea. See Macknight, Heylin, and Langius. With what amazement ſhould we reflect upon it, that the bleſſed Jeſus, though ſo early ripened for the moſt extenſive ſervices, ſhould live in retirement even till his thirtieth year! That he deferred his miniſtry ſo long, ſhould teach us not to thruſt ourſelves forward to public ſtations, till we are qualified for them, and plainly diſcover a divine call: That he deferred it no longer, ſhould be an engagement to us to avoid unneceſſary delays, and to give God the prime and vigour of our life. Our great maſter attained not, as it ſeems, to the concluſion of his thirty-fifth year, if he ſo much as entered upon it; yet what glorious atchievements did he accompliſh, within thoſe narrow limits of time! Happy that ſervant, who with any proportionable zeal diſpatches the great buſineſs of life! So much the more happy, if his ſun go down at noon; for the ſpace that is taken from the labours of time, will be added to the rewards of eternity.

Being (as was ſuppoſed) the ſon of Joſeph] I. In the firſt place, with reſpect to the genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke, we may obſerve, that St. Matthew opens his hiſtory with our Lord's genealogy, by Joſeph his ſuppoſed Father; St. Luke gives us his genealogy on the mother's ſide. The words before us, properly pointed and tranſlated, run thus; being (as was ſuppoſed) the ſon of Joſeph, the ſon of Heli. He was the ſon of Joſeph by common report; but in reality the ſon of Heli, by his mother, who was Heli's daughter. We have a parallel example, Gen. xxxvi. 2. where Aholibamah's pedigree is thus deduced; Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon; For, ſince it appears from ver. 24, 25. that Anah was the ſon, not the daughter of Zibeon, it is undeniable that as Moſes calls Aholibamah the daughter both of Anah and of Zibeon, becauſe ſhe was the grand-daughter; ſo Jeſus is fitly called the ſon of Heli, becauſe he was his grandſon. However, the common pointing and conſtruction of the paſſage may be retained, conſiſtently with the preſent opinion; becauſe, though the words ſon of Heli ſhould be referred to Joſeph, they may imply no more than that Joſeph was Heli's ſon-in-law; his ſon by marriage with his daughter Mary. The ancient Jews and Chriſtians underſtood this paſſage in the one or other of theſe ſenſes; for the Talmudiſts commonly call Mary by the name of Heli's daughter. In proof of what we have advanced above, we obſerve, that the two genealogies are intirely different, from David and downward; and that if, as ſome have ſuppoſed, theſe genealogies exhibit Joſeph's pedigree only, the one by his natural, the other by his legal father, the natural and legal fathers would have been brothers, when it is plain they were not. Jacob, Joſeph's father, in Matthew, being the ſon of Matthan, the ſon of Eleazar; whereas Heli, the father ſuppoſed to be aſſigned him by Luke, was the ſon of Matthat, a different perſon from Matthan, becauſe the ſon of Levi. And further on this ſuppoſition, we ſhould be altogether uncertain whether our Lord's mother, from whom alone he ſprang, was a daughter of David; and conſequently cannot prove that he had any other relation to David, than that his mother was married to one of the deſcendants of that prince. Let the reader judge whether this fully comes up to the import of the paſſages of Scripture which tell us, he was made of the ſeed of David, Rom. i. 3. Acts ii. 30.

II. Taking it for granted then that St. Luke gives our Lord's real pedigree, and St. Matthew that of his ſuppoſed father, it may reaſonably be aſked, why St. Matthew hath done ſo? To which it may be replied, that he intended to remove the ſcruples of thoſe who knew that the Meſſiah was to be the heir of David's crown; a reaſon, which appears the ſtronger, if we ſuppoſe with ſome learned writers, that St. Matthew wrote poſterior to St. Luke, who has given the real pedigree. Now though Joſeph was not Chriſt's real father, it was directly for the Evangeliſt's purpoſe to derive his pedigree from David, and ſhew that he was the eldeſt ſurviving branch of the poſterity of that prince; becauſe, that point eſtabliſhed, it was well enough underſtood that Joſeph, by marrying our Lord's mother, after he knew ſhe was with child of him, adopted him for his ſon, and raiſed him both to the dignity and the privileges of David's heir; accordingly the genealogy concludes in terms which imply this; Jacob begat Joſeph, the huſband of Mary, of whom was born Jeſus. Joſeph is not called the father of Jeſus, but the huſband of his mother Mary; and the privileges following this adoption will appear to be more eſſentially connected with it, if, as is probable, Joſeph never had any child: for thus the regal line of David's deſcendants by Solomon failing in Joſeph, his rights were properly transferred to Jeſus, his adopted ſon, who indeed was of the ſame family, though by another branch. St. Matthew therefore has deduced our Lord's political and royal pedigree, with a view to prove his title to the kingdom of Iſrael, by virtue of the rights which he acquired through his adoption; whereas St. Luke explains his natural deſcent in the ſeveral ſucceſſions of thoſe from whom he derived his human nature. It may not perhaps be unpleaſing juſt to remark, that Celotti, a learned Italian, conjectures that Matth. i. 16. ſhould be read, Jacob begat Mary, the wife of Joſeph; and of her was born, &c. grounding his conjecture upon the ſuppoſition that St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew, and that the reading we now have in the Greek aroſe from the miſtake in the Greek tranſlator; but this conjecture, however ingenious, is certainly very dangerous, and has been attacked and refuted by M. Mingarelli, who ſeems to have proved very ſufficiently what we have advanced,—that St. Luke gives the genealogy of Mary, St. Matthew of Joſeph. See the note on Matth. i. 16.

III. Our Lord's genealogy given by St. Luke, will appear with a beautiful propriety, if the place which it holds in his hiſtory is attended to. It ſtands immediately after Jeſus is ſaid to have received the teſtimony of the Spirit, declaring him the Son of God, that is to ſay, the Meſſiah, and before he entered on his miniſtry, the firſt act of which was, his encountering with and vanquiſhing the ſtrongeſt temptations of the arch-enemy of mankind. Chriſt's genealogy by his mother, who conceived him miraculouſly, placed in this order, ſeems to inſinuate that he was the ſeed of the woman, which, in the firſt intimation of mercy vouchſafed to mankind after the fall, was predicted to bruiſe the ſerpent's head. Accordingly St. Luke, as became the hiſtorian who related Chriſt's miraculous conception in the womb of his mother, carries his genealogy up to Adam, who together with Eve received the before-mentioned promiſe concerning the reſtitution of mankind by the ſeed of the woman. That the genealogy not only of our Lord's mother, but of his reputed father, ſhould have been given by the ſacred hiſtorians, was wiſely ordered, becauſe the two, taken together, prove him to be deſcended from David and Abraham in every reſpect, and conſequently that one of the moſt remarkable characters of the Meſſiah was fulfilled in him; the principal promiſes concerning the great perſonage, in whom all the families of the earth were to be bleſſed, having been made to thoſe patriarchs in quality of his progenitors. See Gen. xxii. 18. Pſ. cxxxii. 11, 12. and Matth. i. 1.

IV. Concerning the variations, &c. in theſe genealogies, we refer to the notes. Though, could we not remove ſatisfactorily any difficulties occurring in them, it would be a ſufficient vindication of the Evangeliſts to ſay, that they gave Chriſt's pedigree as they found it in the authentic tables, which, according to the cuſtom of the Jewiſh nation, were preſerved with the greateſt accuracy. Bp. Burnet upon this ſubject obſerves, that had not the genealogies of Chriſt been taken exactly out of the temple regiſters, the bare ſhewing of them had ſerved to have confuted the whole. For if in any one thing, the regiſters of their genealogies were clear and uncontroverted; ſince theſe proved that they were Abraham's ſeed, and likewiſe made out their title to the lands, which from the days of Joſhua were to paſs down either to immediate deſcendants, or, as they failed, to collateral degrees. Now this ſhews plainly, that there was a double office kept of their pedigrees; one was natural, and might be taken when the rolls of circumciſion were made up; and the other related to the diviſion of the land; in which when the collateral line came inſtead of the natural, then the laſt was dropped, as extinct, and the other remained. It being thus plain from their conſtitution, that they had theſe two orders of tables, we are not at all concerned in the diverſity of the two Evangeliſts on this head; ſince both might have copied them out from thoſe two offices at the temple; and if they had not done it faithfully, the Jews could have authentically demonſtrated their error, in entitling our Saviour to that received character of the Meſſiah,—that he was to be the ſon of David, by a falſe pedigree. Therefore, ſince no exceptions were made at the time when the ſight of the rolls muſt have ended the enquiry, it is plain that they were faithfully copied out; nor are we now bound to anſwer ſuch difficulties as ſeem to ariſe out of them, ſince they were not queſtioned at the time in which only an appeal could by made to the public regiſters themſelves. See Bp. Burnet's four diſcourſes, p. 16. Macknight, Whiſton, and Whitby on Matth. i. 14.

Ver. 36. Which was the ſon of Cainan] In this and the next verſe are two Cainans mentioned, contrary to Gen. x. 24. where the firſt is omitted. It is true, in the tranſlation which the LXX have given of that paſſage both are found; but it is more than probable that the name crept into this verſe of St. Luke, through the careleſſneſs of ſome early tranſcriber, who, becauſe the Evangeliſt mentions Cainan in his proper place, put the name down by accident before Arphaxad alſo; and later tranſcribers finding it there, foiſted it into the LXX, which in early times was generally uſed both by Jews and Chriſtians; and ſo the error being thus handed down, has become univerſal. See Beza, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 38. Adam, who was the ſon of God] Adam being deſcended from no human parents, but formed by the immediate power of a divine creating hand, might with peculiar propriety be called the ſon of God, in his original ſtate, the heir of immortality and glory. The Evangeliſt might likewiſe intend by this expreſſion to engage us to believe the poſſibility of Chriſt's being born of a pure virgin; for if divine Omnipotence could create or produce the firſt Adam, from the duſt of the earth, without a parent, it was equally capable of producing the ſecond Adam from the womb of a virgin. Wetſtein obſerves, that St. Matthew writing for the Jews, deduces our Saviour's pedigree from Abraham and David; but Luke writing for the Gentiles, traces his pedigree as high as Adam, the common Father of mankind, to ſhew that Jeſus is the Saviour of the world, born for the common good of the human race: and when he calls Adam the ſon of God, he means to expreſs that Chriſt, born of the virgin, is the ſecond Adam, and that his birth by the Holy Spirit is a no leſs ſingular inſtance of the divine power, than was the creation of Adam.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. III. Ver. 23—38.

We have before obſerved, that when we ſurvey ſuch a ſeries of generations as this before us, it is obvious to reflect, how, like the leaves of a tree, one paſſeth away, and another cometh. Of thoſe who formerly lived upon the earth, and perhaps made the moſt conſpicuous figures, how many are there whoſe names have periſhed with them! How many, of whom only the name is remaining! And in this view, how vain is the ſearch after poſthumous fame, and a deſire to render ourſelves conſpicuous to future ages!

It is obſervable, that all which the divine wiſdom has been pleaſed to tell us, concerning Methuſelah, the oldeſt of the ſons of men, is, that at the age of 187 he begat a ſon called Lamech, that after this he begat other ſons and daughters; that he lived 969 years, and that he died. Gen. v. 25, 27. This is the whole hiſtory of his life and actions; and it is a picture of the generality of mankind, who think themſelves of great conſequence in the world. They marry, and are given in marriage; they perform the common offices of nature, and all their poſterity is like to know of them, is perhaps, barely their names, in a genealogy like that before us; or at moſt, the number of years they lived, the names of the children they begat, and poſſibly the ſum total of the wealth they left behind them, after a painful and penurious life. Now, who would wiſh for ſuch a fame as this? Or who would deſire to be ſo impertinently remembered for circumſtances, which do no honour to his memory?

It would be well, therefore, if thoſe who are fond of a poſthumous acquaintance with mankind, would ſeriouſly conſider with themſelves, from a review of their character, in what light they may ſuppoſe poſterity will regard them. They ſhould bethink themſelves, whether they are maſters of any amiable, or any uſeful quality; and whether, if their actions were drawn out to view, they would appear in a better light than Methuſelah's; if not, their names are not worth preſerving, and ſilence is the beſt compliment that can be paid them.

There are others, of a more lively and active turn indeed than the former, yet who are as far from entertaining any manly ſentiment, or doing any thing more agreeable to their reaſon. I mean thoſe who are led away by their ſenſitive appetite, and who have a great alacrity in all brutiſh pleaſures; pretenders to wit and humour, ridilers of the preachers of righteouſneſs, and far gone in thoſe faſhionable vices, which erewhile cauſed the univerſal deluge. What a mortifying reflection muſt it be to a polite and well-bred ſinner, to conſider, that even in that awkward age, before the modern arts of gallantry were in being, iniquity ſhould be carried to ſo great an height, that it was very near extirpating the ſpecies! Surely nothing can give us ſo mean an idea of the pretenſions of our men of pleaſure, as to compare them with an antediluvian reprobate.

Whatever we may fancy of our refinements upon wickedneſs, it will appear that we can no more out-act the vices, than we can rival the virtues of our predeceſſors. Some advantages they certainly had above any of their puny ſucceſſors: They had a long ſcene of life before them, to perpetuate and lengthen out their pleaſures, and as their bodies were more durable than ours, ſo were they likewiſe proportionably more robuſt; ſince it requires leſs natural vigour to ſupport a man to the age of eighty or ninety, than eight or nine hundred years. How then muſt it move the ſcorn of one of theſe ancient libertines, to ſee a creature ſo full of weakneſs and infirmity, pretending to primitive vigour and activity, and aping his ſtrong progenitors!

If the abandoned could be perſuaded to think ſeriouſly of their condition; if they would look backward upon what they have been doing, and forward to what they have to do; if they would reflect upon the tranſitory nature of their enjoyments, and the certainty of either a weak old age, or an immature and haſty death; they could not, if they had the leaſt degree of ſenſibility, withſtand the terrors of ſo powerful a conviction. Alas! if it be true to tell one of this ſtamp and character, that he muſt die at laſt, what matters it how long his life is? What matters the youth and beauty, the ſtrength and vigour he enjoys!

But where is the voluptuous libertine that lives out even half his days? How often is he cut off in a midnight revel, or in proſecuting a criminal amour! The pains and infirmities of age are his portion, even in the bloom of youth. His vigour is worn out at once, and the reſt of his days are but labour and ſorrow,—under the fears of quitting even this wretched being, and of entering upon another more dreadful and diſcouraging! Diſabled for the pleaſures of this life, he has no reliſh for the happineſs of a better; and the moſt that can be ſaid of him is, that he lives under a perpetual uncertainty whether he ſhould wiſh to live or die. What an abject ſtate of mind! thus to linger upon the brink of a precipice, when we are ſure we muſt take the leap at laſt!

There is not in nature a more melancholy conſideration than a wretch of this ſtamp. His youth was deſpicable, but his old age is beyond contempt. At the ſame time he ſees that he is the jeſt of fools, and ſcarcely pitied by the wiſe and good; the ſcorn and deriſion of all about him, and not ſo much as the favourite of himſelf. What horror, to be conſcious that no one values or eſteems him, and

The temptation and faſting of Chriſt: he overcometh the devil: beginneth to preach. The people of Nazareth admire his gracious words: he cureth one poſſeſſed of a devil, Peter's mother in law, and divers other ſick perſons. The devils acknowledge Chriſt, and are reproved for it: he preacheth throughout the cities.

AND Jeſus, being full of the Holy Ghoſt, returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderneſs,

2 Being forty days tempted of the devil. And in thoſe days he did eat nothing: and when they were ended, he afterwards hungered.

3 And the devil ſaid unto him, If thou be the Son of God, command this ſtone that it be made bread.

4 And Jeſus anſwered him, ſaying, It is written, that man ſhall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God.

5 And the devil, taking him up into an high mountain, ſhewed unto him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time.

6 And the devil ſaid unto him, All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them: for that is delivered unto me; and to whomſoever I will, I give it.

7 If thou therefore wilt worſhip me, all ſhall be thine.

8 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto him, Get thee behind me, Satan: for it is written, Thou ſhalt worſhip the Lord thy God, and him only ſhalt thou ſerve.

at the ſame time, to be conſcious that he deſerves it all! to have out-lived the capacity of enjoying life, and yet to be convinced by every thing he hears or ſees, that it is time for him to quit the ſtage, and make room for others!

This indeed is the caſe of the wicked only, and of thoſe who are full of youthful follies. But old age is far from being an object of deſire, even in its beſt and moſt venerable circumſtances. How often do we ſee the ruins of an excellent underſtanding, ſo disfigured and defaced with age, as to be a reproach to human reaſon! And who knows how ſoon he himſelf may ſink down to circumſtances as miſerable and diſgraceful? Who would accept of life upon ſuch ignominious terms? Surely none can be ſo fond of this preſent world, but thoſe who fear to venture upon another!

The happineſs therefore of human life conſiſts not in the number of years, but of the virtues that are practiced in it. It is but a paſſage to a better ſtate, and he who has his eye fixed upon his journey's end, will never be offended at the ſhortneſs of it.

Methuſelah, we read, lived 969 years, Enoch but 365. One of them ſecured a bleſſed immortality. He walked with God, and was tranſlated; Concerning the other, we only know that he died. Need I put the queſtion to any one, Whether, at firſt ſight, he had rather be Methuſaleh, or Enoch?

Thus much for human life in general; And as to the titles and marks of honour that diſtinguiſh us from each other in it, however they may divide the world, yet how very ſoon will they be quite ſilenced and extinguiſhed! What do we know of theſe patriarchs before us?—And what a poor idea muſt we form hence of all our little ſtrifes and competitions! Are any of theſe worthies either the better or the worſe for the high or low ſtations they poſſeſſed in life?—Their fortunes are now determined, and they are reduced to the ſame common level: —Their love alſo, and their hatred, and their envy, is now periſhed; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the ſun. Eccles. ix. 6.

And ſuch will be the ſtate of all the great ones, whoſe names now fill the world with wonder. They ſhall lie down alike in the duſt, and the worms ſhall cover them. And is it worth while then for an ambitious ſpirit to rend the world into ſects and parties, for the ſake of ſo ſhort-lived a glory? Since life is ſo ſoon to have an end, what matters the part we act in it? At preſent, it is of very little conſequence to our repoſe, and in a while it will be quite forgotten.

Vain and deſpicable indeed is all ſublunary glory depending on the breath of men. But religion opens to us a new ſcene of ambition, in the realms of bliſs, by recommending us to beings of a ſuperior character. Thoſe angels, who are ſaid to rejoice at our repentance, cannot be ſuppoſed inattentive to our actions: and would it not be a more generous ambition to endeavour at their applauſe, than that of creatures as full of frailty as ourſelves? eſpecially ſince the time will come, when, if it be not our own fault, we ſhall be removed from the groveling purſuits of this tranſitory life, to the ſociety of thoſe bleſſed ſpirits. The reaſon why we are apt to be unmoved with theſe thoughts in our life-time, is becauſe they are too refined and abſtracted. But the time will come, when the partition between the two worlds will be broken down, the whole tribe of intellectual beings be laid open to our view, and we ſhall know, even as alſo we are known. Then will our ambition take a nobler turn; and while we aim at the eſteem of celeſtial beings, the frail monuments we have been erecting upon earth, ſhall from thenceforth be buried for ever in oblivion.

To conclude, if we deſire that our lives here may not be uſeleſs, let us fill them up with acts of charity and benevolence. If we would avoid being bewitched with pleaſure, let us begin to deſpiſe it young: If we would provide againſt the miſeries of age, let us arm ourſelves with an early piety; if we are fond of rank and precedence, let us conſider that death will level us; nay, and if we are deſirous of fame upon earth hereafter, let us reflect, that we ſhall be incapable of enjoying it. In ſhort, let us all remember, that we are intended for another life, and let us fix all our hopes of happineſs, of fame, and of pleaſure there; while we look not at the things which are ſeen, but at the things which are not ſeen; for the things which are ſeen are temporal, but the things which are not ſeen are eternal. See Littleton's Sermons, p. 144, &c.

Chap. IV. Ver. 2. Being forty days tempted, &c.] Where he was forty days, and he was tempted by the devil. Bengelius and Heylin. See Matth. iv. 2, 3. For notes on this remarkable tranſaction we refer to that chapter, the Reflections upon it, and thoſe upon the preſent chapter.

Ver. 5. The devil, taking him up into an high mountain, &c.] This temptation is placed the laſt of the three in St. Matthew. To reconcile the Evangeliſts, it is obſerved that St. Matthew recites the temptations according to the order in which they occurred; for he plainly affirms this order by the particle then, ver. 5. and again, ver. 8. and at the concluſion of the temptation (relating to Chriſt's caſting himſelf down from the pinnacle or wing of the temple) that then the devil left him. In this order, conſidering the natural temper of the Jews, they appear to riſe progreſſively in ſtrength one above another; Matthew therefore having preſerved the true order of the temptations, Luke muſt be ſuppoſed to have neglected it, as a thing not very material: And the ſuppoſition may be admitted without weakening his authority in the leaſt; for he connects the temptations only by the particle και, which imports, that he was tempted ſo and ſo, without marking the time or order of the temptations, as St. Matthew ſeems to do. If the reader is of a different opinion, he muſt ſuppoſe, with Toinard, that the temptation to idolatry was twice propoſed; once before Jeſus went with the devil to the temple, as the order obſerved by St. Luke may imply; and again when he was returning from the temple, to receive new teſtimonies from the Baptiſt, and make diſciples at Jordan, the devil taking him a ſecond time into the mountain for that purpoſe. As it ſeems impoſſible that the devil ſhould have ſhewed Chriſt the kingdoms of the earth in a moment, ſome would place a comma at world, referring the words in a moment to the celerity with which Chriſt was carried to the mountain: The devil taking him up into an high mountain in a moment of time, ſhewed him, &c.

Ver. 6. For that is delivered unto me, &c.] Grotius has well obſerved, that this contains a vile inſinuation, that God had done what none who truly underſtands the nature of God and the creature can ſuppoſe poſſible; namely, that he had parted with the government of the world out of his own hands: and we may add to this, that in the text which Chriſt hath quoted, there is enough to overthrow that notion, ſince God's appropriating to himſelf the worſhip of all his creatures, plainly implies his univerſal empire and dominion over all, and the regard he has to the religious obſervation and obedience of all the ſubjects of his kingdom. It is remarkable, that among other things which ſeveral heathen writers learned from the primitive Chriſtians, this was one; to repreſent evil ſpirits as tempting men from their duty by views of wordly riches and grandeur; over which Porphyry in particular ſays, they often would pretend to much more power than they really had. We may obſerve from this verſe, that the impudence of the tempter is boundleſs: he promiſes liberally what is peculiar to God to give; and in return, aſks what is due to God alone,—religious worſhip; that is, an acknowledgment, not of his being the firſt cauſe of all things, the Maker, Preſerver, and Governor of the univerſe,—for on this very occaſion he confeſſed that what he had was delivered unto him;—but an acknowledgment of his being lord of the world, ſo far as to diſpenſe its joys to whomſoever he pleaſed. Which acknowledgment implied likewiſe a promiſe of ſubmiſſion to the meaſures, which he, as lord of the world, ſhould preſcribe. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 9. Pſ. xci. 11.—V. 12. Deut. vi. 16.—V. 13. John xiv. 30.—V. 14. Matth. iv. 12. John iv. 43. Acts x. 37.—V. 16. Matth. ii. 23. xiii. 54. Acts xvii. 2.

Ver. 12. Thou ſhalt not tempt] See on Matth. iv. 7. To tempt God, is to make an improper trial of his power; to make new and unreaſonable demands upon it, after ſufficient evidence has been already afforded, and to do this not barely from preſumption, but from diſtruſt. The propriety of underſtanding the word in the ſenſe of demanding further evidence of that which is already made ſufficiently plain, will appear, if we conſider our Saviour as alluding to the glorious teſtimony God had given of his divine Sonſhip; after which it would be the greateſt abſurdity to demand any further proof of his being ſo nearly related to the Divine Being. The expreſſion of our Saviour may likewiſe be interpreted, as ſignifying that the Scripture forbids us to preſcribe to God in what inſtances he ſhall exert his power; and as we are not to ruſh into danger without a call, in expectation of extraordinary deliverance, ſo neither are we to dictate to divine wiſdom what miracles ſhall be wrought for mens conviction. Probably in this and the preceding temptations the devil transformed himſelf into an angel of light, or aſſumed the appearance of a good ſpirit, hoping the better to deceive Jeſus; for, agreeably to the opinion of the Jews, Satan might think he would take him for the guardian angel of the promiſed land, who could eaſily raiſe him to the throne of all the kingdoms contained in it, the peculiar management of their affairs being communicated to him. See Macknight, Farmer's Inquiry, and the Reflections.

Ver. 13. He departed, &c.] This implies that he aſſaulted him afterwards; ſee John xiv. 30. We may therefore believe, that he was nothing the wiſer for the trial he now made. It is true, we find the devils more than once confeſſing our Lord in the courſe of his miniſtry; but it does not follow from thence, that they were fully ſatisfied of his character. If they ſuſpected him to be the Meſſiah, they might give him the title, in order to make his enemies believe he acted in concert with them. Beſides, towards the concluſion of his miniſtry, we find the devil active in procuring his death; which he could not have been, had he known who our Lord was, or underſtood the method in which the redemption of the world was to be accompliſhed. It cannot be denied indeed that the devils had ſome knowledge of God's merciful intention to ſave the world by his Son. At the ſame time it is equally true that the knowledge of this grand event was very imperfect, the prophecies relating to it having been all along conceived in ſuch obſcure terms, as made it difficult, if not impoſſible to underſtand them fully, till the event explained them; probably on purpoſe that evil ſpirits might not have it in their power to fruſtrate the beneficent work, in the execution of which, contrary to their diſpoſitions, they were to be active. See Stanhope's Epiſtles and Goſpels, and Sherlock's Diſcourſes, vol. ii. diſc. 7.

Ver. 15. Being glorified of all] With univerſal applauſe. Heylin. Our tranſlation is rather more literal; but to glorify a preacher is an uncommon phraſe in our language; and therefore Dr. Heylin's, which fully expreſſes the ſenſe, ſeems the preferable verſion.

Ver. 16. He went into the ſynagogue on the ſabbath-day, &c.] They who are acquainted with Jewiſh literature know, that the five books of Moſes have long ago been divided in ſuch a manner, that by reading a ſection of them every ſabbath, the whole is gone through in the ſpace of a year. For though the ſections or paraſhoth be fifty-four in number, by joining two ſhort ones together, and by reading the laſt and the firſt in one day, they reduce the whole within the compaſs of the year. It is generally thought that Ezra was the author of theſe diviſions; and that the Jews from his time read Moſes publickly on the ſabbaths, till Antiochus Epiphanes prohibited that part of their ſervice on pain of death. Awed by the terror of ſo ſevere a puniſhment, the Jews forbore reading their law for a time, and ſubſtituted in its place certain ſections of the prophets, which they thought had ſome affinity with the ſubjects handled by Moſes; and though more peaceable times came, in which they again brought the law into their worſhip, they continued to read the prophets, joining the two together, as is evident from St. Luke's account of the ſynagogue ſervice, Acts xiii. 15. By the rules of the ſynagogue, any perſon whom the directors called up, might read the portion of ſcripture allotted for the ſervice of the day. Our Lord therefore read, by the appointment of thoſe who preſided in the ſervice. Vitringa, indeed, and Surenhuſius imagine, that he did not officiate on this occaſion in the low capacity of a reader, but as a teacher; alledging, that none of the circumſtances which uſually attended the reading of the law are to be found here; particularly, it is not ſaid that Jeſus was called to read; nothing is ſpoken of the benedictions with which this part of the ſervice was accompanied; and only one verſe, with part of another, was read. Vitringa alſo affirms, that, as far as he knows, the paſſage he mentioned makes no part of any ſection of the prophets now read in the ſynagogue. De Vet. Synag p. 1000.—But the firſt objection proves too much; for the fore-cited paſſage, Acts xiii. 15. ſhews that a call from the rulers was neceſſary to a perſon's preaching in the place of public worſhip. It is therefore ſtrange that Vitringa ſhould have inſiſted on the omiſſion of this circumſtance, to prove that Jeſus now performed the office, not only of a reader, but a teacher. The truth is, an omiſſion of this kind can prove nothing at all, as it is well known that the Evangeliſts, in their narrations, have omitted many circumſtances which really exiſted. But to paſs this, the hiſtorian himſelf appears to have determined the matter in diſpute; for he ſays expreſly, that Jeſus went into the ſynagogue on the ſabbath-day, and ſtood up for to read; which ſeems to imply, that he did read the ſection for the day, and that he was authorized to do ſo. The reaſon is, it does not appear that any portion of Scripture was uſed in the ſynagogue-ſervice beſides the appointed ſections, the ſhemas excepted, which were three paſſages in the books of Moſes, beginning with the word ſhema, whoſe ſignification is Hear thou, and which were written on the phylacteries. See on Matth. xxiii. 5. As for the benedictions, it was quite foreign to the Evangeliſt's purpoſe to take notice of them at all; and that there was only one verſe read, with part of another, if I miſtake not, Vitringa will find it hard to prove from any thing Luke has ſaid. He tells us, that Jeſus ſtood up for to read, ver. 17. and there was delivered to him the book of the prophet Iſaias; and when he had opened the book, he found the place—No ſooner had he ſeparated the two rolls of the volume, (αναπτυξας το βιβλιον) than that leſſon of the prophet preſented itſelf—where it is written, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. Therefore, ſince the Evangeliſt ſays expreſly that Jeſus ſtood up for to read, thoſe who underſtand the cuſtoms of the ſynagogues, and the manner in which the books of the ancients were written and rolled up, muſt acknowledge that what he read was in all probability the ſection for the day, which preſented itſelf of courſe, and that he did not deliver the book to the miniſter till he had finiſhed it. For, conſiſtently enough with theſe ſuppoſitions, Luke might characterize the leſſon read by that particular paſſage of it which Jeſus choſe to make the ſubject of his ſermon to the congregation, eſpecially as that ſermon occaſioned his removal to Capernaum, which was the principal point the hiſtorian had in view.—To Vitringa's laſt argument it may be replied, that though the paſſage read ſhould not be found in any ſection of the prophets read at preſent in the ſynagogue, it will by no means follow, that it was not uſed in the ſynagogue anciently; eſpecially as it is well known that all the Jews do not now obſerve one rule in this matter: Or, though they were perfectly agreed about the leſſons, ſhould the practice of men, who in many inſtances have deviated from the inſtitutions of their fathers, outweigh in a matter of antiquity the teſtimony of an author who lived in the age he wrote of, and who could not but know the form of worſhip then practiſed. Nevertheleſs, if the reader pleaſes to conſult the table printed at the end of Vander Hooght's edition of the Hebrew Bible, he will find that Iſai. lxi. 1. according to the cuſtom of all the ſynagogues, falls to be read with the fiftieth ſection of the law. For the ſection of the prophets correſponding with the fiftieth ſection of the law, begins at Iſai. lx. 1. and ends where the next ſection begins, viz. at lxi. 11. It was therefore the ſection for the day which Jeſus read in the ſynagogue of Nazareth:—If ſo, the chronology of this part of the hiſtory is determined; for the firſt ſection of the law being anciently read on the firſt ſabbath of Tiſri, the ſeventh month, according to our September (becauſe Ezra, the father of the ſynagogue, began the public reading on the firſt day of that month, Neh. viii. 2.) the fiftieth ſection, with its correſponding paſſage in the prophets, fell to be read on the laſt ſabbath of Auguſt, or the firſt of September. The Jews at preſent begin the law anſwering to the primitive inſtitution of Moſes, Deut. xxxi. 10, 11. on the laſt day of the feaſt of tabernacles, that is, the twenty-ſecond day of Tiſri. By this commencement it was a week or two later in the year when our Lord read the Scriptures publickly in the ſynagogue of Nazareth, was expelled the town, and fixed his reſidence at Capernaum. We may juſt remark further, that the attitude obſerved in reading the Scripture was ſtanding; but when they commented upon or explained what had been read, they ſat down. There was a ſettled reader in every ſynagogue;

17 And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Eſaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written,

18 The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, becauſe he hath anointed me to preach the goſpel to the poor; he hath ſent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of ſight to the blind, to ſet at liberty them that are bruiſed:

19 To preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

20 And he cloſed the book, and he gave it again to the miniſter, and ſat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the ſynagogue were faſtened on him.

21 And he began to ſay unto them, This day is this ſcripture fulfilled in your ears.

22 And all bare him witneſs, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. And they ſaid, Is not this Joſeph's ſon?

23 And he ſaid unto them, Ye will ſurely ſay unto me this proverb, Phyſician, heal thyſelf: whatſoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do alſo here in thy country.

Ver. 18. Iſai. lxi. 1.—V. 22. Pſ. xlv. 2. Matth. xiii. 54. Ch. ii. 47. John vi. 42.—V. 23. Matth. iv. 13. Matth. xiii. 54. Mark vi. 1.

but it was likewiſe cuſtomary to compliment any perſon with this honour, though a ſtranger, provided he was any way famous for his mental abilities or gravity; therefore, though Jeſus was not one of the ſtated miniſters of religion in the town of Nazareth, the office now aſſigned him was agreeable to the regulations of the ſynagogue. Perhaps the rulers, having heard the report of his miracles, (ſee ver. 14.) and of the Baptiſt's teſtimony concerning him, were curious to hear him read and expound the Scriptures; and the rather becauſe it was well known in Nazareth that he had not the advantage of a learned education. Wherefore, as the Hebrew was now a dead language, and Jeſus had not been taught to read, his actual reading, and with ſuch facility the original Hebrew ſcriptures, as well as his expounding them, was a clear proof of his inſpiration. Some would point the latter part of this verſe thus: He went into the ſynagogue, as he was wont to do, on the ſabbath-day, and ſtood up to read. See Macknight and Bengelius.

Ver. 17—19. When he had opened the book, &c.] Αναπτυξας το βιβλιον, unrolling the volume. The ſacred books were written anciently on ſkins of parchment, and ſewed together; and the books thus written were rolled up into volumes, like the pentateuchs uſed by the modern Jews in their ſynagogues. The reader will find a full account of them in Jones's Vindication of St. Matthew's Goſpel, ch. xv. As the Scriptures were read in order, the paſſage of the prophet Iſaiah which fell of courſe to be read in the ſynagogue of Nazareth, would naturally preſent itſelf on ſeparating the two rolls of the book. This happened to be the celebrated prediction Iſai. lxi. 1. in which the Meſſiah is introduced deſcribing his own miſſion, character, and office; the reader is referred to our notes on that chapter. The doctrine of the ever-bleſſed Trinity is often interwoven, even in thoſe Scriptures where one would leaſt expect it. We have a clear declaration of the great THREE-ONE in the words before us: The Spirit—of the Lord—is upon Me, is a phraſe uſually applied to the prophets, when they were under an immediate afflatus of the Spirit; becauſe he hath anointed me, that is, commiſſioned me—to preach the Goſpel to the poor, i. e. the meek and lowly in heart. Some would read the paſſage, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me; becauſe he hath anointed me to preach the Goſpel to the poor, he hath ſent me to heal the broken-hearted, &c. To one who conſiders the matter attentively, it muſt appear an unſpeakable recommendation of the Goſpel œconomy, that it offers the pardon of ſin, and ſalvation to all, on the ſame terms. The rich here have no pre-eminence over the poor, as they ſeem to have had under the law, which preſcribed ſuch coſtly ſacrifices for the atonement of ſin as were very burdenſome to the poor. The prophet Iſaiah, therefore, in deſcribing the happineſs of Goſpel-times, very fitly introduces the Meſſiah mentioning this as one of the many bleſſings which would accrue to the world from his coming; that the glad tidings of ſalvation were to be preached by him and his miniſters to the poor, and conſequently were to be offered to them without money, and without price, Iſai. lv. 1. Inſtead of recovering of ſight to the blind, which is in the LXX, the preſent Hebrew copies of Iſaiah have, and the opening of the priſon to the bound. Perhaps the alteration was made by the Maſoreths, becauſe the original reading preſerved by the LXX and by the Evangeliſts gave too much countenance to the Chriſtians, who affirmed, that the miracles which Jeſus performed on the blind were the very miracles which, according to the prediction of Iſaiah, the Meſſiah was to perform. Dr Waterland renders the clauſe in Iſaiah, and to the priſoners broad day-light, or open viſion. The laſt clauſe in the 18th verſe is neither in the LXX, nor in the original Hebrew. We find it indeed, Iſai. lviii. 6. where the LXX have the very words. Le Clerc therefore ſuppoſes, that this paſſage from the fifty-eighth chapter, having been placed on the margin of St. Luke, as parallel to the citation from the ſixty-firſt chapter, came at length to be inſerted into the text as part of that citation. Indeed it is very evident that deliverance to the captives, and liberty to the bruiſed, oppreſſed, or bound, are the ſame. And we may obſerve further, that the connecting particle καὶ is placed properly before the third clauſe,—and recovering of ſight, &c. whereas its omiſſion before the fourth clauſe not only breaks the ſentence, but manifeſtly proves it to be a gloſs. This verſe contains a magnificent deſcription of the Meſſiah's miracles and mighty works; all that he needed to do, for the deliverance of ſuch perſons as were held captives,—or, as the Apoſtle expreſſes it, were oppreſſed of the devil, Acts x. 38.—was to preach, (κηρύξαι,) to proclaim, or declare them delivered. In like manner, to give recovery of ſight to the blind, or to work any other miracle of healing, no more was requiſite, but that he ſhould ſpeak the word. It is obſervable, that in this deſcription of the Meſſiah's miniſtry, Iſaiah has alluded to the manners of the eaſterns, who in ancient times were ſo inhuman, as to lead captive into far diſtant lands thoſe whom they conquered. Their principal captives they caſt into priſon, loaded with irons, which ſorely bruiſed their bodies; and to render them incapable of raiſing freſh diſturbances, or it may be to increaſe their miſery, they ſometimes put out their eyes. In this manner Nebuchadnezzar treated Zedekiah; Wherefore, as the Meſſiah in many other prophecies had been repreſented under the notion of a great and mighty conqueror, Iſaiah, in deſcribing his ſpiritual triumphs, with great propriety introduces him declaring, that he was come to ſubdue the oppreſſors of mankind, and to deliver from captivity and miſery thoſe wretches whom they had enſlaved, by opening their priſon-doors, healing the wounds and bruiſes occaſioned by their chains, and even by giving ſight to thoſe whoſe eyes had been put out in priſon. Some, underſtanding this prophecy in a literal ſenſe, are of opinion, that it foretels the alteration which by the Chriſtian religion hath been made in the policy of nations, but eſpecially in the manner of making war, and of treating the vanquiſhed, in both which much more humanity is now uſed than anciently, to the great honour of the Chriſtian inſtitution, and of its author. See Craddock's Harmony, Macknight, and Le Clerc.

Ver. 20, 21. And ſat down] In agreement with the cuſtom which we have ſpoken of at the end of the note on ver. 16. our Lord ſat down to preach, after he had read the paſſage in the prophet which he made the ſubject of his diſcourſe. The cuſtom of preaching from a text of Scripture, which now prevails throughout all the Chriſtian churches, ſeems to have derived its origin from the authority of this example. In ſpeaking to the congregation from the prophecy, he told them, it was that day fulfilled in their ears, ver. 21. for although no miracle had been done in their city, they were credibly informed of many, which had been wrought by him; and it may be alſo, at the paſſover, had ſeen him do ſuch things, as fully anſwered the prophet's deſcription of the Meſſiah. By ſome illuſtration of this kind Jeſus proved his aſſertion, in a ſermon of conſiderable length, the ſubject of which only is mentioned by St. Luke, though at the ſame time he leads us to think of the ſermon itſelf; for he tells us, ver. 22. that all the congregation bare him witneſs, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. The phraſe in the original, λογοις της χαριτος, ſignifies literally, words of grace, and probably refers to the agreeable manner of Chriſt's diſcourſe, as well as to the matter of it. And as they could not but take notice of the majeſty and grace with which he ſpoke, ſo it muſt naturally fill them with admiration, conſidering the meanneſs of his birth and education. At the ſame time the malevolence of their diſpoſition led them to mingle with their praiſes a reflection, which they thought fully confuted his pretenſions to the Meſſiahſhip, and ſhewed the abſurdity of the application which he had made of Iſaiah's prophecy to himſelf as the Meſſiah:—They ſaid, Is not this Joſeph's Son? See John vii. 27. and the next note.

Ver. 23—27. And he ſaid unto them, &c.] When our Lord came into Galilee, with a view to exerciſe his miniſtry, he did not go to Nazareth: On the contrary, he paſſed by it, and went ſtraight to Cana, which lay not far from Sidon. See John ii. 1. This exaſperated the Nazarenes. Beſides, he had not performed any miracle in their town; far leſs had he done any like that which they heard he had performed in Capernaum, where he cured the nobleman's ſon without ſtirring from Cana. It ſeems they thought, ſince their townſman could ſo eaſily give health to the ſick at a diſtance, there ought not to have been ſo much as one diſeaſed perſon in all Nazareth. At leaſt our Lord's own words ſuggeſt this conjecture. He ſaid unto them, Ye ſurely ſay to me, (for ſo it ſhould be rendered) ye apply to me this proverb,—which was a common one amongſt the eaſterns, Phyſician, heal thyſelf. Whatſoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do alſo here in thy country, plainly alluding to the cure of the nobleman's ſon; as if they had ſaid, "Since thou poſſeſſeſt powers ſo 24 And he ſaid, Verily I ſay unto you, No prophet is accepted in his own country.

25 But I tell you of a truth, many widows were in Iſrael in the days of Elias, when the heaven was ſhut up three years and ſix months, when great famine was throughout all the land;

26 But unto none of them was Elias ſent, ſave unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow.

27 And many lepers were in Iſrael in the time of Eliſeus the prophet; and none of them was cleanſed, ſaving Naaman the Syrian.

28 And all they in the ſynagogue, when they heard theſe things, were filled with wrath, great, and art able to cure ſick perſons at a diſtance, we cannot help thinking, that in thine abſence thou oughteſt to have recovered the ſick of thy native city, rather than thoſe of any other town; it being expected of every phyſician, that he will beſtow the healing virtue of his art upon his own relations and friends who need it, ſooner than upon ſtrangers." In anſwer to their ill-natured whiſpers, Jeſus told them plainly, that his character would ſuffer nothing by their rejecting him; becauſe it had ever been the lot of prophets to be deſpiſed in their own country, ver. 24. and ſee on Matth. xiii. 57. And with relation to his having wrought no miracle of healing in their town, he inſinuated, that the very heathens were more worthy of favours of this ſort than they, to ſuch a pitch of wickedneſs had they proceeded; in which reſpect they reſembled their anceſtors, whoſe great ſins God reproved by ſending his prophets to work miracles for heathens, rather than for them, in a time of general calamities, ver. 25.—27. By putting them thus in mind of Elijah's miracle, in behalf of the widow of Sarepta, an heathen inhabitant of an heathen city, in a time of famine, while many widows of Iſrael were ſuffered to ſtarve; and of Eliſha's miracle upon Naaman, the Syrian leper, while many lepers of Iſrael remained uncleanſed; he ſhewed them both the ſin and the puniſhment of their anceſtors, and left it to themſelves to make the application. St. James ſpeaks of the ſame period of time, that the heavens were ſhut up in the days of Elijah, ch. v. 17. as our Lord does, ver. 25. which is grounded either on our Lord's authority here, or was a circumſtance, probably, eſtabliſhed by tradition: For in both places it is ſpoken of, as a thing well known; nor can we doubt but the account is very exact, though the time is not determined in the Old Teſtament. Lightfoot and others have obſerved, that there is ſomewhat remarkable in this circumſtance of time, as it agrees with the continuance of Chriſt's public miniſtry, that as Elijah ſhut up heaven by his prayers, ſo that it rained not upon the earth for the ſpace of three years and ſix months; ſo from the baptiſm to the death of Chriſt, the the heavens were opened for a like ſpace of time, when his doctrine dropped as the rain, and his ſpeech diſtilled as the dew. God ſent Elijah to Sarepta, a Gentile city in the coaſts of Sidon, and ſo made him the firſt prophet that was ever ſent amongſt the Gentiles; and when our Lord himſelf went among the Gentiles, it was into the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon, to ſhew mercy to a poor woman, as Elijah had done before to a poor widow: thereby giving a tacit intimation, of the mercy intended to be ſhewn to the Gentiles. See Macknight, Lightfoot, Guyſe, and the note on Matth. xiii. 58.

Ver. 30. Paſſing through the midſt, &c.] In the midſt of the confuſion our Lord eſcaped, probably by making himſelf inviſible: But though we cannot certainly determine, whether the miracle lay in this, or in our Lord's aſſuming ſome other form, or in affecting their eyes and minds in ſuch a manner, that they ſhould not know him; it ſeems unqueſtionable that there was ſomething miraculous in the caſe; and therefore the Nazarenes could no longer complain that he had wrought no miracle among them. Ver. 31. To Capernaum] Capernaum is no where mentioned in the Old Teſtament, either by its own name, or by any other. Probably it was one of thoſe towns, which the Jews built after their return from Babylon. Its exact ſituation has not as yet been determined with certainty by geographers; only from its being on the confines of the two tribes, Reland and others conjecture, that it ſtood ſomewhere on the north-weſt ſhore of the lake of Gennezareth. According to Joſephus, (Bell, b. iii. c. 18.) the length of this lake was an hundred furlongs, or twelve miles and a half, and its breadth forty furlongs, or five miles. Pliny ſays it was ſixteen miles long and ſix broad. Anciently the lake of Gennezareth was called the Sea of Chinneroth, Numb. xxxiv. 11. but in later times it was named the Sea of Galilee, becauſe that country formed part of its ſhore; —and the Sea of Tiberias, from the city Tiberias lying on the ſouth-weſt coaſt thereof. Its bottom is gravel, which gives its waters both a good colour and taſte. The river Jordan runs through the middle of it, and ſtocks it with a great variety of excellent fiſh. In the countries round this lake our Lord ſpent two or three years of his public life; and though he afterwards enlarged the compaſs of his journies, yet they always enjoyed a conſiderable ſhare of his bleſſed company and divine inſtructions. There were ſeveral reaſons which might determine Jeſus to be ſo much about the ſea of Galilee. 1. The countries which ſurrounded this ſea were large, fertile, and populous, eſpecially the two Galilees: For, according to Joſephus, (bell. l. iii. c. 2.) they alone had many towns, and a multitude of villages, the leaſt of which contained above 15,000 ſouls. On the eaſt ſide of the lake were Choraſin, Bethſaida, Gadara, and Hippon; on the weſt, Capernaum, Tiberias, and Tarrichea, with other places of inferior note. Wherefore, as it was agreeable to the end of Chriſt's coming, that his doctrine ſhould be ſpread extenſively, and his miracles wrought publickly, no country could be a fitter ſcene for his miniſtry than this. Beſides its numerous inhabitants, there were at all times many ſtrangers reſorting to the trading towns on the lake, who, after hearing Jeſus preach, could carry home with them the glad tidings of ſalvation, which were the ſubject of his ſermons. Capernaum, choſen by Chriſt as the place of his reſidence, was a town of this kind, and much frequented. 2. The countries round the lake were remote from Jeruſalem, the ſeat of the ſcribes and Phariſees, a moſt malignant ſort of people, who would not have borne with patience the preſence of a teacher held in ſuch eſtimation as Jeſus deſervedly was. We know this by what happened in the beginning of his miniſtry, when he made and baptized many diſciples in Judea. They took ſuch offence at it, that he was obliged to leave the country: John iv. 1. compared with ch. iii. 22. Wherefore, as it was neceſſary that he ſhould ſpend a conſiderable time in preaching and working miracles, both for the confirmation of his miſſion, and for the inſtruction of his diſciples in the doctrines they were afterwards to preach, theſe countries were, of all others, the moſt proper for him to reſide in; or rather, they were the only places where he could be with ſafety for any time. 3. It was agreeable to the end of our Lord's miſſion, that he ſhould be in a low ſtation of life; becauſe to have affected pomp and grandeur was inconſiſtent with the character of a teacher from God. The reader, perhaps, will yield more readily to the evidence of this aſſertion, when he remembers that Plato, drawing the character of one perfect in virtue, ſays, "He muſt be poor, and void of all recommendation but virtue alone." Repub. 2. Beſides, had our Lord appeared with the equipage of a great man, or been diſtinguiſhed by the ſplendor of high life, it muſt ſoon have rendered him obnoxious either to Herod, or to the Roman governor. On the other hand, that the duties of his miniſtry might be executed as extenſively as poſſible, he and his diſciples were obliged to make many long journies, the fatigue of which would have been too great for ordinary conſtitutions to have ſuſtained, had they been all performed on foot. This inconvenience was remedied by the eaſy paſſages which the lake afforded. Hence the countries around it were choſen by him as the ſcene of his miniſtry, preferably to the other parts of the land of Iſrael. Farther, as the multitude earneſtly wiſhed he would take the title of king, and ſet up a ſecular empire, it was neceſſary that he ſhould have it in his power to retire from them, when they became troubleſome. Accordingly we find him and his diſciples making their eſcapes by the lake; paſſing eaſily and ſpeedily in their own boats, from one country to another, as occaſion required. 4. Capernaum, of all the towns near the lake, was pitched upon by Jeſus as the place of his ordinary reſidence, after his expulſion from Nazareth, becauſe he was ſure of meeting with a favourable reception there. He had gained the friendſhip of the principal family in the city; viz. that of the nobleman, whoſe ſon he had cured in Cana: And the good will which this family, with its relations, bare to him, was not an ordinary kindneſs, like that which perſons bear to a benefactor; but, being ſtruck with the miracle, they firmly believed him to be the Meſſiah, heartily eſpouſed his cauſe, and no doubt were ready to aſſiſt him on all occaſions. Beſides, this miracle muſt have conciliated the love and reſpect of the inhabitants of Capernaum, to whom it could not but be well known. Nor muſt we omit the foreknowledge which Jeſus had of his being to gain the favour of a Roman centurion, (Matth. viii. 5, &c.) and of a ruler of the ſynagogue, (Mark v. 22.) both living in this town, whoſe friendſhip likewiſe would protect him from the inſults of his enemies. To conclude, Capernaum was the place where the men dwelt who had become his diſciples immediately after his baptiſm, and whoſe preſence was neceſſary to him on many occaſions, before he called them to leave their families, and attend upon him conſtantly. See Macknight, 32 And they were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine: for his word was with power.

33 And in the ſynagogue there was a man which had a ſpirit of an unclean devil; and he cried out with a loud voice, 34 Saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jeſus of Nazareth? art thou come to deſtroy us? I know thee who thou art; the Holy One of God.

35 And Jeſus rebuked him, ſaying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And when the devil had thrown him in the midſt, he came out of him, and hurt him not.

36 And they were all amazed, and ſpake among themſelves, ſaying, What a word is this! for with authority and power he commandeth the unclean ſpirits, and they come out!

37 And the fame of him went out into every place of the country round about.

38 And he aroſe out of the ſynagogue, and entered into Simon's houſe. And Simon's wife's mother was taken with a great fever; and they beſought him for her.

39 And he ſtood over her, and rebuked the fever; and it left her: and immediately ſhe aroſe and miniſtered unto them.

40 Now when the ſun was ſetting, all they that had any ſick with divers diſeaſes, brought them unto him; and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them.

41 And devils alſo came out of many, crying out, and ſaying, Thou art Chriſt, the Son of God. And he, rebuking them, ſuffered them not to ſpeak: for they knew that he was Chriſt.

42 And when it was day, he departed, and went into a deſart place: and the people ſought him, and came unto him, and ſtayed him, that he ſhould not depart from them.

43 And he ſaid unto them, I muſt preach the kingdom of God to other cities alſo: for therefore am I ſent.

44 And he preached in the ſynagogues of Galilee.

The meaning of the laſt words ſeems to be, and did him no further harm; Μηδὲν ϐλαψαν αὐτόν; for while the convulſion continued, it muſt have given him ſome pain, and might have been attended with laſting diſorder, had not the reſtraining and healing power of Chriſt prevented.

Ver. 38. And Simon's wife's mother] For, &c. Wat.

Ver. 39. Rebuked the fever] This is an expreſſion of the ſame kind and ſignification with rebuking the winds and the ſea, Matth. viii. 26. Not that either the one or the other were conſidered by Chriſt as perſons; but it intimates his authority over all diſeaſes, and over the elements, being analogous to the figurative expreſſions in Scripture, which repreſent not only all inanimate creatures, as God's ſervants, but diſeaſes, famines, peſtilence, &c. as executioners waiting on him to inflict puniſhment upon rebellious ſinners. Thus Habakkuk iii. 5. Before him went the peſtilence, and burning diſeaſes went forth at his feet; a figure which excellently repreſents the divine power, to which all things are ſubject. See Pſ. civ. 7. cvi. 9. We may remark, that this cure was effected in an inſtant, and not ſlowly, like the cures produced in the courſe of nature, or by medicine; for though the length and violence of her diſtemper had brought her into a weak and languid ſtate, her full ſtrength returned all at once, inſomuch that riſing up immediately, ſhe prepared a ſupper for them, and ſerved them while at meat, ſhewing that ſhe was reſtored to perfect health. See Macknight.

Ver. 41. And devils alſo came out of many] See on ch. xi. 14. It would be very fooliſh to imagine, that God ſuffered theſe unhappy perſons to be poſſeſſed, merely that Chriſt might have the honour of curing them. But it is to be conſidered, that the view under which Chriſt is moſt frequently repreſented, is as the great antagoniſt of the prince of darkneſs, and the Goſpel has its foundation in the victory which Satan has gained over mankind. Compare Gen. iii. 15. Matth. xii. 28, 29. 1 John iii. 8. Heb. ii. 14. and Rom. xvi. 20. as alſo Matth. vi. 13. John xvii. 15. Epheſ. vi. 16. and 1 John ii. 13, 14. iii. 12. v. 18, 19. in all which places Ὁ πονηρὸς ſeems to ſignify the wicked one, that is, the devil, whoſe powerful influence over men is intimated or expreſſed in each of them. And it appears from Wiſd. ii. 24. that the Jews before Chriſt's time had ſomething of this notion, and conſidered the wicked in general as taking part with the devil. The words are, Through envy of the devil came death into the world, and they who hold of his ſide do find it. The inſpired texts above ſhew that the expreſſion is juſt; and it was certainly on this account a moſt wiſe and gracious diſpenſation to permit the devil about this time to give ſome unuſual proofs of his exiſtence, power, and malice, in thus attacking mens bodies, which would naturally convince them what a dangerous enemy he was to their ſouls, and what need they had of the patronage of Chriſt; as the ſenſible victory of Chriſt in theſe diſpoſſeſſions would be a proof and ſpecimen of that illuſtrious and complete triumph over him and his confederate powers, in which our Lord's mediatorial kingdom is to end. No kind of miracles therefore could be more fit to atteſt his miſſion, and to promote his intereſt among men; and hence it is that hardly any are more frequently and circumſtantially deſcribed. This ſeems a ſufficient anſwer to the difficulty propoſed by Mr. Mede, in his Works, p. 28. and others; and a clear proof that we ſhall do no ſervice to Chriſtianity by endeavouring to diſprove the reality of theſe poſſeſſions, or by dropping the mention of the infernal powers in our preaching, how faſhionable ſoever ſuch omiſſions may grow.

REFLECTIONS ON OUR SAVIOUR'S TEMPTATION.

The ſeveral ſcenes of the wonderful tranſactions recorded in this chapter were preſented to our Lord in the form, and anſwered the end of a preſent trial. But this was not all; they appear to have been directly and properly intended as ſymbolical predictions and repreſentations of the future difficulties of his office and miniſtry. We will conſider them in this view.

Now with reſpect to the firſt ſcene, (ver. 3, 4.) it is evident that it had reference to our Saviour's future miniſtry, through the whole courſe of which he was preſſed with the ſame kind of temptations, and reſiſted them upon the ſame principles. This part of the temptation very naturally conveyed this good inſtruction, "that Chriſt, though the Son of God, was to ſtruggle with the afflicting hardſhips of hunger and thirſt, and all the other evils of humanity, like the loweſt of the ſons of men; and that he was never to exert his divine power for his own perſonal relief under the moſt preſſing difficulties, or for the ſupply of his moſt urgent occaſions, but with reſignation and faith to wait for the interpoſition of God in his favour." Accordingly we find that Chriſt regulated his conduct by this maxim. He did not ſubſiſt by miracles; but though rich in the poſſeſſion of a power capable of controlling all the laws of nature; though heir and Lord of all, he became poor, lived an indigent life, without any ſettled habitation, or certain proviſion. He knew how much more bleſſed it is to give than to receive, and yet diſdained not to accept kindneſs from others, or even to ſtand indebted to their bounty for his ſupport. In ſome circumſtances he felt the preſſure of hunger, without having food to eat; at other times he had no leiſure to take any, through a zealous application to the duties of his office, ſuch as was not to be interrupted by the preſſing calls of nature. He choſe rather to deny himſelf neceſſary refreſhment, than loſe an opportunity of healing and inſtructing the multitude; and neither on theſe nor on any other occaſion did he relieve himſelf by a miracle. This is the more extraordinary, as he interpoſed with readineſs on the behalf of others, who daily rejoiced in the temporal as well as ſpiritual benefit of his divine power; and at different times fed the hungry multitude in the deſart, by a miraculous increaſe of his own ſlender proviſions.

Nor did he only endure hunger and thirſt, but all the other evils incident to human nature. He lived a laborious, and led an itinerant life. Inſtead of commanding angels to his ſervice, he ſubmitted to the inconveniencies and fatigues of travelling on foot, from one part of Judea and Galilee to another, and was toſſed about by tempeſts at ſea. He was exhauſted by the inceſſant labours of his miniſtry, and that intenſe application of mind with which he engaged in it. After performing tireſome journies, and preaching to the crowds which followed him in the day, he often ſpent a conſiderable part of

CHAP. V.

Chriſt teacheth the people out of Peter's ſhip; in a miraculous taking of fiſhes, ſheweth how he will make him and his partners fiſhers of men; cleanſeth the leper; prayeth in the wilderneſs; healeth one ſick of the palſy; calleth Matthew the publican; eateth with ſinners, as being the phyſician of ſouls; foretelleth the faſtings and afflictions of the apoſtles after his aſcenſion: and likeneth faint-hearted and weak diſciples to worn-out garments and old bottles.

AND it came to paſs that, as the people preſſed upon him to hear the word of God, he ſtood by the lake of Genneſaret,

2 And ſaw two ſhips ſtanding by the lake: but the fiſhermen were gone out of them, and were waſhing their nets.

3 And he entered into one of the ſhips, which was Simon's, and prayed him that he would thruſt out a little from the land. And he ſat down, and taught the people out of the ſhip.

4 Now when he had left ſpeaking, he ſaid unto Simon, Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught.

5 And Simon anſwering, ſaid unto him, Maſter, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: neverthelefs, at thy word, I will let down the net.

Ver. 1. Matth. iv. 18. Mark i. 16.—V. 7. John xxi. 6.

the night, ſometimes the whole of it, in prayer to God, and in the open air; notwithſtanding the copious dews which fall by night in thoſe parts, muſt have been very dangerous, eſpecially when the body was heated by the exerciſe of the preceding day. So many injuries did his conſtitution ſuffer, that the craſis or texture of his blood was deſtroyed, and ſweated through every pore of his body; and to ſuch a degree was he enfeebled by the violences to which he patiently ſubmitted, as to be unable to bear his croſs. He, who in ſo many thouſand inſtances renewed the health and vigour of others, never exerted any miraculous power, either to preſerve or reſtore his own, but ſunk under the preſſure of his infirmities! In all his exigencies he referred himſelf to God. Even under that great extremity, his agony in the garden, he ſought and waited for the interpoſition of God; who, in anſwer to his prayer, ſent an angel from heaven to ſtrengthen him: And when the hour of his death approached, he uſed no means for his reſcue; but meekly reſigned himſelf into the hands of his moſt malicious enemies, in obedience to his Father's will.

The divine powers with which Chriſt was inveſted, were deſigned as the ſeal of his miſſion, and accordingly they were never applied to a different purpoſe. This ſtrict appropriation of his miracles to their proper intention, ſerved to point it out more clearly, and to keep it in conſtant view; to manifeſt his wiſdom, and the neceſſity of the works themſelves, and to preſerve their dignity and authority, which would have been impaired, if not deſtroyed, by a more general application of them. As Chriſt never applied them to any purpoſe foreign to their grand intention, ſo it was in a very peculiar manner neceſſary, that they ſhould never be employed to protect himſelf from the calamities and diſtreſſes to which human nature is incident. Had he, when made in the likeneſs of men, ſaved himſelf by miracles from the evils of humanity, where had been his conflict, his victory, his triumph? Or where the conſolation and benefit his followers derive from his example, his merit, his crown? Sufferings were the theatre on which he diſplayed his divine virtues, and they were both the ground of his advancement to the glorious office of our Redeemer, and a natural means of inſpiring him with compaſſion to all who were to follow him.

The ſecond ſcene of this temptation (ver. 9—12. Matth. iv. 5—7.—The reader will ſee that we follow St. Matthew's order, agreeable to the obſervation on ver. 5.) has alſo an evident reference to our Saviour's futureminiſtry. Through the whole courſe of it he was aſſaulted with temptations ſimilar to that here propoſed, and repelled them upon the maxim here adopted. Inſtead of needleſsly and unwarrantably running into danger, and then relying upon the divine power to extricate him, which might have occaſioned an unneceſſary and endleſs multiplication of miracles, we find him uſing the utmoſt caution in declining hazards, avoiding as far as poſſible what might exaſperate his enemies, and enjoining ſilence with regard to his miracles, when the publication of them was likely, by raiſing envy or popular commotions, to inflame their minds yet more againſt him. We find him alſo diſappointing their malice, by prudently retreating out of its reach, till the appointed period of his miniſtry was fulfilled: ſo that, although there were ſome inſtances in which he was protected from his adverſaries in a miraculous manner, yet, conſidering how eagerly the Jewiſh rulers were bent upon his deſtruction, and how often they attempted it, thoſe inſtances are few, compared with what they muſt have been, had not Chriſt been perpetually attentive in his whole conduct to this maxim,—Thou ſhalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

In producing the evidences of his divine miſſion, he ſtill acted upon the ſame maxim: Inſtead of opening his commiſſion at Jeruſalem, and diſplaying all at once upon that grand theatre the powers with which he was inveſted; he performed his firſt miracle at Cana in Galilee, and made that obſcure country, for a conſiderable time, the principal ſcene of his miniſtry, which he endeavoured to fulfil with all the privacy which the nature of the work would admit. Inſtead of courting the favour of the opulent and powerful, to engage them to countenance and ſupport his cauſe, or challenging from the rulers of the Jewiſh nation the homage due to his high character, he did not bear a commiſſion chiefly or particutarly directed to them (an honour which ſome of the ancient prophets enjoyed;) but converſed freely with all ſorts of people; not only with the loweſt, but with the worſt, in order to bring them to repentance.

Now theſe circumſtances of Chriſt's miniſtry correſpond to thoſe in the ſcene before us, where he was tempted to a public and oſtentatious diſplay of his miraculous powers; and his anſwer to this ſecond temptation contained a new limitation under which thoſe powers were to be uſed: Even in bringing men to the faith, he was not to exceed the order and appointment of God. And though the determination of God in this reſpect was certainly founded in the higheſt wiſdom; though it was perfectly analogous to the other meaſures of his government over his moral creatures; and though it was well calculated to promote the credit and true intereſt of the Goſpel, yet did it require the greateſt humility, fortitude, and piety in him, who had the power of working miracles at pleaſure, to acquieſce herein.

Ambition and vain-glory could never have reſiſted the temptations Chriſt was under to an inceſſant and unlimited exertion of his miraculous powers, by which he would have advanced his own honour, rendered his miniſtry more illuſtrious, and forced univerſal conviction. This temptation was the more difficult to be overcome, as in conſequence of the method which was taken, his doctrine was embraced only by a few well-diſpoſed perſons, and thoſe generally in the loweſt rank of life. See Matth. xi. 25, 26.

The third and laſt ſcene of this temptation (ver. 5—8. Matth. iv. 8, 9.) was alſo a preſignification and warning of the like temptations in the courſe of his future miniſtry; during which he was called upon to proſtitute himſelf, with all his miraculous endowments, to the ſervice of Satan, for the ſake of worldly honours. The Jewiſh nation expected their Meſſiah to deliver it from the yoke of ſervitude, and to raiſe it to a pitch of grandeur ſuperior to what it had ever enjoyed. As theſe were the expectations which the Jews entertained, ſo they were very ſolicitous that Jeſus ſhould anſwer them; and would have done every thing in their power to promote the ſucceſs of ſuch an undertaking:—they even would have taken him by force, and made him a king. And it is certain, that had his miraculous powers, which were wholly conſecrated to the erecting the kingdom of God amongſt them, been employed in paving his way to ſecular honour, he might not only have eſcaped ſufferings and death, but eaſily have aſcended the throne of the univerſe. How readily would not only the Jews, but all other nations, have repaired to the ſtandard of a prince, who by a word, or ſilent volition only, could provide for his own armies, or deſtroy thoſe of his enemies? "Why then,—it might have been ſuggeſted to him,—inſtead of ſpending your life in affliction, and then ending it upon the croſs, will you not uſe your power for your own benefit? to deliver yourſelf from miſery, and make yourſelf maſter of the world?"

But temptation never at any time prevailed over our Lord, notwithſtanding the deſire of honour, wealth, and dominion is natural to every human mind, and, however innocent in itſelf, is with greater difficulty than any other ſubjected to the controul of reaſon and conſcience; and notwithſtanding univerſal empire carries with it charms almoſt irreſiſtible to noble and heroic minds, conſcious of their ſuperior wiſdom and abilities, and an intention to employ their power to the true ends for which it was beſtowed. If any thing can heighten the virtue of deſpiſing worldly greatneſs, if it come in competition with our duty, it is the being practiſed in circumſtances of indigence, ſuch as are infinitely beneath that rank to which our merit intitles us; and therefore to refuſe, as our Saviour did, grandeur and royalty, and univerſal empire, while he was more deſtitute of the accommodations of life than even the beaſts of the field, or the birds of the air, and was ſtruggling with poverty, reproach, and perſecution in the cauſe of God, and had death itſelf in certain proſpect before him,—all which evils might have been avoided by a miſapplication of his miraculous powers,—was the higheſt act of virtue that humanity could exhibit. See Farmer's inquiry, Sect. 4. and the Reflections on Matth. iv.

6 And when they had this done, they incloſed a great multitude of fiſhes: and their net brake.

7 And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ſhip, that they ſhould come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ſhips, ſo that they began to ſink.

8 When Simon Peter ſaw it, he fell down at Jeſus' knees, ſaying, Depart from me, for I am a ſinful man, O Lord!

9 For he was aſtoniſhed, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fiſhes which they had taken:

10 And ſo was alſo James and John, the ſons of Zebedee, which were partners with Simon. And Jeſus ſaid unto Simon, Fear not; from henceforth thou ſhalt catch men.

11 And when they had brought their ſhips to land, they forſook all, and followed him.

12 And it came to paſs, when he was in a certain city, behold, a man full of leproſy: who ſeeing Jeſus, fell on his face, and beſought him, ſaying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canſt make me clean.

13 And he put forth his hand, and touched him, ſaying, I will: Be thou clean. And immediately the leproſy departed from him.

14 And he charged him to tell no man: But go, and ſhew thyſelf to the prieſt, and offer for thy cleanſing, according as Moſes commanded, for a teſtimony unto them.

15 But ſo much the more went there a fame abroad of him: and great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed by him of their infirmities.

16 And he withdrew himſelf into the wilderneſs, and prayed.

17 And it came to paſs on a certain day, as he was teaching, that there were Phariſees and doctors of the law ſitting by, which were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jeruſalem: and the power of the Lord was preſent to heal them.

18 And behold, men brought in a bed a man which was taken with a palſy: and they ſought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him.

19 And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in, becauſe of the multitude, they went upon the houſetop, and let him down through the tiling, with his couch, into the midſt before Jeſus.

20 And when he ſaw their faith, he ſaid unto him, Man, thy ſins are forgiven thee.

21 And the ſcribes and the Phariſees began to reaſon, ſaying, Who is this which ſpeaketh blaſphemies? Who can forgive ſins but God alone?

22 But when Jeſus perceived their thoughts, he anſwering ſaid unto them, What reaſon ye in your hearts?

23 Whether is eaſier to ſay, Thy ſins be forgiven thee; or to ſay, Riſe up, and walk?

24 But, that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive ſins, He ſaid unto the ſick of the palſy, I ſay unto thee, Ariſe, and take up thy couch, and go unto thine houſe.

25 And immediately he roſe up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own houſe, glorifying God.

26 And they were all amazed, and they

Chap. V. Ver. 6. And their net brake] Διεῤῥήγνυτο,—was breaking, or began to break; for ſo the word muſt ſignify here, becauſe if the net had been broken, they could not have caught the fiſhes. This tranſlation is juſtified by ὥστε βυθίζεσθαι αὐτά, in the following verſe, which without diſpute is there properly rendered ſo that they began to ſink. Thus alſo Matth. ix. 18. My daughter, ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν, is now (almoſt) dead; as is evident from Mark v. 23. Luke viii. 49. So likewiſe chap. xxi. 26. men (almoſt) killed through fear.

Ver. 8. Depart from me] Peter's words on this occaſion may be variouſly interpreted; for we may ſuppoſe that, conſcious of his iniquity, he was afraid to be in Chriſt's company, leſt ſome infirmity or offence might have expoſed him to more than ordinary chaſtiſements. Comp. Judg. vi. 22. xiii. 22. Or, it being an opinion of the Jews, that the viſits of the prophets were attended with chaſtiſements from heaven, 1 Kings xvii. 18. he might be ſtruck with a panic, when he obſerved this proof of Chriſt's power: Or he may have ſaid to his maſter, depart, becauſe he was not able to ſhew him the reſpect he deſerved, and was not worthy to be in his company. In this latter ſenſe Peter's words were full of reverence and humility, being not unlike the centurion's ſpeech ſo highly applauded by Jeſus himſelf,—I am unworthy that thou ſhouldeſt come under my roof. It is ſo well known, that it ſcarce needs obſerving, That the ancients thought it improper and unſafe, where it could be avoided, for good men to be in the ſame ſhip with perſons of an infamous character; nor would the heathens ſometimes permit the very images of their deities to be carried in the veſſel with ſuch, or even with thoſe concerning whom there was any ſtrong ſuſpicion. See Elſner, Doddridge, and the Reflections.

Ver. 10. Thou ſhalt catch men] Thou ſhalt captivate, or take alive. The exact meaning of the word ζωγρῶν. See 2 Tim. ii. 26. in the margin. To catch, implies ſomething more of artifice than the word carries with it, or the occaſion ſeems to require.

Ver. 11. Brought their ſhips to land] Their boats to ſhore. Wat.

Ver. 17. And the power of the Lord was preſent, &c.] Our Lord not only preached ſuch awakening ſermons as might have converted them to righteouſneſs, but he was ready to perform ſuch aſtoniſhing miracles, as ought to have removed all their ſcruples with reſpect to his miſſion. Some ſuppoſe, that the word them refers not to the doctors and Phariſees of the law, but, in general, to thoſe who had need of healing, and faith to be healed:—the crowds, mentioned Mark ii. 2. See on Matth. ix. 1.

Ver. 20. And when he ſaw their faith] That of the man, and of his friends,—though they themſelves ſpake nothing; the miſerable condition of the paralytic yet pleading with a voice far more eloquent than all language. St. Chryſoſtom, ſpeaking of this act of the bearers, ſays, "So ingenious a thing is affection, and ſo fruitful in invention is love!". And upon the paralytic's patience in bearing all theſe difficulties, and not waiting for ſome other opportunity, he obſerves, He ſaid nothing of all this either to himſelf or his bearers; but thought it became him to make ſuch a number of perſons as were preſent witneſſes of his cure. But his faith was not only viſible from hence, but likewiſe from the very words uſed by Chriſt on this occaſion; for which reaſon alſo Chriſt did not go out to him, but waited for the ſick man to come to him, that he might have an opportunity of demonſtrating the faith of the paralytic to all the company. For could not he have made the admiſſion of the paralytic to him an eaſy thing? But he did nothing of that nature, that he might exhibit to all the company the diligence and fervent faith of the paralytic and his friends. See Bp. Smallbrooke's Vindic. vol. ii. p. 106. and the Dicourſes on the Miracles, vol. i. p. 143.

glorified God, and were filled with fear, ſaying, We have ſeen ſtrange things to-day.

27 And after theſe things he went forth, and ſaw a publican named Levi, ſitting at the receipt of cuſtom: and he ſaid unto him, Follow me.

28 And he left all, roſe up, and followed him.

29 And Levi made him a great feaſt in his own houſe: and there was a great company of publicans, and of others that ſat down with him.

30 But their ſcribes and Phariſees murmured againſt his diſciples, ſaying, Why do ye eat and drink with publicans and ſinners?

31 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid unto them, They that are whole need not a phyſician; but they that are ſick.

32 I came not to call the righteous, but ſinners, to repentance.

33 And they ſaid unto him, Why do the diſciples of John faſt often, and make prayers, and likewiſe the diſciples of the Phariſees; but thine eat and drink?

34 And he ſaid unto them, Can ye make the children of the bride-chamber faſt, while the bridegroom is with them?

35 But the days will come, when the bridegroom ſhall be taken away from them, and then ſhall they faſt in thoſe days.

36 And he ſpake alſo a parable unto them; No man putteth a piece of a new garment upon an old; if otherwiſe, then both the new maketh a rent, and the piece that was taken out of the new, agreeth not with the old.

37 And no man putteth new wine into old bottles; elſe the new wine will burſt the bottles, and be ſpilled, and the bottles ſhall periſh.

38 But new wine muſt be put into new bottles; and both are preſerved.

39 No man alſo having drunk old wine, ſtraightway deſireth new: for he ſaith, The old is better.

ix. 8. And indeed, whether you examine the nature of this miracle, as being a perfect and inſtantaneous cure of an obſtinate univerſal palſy, under which a perſon advanced in years (ver. 25.) had laboured perhaps for a long time; a perfect cure produced by the pronouncing of a ſingle ſentence; or whether you conſider the number and quality of the witneſſes preſent, Phariſees and doctors of the law from every town of Galilee and Judea, and from Jeruſalem, together with a vaſt concourſe of people; or whether you attend to the effect which the miracle had upon the witneſſes;—the Phariſees and doctors of the law, not able to find fault with it in any reſpect, though they had come with a deſign to refute our Lord's pretenſions as a worker of miracles, were aſtoniſhed, and openly confeſſed that it was a ſtrange thing which they had ſeen;—the multitude glorified God, who had given ſuch power unto men;—the perſon upon whom the miracle was wrought, employed his tongue, the uſe of which he had recovered, in celebrating the praiſes of God:—In ſhort, view it in whatever light you pleaſe, you will find it a moſt illuſtrious miracle, highly worthy of your attention and admiration. See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 27. A publican named Levi] There were at this time in the Roman empire two ſorts of people, who might be called publicans, (τελωναι.) Firſt, ſuch as farmed the taxes of whole provinces. Theſe generally were Roman knights, men of very honourable characters, as we learn from the commendations which Cicero gives of them in his oration, Pro lege mamilia & pro Planco. It was this ſort of tax-gatherers who were properly termed publicans by the Romans; but it does not appear that they are ever mentioned in the Goſpels. Theſe did not levy the taxes in perſon; but they employed their freed-men and ſlaves in that office; and, to make out the number, gave them for aſſiſtants as many of the natives of the country as were neceſſary. This ſort of men were likewiſe called publicans, (τελωναι,) being as it were under-farmers of the taxes; but in Latin their proper name was portitores. Their employment was attended with great temptations; for the taxes being farmed for a ſum, in levying them from individuals they had it in their power to exact more than was due. Farther, in every country the raiſing of taxes for a foreign power being an odious buſineſs, not many of the natives would chooſe to be employed in it, except ſuch as were of the loweſt ſtation and character. In the execution therefore of this office, theſe men did not fail to puſh matters to the utmoſt, levying the taxes with rigour, and enriching themſelves with the ſpoils of the people. Hence this claſs of publicans in all countries became the objects of univerſal hatred. In Judea eſpecially they were particularly infamous, becauſe the paying of taxes to heathens was by many looked upon as little better than apoſtaſy from their religion. This circumſtance, together with the injuſtice which the publicans uſually committed in the execution of their office, occaſioned them to be always ranked with ſinners, and made thoſe who valued their own reputation ſhun their company. But though the publicans in general were bad men, there were among them ſome of a different character. Zaccheus we are ſure was a perſon of great probity, piety, and charity, even before his converſion; and Matthew (here called Levi) may have reſembled him; at leaſt in the Goſpels there are no hints to be found of any unjuſt practices committed by him in the execution of his office. It is generally thought, that the taxes he levied were thoſe impoſed upon commodities tranſported by the ſea of Galilee to and from Capernaum,

Ver. 39. No man alſo, having drank old wine] That is, "As people who have been accuſtomed to drink wine made mellow with age, do not willingly drink new wine, which for the moſt part is harſh and unpleaſant; ſo Chriſt's diſciples, having been accuſtomed for ſome time to live without practiſing any of the ſeverities for which the Phariſees were remarkable, could not reliſh that new way of life which they had been recommending; they were not yet ſo fully acquainted with and eſtabliſhed in his doctrine, as to ſubmit chearfully to any extraordinary hardſhips." This is Le Clerc's interpretation of the paſſage; but Wolfius and others apply it to the Phariſees, who were much better pleaſed with the traditions of the elders, than with the doctrines of Chriſt, becauſe the latter preſcribed duties more difficult and diſagreeable to the corrupt natures of men than the former. See on Joel i. 5. We may juſt remark how applicable theſe proverbial parables were to the time and occaſion. See ver. 29.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CALLING OF SIMON, &c.

As the ſun in his firſt riſing draws all eyes to him, ſo did the ſun of righteouſneſs, when he firſt ſhone forth in the world. His miraculous cures drew patients; his divine doctrines drew auditors; both together drew the admiring multitude by troops after him, ver. 1.

And why do we not ſtill follow thee, O Saviour, through deſarts and mountains, over land and ſeas, that we may be both healed and taught?—It was thy promiſe, O Saviour, that when thou wert lifted up, thou wouldeſt draw all men to thee: Behold, thou art lifted up ſince, both to the tree of ſhame, and to the throne of heavenly glory: O draw us, then, bleſſed Lord, and we will run after thee. Thy word is ſtill the ſame, though proclaimed by men; thy virtue is ſtill the ſame, though exerciſed upon the ſpirits of men; give us to hunger after both, that by both our ſouls may be ſatisfied.

The people, in the preſent inſtance, not only follow Chriſt, but preſs upon him: Even indecorum here finds both excuſe and acceptance. They did not keep their diſtances in awe of the Majeſty of the Speaker, while their ears were raviſhed with the power of the ſpeech; yet did not the Saviour check their unceremonious thronging, but rather he encourages their forwardneſs: We cannot offend thee, O God, with the importunity of our deſires; nay, thou art well pleaſed that the kingdom of heaven ſhould ſuffer violence: Ever art thou diſpleaſed with our ſlackneſs, our vehemency never can diſpleaſe.

The throng of his audience forced Chriſt to leave the ſhore, and make Peter's veſſel his pulpit. Never were there ſuch nets caſt out of that fiſher-boat before. Whilſt he was upon the land, he healed the ſick bodies by his touch; now that he was upon the ſea, he cured the ſick ſouls by his doctrine, and is purpoſely ſevered from the multitude, that he may unite them to him. He that made both ſea and land, cauſeth both ſea and land to conſpire to the opportunities of doing good.

Simon and his partners were buſy waſhing their nets, little thinking ſo ſoon to leave them, which now ſo carefully employed their attention;

CHAP. VI.

Chriſt reproveth the Phariſees' blindneſs about the obſervation of the ſabbath, by ſcripture, reaſon, and miracle: chooſeth twelve apoſtles: healeth the diſeaſed: preacheth to his diſciples before the people, pronouncing bleſſings and woes: how we muſt love our enemies; and join the obedience of good works to the hearing of the word, leſt in the evil day of temptation we fall, like an houſe built upon the face of the earth without any foundation.

AND it came to paſs on the ſecond ſabbath after the firſt, that he went through the corn-fields; and his diſciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat, rubbing them in their hands.

2 And certain of the Phariſees ſaid unto them, Why do ye that which is not lawful to do on the ſabbath-days?

And Jeſus anſwering them, ſaid, Have ye not read ſo much as this, what David did, when himſelf was an-hungered, and they which were with him;

4 How he went into the houſe of God, and did take and eat the ſhew-bread, and gave alſo to them that were with him; which is not lawful to eat, but for the prieſts alone?

Ver. 1. Matth. xii. 1. Mark ii. 23.—V. 3. 1 Sam. xxi. 6.—V. 4. Lev. xxiv. 9.

tention; When, behold, Chriſt interrupts them with the favour and bleſſing of his gracious preſence. Labour in our calling, how homely ſoever, renders us capable of divine benediction. The honeſt Simon, when he ſaw the people flock after Chriſt, and heard him ſpeak with ſuch power, could not but conceive a confuſed apprehenſion of ſome excellent worth in ſuch a teacher, and therefore is glad to honour his veſſel with ſuch a gueſt, and to be firſt Chriſt's hoſt by ſea, ere he is his diſciple by land: an humble and ſerviceable entertainment of a prophet, was the good foundation of his future honour.

No ſooner is this ſervice done to Chriſt, than he is preparing the bounteous reward. When the ſermon is ended, he ſaith unto Simon, ver. 4. Launch forth into the deep, &c. It had been as eaſy for our Saviour to have brought the fiſh to Peter's boat, cloſe to the ſhore: but in all his miracles we may obſerve, he ever loves to meet nature in her own boundaries; and when ſhe hath done her beſt, to ſupply the reſt by his over-ruling power.

Rather from a deſire to gratify and obey his gueſt, than to pleaſure himſelf, will Simon beſtow one caſt of his net: Had Chriſt enjoined him an harder taſk, he had not refuſed; yet not without a modeſt allegation of the unlikelihood of ſucceſs. Maſter, we have toiled all night, (ver. 5.) and caught nothing; yet at thy word I will let down the net. The night was the fitteſt time, humanly ſpeaking, for the hopes of their trade; ſo that not unjuſtly might Simon doubt his ſucceſs by day, when he had worn out the whole night in unprofitable labour: And thus it is that God ſometimes croſſeth the faireſt of our expectations, and giveth a bleſſing to thoſe times and means, whereof our prudence utterly deſpairs; thoſe pains cannot be caſt away, which we reſolve to employ for Chriſt.

O God, how many do we ſee daily caſting out their nets in the great lake of this world, which in the whole night of their lives, have caught nothing in recompence of their toil! They conceive miſchief, and they bring forth iniquity: They hatch cockatrice eggs, and weave the ſpider's web; he that eateth of their eggs dieth, and that which is trodden upon breaketh out into a ſerpent. Their webs ſhall form no garment, neither ſhall they cover themſelves with their labours.

Oh ye ſons of men! how long will ye love vanity, and follow after lies?—And yet, if we have thus vainly miſ-ſpent the time paſt, let us, at the command of Chriſt, caſt out, with theſe fiſhermen, our newly-waſhen nets, and our humble and patient obedience ſhall then come home richly laden with bleſſings: (ver. 6.) Never man threw out his net at the command of his Saviour, and drew it back empty. Who would not obey thee, O Chriſt, ſince thou ſo bountifully requiteſt our weak ſervices!

It was not mere retribution that was intended in this event, but inſtruction alſo. This act was not without a myſtery: They who were to be made fiſhers of men, were in this draught to foreſee their ſucceſs: The kingdom of heaven, we are aſſured, is like a draw-net, caſt into the ſea, which when it is full, men draw to land, &c. Matth. xiii. 47. Thus the very firſt draught which Peter made after the commencement of his apoſtleſhip, incloſed no leſs than three thouſand ſouls, Acts ii. 41. O powerful goſpel! that can fetch ſinful men from the depth of natural corruption! O happy ſouls, that from the blind and polluted cells of our wicked nature, are thus drawn forth into the glorious liberty of the ſons of God!

Simon's net breaks with the ſtore; accordingly they beckon their partners in the other veſſel for help, ver. 7. There cannot be a better improvement of ſociety, than to afford mutual aſſiſtance, than to relieve each other in all profitable labours, for drawing up the ſpiritual draught into the veſſel of Chriſt's church. Gracious Saviour, if theſe apoſtolical veſſels of thy firſt rigging were thus overladed, how do ours float and totter with an unballaſted lightneſs! O do Thou, who art no leſs preſent in theſe our veſſels, lade them with an equal freight of ſanctified ſentiments, or of converted ſouls, according to our ſtation, and thus ſhall we too have equal cauſe to praiſe thee for thy exuberant bounty.

Simon was a ſkilful fiſher, and well knew the depth of his trade; perceiving now therefore more than art, more than nature in this draught, He falls down at the knees of Jeſus, and acknowledges his unworthineſs, ver. 8. Himſelf is caught in this wonderous net. He doth not greedily fall upon the unexpected and profitable booty; but he turns his eyes from the draught to himſelf; from the act to the Author; and in the utmoſt aſtoniſhment proclaims his own vileneſs, and his Saviour's Majeſty. Depart from me, for I am a ſinful man, O Lord!

What pity had it been that the poor honeſt fiſherman ſhould have been taken at his word! O Simon, thy Saviour is come into thine own boat to call thee, to call others by thee unto bleſſedneſs:—And doſt thou ſay, Lord, depart from me?—as if the patient ſhould ſay, to the phyſician, "Depart from me, for I am ſick." But, it was the voice of aſtoniſhment, not of diſlike; the voice of humility, not of diſcontent: Yea, Peter, becauſe thou art a ſinful man, therefore hath thy Saviour need to come to thee, to ſtay with thee; and becauſe thou art humble in the acknowledgement of thy ſinfulneſs, therefore doth Chriſt delight to abide with thee, and will call thee to abide with him. No man ever fared the worſe for abaſing himſelf to his God; many a ſoul hath Chriſt left, for froward and unkind uſage, never any for its diſparagement of itſelf, and intreaties of humility.

O my ſoul, be not weary of complaining of thine own wretchedneſs; diſgrace thyſelf readily to him who knows thy vileneſs; be aſtoniſhed at thoſe mercies, which have ſhamed thine ill-deſervings. Thy Saviour hath no power to turn away from a proſtrate heart; He that terribly reſiſteth the proud, delighteth to revive the ſpirits of the lowly: Fear not, &c. ver. 10. Behold, Simon's humility is rewarded with an apoſtleſhip! He that bade Chriſt go from him, ſhall have the honour to go firſt on the happy errand of goſpel ſalvation.

This was indeed a trade of which Simon had no ſkill; yet it could not but be enough to him, that Chriſt had ſaid, Follow me,—I will make thee:—The miracle ſhewed him able to make good his word; for ſurely He that hath power to command the fiſhes to be taken, can eaſily enable the hands to take them when and how he pleaſes.

What then is this divine trade of ours, but a ſpiritual fiſhery? The world is a ſea; ſouls, like fiſhes, ſwim at liberty in this great deep: The nets of wholeſome doctrine draw ſome up to the ſhore of grace and glory. How much ſkill and care, how much toil and patience is requiſite for this art!—Who is ſufficient for theſe things? This ſea,—theſe nets,—the fiſhers,—the fiſh,—the veſſels,—all are thine, O God; do in us, and by us, what thou wilt: Give us ability and grace to follow thee, and to take men; give unto men the will and grace to be taken; and take thou the eternal glory of all that which thou haſt given.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. On the ſecond ſabbath, &c.] On the firſt ſabbath after the ſecond of the paſſover. Wat. Commentators are much at a loſs to underſtand what St. Luke means by the ſecond ſabbath after the firſt;—Σαββάτῳ δευτεροπρώτῳ. Some think the proper tranſlation of his words is, the firſt ſecond-day's ſabbath; underſtanding thereby, the ordinary ſabbath which happened in the paſſover week, and aſſigning the following reaſon of its name. The law enjoined, that on the ſecond day of the paſſover week, they ſhould offer the ſheaf of the firſt-fruits, Lev. xxiii. 10, 11. but in caſe of a backward ſeaſon, they placed an intercalary month between the laſt month Adar, and the firſt month Abib, anſwering to our March, and called it, the Adar, or the ſecond Adar. From the ſecond day of the paſſover week, on which the firſt ſheaf was offered with prayers for a bleſſing on the beginning harveſt, they counted ſeven weeks to Pentecoſt. See Lev. xxiii. 15, 16. Deut. xvi. 10. Exod. xxiii. 16. The day on which they offered the firſt barley ſheaf, and from which they counted the ſeven weeks of harveſt, to the feaſt of Pentecoſt, being the ſecond day of the paſſover week, it is ſuppoſed that the ordinary ſabbaths happening in theſe weeks, carried in their name a memorial of the term from whence they were computed. Thus the firſt of them was called Σαββάτον δευτεροπρώτον, the firſt ſecond-day's ſabbath; or, "the firſt ſabbath after the ſecond day of unleavened bread:" The ſecond was called Σαββάτον δευτεροδευτερον, the ſecond ſecond-day's ſabbath; and ſo on, till the ſeventh. There are beſides this a variety of other interpretations and opinions: that which we have advanced ſeems moſt agreeable to truth; but upon the whole it may be obſerved, that according to all the interpretations of the paſſage, this firſt ſecond-day's ſabbath happened near ſome paſſover.

Ver. 3. An hungred] Hungry. Wat. and MS.

5 And he ſaid unto them, That the Son of man is Lord alſo of the ſabbath.

6 And it came to paſs alſo on another ſabbath, that he entered into the ſynagogue and taught: and there was a man whoſe right hand was withered:

7 And the ſcribes and Phariſees watched him whether he would heal on the ſabbath-day; that they might find an accuſation againſt him.

8 But he knew their thoughts, and ſaid to the man which had the withered hand, Riſe up, and ſtand forth in the midſt. And he aroſe, and ſtood forth.

9 Then ſaid Jeſus unto them, I will aſk you one thing; Is it lawful on the ſabbath-days to do good, or to do evil? to ſave life, or to deſtroy it?

10 And looking round about upon them all, he ſaid unto the man, Stretch forth thy hand. And he did ſo: and his hand was reſtored whole as the other.

11 And they were filled with madneſs; and communed one with another what they might do to Jeſus.

12 And it came to paſs in thoſe days, that he went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God.

13 And when it was day, he called unto him his diſciples: and of them he choſe twelve, whom alſo he named apoſtles;

14 Simon (whom he alſo named Peter,) and Andrew his brother, James and John, Philip and Bartholomew,

15 Matthew and Thomas, James the ſon of Alpheus, and Simon called Zelotes, 16 And Judas the brother of James, and Judas Iſcariot, which alſo was the traitor.

17 And he came down with them, and ſtood in the plain; and the company of his diſciples, and a great multitude of people out of all Judea and Jeruſalem, and from the ſea-coaſt of Tyre and Sidon, which came to hear him, and to be healed of their diſeaſes;

18 And they that were vexed with unclean ſpirits: and they were healed.

19 And the whole multitude ſought to touch him: for there went virtue out of him, and healed them all.

20 And he lifted up his eyes on his diſciples, and ſaid, Bleſſed be ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God.

21 Bleſſed are ye that hunger now: for ye ſhall be filled. Bleſſed are ye that weep now: for ye ſhall laugh.

22 Bleſſed are ye when men ſhall hate you, and when they ſhall ſeparate you from their company, and ſhall reproach you, and caſt out your name as evil, for the Son of man's ſake.

23 Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy: for behold, your reward is great in heaven: for in the like manner did their fathers unto the prophets.

24 But woe unto you that are rich! for ye have received your conſolation.

25 Woe unto you that are full! for ye ſhall hunger. Woe unto you that laugh now! for ye ſhall mourn and weep.

Ver. 9. To ſave life, or to deſtroy it?] That our Lord might expoſe the malice and ſuperſtition of the Phariſees, he appealed to the dictates of their own minds, whether it was not more lawful to do good on the ſabbaths than to do evil; to ſave than to kill? He meant—"more lawful for him on the ſabbath to ſave mens lives, than for them to plot his death, without the leaſt provocation." This was a ſevere but juſt rebuke, which in the preſent circumſtances muſt have been ſenſibly felt.

Ver. 12. In prayer to God] 'Εν τῇ προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ, in a proſeucha, oratory, or prayer-houſe of God. Theſe proſeuchas, or houſes of prayer, were common in Judea: It is well known that they were open at the top, planted round with trees, and often ſituated by the ſide of ſeas or rivers. See Acts xvi. 13. Judg. xx. 26. and Calmet on the word proſeuche. Dr. Heylin is of opinion, that the phraſe is emphatical, to import an extraordinary and ſublime devotion:—In the prayer of God. So the high mountains, and tall cedars, in ſcripture are called the mountains of God, and the cedars of God. Jeſus was to appoint his diſciples the following day.

Ver. 17. And ſtood in the plain] Macknight is ſtrongly of opinion that this ſermon was not the ſame with that declared in the fifth and following chapters of St. Matthew. Amongſt other reaſons which he urges to ſhew the difference, he remarks, that the ſermon recorded by St. Matthew was delivered on a mountain, in a ſitting poſture; for he went up into a mountain, and ſat down to pronounce it, Matth. v. 1. and after he had finiſhed it, came down to the plain, Matth. viii. 1. whereas when he pronounced this which St. Luke ſpeaks of, he was in a plain or valley, where he could not ſit becauſe of the multitude which ſurrounded him, but ſtood with his diſciples. But though there were not an evident diſagreement in the facts preceding and following theſe two ſermons, the reader might eaſily have allowed that they were pronounced at different times, becauſe he will find other inſtances of things really different, notwithſtanding in their nature they be alike, and were preceded and followed by ſimilar events. For example, the two miraculous dinners were not only alike in their natures, but in their circumſtances alſo; for they were introduced by the ſame diſcourſes, and followed by like events; particularly at the concluſion of both, Jeſus paſſed over the ſea of Galilee; nevertheleſs, both being found in the ſame Evangeliſt, no reader can poſſibly think them the ſame. See the note on Matth. v. 1.

Ver. 24. Woe to you that are rich] We may obſerve another circumſtance in this diſcourſe, in which alſo it differs from that in St. Matthew, namely, that our Lord not only pronounced bleſſings, but likewiſe maledictions in it. As poverty, which is neither good nor bad in itſelf, does not recommend us to God, unleſs it is accompanied with the virtues which are ſuitable to an afflicted ſtate; ſo riches do not make us the object of God's hatred, unleſs they be accompanied with thoſe vices which frequently ſpring from an opulent fortune; namely, pride, luxury, love of pleaſure, covetouſneſs. Rich men, infected with ſuch vices as theſe, are the objects of the woe here denounced, and not they who make a proper uſe of their wealth, and poſſeſs the virtues which ſhould accompany affluence. Wherefore, though there is no reſtriction added to the word rich in the malediction, as there is to the word poor in the complete denunciation of the beatitude, Matth. v. 3. yet it is equally to be underſtood: "Woe unto you that are rich in ſpirit; you who are proud, covetous, lovers of pleaſure; for ye have received your conſolation." The parable of the rich man and Lazarus may be conſidered as an illuſtration both of the beatitude and the malediction. The reader will find, by referring to the parallel paſſages in Matth. v. &c. and the notes, the dubious expreſſions in this diſcourſe fully elucidated. See Macknight and Blair.

Ver. 25. Woe unto you that laugh now] Our Lord's malediction is not inconſiſtent with the Apoſtle's precepts which command Chriſtians always to rejoice; neither is the mirth, againſt which the woe is here denounced, to be underſtood of that conſtant chearfulneſs of temper

26 Woe unto you when all men ſhall ſpeak well of you! for ſo did their fathers to the falſe prophets.

27 But I ſay unto you which hear, Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you,

28 Bleſs them that curſe you, and pray for them which deſpitefully uſe you.

29 And unto him that ſmiteth thee on the one cheek, offer alſo the other; and him that taketh away thy cloke, forbid not to take thy coat alſo.

30 Give to every man that aſketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods, aſk them not again.

31 And as ye would that men ſhould do to you, do ye alſo to them likewiſe.

32 For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for ſinners alſo love thoſe that love them.

33 And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for ſinners alſo do even the ſame.

34 And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for ſinners alſo lend to ſinners, to receive as much again.

35 But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward ſhall be great, and ye ſhall be the children of the Higheſt: for he is kind unto the unthankful, and to the evil.

36 Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father alſo is merciful.

37 Judge not, and ye ſhall not be judged: condemn not, and ye ſhall not be condemned: forgive, and ye ſhall be forgiven:

38 Give, and it ſhall be given unto you; good meaſure, preſſed down, and ſhaken together, and running over, ſhall men give into your boſom. For with the ſame meaſure that ye mete withal, it ſhall be meaſured to you again.

39 And he ſpake a parable unto them, Can the blind lead the blind? ſhall they not both fall into the ditch?

40 The diſciple is not above his maſter: but every one that is perfect ſhall be as his maſter.

41 And why beholdeſt thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but perceiveſt not the beam that is in thine own eye?

42 Either how canſt thou ſay to thy brother, Brother, let me pull out the mote that is in thine eye, when thou thyſelf beholdeſt not the beam that is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, caſt out firſt the beam out of thine own eye, and then ſhalt thou ſee clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye.

43 For a good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

44 For every tree is known by his own fruit: for of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble-buſh gather they grapes.

which ariſes to the true Chriſtian from the comfortable and chearful doctrines with which they are enlightened by the Goſpel,—the aſſurance they have of reconciliation with God, the hope they have of everlaſting life, and the pleaſure they enjoy in the practice of piety, and the other duties of religion: But it is to be underſtood of that turbulent carnal mirth, that exceſſive levity and vanity of ſpirit, which ariſes not from any ſolid foundation, but from immoderate ſenſual pleaſure, or thoſe vain amuſements of life, by which the giddy and the gay contrive to ſpend their time;—that ſort of mirth which diſſipates thought, leaves no time for conſideration, and gives them an utter averſion to all ſerious reflection. Perſons who continue to indulge themſelves in this ſort of mirth through life, ſhall weep and mourn eternally, when they are excluded from the joys of heaven, and baniſhed for ever from the preſence of God. See Blair's ſermons.

Ver. 26. Woe unto you, when all men ſhall ſpeak well of you] "Woe unto you, if by propagating ſuch doctrines, and encouraging men in ſin, you ſhall gain to yourſelves the applauſe and flattery of the generality of men; for thus in old times did the falſe prophets and deceivers, who, accommodating their doctrines to the luſts and paſſions of men, were more careſſed and better harkened to, than the true prophets of God." See Dr. Clarke, and on Matth. v. 12.

Ver. 30. Give to every man that aſketh of thee] As the word aſk not again, is uſed by the LXX to expreſs a claim of intereſt due upon money and goods, ſome interpreters have choſen to render the words lend to every man that aſketh of thee, and from him that receiveth thy goods, exact not intereſt. But ἀπαίτειν cannot well ſignify the exaction of intereſt, becauſe the word αἴρειν, to which it relates, never ſignifies to borrow; and therefore it is more natural to interpret ἀπαίτειν, of the exaction of ſuch debts only, as the law appointed to be remitted every ſeventh year, Deut. xv. 2, 8. Accordingly it is added, ver. 34. If you lend to thoſe from whom you hope to receive, what thanks have you? For ſinners alſo lend to ſinners, to receive as much again. "Ye do not, by your obedience to the law, diſtinguiſh yourſelves from the heathens, who exact the payment of the leaſt ſums which they lend one to another." Or we may ſuppoſe, that one's reclaiming the goods that have been taken from him without his conſent, is here prohibited; a ſenſe of the paſſage agreeable to the force of the word αἴροντος, which commonly ſignifies, "to take a thing away violently, or by fraud." In the mean time, whatever ſenſe we put on our Lord's precept, it muſt be underſtood with the limitations which common ſenſe directs us to make; namely, that we give and lend freely to all who aſk, or permit them to retain what they have unjuſtly taken; provided only that it be a thing of ſmall account, which we can eaſily ſpare, and the perſons who aſk or take ſuch things be in real neceſſity, and the reclaiming of them would occaſion more trouble than they are worth; which without doubt was the meaning of the Moſaical precepts alluded to by our Lord in this part of his ſermon.

Ver. 35. Hoping for nothing again] Diſtruſting nothing. Wat. "Shew theſe acts of kindneſs to your brethren, not at all deſpairing either of your preſent ſuſtenance, or of your future reward." See Beza.

Ver. 38. Good meaſure, &c.] Our Lord makes uſe of three phraſes to expreſs all the different kinds of good meaſure, according to the different natures of the things meaſured. Some of them, to make the meaſure good, muſt be preſſed and trodden; ſome of them muſt be ſhaken, as the ſeveral kinds of grain; and ſome of them muſt be running over, as all ſorts of liquors. The figure of giving this good meaſure into one's boſom, is an alluſion to the eaſtern habits, which were long pieces of cloth wrapped round their bodies, and girded up with a girdle. Their garments being of this kind, they could receive into their lap or boſom a conſiderable quantity of ſuch dry goods as they ſold by meaſure. See Ruth iii. 15. 2 Kings iv. 39. Nehem. v. 13. Prov. xvi. 33.

Ver. 40. Every one that is perfect ſhall be, &c.] Κατηρτισμένος, perfected, finiſhed; the meaning is, "The ſcholar is in a fair way to be tinctured with the opinions of his maſter: If therefore the maſter is ignorant and illiterate, the ſcholar will probably be ſo likewiſe; for which reaſon, thoſe who pretend to inſtruct others, ought to be well informed themſelves in the doctrine they are to deliver."

good; and an evil man out of the evil treaſure of his heart, bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of the heart his mouth ſpeaketh.

46 And why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I ſay?

47 Whoſoever cometh to me, and heareth my ſayings, and doeth them, I will ſhew you to whom he is like:

48 He is like a man which built an houſe, and digged deep, and laid the foundation on a rock: and when the flood aroſe, the ſtream beat vehemently upon that houſe, and could not ſhake it: for it was founded upon a rock.

49 But he that heareth, and doeth not, is like a man that without a foundation built an houſe upon the earth, againſt which the ſtream did beat vehemently, and immediately it fell, and the ruin of that houſe was great.

CHAP. VII.

Chriſt findeth a greater faith in the centurion, a Gentile, than in any of the Jews; healeth his ſervant being abſent; raiſeth from death the widow's ſon at Nain; anſwereth John's meſſengers with the declaration of his miracles; teſtifieth to the people what opinion he held of John; inveigheth againſt the Jews, who would neither be won with the manners of John nor of Jeſus; and ſheweth, by occaſion of Mary Magdalene, how he is a friend to ſinners; not to maintain them in ſins, but to forgive them their ſins, upon their faith and repentance.

NOW when he had ended all his ſayings in the audience of the people, he entered into Capernaum:

2 And a certain centurion's ſervant, who was dear unto him, was ſick, and ready to die.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VI.

What actions are ſo fair and lovely, that malice cannot turn them into reproach?—What characters are ſo unblemiſhed, what ſo exemplary, that uncharitableneſs cannot revile and condemn them?—While the eyes of diſtreſſed multitudes are turned to Chriſt, as their only phyſician, and moſt valuable friend, the eyes of the Phariſees are continually upon him for evil, (ver. 7.) and they beheld his wonderous miracles, not for their own conviction, but that they may, if poſſible, turn them into the means of his deſtruction. So ineffectual are the moſt obvious and demonſtrative arguments, till divine grace conquers mens natural averſion to a Redeemer's kingdom, and captivates their hearts to the obedience of the faith.

The malice of the Phariſees, however, did not reſtrain the benevolence of our compaſſionate Saviour, nor deprive the poor penitent of his cure (ver. 10). This ought to be the pattern of our conduct. We muſt not be overcome of evil, nor ſuffer the moſt unjuſt cenſure, or the moſt malicious oppoſition to break our ſpirits ſo, as to to prevent us from doing our duty. If others are mad with perſecuting rage, (ver. 11.) let us pity them, improving all their fury againſt the cauſe of God, as a motive to excite our moſt zealous and courageous endeavours for its ſervice.

We may aſſure ourſelves, that the Apoſtles, the future miniſters of our Lord, had no inconſiderable ſhare in thoſe petitions, in which, with unabating fervour and intenſeneſs of devotion, he ſpent this memorable night, ver. 12.—And if we have any regard for the ſupport of religion in the riſing age, we likewiſe ſhould pray earneſtly both for them who are already in the miniſtry, and for ſuch as are preparing for it. This ſurely ought to be the frequent care not only of thoſe who have the tremendous charge of educating ſuch as are ere long to be entruſted with the honour of the Goſpel, and the care of ſouls, but of thoſe who are now ſtruggling with the glorious labours and trials of that important office; and even of all thoſe private Chriſtians who cordially love the intereſt of their Maſter, and wiſh the ſalvation of their fellow-creatures.

Our Lord here again pronounces (ver. 20—26.) the poor and the hungry, the mournful and the perſecuted to be happy; and repreſents thoſe as miſerable who are rich and full, joyous and applauded: not that this is univerſally the caſe, but becauſe proſperous circumſtances are ſo frequently a ſweet poiſon, and affliction a healing though bitter medicine. The thought will reconcile us to adverſity, and awaken our caution when the world ſmiles upon us; when a plentiful table is ſpread before us, and our cup runneth over; when our ſpirits are gay and ſprightly, or when we hear, what to corrupted nature is too harmonious muſick,—that of our own praiſe from men. Oh that we may ſecure what is of infinitely greater importance, the praiſe of our heavenly Maſter, by a conſtant obediential regard to theſe his precepts! May we be happy proficients in the art of bearing and forgiving injuries; may we be ready to every good word and work, maintaining an eye quick to obſerve, a heart tender to feel, a hand open to relieve the calamities and neceſſities of friends, of ſtrangers, and of enemies; giving to ſome, and where there may be but little proſpect of return; lending to others; which, if it engage them to greater induſtry, is as real a benefit as if the loan were a gift; ver. 27—34.

But let us not preſume to call God our Father, ver. 35, 36. if we do not labour to reſemble him, nor dare to challenge the peculiar honour and privilege of Chriſt's diſciples; if we do not diſtinguiſh ourſelves from others by the charity of our tempers, and the uſefulneſs of our lives, as well as by the articles of our faith, and the forms of our worſhip. Let a frequent reflection on our own faults teach us candour, while the ſenſe of our continued dependance on the divine liberality makes us liberal towards thoſe who need our aſſiſtance, leſt we loſe the comforts ſo juſtly forfeited, and abuſed mercies be another day repaid with meaſures of wrath preſſed down, ſhaken together, and running over! (ver. 37, 38.) Abuſed mercies—for ſure no goodneſs can be greater than the permiſſion which our Lord gives us to carve for ourſelves: With what meaſure ye met, it ſhall be meaſured unto you. We ourſelves are, as it were, to tell God how much mercy he ſhall ſhew us;—and can we be content with leſs than the very largeſt meaſure? Who then would not give to man, what he wiſhes and deſigns to receive of God?

On a future day, we are to give an account of ourſelves before God, and therefore ſhould judge for ourſelves in matters of religion, and be very careful that we do not ſtupidly follow blind guides, till we fall with them into deſtruction; ver. 39.—"Lead us therefore, O Lord, in the way everlaſting; form us to a more perfect reſemblance of our great Maſter; make us ſevere to ourſelves, and, ſo far as it is real charity, indulgent to others. Sanctify our hearts by thy grace, that they may be as trees bringing forth good fruits, or as fountains pouring out wholeſome ſtreams: There may a good treaſure be laid up, from whence good things may be abundantly produced; there may thoſe holy and benevolent affections continually ſpring up, which may flow forth with undiſſembled freedom, to refreſh the ſouls, and animate the graces of all who are around us!" ver. 40, 45.

And may theſe beautiful, ſtriking, and repeated admonitions which our Saviour gives us of the vanity of every profeſſion which does not influence the practice, (ver. 46—49.) be attended to with reverence and fear: We are building for eternity. May we never grudge the time and labour of a moſt ſerious inquiry into the great and fundamental principles of religion: May we diſcover the ſure foundation, and raiſe upon it a noble ſuperſtructure, which ſhall ſtand fair and glorious, when hypocrites are ſwept away into everlaſting ruin, on that aweful day, in which heaven and earth ſhall flee away from the face of Him that ſitteth on the throne. Rev. xx. 11.

Chap. VII. Ver. 2. A certain centurion's ſervant] In the notes on St. Matthew we have ſpoken largely concerning this miracle, and have given, on ver. 23. of the eighth chapter, the arguments of thoſe who think that the hiſtorians relate different tranſactions; at the ſame time harmonizing the accounts, and endeavouring to ſhew, according to our own private opinion, that they are one and the ſame. See on Matth. viii. 5. In confirmation of this opinion, the following paſſage from Dr. Heylin is ſubjoined: "The narrative which St. Luke gives of the centurion's behaviour is larger and more diſtinct than that given in St. Matthew, and therefore we will put them both together, only premiſing that as it is not unuſual in all languages, ſo in the Hebrew particularly it is very uſual, to aſcribe to the perſon himſelf what has been ſpoken or done by his order. (See ch. xi. 2, 3.) And accordingly St. Matthew relates, as ſaid by the centurion himſelf, what was really ſpoken by thoſe whom he had deputed to addreſs our Lord on his behalf; which ſufficiently accounts for the ſeeming difference that is found in the Evangeliſts. The centurion was a pagan, who, attending to the light of nature with a ſolid piety, had attained to the knowledge of THE ONE GOD, and finding that fundamental truth ſo well eſtabliſhed in the Jewiſh religion, had upon that account conceived a great affection to the Jewiſh nation, and done them all the good offices which lay in his power. His advancement in natural religion made him ripe for the revealed; and his knowledge of God led him by a juſt tranſition to the knowledge of Chriſt, for whom he had ſo aweful a veneration, that when he was to apply to him for the cure of his ſervant, he had recourſe to

3 And when he heard of Jeſus, he ſent unto him the elders of the Jews, beſeeching him that he would come and heal his ſervant.

4 And when they came to Jeſus, they beſought him inſtantly, ſaying, That he was worthy for whom he ſhould do this:

5 For he loveth our nation, and he hath built us a ſynagogue.

6 Then Jeſus went with them. And when he was now not far from the houſe, the centurion ſent friends to him, ſaying unto him, Lord, trouble not thyſelf: for I am not worthy that thou ſhouldeſt enter under my roof;

7 Whereſore neither thought I myſelf worthy to come unto thee: but ſay in a word, and my ſervant ſhall be healed.

8 For I alſo am a man ſet under authority, having under me ſoldiers, and I ſay unto one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my ſervant, Do this, and he doeth it.

9 When Jeſus heard theſe things, he marvelled at him, and turned him about, and ſaid unto the people that followed him, I ſay unto you, I have not found ſo great faith, no, not in Iſrael.

10 And they that were ſent, returning to the houſe, found the ſervant whole that had been ſick.

11 And it came to paſs the day after, that he went into a city called Nain; and many of his diſciples went with him, and much people.

12 Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only ſon of his mother, and ſhe was a widow: and much people of the city was with her.

13 And when the Lord ſaw her, he had compaſſion on her, and ſaid unto her, Weep not.

14 And he came and touched the bier: and they that bare him ſtood ſtill. And he ſaid, Young man, I ſay unto thee, Ariſe.

15 And he that was dead, ſat up, and began to ſpeak. And he delivered him to his mother.

16 And there came a fear on all: and they glorified God, ſaying, That a great prophet is riſen up among us; and, That God hath viſited his people.

the interceſſion of the elders of the Jewiſh church, who, at his requeſt, came to Jeſus, to intreat him that he would come and cure the ſick ſervant, in conſideration of his maſter who had ſent them, and to whom they acknowledged great obligations. (ver. 4.) Jeſus went along with them, as they deſired; but while he was yet on the way, and not far from the houſe, the centurion who had refrained from addreſſing Jeſus in perſon, out of an humble ſenſe of his own unworthineſs; (and perhaps too from having obſerved how the more religious among the Jews, made a ſcruple of converſing with the heathen, ſuch as himſelf ſtill was, to outward appearance;) when he heard that Chriſt was actually coming to his houſe, reflected with himſelf, upon more enlarged views of faith, that the intended viſit was a needleſs condeſcenſion in our Lord, and therefore ſent ſome of his friends to prevent it by the following meſſage in his name, ver. 6, &c. "Lord, do not give yourſelf farther trouble, for I am not a fit perſon that you ſhould come under my roof; and that indeed was the reaſon why I judged myſelf unworthy to come to you myſelf. Do you but ſpeak the word only, and my ſervant will be cured. For although I am under the authority of others, yet, as I have ſoldiers under me, I ſay to one, Go, and he goeth; to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my ſervant, Do this, and he does it." As if he ſhould have ſaid, "I am but a ſubaltern, and have only a delegated and ſubordinate power; yet what I bid be done, is immediately executed: You then, who are Lord of nature, what cannot you do by your bare command?"—"When Jeſus heard this, he wondered, (ver. 9.) and turning about, he ſaid to the people that followed him, I profeſs that I have not found ſo great a faith even among the Jews themſelves." See Heylin, and on Matth. viii. 10.

Ver. 7. Say in a word] Say the word. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 11. Called Nain] Nain was ſituated a mile or two ſouth of Tabor, and near Endor. The Apoſtles moſt probably were of the number of the diſciples who went with our Lord; becauſe it is not to be imagined, that he would ſuffer the choſen witneſſes of his miracles to be abſent, when ſo great a miracle was to be performed as the reſurrection of a perſon from the dead, and to be performed ſo publickly, in the preſence of all thoſe who were attending the funeral. See Reland's Paleſtine, and Lightfoot. The circumſtance here recorded probably happened towards the evening.

Ver. 12. There was a dead man carried out] It was cuſtomary for the Jews to bury out of the city, as appears from Matth. xxvii. 60. This cuſtom was obſerved likewiſe by other nations. The Jews might have introduced it to prevent their being polluted by touching the biers or dead bodies of their countrymen; but both they and the heathens might have had a further reaſon for this inſtitution, namely, the preſervation of their health; it being notorious that the effluvia which proceed from dead bodies are very pernicious, and often cauſe peſtilential diſorders. Hence it hath been matter of wonder why modern Chriſtians ſhould not only have their burial-grounds contiguous to their churches, but even bury in their churches; a cuſtom moſt certainly prejudicial to health, and introduced, as is moſt likely, by ſuperſtition and pride. But ſee this ſubject completely handled in a judicious pamphlet, intitled, "Seaſonable Conſiderations on the indecent and dangerous Cuſtom of burying in Churches and Church-yards." Some particular circumſtances of diſtreſs are mentioned in the caſe before us: The young man to be buried, was the only ſon of his mother, and ſhe was a widow, and conſequently had no proſpect of more children: Hence the ſympathy which ſhe received from her relations and acquaintance was ſingular. In teſtimony of their concern for her, a crowd of people much greater than was uſual on ſuch occaſions attended her, while ſhe performed the laſt duty to her beloved ſon. This circumſtance the Evangeliſt takes notice of to ſhew, that though there had been no perſons preſent at the miracle but thoſe who attended the funeral, it was illuſtrious, on account of the number of the witneſſes.

Ver. 13—15. When the Lord ſaw her, &c.] Jeſus, whoſe tenderneſs made him ſuſceptible of the ſtrongeſt impreſſions from occurrences of this kind, knowing that the mother's affliction was bitter, and the occaſion of it real, was greatly moved with compaſſion at the ſorrowful ſcene. Nor was his ſympathy vain: He reſolved to turn their mourning into joy, by raiſing the young man from the dead; and he could do this with a good grace, becauſe, having met the funeral by accident on the way, it plainly appeared that there was no colluſion in the caſe. Beſides, the multitude of the people attending the corpſe intirely prevented all ſuſpicion that the perſon carried out was not dead; ſince to manage with ſucceſs a fraud, in which ſo many muſt have been concerned, was abſolutely impoſſible. The miracle therefore being liable to no objection, Jeſus came nigh, laid hold on the bier, and uttered the commanding voice, Young man, I ſay unto thee, ariſe! Immediately, at his authoritative call, the youth revived, having received life from Jeſus, who, inſtead of ſhewing him around to the multitude, by a ſingular exerciſe of modeſty and humanity preſented him to his mother; ver. 15. to intimate, that in compaſſion to her affliction he had wrought the life-giving miracle. At the ſame time, as it was performed near the city-gate, which anciently was the place of public reſort, the youth muſt have been raiſed from the dead in the preſence of many witneſſes; particularly the multitude which came with Jeſus, the people who accompanied the corpſe, and all who happened at that inſtant to be in the gate upon buſineſs: Wherefore, being ſo publickly performed, this great miracle became a noble confirmation of our Lord's miſſion. "The ancients, ſays Grotius, obſerve, that in three of the miracles performed by Jeſus after his ſermon on the mount, the three kinds of God's benefits are repreſented us: Firſt, of thoſe which are conferred upon our ſuing to God for them ourſelves, as in the caſe of the leper. Secondly, of thoſe which are obtained for us by the prayers of others, as in the caſe of the centurion's ſervant. And the third, of thoſe which God beſtows out of his own free mercy, as in the preſent caſe. To which kind of mercy the Apoſtles very juſtly refer the calling of the Gentiles. See Lardner's Credibility, and the 5th diſcourſe, vol. i. on the Miracles.

Ver. 16. Saying,—that God has viſited his people] This is the expreſſion which Zacharias the father of the Baptiſt uſed, when he ſpoke of the coming of the Meſſiah, ch. i. 68. Wherefore the meaning of the inhabitants of Nain was this, God hath viſited the people, by having

raiſed

17 And this rumour of him went forth throughout all Judea, and throughout all the region round about.

18 And the diſciples of John ſhewed him of all theſe things.

19 And John calling unto him two of his diſciples, ſent them unto Jeſus, ſaying, Art thou he that ſhould come? or look we for another?

20 When the men were come unto him, they ſaid, John Baptiſt hath ſent us unto thee, ſaying, Art thou he that ſhould come? or look we for another?

21 And in that ſame hour he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil ſpirits; and unto many that were blind he gave ſight.

22 Then Jeſus anſwering, ſaid unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things ye have ſeen and heard; how that the blind ſee, the lame walk, the lepers are cleanſed, the deaf hear, the dead are raiſed, to the poor the goſpel is preached.

23 And bleſſed is he whoſoever ſhall not be offended in me.

24 And when the meſſengers of John were departed, he began to ſpeak unto the people concerning John, What went ye out into the wilderneſs for to ſee? A reed ſhaken with the wind?

25 But what went ye out for to ſee? A man clothed in ſoft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeouſly apparelled, and live delicately, are in king's courts.

26 But what went ye out for to ſee? A prophet? Yea, I ſay unto you, and much more than a prophet.

27 This is he of whom it is written, Behold, I ſend my meſſenger before thy face, which ſhall prepare thy way before thee.

28 For I ſay unto you, Among thoſe that are born of women, there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptiſt: but he that is leaſt in the kingdom of God, is greater than he.

29 And all the people that heard him, and the publicans, juſtified God, being baptized with the baptiſm of John;

30 But the Phariſees and lawyers rejected the counſel of God againſt themſelves, being not baptized of him.

31 And the Lord ſaid, Whereunto then ſhall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like?

32 They are like unto children ſitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and ſaying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept.

33 For John the Baptiſt came neither eating bread, nor drinking wine; and ye ſay, He hath a devil.

34 The ſon of man is come eating and drinking; and ye ſay, Behold, a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and ſinners.

35 But wiſdom is juſtified of all her children.

36 And one of the Phariſees deſired him that he would eat with him. And he went into the Phariſee's houſe, and ſat down to meat.

37 And behold, a woman in the city, which was a ſinner, when ſhe knew that Jeſus ſat at meat in the Phariſee's houſe, brought an alabaſter-box of ointment, 38 And ſtood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to waſh his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kiſſed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment.

raiſed up among them the great prophet, promiſed to Moſes in the law. The Evangeliſt juſtly obſerves, that by acknowledging Jeſus as the Meſſiah, they glorified God.

Ver. 21. He gave ſight] The original is emphatical, and ſeems to expreſs both in how general, how compaſſionate, and kind a manner our Lord performed theſe miracles: 'Εχαρίσατο τὸ βλέπειν, he graciouſly beſtowed ſight.

Ver. 29. And all the people, &c.] See the note on Matth. xi. 12.

Ver. 30. Rejected the counſel of God againſt themſelves] Rejected the divine offers made to them,—or, deſpiſed within themſelves the purpoſe of God. Wat.

Ver. 35. But wiſdom, &c.] And the doctrine is diſgraced by all her children. Wat. But concerning this verſion, ſee the note on Matth. xi. 19.

Ver. 37. Which was a ſinner—box of ointment] Who had been a ſinner—box of perfume. Wat. and MS. It is generally ſuppoſed, that the woman who anointed our Lord in Simon's houſe, was ſhe who in the Goſpel is called Mary Magdalene, for no other reaſon than becauſe St. Luke, in the beginning of the following chapter, mentions her as one of our Lord's attendants, and one out of whom he had caſt ſeven devils. Some indeed attempt to prove it out of the Talmud, which mentions a lewd woman called Mary Megadella, or the plaiter, viz. of hair, an epithet probably given to all proſtitutes in thoſe times, on account of their nicety in dreſs; But this has no relation to the name Magdalene. In truth Mary Magdalene ſeems rather to have been a woman of high ſtation, and opulent fortune, being mentioned by St. Luke, (ch. viii. 2.) even before Joanna, though the wife of ſo great a man as Herod's ſteward. Beſides, the other Evangeliſts, when they have occaſion to ſpeak of our Lord's female friends, commonly aſſign the firſt place to Mary Magdalene, who was probably ſo called from Magdala, the place of her birth, a town ſituated near the lake of Tiberias, and mentioned Matth. xv. 39. The character given of this woman, that ſhe had been a ſinner, renders it probable that he had formerly been a Harlot; for the word ἁμαρτωλὸς is frequently uſed in this ſenſe: but her action on this occaſion proves, that ſhe was now awakened to a juſt ſight of her folly. The city in which ſhe is ſaid to have lived means Capernaum, the place of our Lord's ordinary reſidence, which is often deſcribed in that general way. Probably ſhe was acquainted at the Phariſee's, houſe, for ſhe gained eaſy acceſs even into the room where the company was ſitting. It may be neceſſary juſt to remark, that this is a very different ſtory from that of Mary's anointing Chriſt's head a little before his death. See Matth. xxvi. 6, &c. the parallel places, Macknight and Whitby.

Ver. 38. Began to waſh his feet with tears] To water his feet with a ſhower of tears. Doddridge; who obſerves that this is the proper ſignification of the word βρέχειν. See Matth. v. 45. We are not to imagine that this woman came on purpoſe thus to waſh and wipe the feet of Chriſt; but probably, hearing that the Phariſee who invited Jeſus to dinner had neglected the civility uſually paid in the eaſtern countries to ſuch gueſts as they deſigned particularly to honour,—that of anointing the head with fragrant oils, or rich perfumes, ſhe was willing to 39 Now when the Phariſee which had bidden him, ſaw it, he ſpake within himſelf, ſaying, This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who, and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him: for ſhe is a ſinner.

40 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid unto him, Simon, I have ſomewhat to ſay unto thee. And he ſaith, Maſter, ſay on.

41 There was a certain creditor, which had two debtors: the one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty.

42 And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both. Tell me therefore, which of them will love him moſt?

43 Simon anſwered and ſaid, I ſuppoſe that he to whom he forgave moſt. And he ſaid unto him, Thou haſt rightly judged.

44 And he turned to the woman, and ſaid unto Simon, Seeſt thou this woman? I entered into thine houſe, thou gaveſt me no water for my feet: but ſhe hath waſhed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head.

45 Thou gaveſt me no kiſs: but this woman, ſince the time I came in, hath not ceaſed to kiſs my feet.

46 My head with oil thou didſt not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment.

47 Wherefore I ſay unto thee, Her ſins, which are many, are forgiven; for ſhe loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the ſame loveth little.

Ver. 39. Ch. xv. 2.—V. 41. See Matth. xviii. 28.—V. 46. Pſ. xxiii. 5.—V. 47. 1 Tim. i. 14.

ſupply the defect; and as ſhe ſtood near Jeſus, was ſo melted with his diſcourſe, that ſhe ſhed ſuch a flood of tears, as wetted his feet which lay bare on the couch, his ſandals being put off; and obſerving this, ſhe wiped them with the treſſes of her hair, which ſhe now wore flowing looſe about her ſhoulders, as mourners commonly did; and then, not thinking herſelf worthy to anoint his head, poured forth the liquid perfume upon his feet. Neither Jews nor Romans wore ſtockings; and as for their ſhoes, or ſandals, they always put them off when they lay down on their couches to take meat. Theſe cuſtoms are alluded to in the law of the paſſover, which orders the Jews to depart from their ordinary way, and to eat the paſſover ſtanding, with their loins girded, their ſhoes on their feet, and their ſtaff in their hand. See on Exod. xii. 11. The word θριξὶ properly ſignifies treſſes, as we have rendered it. It is well known that long hair was eſteemed a great ornament in the female dreſs: women of looſe character uſed to nouriſh and plait it, and to ſet it off with garlands and Jewels. See 1 Cor. xi. 15. Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 39, 40. Now when the Phariſee—ſaw it, &c.] Simon perceiving what was done, immediately concluded that Jeſus could not be a prophet; ſince in that caſe, inſtead of allowing her even to touch him, he would certainly expel her from his preſence forthwith, as the tradition of the elders directs: for it was a maxim amongſt the Phariſees, that the very touch of the wicked cauſed pollution. But though Simon did not declare his ſentiments, they were not hidden from Chriſt; who, to ſhew him that he was a prophet, and that he knew not only the characters of men, but the inward and inviſible ſtate of their minds, converſed with him immediately upon the ſubject of his thoughts. The ſcope indeed of what he ſaid was to convince Simon how abſurdly he reaſoned. Nevertheleſs Jeſus did not expoſe him before the company, by making what he ſaid within himſelf public; but with great delicacy pointed out the unreaſonableneſs of his thoughts to Simon alone, without letting the gueſts at table know any thing of the matter. Inſtead of Maſter, ſome render the word Διδάσκαλε (and, as it ſeems, more properly) O Teacher; for Διδασκαλε certainly expreſſes more than the Engliſh word Maſter, eſpecially in the ſenſe wherein we now uſe it.

Ver. 41. Five hundred pence] Δηνάρια, a Roman coin, in value about ſeven pence half-penny of our money; ſo that five hundred were nearly equivalent to fifteen of our guineas, and fifty to one guinea and a half. There is no reaſon to believe that any myſtery was intended by Chriſt in fixing on theſe ſums rather than any others, which had as great a difference between them. See Doddridge and Chemnitz.

Ver. 42. Which of them will love him moſt?] Neither of them will love him at all, before he has forgiven them. An inſolvent debtor, till he is forgiven, does not love, but fly his creditor. See the note on ver. 47.

Ver. 44. Seeſt thou this woman?—]The kindneſs which this woman ſhewed to Jeſus was very extraordinary; therefore, as he had all the ſofter and finer paſſions of human nature in their perfection, he was greatly moved with the conſciouſneſs ſhe had of her guilt, the ſincerity of her repentance, the profoundneſs of her humility, and the tenderneſs of her love, and in a very obliging manner expreſſed the ſenſe he had of it: for, in the hearing of all the gueſts, he recounted particularly, and with approbation, the ſeveral actions by which ſhe had teſtified her reſpect; and becauſe by accident ſhe had wetted his feet with her tears, he gave it an agreeable turn, well knowing from what ſpring her tears had flowed. That the company might know it was not offenſive to him, he called it a waſhing of his feet; a compliment, which was uſually paid to gueſts on their coming into an houſe, eſpecially after travelling, but which Simon had happened to neglect. Moreover, by purſuing the compariſon between her behaviour towards him in the other inſtances, and Simon's, he did not ſo much complain of the latter, for failing in point of civility, as inſinuate that the woman had ſurpaſſed him; and this the queſtion, Which of them will love him moſt? elegantly implies. The words of the ſubſequent clauſe of this verſe, Thou gaveſt me no water for my feet, ſound ſomewhat harſh to us; but will be found agreeable to the niceſt propriety of good breeding, if the manners of the eaſtern countries are conſidered. There perſons of the higheſt rank did not think it below them to honour their gueſts by performing offices of this kind for them. Thus in Gen. xviii. 7. we read, that on the arrival of the three angels, Abraham ran into the herd, and fetched a calf, and took butter and milk, and the calf which his ſervant had dreſſed, and ſet it before them, and he ſtood by them under the tree, to ſerve them, and they did eat. Something of this ſort we find, Iliad. ix. ver. 205. And Dr. Shaw (Trav. p. 301.) tells us, that theſe cuſtoms ſubſiſt among the eaſtern nations to this day, particularly among the Arabs, who are remarkable for retaining their ancient manners; and that the perſon who firſt preſents himſelf to welcome a ſtranger, and waſh his feet, is the maſter of the family: for as they ſtill walk barefooted, or with ſandals only, this piece of civility is abſolutely neceſſary.

Ver. 45. Thou gaveſt me no kiſs, &c.] Since it was cuſtomary for the maſter of the houſe to receive his gueſts with ſuch a ſalutation, to provide them with water to waſh their feet, &c. It is poſſible Simon might have omitted ſome of theſe civilities, leſt his brethren who ſat at table with him ſhould think he paid Jeſus too much reſpect; and if there was any ſuch ſlight intended, it might be an additional reaſon for our Lord's taking ſuch particular notice of the neglect. As the Evangeliſt tells us ſo expreſly, that ſhe heard of our Lord's being at dinner with the Phariſee before ſhe came, ver. 37. there ſeems to be no doubt that thoſe copies ſhould by all means be followed which read it, εισηλθεν, ſhe came in. See Wetſtein, Calmet, and Bengelius. The author of the Obſervations remarks, that our Lord reproaches the Phariſee that he had given him no kiſs; whereas the perſon whom he had been cenſuring in his heart, had not ceaſed kiſſing his feet from her entrance in the houſe. It is viſible by the contraſt which our Lord here ſuppoſes, betwixt the woman's kiſſes and the compliment he had reaſon to expect from the Phariſee, that he did not look for his kiſſing his feet, but for ſome other ſalutation. But what?—Not the kiſſes of equality moſt certainly, but rather that kiſſing his hand, which marks out reverence,—the reverence cuſtomarily paid in the eaſt to thoſe of a ſacred character, and which, contrary to the rules of decorum, he had omitted. Thus Norden tells us, that a Coptic prieſt, whom they took in their bark from the neighbourhood of Cairo a conſiderable way up the Nile, carried it pretty high, inſomuch that he dared to tell them more than once, that he could not take them for Chriſtians, ſince not one of their company had offered to kiſs his hands; whereas the Copti ran every day in crowds round him, to ſhew their reſpect by ſuch marks of ſubmiſſion. And at Saphet in Galilee, where the Jews have a ſort of univerſity, Dr. Pococke ſaw the inferior rabbies complimenting the chief, who was very decently habited in white ſattin, on the day of Pentecoſt, by coming with great reverence, and kiſſing his hand. See Obſerv. p. 262.

Ver. 46. Mine head with oil, &c.] The reader will obſerve the beautiful and elegant contraſt in this verſe, between common oil and precious ointment, as well as between anointing the head and anointing the feet; and indeed the ſame kind of contraſt is obſerved in the two preceding verſes. How common this circumſtance of anointing, &c. was, will appear on referring to Deut. xx. 4. Micah vi. 15. Pſ. xxiii. 5. civ. 15. cxli. 5.

Ver. 47. For ſhe loved much] Wherefore ſhe loved much. Wat. That no body might put a wrong conſtruction upon this woman's behaviour, our Lord declared, that her regard to him proceeded purely from a ſenſe of the favour he had done her, in bringing her to repentance, and in raiſing her to the hope of pardon. For though he had not yet given her any expreſs intimation of the pardon of her ſins; yet, having made her ſenſible of them by his ſermon, and raiſed her to the grace of true repentance, without doubt ſhe was aſſured of her pardon by the general doctrine of the Goſpel; and particularly by the promiſe of reſt which Jeſus had lately made to all weary and heavy-laden ſinners: But the favour of pardon bearing a proportion 48 And he ſaid unto her, Thy ſins are forgiven.

49 And they that ſat at meat with him, began to ſay within themſelves, Who is this that forgiveth ſins alſo?

50 And he ſaid to the woman, Thy faith hath ſaved thee; go in peace.

CHAP. VIII.

Women miniſter unto Chriſt of their ſubſtance. Chriſt, after he had preached from place to place, attended with his apoſtles, propoundeth the parable of the ſower, and of the candle; declareth who are his mother, and brethren; rebuketh the winds; caſteth the legion of de-tion to the multitude and greatneſs of the ſins pardoned, this woman, who was a notorious ſinner, could not but love Jeſus ardently, who had converted her, and given her good hope that God would be merciful to her. "I ſay unto thee, her ſins, which are many, are forgiven, namely, by me;" for the reaſon will not hold without this. So that Jeſus, on this occaſion, in the hearing of Simon and all the gueſts, plainly aſſumed to himſelf the prerogative of the Son of God, —the right of forgiving men their ſins. Accordingly the gueſts underſtood him in this ſenſe, as appears from the reflection which they made upon his ſpeech, ver. 49. The clauſe, for ſhe loved much, is better tranſlated as Dr. Waterland has done it, Wherefore, &c. Our Lord did not make the application of this parable more directly, but left Simon to do it, becauſe he could not but ſee that if love invites love, and merits a return, Jeſus would have been ungenerous, had he treated this woman with rudeneſs and contempt. Having expreſſed greater love to him, ſhe deſerved higher returns of gratitude from him, than even Simon himſelf; for which reaſon, he was not to blame when he allowed her to waſh his feet with tears, to wipe them with the hairs of her head, to kiſs them, and anoint them with ſweet perfumes. See Beza, Macknight, and the 12th ſermon on the Miracles.

Ver. 49. Who is this, &c.?] "Who is this arrogant and preſumptuous man, that not only tranſgreſſes our rules, by permitting a harlot to touch him, but even preſumes to ſay that he forgiveth ſins, which is the peculiar prerogative of God himſelf?" See Matth. ix. 3. and ch. v. 21.

Ver. 50. Thy faith hath ſaved thee, &c.] Our Lord, contemning the malicious murmuring of the Phariſees, repeated his aſſurance, by telling the woman that her faith had ſaved her from the puniſhments of her ſins, and bidding her depart in peace; that is, impreſſed with a ſtrong ſenſe of the love of God, and filled with the ſatisfaction which naturally ariſes from that attainment. Go in peace, was an uſual form of diſmiſſing inferiors, and was an expreſſion of the friendſhip and good wiſhes of the perſon ſpeaking. There is an evident propriety in the phraſe here, conſidering what had happened to diſcompoſe the ſpirit of this humble penitent. See ch. viii. 48. ii. 29. Mark v. 34. James ii. 16. and Gen. xliv. 17.

REFLECTIONS ON THE GOOD CENTURION, &c.

Ver. 1—16. Matth. viii. 5—13.

No nation, no trade can ſhut out a good heart from God: If this centurion was a foreigner by birth, yet was he a domeſtic in heart: He loved that nation which was choſen of God, and if he were not of the ſynagogue, yet did he build a ſynagogue (ver. 5.); where he might not be a party, he would ſtill be a benefactor. We could not love religion, were we utterly deſtitute of it.

We do not ſee this centurion come to Chriſt, as the Iſraelitiſh captain came to Elijah on Carmel,—but with much ſuit, much ſubmiſſion,—by others,—by himſelf. Could we but ſpeak for ourſelves, as this captain did for his ſervant, what could we poſſibly want? What marvel is it, if God be not forward to give, where we care not to aſk, or aſk as if we cared not to receive?

Great variety of ſuitors reſorted to Chriſt; one for a ſon, another for a daughter, a third for himſelf; I ſee none come for his ſervant but this one centurion: Nor was he a better man than a maſter. His ſervant is ſick; he doth not drive him out of doors, but lodges him at home; and then ſeeks to Chriſt for aid with a vehement aggravation of his diſeaſe. Had the maſter been ſick, the faithfulleſt ſervant could have done no more: He is unworthy to be well ſerved, who will not ſometimes wait upon his followers. It behoves us ſo to look down upon our ſervants here on earth, as that we may ſtill look up to our Maſter who is in heaven.

There was a paralytic whom faith and charity brought to our Saviour, and let down through the uncovered roof, in his bed. Why was not this centurion's ſervant ſo carried, ſo preſented?—One and the ſame grace may yield contrary effects. They, becauſe they believed, brought the patient to Chriſt; he, becauſe he believed, brought not his ſervant to him. Their act argued no leſs deſire, his argued more confidence; his labour was leſs, becauſe his faith was more; and hence we find that it met an ample reward; Jeſus ſaith unto him, I will come and heal him, Matth. viii. 7.

As he ſaid, ſo he did; the word of Chriſt is his act, or concurs with it: He went as he ſpake. O admirable return of humility! Chriſt will go down to viſit the ſick ſervant: The maſter of that ſervant ſays, Lord, I am not worthy that thou ſhouldeſt come under my roof, ver. 6. The Jewiſh elders, who went before to mediate for him, could ſay, He was worthy for whom Chriſt ſhould do this miracle, ver. 4. He for himſelf ſays, he is not even worthy of Chriſt's preſence. And yet, while he confeſſes himſelf thus unworthy of any favour, he approves himſelf worthy of all. Had not Chriſt been before in his heart, he could not have thought himſelf unworthy to entertain that divine gueſt within his houſe: God ever delighteth to dwell under the lowly roof of an humble breaſt.

It is fit the foundation ſhould be laid deep, where the building is high: The centurion's humility was not more low, than his faith was lofty; that reaches up into heaven, and in the face of human weakneſs deſcries Omnipotence. Only ſay the word, and my ſervant ſhall be whole, ver. 7.

But what foundation had this ſteady confidence of the good centurion?—He ſaw how powerful his own word was with thoſe under his command, ver. 8. (though himſelf were under the command of another) the force whereof extended to abſent performances. Well therefore might he argue that a free and unbounded power could give infallible commands, and that the moſt obſtinate diſeaſe muſt yield to the beck of the God of nature. Weakneſs may ſhew us what is in ſtrength; as by one drop of water we may ſee what is in the main ocean.

I marvel not, if this centurion was kind to his ſervants,—for they were dutiful to him. He can but ſay, Do this, and it is done: Theſe mutual reſpects draw on each other. They that neglect to pleaſe, cannot juſtly complain of being neglected. Oh could I but be ſuch a ſervant to mine heavenly Maſter!—Alas! every one of his commands ſays, Do this,—and I do it not: Every one of his prohibitions ſays, Do it not,—and I do it. He ſays, "Go, from the world,"—I run to it: He ſays, Come to me,—I run from him. Woe is me! this is not ſervice, but enmity: How can I look for favour, whilſt I return rebellion? It is a gracious Maſter whom we ſerve: There can be no duty of ours which he ſees not, acknowledges not, crowns not. We could not but be happy, if we could but be officious.

What can be more marvellous than to ſee Chriſt marvel? ver. 9. All marvelling ſuppoſes an ignorance going before, and a knowledge following ſome unexpected accident. Now who wrought this faith in the centurion, but He that wondered at it?—Yet he wondered, to teach us much more to admire that, which He at once knows and holds admirable. He wrought this faith as GOD; he wondered at it as man. He that was both, did both, to teach us where to beſtow our wonder. Our wealth, beauty, wit, learning, honour, may make us accepted of men; it is our faith only, which ſhall make God in love with us. There are great men, whom we juſtly pity; we can eſteem, love, and admire none but the gracious.

It is not more the ſhame of Iſrael, than the glory of this centurion, that our Lord ſays, I have not found ſo great faith, &c. ver. 9. God never gives more than he requires: Where we have laid our tillage, manure, and ſeed, who would not look for a crop? But if the uncultured fallow yield more than the arable, how juſtly is that unanſwerable ground near to a curſe! Our Saviour did not mutter this cenſorious teſtimony to himſelf, but he turned him about to the people, and ſpake it in their ears, at once to excite their ſhame and emulation. It is well if any thing can enkindle in us holy ambitions. Dull and baſe are the ſpirits of that man, who can endure to ſee another overtake him in the way, and out-run him to heaven.

He who both wrought this faith in the centurion, and wondered at it, doth now reward it, (Matth. viii. 13.). The infinite mercy of God, ever conſiſtent with itſelf, follows but one rule in his gift to us,—the faith he gives us. Give us, O God, to believe, and then be it unto us, even as thou wilt!

If the prayers of an earthly maſter prevailed ſo much with the Son of God, for the recovery of a ſervant, how ſhall not the interceſſion of the Son of God prevail with his father in heaven, for us his impotent children upon earth? What can we want, O Saviour, whilſt thou ſueſt for us? He that gave thee for us, can deny thee nothing for us, can deny us nothing for thee.

But turn we away from hence, and follow this beneficent Saviour to Nain. No ſooner hath he raiſed the centurion's ſervant from the palſy and his bed, than he raiſes the widow's ſon from death and the bier. His providence hath ſo contrived his journey, that he meets with the ſad pomp of a funeral; a woeful widow, attended with her weeping neighbours, is following her only ſon to the grave,—a young man, the only ſon,—the only child of his mother, and ſhe was a widow. Surely there was not a circumſtance in this ſpectacle that did not command compaſſion. Nay, when God himſelf would deſcribe the moſt paſſionate expreſſion of ſorrow that can attend the miſerable, he can but ſay, O daughter of my people, gird thee with ſackcloth, cover thyſelf with aſhes; make lamentation and bitter mourning, as for thine only ſon.

Such was the loſs, ſuch the ſorrow of this diſconſolate mother: Nor words nor tears can ſuffice to diſcover it: A good huſband may make amends for the loſs of a ſon; had the root been left intire, ſhe might better have ſpared the young branch: But alas! now both are cut up, all the ſtay of her life is laid low with a ſtroke; ſhe ſeems abandoned to the very perfection of miſery.

And yet, now, when ſhe gave herſelf up for a forlorn mourner, paſt all capacity of redreſs,—even now, the God of comforts meets vils out of the man, into the herd of ſwine; and is rejected of the Gadarenes; healeth the woman of her bloody iſſue; and raiſeth from death Jairus's daughter.

AND it came to paſs afterward, that he went throughout every city and village, preaching, and ſhewing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God: and the twelve were with him;

2 And certain women, which had been healed of evil ſpirits and infirmities, Mary called Magdalene, out of whom went ſeven devils,

3 And Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's ſteward, and Suſanna, and many others, which miniſtered unto him of their ſubſtance.

4 And when much people were gathered together, and were come to him out of every city, he ſpake by a parable:

5 A ſower went out to ſow his ſeed: and as he ſowed, ſome fell by the way-ſide; and it was troden down, and the fowls of the air devoured it.

6 And ſome fell upon a rock; and as ſoon as it was ſprung up, it withered away, becauſe it lacked moiſture.

7 And ſome fell among thorns; and the thorns ſprang up with it, and choked it.

8 And other fell on good ground, and ſprang up, and bare fruit an hundred-fold. And when he had ſaid theſe things, he cried, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

9 And his diſciples aſked him, ſaying, What might this parable be?

10 And he ſaid, Unto you it is given to know the myſteries of the kingdom of God; but to others in parables; that ſeeing they might not ſee, and hearing they might not underſtand.

11 Now the parable is this: The ſeed is the word of God.

her, pities her, relieves her! Here was no ſolicitor but his own compaſſion; in other caſes he was ſought and ſued to. O thou merciful God, none of our ſecret ſorrows can be either hid from thine eyes, or kept from thine heart; and when we are paſt all our hopes, all poſſibilities of help, then art thou neareſt to us for deliverance.

Here was a conſpiration of all parts to the exerciſe of mercy. The heart had compaſſion; (ver. 13.) the mouth ſaid, weep not; the feet went to the bier; the hand touched the coffin, the power of the Deity raiſed the dead: What the heart felt was ſecret to itſelf, the tongue therefore expreſſes it in words of comfort, Weep not.

Alas! what are words to paſſions ſo ſtrong and ſo juſt as hers? To bid her not to weep, who had loſt her only ſon, was to perſuade her to be miſerable and not feel it. Concealment doth not remedy, but aggravate ſorrow; therefore, that with the counſel not to weep, ſhe might ſee cauſe of compliance, his hand ſeconds his tongue. His hand arreſts the coffin, and ſets free the priſoner of death: Young man, I ſay unto thee, Ariſe; and inſtantly he that was dead ſat up. The Lord of life and death ſpeaks with command: It is no more hard for his Almighty word, which gave all things their being, to ſay, Let them be repaired, than let them be made.

Behold now this young man, thus miraculouſly awakened from his deadly ſleep, deſcending joyfully from the bier, wrapping his winding ſheet about his loins, caſting himſelf down in paſſionate thankfulneſs at the feet of his Almighty Reſtorer, and adoring that divine power which had remanded his ſoul to her forſaken lodging! Doubtleſs the firſt utterance of that returning ſoul was couched in words of the higheſt praiſe and wonder. It was the mother, whom our Lord pitied in this act, and not the ſon: As for her ſake therefore he was raiſed, ſo to her hands was he delivered, (ver. 15.) that ſhe might acknowledge that ſoul given to her, not to the poſſeſſor.

Who is there that cannot feel the amazement and extaſy of joy which throbs in this revived mother's heart, when her ſon now ſalutes her from another world? How ſoon is the funeral banquet turned into a new birth-day feaſt! What ſtrivings were here to ſalute the late carcaſe of their reſtored neighbour! What aweful and admiring looks were now caſt on the Lord of Life! How gladly did every tongue celebrate both the work and the author! A great prophet is raiſed up, &c. ver. 16. A prophet was the higheſt appellation they could find for him, whom they ſaw like themſelves in ſhape, ſuperior to themſelves in power. They were not yet acquainted with God manifeſted in the fleſh; this miracle might well indeed have aſſured them of more than a prophet: But he that raiſed the dead man from the bier, would not ſuddenly raiſe theſe dead hearts from the grave of infidelity: They ſhall ſee reaſon enough to know that the prophet who was raiſed up to them, was himſelf the God that now viſited them; and who at length ſhould do for them even more, far more than he had yet done for this young man;—raiſe them from death to life, and tranſlate them for ever from duſt to glory!

Chap. VIII. Ver. 1. And it came to paſs afterwards] Εν τω καθεξῆς, that is, The day after our Lord dined with Simon,—he and his twelve Apoſtles departed from Capernaum, with an intention to go up to Jeruſalem to the paſſover. He did not, however, keep the direct road; he ſet out early, and preached in many towns and villages by the way, the glad tidings of the kingdom of God; that is, the joyful tidings of God's reconcileableneſs to man, of the neceſſity of reformation, and of the acceptableneſs of repentance even in the chief of ſinners. His going through the cities and villages to preach, are the terms made uſe of by the Evangeliſt's when they deſcribe our Lord's departure from Capernaum; therefore, as it is uſed on this occaſion, it is highly probable that Simon the Phariſee, with whom our Lord dined the day before, lived in Capernaum: and as this latter gave him the invitation immediately after he had finiſhed his diſcourſe occaſioned by the Baptiſt's meſſage, Jeſus muſt have been in Capernaum, or near it, when that meſſage came to him. See Macknight.

Ver. 2. And certain women, &c.] Our Lord was accompanied in his journey by certain pious women, who in all probability were going likewiſe to the paſſover, and who ſupplied him with money, not on the preſent occaſion only, but as often as they ſtood in need of it. St. Mark agrees with St. Luke in the circumſtance of our Lord's being ſupported by the charity of his friends; for, ſpeaking of the women who were preſent at Chriſt's crucifixion, he ſays, ch. xv. 41. that when Jeſus "was in Galilee, they followed him, and miniſtered unto him of their ſubſtance." The Evangeliſts no where elſe tell us in what way our Lord and his Apoſtles were ſupported. Of the number of theſe pious women was Mary, called Magdalene, from Magdala, the place of her reſidence, as we have obſerved on ch. vii. 37. a woman of the firſt rank in Judea, out of whom our Lord had caſt ſeven devils: This is ſuppoſed by Gregory to have been only a proverbial expreſſion, to ſignify that ſhe was a perſon of a very bad character, whom Jeſus reclaimed; and M. L'Enfant advances the ſame interpretation, as agreeable to the Jewiſh type: but, as ſo much is ſpoken of diſpoſſeſſions, in the proper ſenſe of the word, by St. Luke, it is moſt natural to ſuppoſe this to be referred to here. Nor will it ſeem ſtrange that ſhe is repreſented as having been poſſeſſed by ſeven devils, when we recollect that we have in this very chapter the account of a man who was poſſeſſed by a whole legion. See Calmet's Dictionary on the word Mary Magdalene. The reaſon why a woman of Joanna's quality had become an attendant upon Chriſt, is aſſigned by St. Luke. She was one of thoſe who had been healed by him of evil ſpirits and infirmities. It is moſt probable that this wife of Chuza was now a widow. See Calmet on the word Joanna, and 1 Tim. ii. 18.

Ver. 10. That ſeeing, they might not ſee] As much as to ſay, "Take this mark, among others, of the truth of my pretenſions. My offers of ſalvation, as was foretold, (ſee Iſai. vi. 8—10.) are rejected of my countrymen; and I have delivered my meſſage to them in ſuch terms, and attended with ſuch circumſtances, as the good providence of God hath foretold, and by foretelling hath preſcribed the Meſſiah to employ, in order to promote the accompliſhment of his will." Whence we learn, that Jeſus is not here declaring the mode in which, as a divine meſſenger, he was to propound God's good will to man; much leſs is it any intimation of the peculiar genius of the Goſpel, which in one place ſelected its favourites, and in another doomed the unhappy to perdition; but it is a ſimple aſſertion that the prophetic prediction, or if you will, God's ſentence, was now fulfilling or executing on the Jews; and that Jeſus, as the inſtrument of its completion, was indeed the Meſſiah foretold: In a word, he is here ſimply inſtructing his followers in the wiſe and wonderful accompliſhment of Scripture-prophecies concerning the fate of the Jews, and the fortunes of their Meſſiah; to convince them of God's righteous dealings, and of the truth of his own miſſion. See Warburton's Sermons, vol. i. p. 320. and the Reflections on Matth. x.

13 They on the rock are they, which, when they hear, receive the word with joy; and theſe have no root, which for a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away.

14 And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth, and are choked with cares and riches, and pleaſures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection.

15 But that on the good ground are they, which in an honeſt and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience.

16 No man, when he hath lighted a candle, covereth it with a veſſel, or putteth it under a bed; but ſetteth it on a candleſtick, that they which enter in may ſee the light.

17 For nothing is ſecret, that ſhall not be made manifeſt; neither any thing hid, that ſhall not be known, and come abroad.

18 Take heed therefore how ye hear: for whoſoever hath, to him ſhall be given; and whoſoever hath not, from him ſhall be taken, even that which he ſeemeth to have.

19 Then came to him his mother and his brethren, and could not come at him for the preſs.

20 And it was told him by certain, which ſaid, Thy mother and thy brethren ſtand without, deſiring to ſee thee.

21 And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, My mother and my brethren are theſe which hear the word of God, and do it.

22 Now it came to paſs on a certain day, that he went into a ſhip with his diſciples: and he ſaid unto them, Let us go over unto the other ſide of the lake. And they launched forth.

23 But as they ſailed, he fell aſleep: and there came down a ſtorm of wind on the lake; and they were filled with water, and were in jeopardy.

24 And they came to him, and awoke him, ſaying, Maſter, maſter, we periſh! Then he aroſe, and rebuked the wind, and the raging of the water: and they ceaſed, and there was a calm.

25 And he ſaid unto them, Where is your faith? and they, being afraid, wondered, ſaying one to another, What manner of man is this! for he commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him.

26 And they arrived at the country of the Gadarenes, which is over-againſt Galilee.

27 And when he went forth to land, there met him out of the city, a certain man,

Ver. 14. Are choked with cares] St. Luke expreſſes it thus, perhaps, to intimate the uneaſy ſituation of the mind, while clogged and ſtraightened with ſuch incumbrances as theſe, and rendered as it were unfit to breathe its own native air, and to delight itſelf with celeſtial and eternal objects. Choaking ariſes from ſomething which ſtraightens the gullet or wind-pipe, and ſo obſtructs the paſſage of food or air; and thus young plants or corn may properly be ſaid to be choaked by thorns, which do not leave them room to grow; and the word, which would exert its vital power and principle, is repreſented as choaked, when thus oppreſſed with ſecular cares prevailing in the mind.

Ver. 16. A candle] A lamp. Wat.

Ver. 17, 18. For nothing is ſecret, &c.] The author of the verſion of 1729 tranſlates theſe two verſes elegantly enough, in the following manner: Ver. 17. "Whatever is now obſcure, ſhall hereafter be made clear; whatever is now concealed ſhall then be publickly known: Ver. 18. Improve therefore what you hear; for he that improves what he has, ſhall have more; but he that does not, ſhall loſe even that which he thinks he poſſeſſes."

Ver. 19. Then came to him his mother] Our Lord's mother made this viſit probably with a deſign to carry him to Nazareth, where ſhe might hope he would work miracles, and bleſs his countrymen with the benefits he ſo freely diſpenſed wherever he came. She ſeems to have ſucceeded in her deſign; for not long after this he went away into his own country, as St. Matthew informs us, ch. xiii. 53. Or, if this ſuppoſition be not allowed, perhaps his relations might come to him, from an apprehenſion that the continual fatigue of preaching might hurt his health, and were therefore deſirous of his reſting a while, to refreſh himſelf. Macknight is of opinion, that this was the ſecond time in which Mary ſhewed her anxiety for her ſon; the account in St. Matthew being introduced before the parable of the ſower, and this in St. Luke after it.

Ver. 23. He fell aſleep] Some are of opinion, that on this occaſion our Lord fell aſleep deſignedly, to give as it were an opportunity for the full diſplay of this extraordinary miracle. However, as he went on board in the evening, his falling aſleep may have happened in the night-time, and in common courſe; particularly as he muſt have been fatigued with the labours of the preceding day. Inſtead of they were filled, ſome copies read the veſſel was filled. See Mar. iv. 37.

Ver. 24. Maſter! maſter! we periſh] How conciſe, how abrupt, and how ardent is this exclamation! therefore how ſtrongly ſignificant of imminent danger, and of the utmoſt diſtreſs! They have not time to be explicit; a moment's delay may be fatal. What they utter is conciſeneſs itſelf, and all rapidity.—This is nature; this is the genuine language of the heart; this is true hiſtoric painting. Every impartial reader muſt admire this exquiſitely juſt and fine ſtroke, far beyond the diffuſe and (I had almoſt ſaid impertinently) florid ſpeech which Virgil puts into the mouth of his hero on a like occaſion. See Æn. i. ver. 98.

Ver. 25. Where is your faith?] The diſciples having ſeen their Maſter perform many miracles, had abundant reaſon to rely on his power and goodneſs, even in a greater danger than this; for though their veſſel had ſunk, they could not have imagined that God would have ſuffered Him to be loſt, and might have been confident that he who had given ſight to the blind, and life to the dead, could have ſaved them all, by making them walk firmly on the water, as he enabled one of them to do afterwards. Their timidity therefore was altogether culpable, and the reproof he gave them juſt. See the note on Matth. viii. 27.

Ver. 26, 27. And they arrived at the country of the Gadarenes] Though we have given, in the notes on St. Matthew, an explanation of the principal circumſtances of this remarkable miracle; yet, as it contains ſo full and ſatisfactory an account of real poſſeſſion, and demoniacal agency, I cannot refuſe my reader the extracts following from Dr. Ward's diſſertation on the ſubject, as they not only concur with, but ſtrongly confirm the opinions advanced in the notes on St. Matthew. Obſerve we then, that the caſe of the man among the tombs is told with ſome remarkable circumſtances: He is here deſcribed as wholly unconverſable; ſo fierce, that no one durſt come near him. He had lived a long time in this condition, and therefore was neither capable, nor had any opportunity of knowing any thing concerning Chriſt or his character. Beſides, it is plain that he could not be appriſed of his coming at that time, for the ſhip ſailed over from the other ſide in the night, and ſo ſoon as Chriſt came aſhore, and the man ſaw him at a diſtance, he ran to him and worſhipped him; ver. 28. Are theſe the actions of a mere madman, fierce and outrageous? What could give this ſudden turn to his mind, while Chriſt was yet at a diſtance from him? And when he came up to Chriſt, and Chriſt ſpoke to him, how could he know and confeſs him to be the Son of God moſt high, whom he had never before heard of? What he ſays further is indeed agreeable to the ravings of a madman, if it came from himſelf: but that it could not, ſeems very plain from its inconſiſtency with his true confeſſion of Chriſt, to whom he was wholly a ſtranger; though conſidering all he ſays as coming from an evil ſpirit, the whole is in character; nor do the inhabitants of the neighbouring town ſeem to have known more of Chriſt than this man, if we are to judge by their conduct. All theſe circumſtances therefore being duly conſidered, it muſt appear very evident that the caſe of this man could not be merely the effect of madneſs, but that it was a real poſſeſſion. And if the term demoniacs is at any time in the New Teſtament applied to natural diſorders, when they become invetewhich had devils long time, and ware no clothes, neither abode in any houſe, but in the tombs.

28 When he ſaw Jeſus, he cried out, and fell down before him, and with a loud voice ſaid, What have I to do with thee, Jeſus, thou Son of God moſt high? I beſeech thee torment me not.

29 (For he had commanded the unclean ſpirit to come out of the man. For oftentimes it had caught him: and he was kept bound with chains, and in fetters; and he brake the bands, and was driven of the devil into the wilderneſs.)

30 And Jeſus aſked him, ſaying, What is thy name? And he ſaid, Legion: becauſe many devils were entered into him.

31 And they beſought him that he would not command them to go out into the deep.

32 And there was there an herd of many ſwine feeding on the mountain: and they beſought him that he would ſuffer them to enter into them. And he ſuffered them.

33 Then went the devils out of the man, and entered into the ſwine: and the herd ran violently down a ſteep place into the lake, and were choked.

34 When they that fed them ſaw what was done, they fled, and went and told it in the city, and in the country.

35 Then they went out to ſee what was done; and came to Jeſus, and found the man out of whom the devils were departed, ſitting at the feet of Jeſus, clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid.

36 They alſo which ſaw it, told them by what means he that was poſſeſſed of the devils was healed.

Ver. 31. Rev. xx. 3.—V. 37. Matth. viii. 34.

rate, from a ſimilitude in their ſymptoms with real poſſeſſions, this is nothing more than what is common in other caſes, and agreeable to the uſe of all language, in which the name of one thing is often transferred to another, on account of ſome apparent likeneſs between them. The way therefore to diſtinguiſh them is by a due attention to all the given circumſtances, by which they may frequently be determined; and where theſe are not ſufficiently clear and deciſive, there can be no concluſion drawn merely from ſuch inſtances: But in the preſent caſe, the circumſtances mentioned are ſuch as can hardly be otherwiſe accounted for, than by a real poſſeſſion. St. Luke obſerves, that Chriſt firſt ſpoke to them, or one of them, (ver. 29. and ſee Matth. viii. 28.) and commanded the unclean ſpirit to come out of him. If this was ſpoken to the man, and not to the devil,—by the unclean ſpirit muſt be meant the diſeaſe: And as Chriſt never ſpoke in vain, the man muſt immediately have found ſome change in himſelf for the better, and therefore could not have aſked him, after this, whether he came to torment him. But that this diſcourſe was between Chriſt and the evil ſpirit appears ſtill more evident from a preceding inſtance of the like kind, which happened while Chriſt was yet leſs known, and is recorded by St. Mark, chap. i. 21, &c.

Ver. 28. What have I to do with thee, &c.?] This way of ſpeaking has been uſed by writers in all the ancient languages, and is applied both to perſons and things. With reſpect to perſons, it is uſed ſometimes by ſuperiors towards their inferiors; at other times, by one equal to another; and again, at other times, by inferiors towards their ſuperiors; and the ſenſe muſt vary according to the different circumſtances of the perſons whom it reſpects. For when an inferior thus addreſſes his ſuperior, which is the caſe here, it is to be conſidered only as an expoſtulation; and in that ſenſe the devils might uſe this form of expreſſion to Chriſt: For that they did it in an expreſſive manner, is evident from the worſhip which they paid him at the ſame time; as likewiſe from their petition to him immediately afterwards, that he would permit them to go into the ſwine. And therefore, his being their judge ſeems to occaſion no impropriety in the expreſſion; for a criminal may, and often does expoſtulate with his judge: but the inconſiſtency of it, as coming from the demoniacs themſelves, has been ſhewn already in the preceding note. It is evident indeed from many paſſages in the Evangeliſts, that Chriſt frequently forbad not only the devils, but men likewiſe, in public, to acknowledge him to be the Son of God; the reaſons for which have been already repeatedly given: But at other times he thought proper to permit ſuch a declaration in private, and particularly from his diſciples, as we find Matth. xvi. 15, &c. And as to the caſe of theſe demoniacs among the Gadarenes, there ſeems to have been the greateſt propriety at that time, not only for his permitting the devils to confeſs him, as they do, to be the Son of God, but likewiſe to worſhip him. For it does not appear that any other perſons were then preſent but Chriſt himſelf and his diſciples, except the demoniacs; and this was not long before he ſent forth his diſciples both to preach and to heal, &c. Matth. x. 7, 8. and therefore, what could be more proper, or give them higher encouragement to hope for ſucceſs in this great work, than to ſee the devils thus ſubject to their Maſter, and paying homage to him, as they had a little before ſeen the winds and the waves obey his command in their paſſage thither? Now the power given them in their commiſſion, as recorded Matth. x. 8. was to heal the ſick, cleanſe the lepers, raiſe the dead, caſt out devils: If therefore the laſt, caſt out devils, had meant no more than to cure madmen, ſurely it would not have been placed after raiſing the dead.—Again, in ch. x. 1. we are told that Chriſt appointed and ſent out ſeventy other diſciples, who are ſaid, ver. 17. to have returned again with joy, ſaying, Lord, even the devils are ſubject unto us through thy name. Where it is plain that they did not mean mere madmen, by our Saviour's anſwer,—Rejoice not that the ſpirits are ſubject unto you; but rather rejoice becauſe your names are written in heaven.

Ver. 30. What is thy name, &c?] Our Saviour probably aſked the name of the evil ſpirit, to ſhew the extreme miſery of the demoniac who was poſſeſſed by him. There is no need of concluding from the anſwer, that the number of theſe evil ſpirits was exactly the ſame with that of a Roman legion, which at this period conſiſted of ſix thouſand and upwards. It was a phraſe often made uſe of to expreſs a great number; and it is obſervable that the Evangeliſt's words lead us to this very ſenſe: My name is legion, for or becauſe we are many. It is evident from St. Luke's mode of expreſſion—many devils were entered into him;—that he thought this was not a mere lunacy, but a real poſſeſſion. Probably a band of evil ſpirits united in the vexation of this wretched creature; but in what manner or order, it is impoſſible for us to ſay, who know ſo little of the ſtate of inviſible beings. See Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. and Pitiſc. de Legione.

Ver. 31. And they beſought him, &c.] It ſeems from Dan. x. 13, 20. that different evil genii preſided over diſtinct legions, by the direction of Satan their prince. Theſe, who perhaps were ſpirits of diſtinguiſhed abilities, might be appointed to reſide hereabouts, to oppoſe as much as poſſible the beneficial deſigns of Chriſt; and having made their obſervations on the character and circumſtances of the inhabitants, they might judge themſelves capable of doing more miſchief here than elſewhere, and on that account might deſire leave to continue on the ſpot. See Mark v. 10. The word Ἀβυσσος, rendered deep in this paſſage, ſignifies the place where wicked ſpirits are puniſhed; as it does likewiſe, Rev. xx. 3. where it is tranſlated the bottomleſs pit: properly it denotes a place without a bottom, or ſo deep that it cannot be fathomed. The Greeks deſcribe their Tartarus in this manner: and the Jews, when they wrote Greek, did not ſcruple to adopt their expreſſions, becauſe they were univerſally underſtood. Beſides, the Hebrew language did not furniſh proper words for theſe ideas; which was the reaſon that the firſt Chriſtians alſo, when they had occaſion to ſpeak of the ſtate of evil ſpirits, made uſe of terms purely Greek. See 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude ver. 6. Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 32. And he ſuffered them] The town of Gadara, near which this miracle was wrought, was a Grecian city: See Matth. viii. 28. and as there was a mixture of Jews and Gentiles in thoſe towns which bordered upon Judea, ſo many of the Jews who lived there complied in ſome things with the Gentile cuſtoms, and among others, very probably, in eating ſwine's fleſh; and if this was the caſe, part of theſe ſwine might belong to them; which, by their number, two thouſand, ſeem to have been a common or town-herd. It was therefore a juſt puniſhment upon them, when Chriſt permitted the ſwine to be thus deſtroyed. And for the other inhabitants, it was nothing more than what often happens in common calamities, that all ſuffer alike, and was abundantly made up to them by a favour of infinitely greater importance. For though Chriſt did not ſtay to declare himſelf to them, yet he left the man whom he had cured to do it; ordering him to return home to his own houſe, and ſhew how great things God had done unto him; (ver. 39.) which accordingly he did. This muſt be ſufficient to acquaint the Gadarenes with his character as the Meſſiah, to which before they were ſtrangers, and lead them to an inquiry into his doctrine; which was a very compaſſionate method to make himſelf known in a country, beyond the uſual limits of his doing it, either in perſon or by his diſciples, till after his aſcenſion. Nor does it ſeem reaſonable, or agreeable to our Saviour's conduct in other caſes, to ſuppoſe that he croſſed the ſea in a ſtormy night privately, and returned back in the ſame manner, only to cure one demoniac, or two at the moſt; and to permit the deſtruction of two thouſand ſwine, without any further view of doing ſervice to the inhabitants of thoſe parts of the country.

37 Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about, beſought him to depart from them; for they were taken with great fear: and he went up into the ſhip, and returned back again.

38 Now the man out of whom the devils were departed, beſought him that he might be with him: but Jeſus ſent him away, ſaying, 39 Return to thine own houſe, and ſhew how great things God hath done unto thee. And he went his way, and publiſhed throughout the whole city, how great things Jeſus had done unto him.

40 And it came to paſs, that when Jeſus was returned, the people gladly received him: for they were all waiting for him.

41 And behold there came a man named Jairus, and he was a ruler of the ſynagogue: and he fell down at Jeſus' feet, and beſought him that he would come into his houſe:

42 For he had one only daughter, about twelve years of age, and ſhe lay a dying. But as he went, the people thronged him.

43 And a woman having an iſſue of blood twelve years, which had ſpent all her living upon phyſicians, neither could be healed of any,

44 Came behind him, and touched the border of his garment: and immediately her iſſue of blood ſtanched.

45 And Jeſus ſaid, Who touched me? When all denied, Peter, and they that were with him, ſaid, Maſter, the multitude throng thee, and preſs thee, and ſayeſt thou, Who touched me?

46 And Jeſus ſaid, Somebody hath touched me: for I perceive that virtue is gone out of me.

47 And when the woman ſaw that ſhe was not hid, ſhe came trembling, and falling down before him, ſhe declared unto him, before all the people, for what cauſe ſhe had touched him, and how ſhe was healed immediately,

48 And he ſaid unto her, Daughter, be of good comfort: thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace.

49 While he yet ſpake, there cometh one from the ruler of the ſynagogue's houſe, ſaying to him, Thy daughter is dead; trouble not the Maſter.

50 But when Jeſus heard it, he anſwered him, ſaying, Fear not: believe only, and ſhe ſhall be made whole.

51 And when he came into the houſe, he ſuffered no man to go in, ſave Peter, and James, and John, and the father and the mother of the maiden.

52 And all wept, and bewailed her: but he ſaid, Weep not; ſhe is not dead, but ſleepeth.

53 And they laughed him to ſcorn, knowing that ſhe was dead.

54 And he put them all out, and took her by the hand, and called, ſaying, Maid, ariſe.

55 And her ſpirit came again, and ſhe aroſe ſtraightway: and he commanded to give her meat.

56 And her parents were aſtoniſhed: but he charged them that they ſhould tell no man what was done.

Ver. 37. The whole multitude—beſought him, &c.] The Inhabitants of the neighbouring town ſeem to have known no more of Chriſt than the demoniac; for when thoſe who fed the ſwine fled thither, and told them what had happened, they immediately came to the place, and ſeeing the great alteration made in the man, this, together with the loſs of their ſwine, ſo terrified them, that they beſought Chriſt to depart out of their coaſts. Mark v. 15—17. They would ſurely not have done this, had they before heard of his character (though they had never ſeen him) that he went about doing good, curing all ſorts of diſeaſes, and expelling devils or demons. See Ward, p. 76. and on Matth. viii. 33.

Ver. 39. Shew how great things God hath done unto thee] The divinity of our Saviour is ſtrongly and emphatically expreſſed in this verſe; where what Jeſus had done, is placed in direct and immediate appoſition with what God had done.

Ver. 43. An iſſue of blood] A bloody flux. Wat.

Ver. 48. Daughter, be of good comfort] What is here ſaid of this woman is frequently aſſerted by our Saviour upon other occaſions, namely, that the miraculous cure which he performed was owing to the patient's faith. We find likewiſe that faith was actually required, ſometimes of the perſons themſelves who were to be healed, at other times of thoſe who interceded for them, and were to atteſt the truth of the miracle. The reaſons for this have been aſſigned in the note on Mark ix. 20—24. The reader however will be fully gratified, if he requires more on this ſubject, by Foſter's "Sermon on the reaſon of Chriſt's requiring faith in order to his miraculous cures," in his Diſcourſes on the principal Branches of Religion, vol. i. p. 345.

Ver. 55. Her ſpirit came again] This expreſſion implies that ſhe was really dead, and that the ſoul exiſts ſeparately after the body dies: a truth very neceſſary to be aſſerted in thoſe days, when it was denied by many. See the note on Mark v. 42.

REFLECTIONS ON THE HEALING OF THE BLOODY ISSUE, Ver. 43—48. and Matth. ix. 20—22.

In this memorable event our bleſſed Lord had certainly no ſmall reſpect to the faith of Jairus, to whoſe houſe he was going. How muſt that ruler now think, that he, who by the virtue of his garment only, could pluck this woman out of the graſp of death, who had been twelve years dying, could now as well, by the power of his word, pluck his daughter who had lived twelve years, out of the Jaws of death, which had newly ſeized her!

The patient laboured under an iſſue of blood; a diſeaſe, attended with no leſs ſhame than pain; no leſs legal impurity, than natural infirmity. Time added to her grief; twelve long years had ſhe languiſhed under this woeful complaint: Beſides the tediousneſs, diſeaſes muſt needs get head by continuance; and ſo much more do they both weaken nature, and ſtrengthen themſelves, by how much longer they afflict us; thus it is alſo in the ſoul, and in the ſtate: Vices, which are the ſickneſs of both, when they grow inveterate, have a ſtrong plea for their abode and uncontroulableneſs.

To conſummate her diſtreſs, poverty was ſuperadded to her ſickneſs, ver. 43. Whilſt ſhe had wherewith to accommodate herſelf, and to procure good attendance, choice diet, and all the ſuccours of diſtreſsful languor, ſhe could not but find ſome mitigation of her ſorrow: But now, want began to oppreſs her no leſs than her diſtemper, and helped to render her perpectly miſerable.

And yet, could ſhe have parted from her ſubſtance in exchange for eaſe, her complaint had been the leſs: Could the phyſicians have given her, if not health, yet relaxation and a receſs from pain, her means had not been miſapplied; but we are told, (Luke v. 26.) that ſhe ſuffered many things of them, in the courſe of their applications; and the remedy was equal in trouble to the diſeaſe. Art could give her neither cure nor hope.

CHAP. IX.

Chriſt ſendeth his apoſtles to work miracles, and to preach. Herod deſireth to ſee Chriſt. Chriſt feedeth five thouſand: enquireth what opinion the world had of him: foretelleth his paſſion: propoſeth to all the pattern of his patience. The transfiguration. He healeth the lunatick: again forewarneth his diſciples of his paſſion: commendeth humility: biddeth them to ſhew mildneſs towards all, without deſire of revenge. Divers would follow him, but upon conditions.

THEN he called his twelve diſciples together, and gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diſeaſes.

2 And he ſent them to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the ſick.

3 And he ſaid unto them, Take nothing for your journey, neither ſtaves, nor ſcrip, neither bread, neither money; neither have two coats apiece.

4 And whatſoever houſe ye enter into, there abide, and thence depart.

5 And whoſoever will not receive you, when you go out of that city, ſhake off the very duſt from your feet for a teſtimony againſt them.

Ver. 1. Matth. x. 1. Mark iii. 13. vi. 7.—V. 2. Matth. x. 7. Mark vi. 12. Ch. x. 11.—V. 5. Matth. x. 14. Acts xiii. 51.

It were indeed pity but that this woman ſhould have been thus ſick: The nature, the duration, the coſt, the pain, the incurableneſs of her diſeaſe, all conſpired to ſend her in ſearch of Chriſt, and moved Chriſt to effect her cure. Our extremities are thoſe harſh friends which drive us to our Saviour. When forſaken of all other ſuccours and hopes, we are fitteſt for his redreſs; there is no fear, no danger, but in our inſenſibility to our helpleſs ſtate.

This woman was a ſtranger to Chriſt; It ſeems ſhe had never ſeen him; the report of his miracles had lifted her up to ſuch a confidence of his power and mercy, as that ſhe ſaid within herſelf, If I may but touch the hem of his garment, I ſhall be whole. The ſhame of her diſeaſe ſtopped her mouth from any verbal ſuit: Had her infirmity been known, ſhe had been ſhunned, abhorred, and diſdainfully thruſt back by all beholders: She conceals therefore her grief, her deſire, and her faith; and ſpeaks within herſelf, where alone ſhe may be bold to utter her ſentiments.

In all likelihood, if there could have been virtue in our Lord's garment at all, the nearer the body the more: Here then was the praiſe of this woman's faith, that ſhe promiſeth herſelf cure, by the touch of the utmoſt hem. Whoever would look to receive any benefit from Chriſt, muſt come in faith. It is that alone which makes us capable of any favour. Nay, the endeavour, and the iſſue of all things, human and ſpiritual, depend upon our faith. Who would ſow, or trade, or travel, or marry, if he did not therein ſurely truſt he ſhould ſpeed well? What benefit can we look to derive from a divine exhortation, if we do not believe it will edify us?—From a ſacramental banquet,—the food of angels,—if we do not believe it will nouriſh our ſouls? from our beſt devotions, if we do not perſuade ourſelves that they will fetch down celeſtial bleſſings? Vain and heartleſs our ſervices, if we do not ſay, "May I drink but one drop of that heavenly nectar; may I taſte but one crumb of that bread of life; may I hear but one word from the mouth of Chriſt; may I ſend but one hearty ſigh or ejaculation of an holy deſire to my God,—and I ſhall be whole!"

According to her reſolution is her practice: She touched, but ſhe came behind to touch, (ver. 44.) whether for humility or for ſecreſy, as deſiring to obtain a cure unſeen, unnoted; ſhe was a Jeweſs, and and therefore well knew, that in this caſe her touch was no better than a pollution: Whatever were her motives, her faith was glorious, was accepted, was triumphant; behold, immediately her iſſue of blood ſtanched, and ſhe was whole of her grievous infirmity.

And now, who would not think that a man might lade up a diſh of water from the ſea, unmiſſed? But that water, though vaſt, is finite; and all its drops are within number. And yet, wonderful to reflect, this baſhful ſoul cannot ſteal one drop of mercy from this endleſs, boundleſs, bottomleſs ſea of divine bounty, but it is felt and queſtioned! ver. 45. And Jeſus ſaid, Who touched me?

Who can forbear the diſciple's reply,—"Who touched thee, O Lord?—the multitude: Doſt thou aſk of one, when thou art preſſed of many? In the midſt of a throng, doſt thou enquire, Who touched me?"

"Nay, but yet ſome one touched me: All thronged me, but one touched. How riddle-like ſoever it may ſeem to ſound, they that thronged me touched me not: She only touched me, who thronged me not; yea, who touched me not." Even ſo, O Saviour, others touched thy body with theirs; ſhe touched thy hem with her hand, thy divine power with her ſoul.

Chriſt inſiſts upon his former challenge, and poſitively aſſerts, Somebody hath touched me; for I perceive that virtue is gone out of me. The effect proves the act; that which is a rule in nature,—that every agent works by contact, holds ſpiritually too. Then doſt thou, O God, work upon our ſouls, when thou toucheſt our hearts with thy Spirit; then do we re-act upon thee, when we touch thee by our faith and confidence in thee. Nothing could pleaſe thee more than this, to feel virtue fetched out of thee by the faith of the receiver. It is the nature and the praiſe of God to be communicative. Thou that knoweſt thy ſtore ſo infinite, canſt not but be more willing to give than we to receive. Thou, that waſt wont to hold it much better to give than to receive, canſt not but give gladly. Fear not then, O my ſoul, to lade plentifully at this well, this ocean of mercy, which, the more thou takeſt, doth but overflow the more.

But why then, O Saviour, didſt thou thus inquire and expoſtulate?—Was it for thine own ſake, that the glory of the miracle might thus come to light, which elſe had been ſmothered in ſilence? Was it for Jairus's ſake, that his depreſſed heart might be raiſed to a confidence in thy omnipotence and mighty power? Or was it chiefly for the woman's ſake, for the praiſe of her faith, and for the ſecurity of her conſcience?—Her modeſty and ſilence through the whole tranſaction, as they had hidden her diſeaſe, ſo would they have hidden her virtue. Chriſt will not ſuffer this ſecrecy, or loſe the honour of ſo ſingular a mercy, the knowledge whereof was well adapted to promote the nobleſt ends:—amongſt which it is very obvious to remark one, namely, that as there was an error in this woman's thought of concealment, ſo in our Lord's words there was a correction of that error; nor will his mercy ſuffer her to retire with that ſecret offence on her head.

Omniſcience cannot be eluded or deceived. Well indeed might the woman think, "He who can thus cure, and thus know his cure, can as well know my name, deſcry my perſon, and ſhame and chaſtiſe my ingratitude." Accordingly, finding ſhe was not hid, ver. 47. with a pale face and trembling foot, ſhe comes, and falls down before him, humbly acknowledging what ſhe had done, and what ſhe had obtained. Could ſhe have found any way privily to retreat with her cure, ſhe had not confeſſed it; and thus had ſhe deprived God of his glory, and been herſelf a thankleſs receiver of ſo great a benefit. O my God, in the deepeſt darkneſs, in the moſt inward retirement, when none ſees me, when I ſee not myſelf, yet let me then perceive thine all-ſeeing eye full upon me; and if ever mine eyes ſhall be ſhut, or arreſted by a prevailing temptation, check me with a ſpeedy reproof, that with this abaſhed penitent I may come in, and confeſs my error, and implore thy mercy!

It is no unuſual thing for kindneſs itſelf to look ſternly for the time, that it may endear itſelf the more when it ſhall pleaſe to be diſcovered. Thus with a ſevere countenance had our Lord looked round him, and aſked, Who touched me? But when the woman came trembling, and confeſſing both her act and ſucceſs, his brow clears up, and he ſpeaks comfortably to her: Daughter, be of chear; thy faith hath made thee whole: Go in peace. ver. 48. O ſweet and ſeaſonable words, fit for thoſe merciful and divine lips to utter; able to ſecure my heart, to diſpel my fears!

Her cure was Chriſt's act; yet he gives the praiſe of it to her:—Thy faith hath made thee whole. He acknowledges a virtue inherent in her; not that her faith did it by way of merit or efficacy, but by way of imputation and gracious conceſſion. So much doth our Saviour regard that faith which he had wrought in her, that he will honour it with the ſucceſs of a cure. And ſuch is ſtill the remedy of our ſpiritual diſeaſes, our ſins. By faith we are juſtified; by faith we are ſaved. Thou only, O Saviour, canſt heal us, and thou wilt not heal us but by our faith; not as it iſſues from us, but as it appropriates thee. The ſickneſs is our own by nature; the remedy ours by grace, both working and accepting it; and our faith is no leſs from thee, than thy cure is from our faith.

O happy diſmiſſion, Go in peace! How unquiet had this poor object hitherto been! A body diſeaſed, a mind grievouſly diſquieted, with ſorrow for her ſickneſs, with anger at her unavailing phyſicians, with fear of continuance of ſo bad a gueſt; and her ſoul, for the preſent, had no peace, from the ſenſe of her guiltineſs in the tranſaction of this buſineſs, and from the conceived diſpleaſure of that Gracious One, to whom ſhe came for comfort and redreſs. But now, at once doth the Saviour calm all theſe ſtorms, and in one word and act reſtore her to perfect peace; peace in body, in mind, in ſoul.

Even ſo, Lord, it was for thee only, who art the prince of peace, to beſtow thy peace wherever thou pleaſeſt. Our bodies, minds, ſouls, eſtates are thine, whether to afflict or eaſe. In vain ſhall we ſpeak peace to ourſelves; in vain ſhall the world ſpeak peace to us, except thou ſay to our hearts, as thou didſt to this diſtreſſed ſoul,—Go in peace.

Chap. IX. Ver. 1. His twelve diſciples] The twelve, Wat. and MS.

Ver. 4. There abide] This was to prevent any reproach which might be brought againſt them for changing their quarters, from too great a regard to the little circumſtances of domeſtic accommodation, or from principles of luxury, with a view to living better. See on Matth. x. 11.

6 And they departed, and went through the towns, preaching the goſpel, and healing every where.

7 Now Herod the Tetrarch heard of all that was done by him: and he was perplexed, becauſe that it was ſaid of ſome, that John was riſen from the dead;

8 And of ſome, that Elias had appeared; and of others, that one of the old prophets was riſen again.

9 And Herod ſaid, John have I beheaded: but who is this of whom I hear ſuch things? And he deſired to ſee him.

10 And the Apoſtles, when they were returned, told him all that they had done. And he took them, and went aſide privately into a deſart place, belonging to the city called Bethſaida.

11 And the people, when they knew it, followed him: and he received them, and ſpake unto them of the kingdom of God, and healed them that had need of healing.

12 And when the day began to wear away, then came the twelve, and ſaid unto him, Send the multitude away, that they may go into the towns and country round about, and lodge, and get victuals: for we are here in a deſart place.

13 But he ſaid unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they ſaid, We have no more but five loaves and two fiſhes; except we ſhould go and buy meat for all this people.

14 For they were about five thouſand men. And he ſaid to his diſciples, Make them ſit down by fifties in a company.

15 And they did ſo, and made them all ſit down.

16 Then he took the five loaves and the two fiſhes, and looking up to heaven, he bleſſed them, and brake, and gave to the diſciples to ſet before the multitude.

17 And they did eat, and were all filled: and there was taken up of fragments that remained to them, twelve baſkets.

18 And it came to paſs as he was alone praying, his diſciples were with him: And he aſked them, ſaying, Whom ſay the people that I am?

19 They anſwering, ſaid, John the Baptiſt; but ſome ſay, Elias; and others ſay, that one of the old prophets is riſen again.

20 He ſaid unto them, But whom ſay ye that I am? Peter anſwering, ſaid, The Chriſt of God.

21 And he ſtraightly charged them, and commanded them to tell no man that thing;

22 Saying, The Son of man muſt ſuffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and chief prieſts, and ſcribes, and be ſlain, and be raiſed the third day.

23 And he ſaid to them all, If any man will come after me, let him deny himſelf, and take up his croſs daily, and follow me.

24 For whoſoever will ſave his life, ſhall loſe it: but whoſoever will loſe his life for my ſake, the ſame ſhall ſave it.

25 For what is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and loſe himſelf, or be caſt away?

26 For whoſoever ſhall be aſhamed of me, and of my words, of him ſhall the Son of man be aſhamed, when he ſhall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels.

Ver. 6. And they departed] The reader will find in Mr. Locke's Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, p. 133, &c. ſome important reflections on the propriety of our Lord's choice of his Apoſtles, in proof of the admirable contrivance of the divine wiſdom in the whole work of our redemption. See alſo the latter part of the note on Matth. x. 2, &c. and xi. 25.

Ver. 7. And he was perplexed] He was exceedingly anxious. Διηπόρει ſtrongly expreſſes a mixture of doubt and fear, which muſt neceſſarily throw the mind into a very uneaſy ſituation.

Ver. 9. And he deſired to ſee him] Probably that he might have an opportunity of being reconciled to him; for though at firſt Herod affected not to believe that John was riſen, yet the perplexity he was in when he heard of it, ſhews plainly that he feared the worſt.

Ver. 10. Bethſaida] This place was only a village, till Philip the Tetrarch of Iturea adorned it with new buildings, drew a wall round it, and called it Julias, in honour of Julia, the daughter of Auguſtus. This city therefore being under Philip's juriſdiction, muſt have ſtood ſomewhere to the eaſt of Jordan. Joſephus has marked its ſituation diſtinctly, by aſſerting that the river Jordan falls into the lake of Genneſaret, behind the city Julias. All the circumſtances mentioned in the Goſpels which have any relation to Bethſaida, quadrate exactly with this ſituation. Bethſaida is indeed called a town of Galilee, John xii. 21. whereas the city which Philip rebuilt was in Gaulonitis. But to this it may be anſwered, that Bethſaida being ſituated hard by Jordan, which divided Galilee from Gaulonitis, it might be called a town of either country, and belong ſometimes to the one, and ſometimes to the other. Farther, though when Joſephus wrote, Galilee did not extend beyond Jordan, the boundary of Herod's dominions; yet the Scripture gives the name of Galilee to the whole region lying north of the ſea. See Reland and Macknight.

Ver. 12 And lodge] The original word καταλύσωσι, is uſed by mariners to ſignify to come back, or retire from the ſea to the haven; and from thence it is applied to travellers who go to their inn; and in a general ſenſe it implies to refreſh one's ſelf. See Hammond and Stockius.

Ver. 25. Or be caſt away] This expreſſion does not ſignify merely to loſe life, which might be applied to a man, who accidentally met death in the purſuit of gain, (as a merchant, who ſhould be loſt in his voyage;) but it properly imports undergoing a capital puniſhment, which is an idea of much greater terror, as well as of ſtricter propriety in the preſent caſe; and it were to be wiſhed that it might be ſeriouſly conſidered by every one in this aweful view. See on Mark viii. 38. Our Lord frequently after this repeated the prediction of his ſufferings, (See ver. 22. and compare Matth. xvii. 22. xx. 18. xxvi. 2. Luke xvii. 25. xxii. 15.) But it is remarkable, that on none of theſe occaſions was the prophecy delivered to any but the twelve, and a few ſelect women, ch. xxiv. 6—8. one inſtance excepted, namely, ch. xvii. 25. where it was expreſſed in terms ſomewhat obſcure. The multitude of the diſciples were never let into the ſecret, becauſe it might have made them deſert Chriſt; as they had not, like the Apoſtles, raiſed expectations of particular preferments in his kingdom to bias their underſtandings, and hinder them from perceiving the meaning of the prediction. It is true, he foretold his reſurrection from the dead more publickly; for oftener than once he appealed to it, as the principal proof of his miſſion, even in the preſence of the prieſts, as is evident from Matth. xxvii. 63. See Macknight and Raphelius.

Ver. 26. In his own glory, and in his Father's] In his own glory, may ſignify the glory peculiar to him as God-man. Probably the majeſty and ſplendor of his glorified body, a viſible repreſentation of which he exhibited in the transfiguration, about a week after this diſcourſe was delivered. He ſhall come alſo in the glory of the Father, 27 But I tell you of a truth, there be ſome ſtanding here which ſhall not taſte of death till they ſee the kingdom of God.

28 And it came to paſs about an eight days after theſe ſayings, he took Peter, and John, and James, and went up into a mountain to pray.

29 And as he prayed, the faſhion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and gliſtering.

30 And behold, there talked with him two men, which were Moſes and Elias:

31 Who appeared in glory, and ſpake of his deceaſe, which he ſhould accompliſh at Jeruſalem.

32 But Peter, and they that were with him, were heavy with ſleep: and when they were awake, they ſaw his glory, and the two men that ſtood with him.

33 And it came to paſs, as they departed from him, Peter ſaid unto Jeſus, Maſter, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moſes, and one for Elias: not knowing what he ſaid.

34 While he thus ſpake, there came a cloud, and overſhadowed them: and they feared as they entered into the cloud.

35 And there came a voice out of the cloud, ſaying, This is my beloved Son: hear him.

36 And when the voice was paſt, Jeſus was found alone. And they kept it cloſe, and told no man in thoſe days any of thoſe things which they had ſeen.

37 And it came to paſs, that on the next day, when they were come down from the hill, much people met him:

38 And behold, a man of the company cried out, ſaying, Maſter, I beſeech thee, look upon my ſon: for he is mine only child.

39 And lo, a ſpirit taketh him, and he ſuddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruiſing him, hardly departeth from him.

40 And I beſought thy diſciples to caſt him out; and they could not.

41 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid, O faithleſs and perverſe generation, how long ſhall I be with you, and ſuffer you? Bring thy ſon hither.

42 And as he was yet a coming, the devil threw him down, and tare him. And Jeſus rebuked the unclean ſpirit, and healed the child, and delivered him again to his father.

43 And they were all amazed at the auguſtly arrayed in the inacceſſible light, wherein God dwells; (1 Tim. vi. 16. See alſo Acts i. 11.) and which, darting through and enlightening all ſpace with its ineffable brightneſs, ſhall make even the ſun to diſappear. Withal, to render his advent to judge the world the more grand, he will come with the holy angels, attended by the whole hoſt, an innumerable company, ready to execute his commands. See Matth. xxv. 31. and Bragge on the parables, vol. ii. p. 181.

Ver. 28. About eight days] What St. Luke calls eight days, is by St. Matthew and St. Mark termed ſix days. The like differences are to be met with in profane hiſtorians. For inſtance, Suetonius Galba, chap. 17. tells us, that Piſo, before he was murdered, had lived ſix days in the character of Cæſar; and Piſo himſelf, in his ſpeech to the ſoldiers, mentions the ſame ſpace of time: "It is now the ſixth day ſince I was adopted Cæſar." Tacit. Hiſt. lib. i. cap. 29. Nevertheleſs the ſame Tacitus, lib. i. cap. 48. tells us, that he was Cæſar only four days; and cap. 19. of the ſame book, that there were only four days between his being created Cæſar and his death. See Matth. xii. 40. and Macknight.

Ver. 29. The faſhion of his countenance was altered] The appearance, &c. was changed. See on Matth. xvii. 2. This was ſo ſtriking a circumſtance, that Eunapius relates a ſtory of Jamblichus, which ſeems evidently to be borrowed from this, (Vit. Jamb. p. 22.) as many things which Philoſtratus tells us of Apollonius Tyanæus ſeem alſo to be borrowed from other hiſtories recorded of Chriſt by the Evangeliſts. The words λευκὸς ἐξαστράπτων, which we render white and gliſtering, may be literally rendered white as lightning;—ſplendid and dazzling as the blaze of lightning.

Ver. 31. And ſpake of his deceaſe] His ἔξοδος, or exit, which he was ſhortly to complete at Jeruſalem. See 2 Pet. i. 15. and Wiſd. iii. 2. It is well obſerved by St. Chryſoſtom, that our Lord never ſpoke of his paſſion but immediately before and after he did ſome great miracle; and here we may obſerve, that in the midſt of his wonderful transfiguration the two ſaints ſpeak of his paſſion. A ſtrange opportunity, in his higheſt exaltation, to ſpeak of his ſufferings! to talk of Calvary on Tabor! when his head ſhone with glory, to tell him how it muſt bleed with thorns! when his face ſhone like the ſun, to tell him how it muſt be defiled with ſpitting! when his garments glittered with that celeſtial brightneſs, to tell him how they muſt be ſtripped off and divided! when he was ſeen between two ſaints, to tell him how he muſt be ſeen between two malefactors! In a word, in the midſt of his divine majeſty, to tell him of his ſhame! and whilſt he was transfigured in the mount, to tell him how he muſt be disfigured upon the croſs! yet theſe two heavenly prophets found this the fitteſt time for ſuch diſcourſe, rather chooſing to ſpeak of his ſufferings in the height of his glory, than of his glory after his ſufferings. It is moſt ſeaſonable in our beſt, to think of our worſt eſtate; for both that thought will be beſt digeſted when we are well, and that change will be beſt prepared for, when we are the furtheſt from it. See Bp. Hale's contemplations, and the Reflections on Mark ix.

Ver. 32, 33. And when they were awake] Probably the ſtreams of light which iſſued from Chriſt's body, eſpecially his countenance, and penetrated through the gloom of night, together with the voices of Moſes and Elias, made ſuch an impreſſion on their ſenſes, as to raiſe them from their ſlumber. The Apoſtles, both before and after the transfiguration, were with their maſter in many delightful ſpots of the country, heard many delightful ſermons, and ſaw many wonderful works; yet in no place, and on no occaſion but this, were they ever heard to ſay, It is good for us to be here. Peter fancied, no doubt, that Jeſus had now aſſumed his proper dignity; that Elias was come, according to Malachi's prediction; and that the kingdom was at length begun: wherefore, in the firſt hurry of his thoughts, he propoſed to provide ſome accommodation for Jeſus and his auguſt aſſiſtants, intending perhaps to bring the reſt of the diſciples with the multitude from the plain before them, to behold his matchleſs glory. He thought this was better for his Maſter than to be killed at Jeruſalem; concerning which he had not only converſed with his diſciples, (ſee ver. 22.) but alſo with the meſſengers from heaven, and the deſign of which Peter could not comprehend. Though St. Peter's propoſal was, as St. Mark obſerves, ch. ix. 6. improper enough; yet perhaps few in ſuch aſtoniſhing circumſtances could have been perfectly maſters of themſelves. The tents he propoſed to build muſt have been only ſlight bowers, like thoſe made uſe of at the feaſt of tabernacles.

Ver. 34, 35. There came a cloud] A bright cloud, St. Matthew calls it, ch. xvii. 5. and St. Peter, the excellent glory, 2 Pet. i. 17. whence we conclude, that it muſt have been the ſhechinah, or viſible ſymbol of the divine preſence; as is evident alſo from the words that came out of the cloud, which were the words of God himſelf; This is my Son, the Beloved, hear him. The voice uttering theſe words juſt as Moſes and Elias diſappeared, intimated that men were no longer to hearken unto them, ſpeaking in the law, but for the future were to obey Jeſus; becauſe Moſes and Elias, though both eminent in their ſtations, were only ſervants, whereas this was God's beloved Son. Beſides, the ſentence uttered by the voice, hear ye him, plainly alluding to Deut. xviii. 15. ſignified, that Jeſus was the prophet of whom Moſes ſpake in that paſſage. See the note there.

Ver. 39. And it teareth him] Throws him into convulſions. Wat. and MS. and ſo ver. 42.

Ver. 41. Bring thy ſon hither] In St. Mark, ch. ix. 19. the order is general; here our Lord addreſſes the father of the youth. After having rebuked the Scribes for their obſtinacy, he turned to the young man's father, and ordered him to bring his ſon to him.

Ver. 43. And they were all amazed] All the diſciples were amazed, when they conſidered the greatneſs of the power which Jeſus ſhewed mighty power of God. But while they wondered every one at all things which Jeſus did, he ſaid unto his diſciples, 44 Let theſe ſayings ſink down into your ears: for the Son of man ſhall be delivered into the hands of men.

45 But they underſtood not this ſaying, and it was hid from them, that they perceived it not: and they feared to aſk him of that ſaying.

46 Then there aroſe a reaſoning among them, which of them ſhould be greateſt.

47 And Jeſus perceiving the thought of their heart, took a child, and ſet him by him,

48 And ſaid unto them, Whoſoever ſhall receive this child in my name, receiveth me; and whoſoever ſhall receive me, receiveth him that ſent me: for he that is leaſt among you all, the ſame ſhall be great.

49 And John anſwered and ſaid, Maſter, we ſaw one caſting out devils in thy name; and we forbad him, becauſe he followeth not with us.

50 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Forbid him not: for he that is not againſt us, is for us.

51 And it came to paſs, when the time was come that he ſhould be received up, he ſtedfaſtly ſet his face to go to Jeruſalem.

52 And ſent meſſengers before his face: and they went, and entered into a village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him.

53 And they did not receive him, becauſe his face was as though he would go to Jeruſalem.

54 And when his diſciples James and John ſaw this, they ſaid, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and conſume them, even as Elias did?

55 But he turned, and rebuked them, and ſaid, Ye know not what manner of ſpirit ye are of.

56 For the Son of man is not come to deſtroy men's lives, but to ſave them. And they went to another village.

in his laſt miracle. It ſhould ſeem that their wonder was accompanied with proportionably high expectations of happineſs in that temporal kingdom which they were now convinced he could eaſily erect. Jeſus knowing this, thought fit, when they came into Galilee (the country were he had the moſt followers) to moderate his diſciples ambition, by predicting his own ſufferings.

Ver. 44. Into your ears; for the Son, &c.] Into your ears; namely, The Son, &c. MS.

Ver. 45. And they feared to aſk him] "Either they imagined that Chriſt, by the poſitive manner in which he delivered his prophecy, underſtood it to be adapted to their capacities, and therefore they dreaded to aſk any farther explanation; or they dreaded to be more particularly informed of what contradicted their favourite notion of a temporal deliverer." Sir D. D—.

Ver. 46. Then there aroſe a reaſoning] Διαλογισμος, a debate, or diſpute. As this diſpute happened immediately after Jeſus foretold his own ſufferings and reſurrection, ſome imagine that by his ſufferings the diſciples underſtood certain great difficulties which their Maſter was to meet with before the eſtabliſhment of his kingdom; and by his reſurrection from the dead, his ſurmounting theſe difficulties: However, the circumſtance mentioned by St. Matthew, xvii. 23. that the prediction made them exceeding ſorry, does not ſeem to agree ſo well with that ſuppoſition, unleſs the thought of his meeting with any oppoſition at all grieved them, even though they were ſure he would ſurmount it. According to St. Luke's repreſentation in our verſion, this diſpute happened at the time when our Lord rebuked his diſciples for it; but we are expreſly told, Mark ix. 33. that it happened as they went to Capernaum. The Evangeliſts may be reconciled by tranſlating St. Luke's words thus: Now there had ariſen a diſpute, &c. namely, as they travelled into Capernaum.

Ver. 51. When the time was come] About this time the feaſt of dedication approached; a ſolemnity not appointed by the law of Moſes, but by that heroic reformer Judas Maccabeus, in commemoration of his having cleanſed the temple, and reſtored its worſhip, after both had been profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes: But although this feaſt was of human inſtitution, and Jeſus foreſaw that further attempts would be made upon his life at Jeruſalem, he did not fear it, but went thither with great reſolution. St. Luke explains the reaſon of this: He had now continued upon earth very near the whole period determined, and was ſoon to be taken up to heaven, from whence he had come down; he therefore reſolved from this time forth to appear as openly as poſſible, and to embrace every opportunity of fulfilling the duties of his miniſtry. When the time was come, or fulfilled (—ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦσθαι) according to the Hebrew idiom ſignifies, when the time drew on, or approached. The word ἀναλήψις, in this paſſage, ſignifies Chriſt's being received or taken up into heaven; for we find αναλαμβάνομαι, from whence it is derived, applied expreſly to his aſcenſion, Matth. xvi. 19. Acts i. 2. xi. 22. 2 Tim. iii. 6. The word ἡμέρας, days or time, does not always imply a determinate ſpace, but is ſometimes uſed in a looſe and indefinite ſenſe, as in this place. The phraſe, he ſteadfaſtly ſet his face, imports a ſtrong and intrepid reſolution, notwithſtanding the foreknowledge our Saviour had of the dangers which awaited him. See Ezek. iv. 3. Macknight, Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 52, 53. And ſent meſſengers] Our Lord did not now travel privately to Jeruſalem, as he had often done before; but declaring his intention publickly, entered on the journey with great courage. The road to Jeruſalem from Galilee lay through Samaria; wherefore, as the inhabitants of this country bore the greateſt ill-will to all that worſhipped in Jeruſalem, Jeſus thought it neceſſary to ſend meſſengers before him, with orders to find out quarters for him in one of the villages: but the inhabitants refuſed to receive him, becauſe his intention in this journey was publickly known. The Samaritans could not refuſe lodging to all the travellers which went to Jeruſalem, as the high road lay through their country; ſuch travellers only as went thither profeſſedly to worſhip were the objects of their indignation. Hence the expreſſion, becauſe his face was as though he would go to Jeruſalem, muſt imply, that his deſign of worſhipping at Jeruſalem was known to the Samaritans.

Ver. 54—56. And when his diſciples, James and John] That theſe diſciples, ſo remarkably diſtinguiſhed by their Lord's favour, ſhould have ſome diſtinguiſhed zeal and faith, may ſeem leſs wonderful than that a perſon of ſo ſweet a diſpoſition as John ſhould make ſo ſevere a propoſal. Our Lord, whoſe meekneſs on all occaſions was admirable, ſharply reprimanded his diſciples for entertaining ſo unbecoming a reſentment: Ye know not what manner of ſpirit ye are of: "Ye do not know the ſinfulneſs of the diſpoſition which ye have juſt now expreſſed; neither do ye conſider the difference of times, perſons, and diſpenſations." The ſeverity which Elijah exerciſed on the men who came from Ahaziah to apprehend him, was a reproof of an idolatrous king, court, and nation, very proper for the times, and very agreeable to the characters both of the prophet who gave it, and of the offenders to whom it was given; at the ſame time it was not unſuitable to the nature of the diſpenſation they were under: But the Goſpel breathes a different ſpirit from the law, whoſe puniſhments and rewards were all of a temporal kind; and therefore it does not admit of this ſort of rigour and ſeverity. Bengelius would render the clauſe interrogatively, Do ye not know what kind of ſpirit ye are of? "Are you not ſenſible that this proceeds from a revengeful ſpirit, which is in every reſpect contrary to the nature of my diſpenſation, and the deſign of my coming into the world."—Accordingly he tells them, that to deſtroy mens lives was utterly inconſiſtent with that deſign: The Son of man is not come to deſtroy mens lives, but to ſave them, ver. 56. alluding to his miracles, by which he reſtored health to the diſeaſed bodies of men; as well as to his doctrine and death, by which he gives life to their ſouls. Having ſaid theſe things, he went with them to another village, the inhabitants whereof were men of better diſpoſitions. This was a noble inſtance of patience under a real and unprovoked injury; an inſtance which expreſſed infinite ſweetneſs of diſpoſition, and which for that reaſon ſhould be imitated by all who call themſelves Chriſt's diſciples. The reader will find more on this ſubject by referring to Warburton's Div. Leg. vol. ii. part 2. p. 17. Morris's Serm. 6. the note on 2 Kings i. 10. and the Reflections at the end of this chapter. Sir D. Dalrymple obſerves upon this paſſage, that "it is of great moment, not only as pointing out the doctrine of the meek and merciful Jeſus, but as ſhewing that we have the evangelical hiſtory without corruption; for would perſecutors, that is, almoſt all men who have had power in all ages, have ſuffered ſuch a paſſage againſt perſecution to have remained, had it been in their power to have corrupted it?"

57 And it came to paſs that as they went in the way, a certain man ſaid unto him, Lord, I will follow thee whitherſoever thou goeſt.

58 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have neſts; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.

59 And he ſaid unto another, Follow me. But he ſaid, Lord, ſuffer me firſt to go and bury my father.

60 Jeſus ſaid unto him, Let the dead bury their dead: but go thou and preach the kingdom of God.

61 And another alſo ſaid, Lord, I will follow thee; but let me firſt go bid them farewel which are at home at my houſe.

62 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.

Ver. 57. Matth. viii. 19.—V. 59. Matth. viii. 21.—V. 61. 1 Kings xix. 20.

Ver. 60. Go thou, and preach] See the notes on Matth. viii. 21. As our Lord called this perſon now to follow him, we muſt conclude that this commiſſion which he gives him to preach was not now directly put into execution. The circumſtance was plainly extraordinary, and might turn on reaſons unknown to us. Chriſt might, for inſtance, foreſee ſome particular obſtruction that would have ariſen from the interview with this perſon's friends at his father's funeral, and have prevented his devoting himſelf to the miniſtry; to which he might refer by ſaying, Let the dead bury their dead. See Doddridge.

Ver. 61. But let me firſt go, &c.] This event may have happened at another time; (the ſimilarity of circumſtances, poſſibly, cauſing St. Luke to join theſe particulars together) for ſurely it would have been very improper to have aſked permiſſion to go and bid thoſe at home farewel, after the anſwer Chriſt had juſt made in the preceding verſe. The phraſe, ἀποτάξασθαι τοῖς εἰς τὸν οἶκόν μου, ſignifies, "Permit me firſt to go and ſettle the affairs of my family, and take my leave of them who are at my houſe;" as Eliſha was permitted to do, when called in ſo extraordinary a manner to the prophetic office, 1 Kings xix. 20. Intending to give up his poſſeſſions, he probably deſigned to order how they ſhould be diſtributed among his friends, as Heinſius has very well explained the paſſage.

Ver, 62. No man, &c.] Heſiod has given it as the character of a good ploughman, that "he keeps his mind intent on his work, that he may make a ſtraight furrow, and does not allow himſelf to gaze about on his companions." Our Lord, on the like obvious principle, may uſe the phraſe, of one that looks behind him while his hand is on the plough, as a kind of proverbial expreſſion for a careleſs, irreſolute perſon, who muſt be peculiarly unfit for the Chriſtian miniſtry; or he might allude to Lot's wife, whoſe looking back is explained by Philo to imply an immediate regard to the riches of this world, and attachment to family-connections, ſo as to make us indifferent to the great duties of morality, and the cauſe of religion. How happy had it been for the church of Chriſt, had this lively admonition been regarded; without which it is impoſſible to divide, or rather direct, the word of truth aright, 2 Tim. ii. 15. See ch. xvii. 32. See Heſiod's weeks and days, lib. ii. ver. 60. and Bos's Obſervations, ch. vi.

REFLECTIONS ON VERSE 51—56.

The time now drew on, in which Jeſus muſt be received up: Calvary is in his paſſage to mount Olivet: He muſt be lifted up to the croſs, thence to aſcend into his heaven. Yet this comes not into mention; as if all the thoughts of death were ſwallowed up in this victory of our Lord over death, He ſtedfaſtly ſet his face to go to Jeruſalem. Well did he know the plots and ambuſhes that were there laid for him, and the bloody iſſue of thoſe deſigns; yet will he go, reſolved for the worſt. It is wiſe to ſend our thoughts before us to grapple with thoſe evils which we know muſt be encountered: The enemy is half overcome, who is but well prepared for, and the ſtrongeſt miſchief may be counteracted by a ſeaſonable fore-reſolution.

The way from Galilee to Judea lay through the region of Samaria, if not through the city. Chriſt, now towards the end of his miniſtry, could not but be attended with a multitude of followers. Purveyors therefore and harbingers were neceſſary to procure lodgings and proviſion for ſo large a troop: ſome of his own retinue are addreſſed to this ſervice. He who could have commanded the angels, ſues to Samaritans for houſe-room and victuals: He that filled and comprehended heaven, ſeeks for ſhelter in a Samaritan cottage. How can we either neglect means, or deſpiſe homelineſs, when thou, the God of all the world, wouldeſt ſtoop to the ſuit of ſo poor a proviſion!

No nations were mutually ſo hateful to each other as the Samaritans and the Jews; the bare looking towards Jeruſalem, was therefore found ſufficient cauſe of repulſe: No enmity, alas! ſo deſperate as that which ariſes from matter of religion; and agreement in ſome points, where there are differences in the main, doth but advance hatred the more.

Which now are we to think moſt ſtrange,—to hear the Son of God ſue for a lodging, or to hear him repulſed. And even upon ſuch a denial, can we help wondering to hear the two angry diſciples return with their Maſter on ſo fiery an errand, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire, &c.?

Theſe ſons of thunder would inſtantly become lightning. Whether, as being kinſmen or diſciples, their zeal could not brook ſo harſh a refuſal: Naturally more hot than their companions, they now thought their piety bade them be impatient.

Obſerve we their progreſs; a reſpectful preface led on a faulty ſuit; faulty, both in preſumption, and in a deſire of private revenge. Maſter, wilt thou, &c.? We do not hear them ſay, "Maſter, will it pleaſe thee, who art the ſole Lord of the heavens, and the elements, to command,"—but Wilt thou that We command? As if, becauſe they had received power over diſeaſes, and unclean ſpirits, therefore heaven and earth were at their beck and controul. But it is the faſhion of our bold nature, upon much given, ſtill to challenge more; and where we find ourſelves graced with ſome abilities, to flatter ourſelves with the faculty of large increaſe.

Had theſe diſciples, indeed, either ſaid or meant, "Maſter, if it be thy pleaſure to command us to call down fire from heaven, we know thy word ſhall enable us to do what thou requireſt; if the words be ours, the power ſhall be thine," this had been but holy, modeſt, faithful; But now the act had in it both cruelty and private revenge; and their zeal was not more worthy of praiſe, than their fury of cenſure.

That fire ſhould fall down from heaven upon men, is a fearful thing even to think of, and hath not been often done: It was done in the caſe of Sodom, when thoſe five unclean cities burned with the unnatural fire of helliſh luſt; it was done too repeatedly at the ſuit of Elijah; and it was done, in an height of trial, to that great pattern of patience, the patriarch Job: We find it no more, and tremble at theſe inſtances we find.

But beſides the dreadfulneſs of the judgement itſelf, who can help trembling at the thought of the ſuddenneſs of this deſtruction, which ſweeps away both body and ſoul, in an unprepared ſtate; ſo that this fire ſhould but begin a worſe, even an eternal; and this heavenly flame, enkindle that of hell!

Thus inconceivably heavy was the revenge; but what was the offence? Had theſe Samaritans reviled Chriſt and his train; had they violently aſſaulted him; had they followed him with ſtones in their hands, and blaſphemies in their mouths, it had been juſt provocation to the warmeſt reſentment and indignation. But now their wrong was only negative; They received him not; ſo that their rejection was but a mere inhoſpitality to a gueſt moſt odious from national diſguſt;—and yet, no leſs revenge will ſerve theſe zealous diſciples than fire from heaven.

Who ſhall heſitate to ſay for you, ye holy Sons of Zebedee, that it was not ſpleen but zeal that urged ſo fearful a ſuggeſtion? Your indignation could not but be ſtirred, to ſee the great Prophet and Saviour of the world ſo unkindly repulſed; yet will not all this excuſe you from a raſh cruelty; from an inordinate and exceſſive rage.

Even the beſt heart may eaſily be miſcarried with a well-meant zeal; no affection is either more neceſſary, or better accepted;—but there is nothing ſo ill as the corruption of the beſt things; and rectified zeal is not more commendable and uſeful, than inordinate and miſguided zeal is hateful and dangerous. Fire is a neceſſary and beneficial element; but nothing more dreadful than fire, when raging and miſplaced.

And thus it is that zeal ſometimes turns to murder!—and then, they that kill you ſhall think that they do God ſervice. Sometimes it turns to frenzy, ſometimes to rude indiſcretion. Wholeſome and bleſſed is that zeal which is well grounded, and well governed; grounded upon the word of truth, not upon unſtable fancies; governed by wiſdom and charity: wiſdom to avoid raſhneſs and exceſs, charity to avoid giving juſt offence.

No motion can want a pretence to countenance it. "Elias did ſo, why not we? He was an holy prophet; the occaſion, the place differs not much; there wrong was offered to a ſervant, here to his maſter; there to a man, here to a God-and-man; if Elias then did it, why not we?" There is nothing more perilous than to draw all the actions of holy men into examples; there muſt be much caution uſed in our imitation of the beſt patterns, whether of perſons or things, if we would avoid the charge of ſervile indiſcretion, or ſinful abſurdity.

The faults of uncharitableneſs cannot be ſwallowed up in zeal. Here our Lord turns back, and frowns on his furious ſuitors with a conciſe but ſharp rebuke, Ye know not what ſpirit ye are of. Another man would not perhaps have felt it; a diſciple's heart could not but be ſenſible of its force. The ſpirit of Elias was that which they want to aſſume and imitate; they ſhall now know the greatneſs of their error. How would they have hated to conceive that any other than God's Spirit had incited them to this paſſionate emotion! But they ſhall now be convinced that it was wrought by the very evil ſpirit, whom they moſt zealouſly profeſſed to abhor.

It is far from the good Spirit of God to ſtir up any man to private revenge, CHAP. X.

Chriſt ſendeth out at once ſeventy diſciples to work miracles, and to preach: admoniſheth them to be humble, and wherein to rejoice: thanketh his Father for his grace: magnifieth the happy eſtate of his church: teacheth the lawyer how to attain eternal life, and to eſteem every one as his neighbour, that needeth his mercy: reprehendeth Martha, and commendeth Mary her ſiſter.

AFTER theſe things, the Lord appointed other ſeventy alſo, and ſent them two and two before his face into every city, and place, whither he himſelf would come.

2 Therefore ſaid he unto them, The harveſt truly is great, but the labourers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harveſt, that he would ſend forth labourers into his harveſt.

3 Go your ways: behold, I ſend you forth as lambs among wolves.

4 Carry neither purſe, nor ſcrip, nor ſhoes: and ſalute no man by the way.

5 And into whatſoever houſe ye enter, firſt ſay, Peace be to this houſe.

6 And if the Son of peace be there, your peace ſhall reſt upon it: if not, it ſhall turn to you again.

7 And in the ſame houſe remain, eating and drinking ſuch things as they give: for the labourer is worthy of his hire. Go not from houſe to houſe.

8 And into whatever city ye enter, and they receive you, eat ſuch things as are ſet before you:

9 And heal the ſick that are therein, and ſay unto them, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

10 But into whatſoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, go your ways out into the ſtreets of the ſame, and ſay,

11 Even the very duſt of your city which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off againſt you: notwithſtanding, be ye ſure of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

12 But I ſay unto you, that it ſhall be more tolerable in that day for Sodom, than for that city.

13 Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethſaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, which have been done in you, they had a great while ago repented, ſitting in ſackcloth and aſhes.

14 But it ſhall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the judgement, than for you.

15 And thou, Capernaum, which are exalted to heaven, ſhalt be thruſt down to hell.

16 He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth me;

revenge, or thirſt of blood; not an eagle's but a dove's was the ſhape wherein he choſe to appear: neither wouldſt thou, O God, be in the whirlwind, or in the fire; but in the ſoft, ſtill, ſmall voice. O Saviour, why do we then ſeek for any precedent, but Him whoſe name we challenge?

Thoſe that would imitate God's ſaints in ſingular actions, as in the inſtance before us, muſt ſee that they go upon the ſame grounds. Without the ſame ſpirit, and the ſame warrant, it is either mockery or a ſin to make them our patterns. Their Maſter, and not Elias, is the only fit exemplar for his diſciples: The Son of man came not to deſtroy mens lives, but to ſave them.

Then are our actions and intentions warrantable and praiſe-worthy, when they accord with his. O Saviour, when we look into thy ſacred acts and monuments, how many a life do we find which thou preſervedſt from periſhing; ſome that had periſhed, by thee recalled, but never any by thee deſtroyed. How then can we enough love and praiſe thy mercy, O thou preſerver of men! How ſhould we imitate thy ſaving, thy beneficent Spirit exerciſed towards us! Eſpecially when we call to mind that the more we can help to ſave, the nearer we approach to thee, who cameſt to ſave us all; that the more deſtructive and mercileſs we are, the more we reſemble him who is Abaddon,—a murderer from the beginning!

Chap. X. Ver. 1, 2. After theſe things the Lord appointed] The ſcene of Chriſt's miniſtry being from this time forth to lie in Judea, and the country beyond Jordan, it was expedient that his way ſhould be prepared in every city and village of thoſe countries whither he was to come: He therefore ſent out ſeventy of his diſciples on this work, mentioning the particular places which he intended to viſit, and in which they were to preach; whereas the twelve had been allowed to go where they pleaſed, provided they confined their miniſtry to the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael. St. Luke is the only Evangeliſt who has given us this account of Chriſt's ſending out the ſeventy, and it is the leſs to be wondered at that he ſhould do it ſo particularly, if the ancient tradition be true, which is generally believed, that he himſelf was one of the number. It is remarkable that our Lord aſſigns the ſame reaſon for the miſſion of the ſeventy, which he had aſſigned for the miſſion of the twelve diſciples. The harveſt was plenteous in Judea and Peræa, as well as in Galilee, and the labourers there alſo were few. See Matth. ix. 37, 38. and Whitby's Preface to St. Luke.

Ver. 4. And ſalute no man by the way] The inſtructions given to the ſeventy on this occaſion, were nearly the ſame with thoſe delivered to the twelve; concerning which, ſee the notes on Matth. xiii. Only he ordered the ſeventy to ſpend no time in ſaluting ſuch perſons as they met on the road, the time aſſigned them for going through the cities being but ſhort. The phraſe, ſalute no man by the way, implies the greateſt diſpatch, as is evident from 2 Kings iv. 29. For the eaſtern ſalutations were exceeding tedious, conſiſting of long wiſhes of happineſs to the perſon ſaluted, and of very particular inquiries concerning his welfare.

Ver. 6. If the Son of peace be there] That is, "If the maſter of the houſe be a virtuous, well-diſpoſed perſon, and receive you kindly, your peace ſhall reſt upon it: your bleſſing, which ye gave at your entrance, ſhall, by my power, be made effectual to that purpoſe." See Matth. x. 12.

Ver. 7 Such things as they give] As they have. Wat.

Ver. 13, 14. Woe unto thee, Chorazin] Having mentioned the puniſhment of thoſe cities which ſhould reject his miniſters, it naturally brought into our Lord's mind the ſtate and puniſhment of the cities where he himſelf had preached moſt frequently, namely, Chorazin, Bethſaida, and Capernaum; for, notwithſtanding he had often reſided in thoſe cities, and performed many miracles before the inhabitants of them, they had continued impenitent; wherefore, becauſe he was never to preach to them any more, and becauſe he knew how great their puniſhment would be, In the overflowing tenderneſs of his ſoul, he affectionately lamented their obſtinacy, which he foreſaw would draw upon them the heavieſt judgements. This part of his diſcourſe too was well calculated to comfort the ſeventy under the ill uſage they might meet with. The preaching of Chriſt himſelf had often been unacceptable, and unſucceſsful to many of his hearers, and therefore they had the leſs cauſe to be ſurprized if theirs ſhould prove ſo likewiſe. Conſidering the affectionate temper of our Lord, it is no wonder that he ſhould renew his lamentation over thoſe unhappy places, where he had ſo intimately converſed; and that he ſhould do it in ſuch words as theſe, ſo well calculated to alarm and impreſs all that ſhould hear or read them. Would to God they might now have their due weight with thoſe, who might paſs them over too ſlightly when they occurred before, Matth. xi. 20, &c! Would to God that every impenitent creature who reads them might know, that the ſentence of his own condemnation is now before his eyes! See Doddridge.

and he that deſpiſeth me, deſpiſeth him that ſent me.

17 And the ſeventy returned again with joy, ſaying, Lord, even the devils are ſubject unto us through thy name.

18 And he ſaid unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven.

19 Behold, I give unto you power to tread on ſerpents and ſcorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing ſhall by any means hurt you.

20 Notwithſtanding, in this rejoice not, that the ſpirits are ſubject unto you; but rather rejoice, becauſe your names are written in heaven.

21 In that hour Jeſus rejoiced in ſpirit, and ſaid, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe and prudent, and haſt revealed them unto babes: even ſo, Father; for ſo it ſeemed good in thy ſight.

22 All things are delivered to me of my Father: and no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him.

23 And he turned him unto his diſciples, and ſaid privately, Bleſſed are the eyes which ſee the things that ye ſee:

24 For I tell you, that many prophets and kings have deſired to ſee thoſe things which ye ſee, and have not ſeen them; and to hear thoſe things which ye hear, and have not heard them.

25 And behold, a certain lawyer ſtood up, and tempted him, ſaying, Maſter, what ſhall I do to inherit eternal life?

26 He ſaid unto him, What is written in the law? how readeſt thou?

27 And he anſwering, ſaid, Thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy ſoul, and with all thy ſtrength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyſelf.

Ver. 17, 18. Lord, even the devils are ſubject unto us] From the manner in which the ſeventy ſpeak of this latter exertion of their power, it would appear to have been what they did not expect when they ſet out; for though Jeſus had given them power to heal diſeaſes, ver. 9. he had ſaid nothing of their caſting out demons. Our Lord's reply may be paraphraſed thus, to retain its force and beauty: "He ſaid to them, I know that it is and muſt be ſo; for I myſelf ſaw Satan, the great prince of theſe demons, falling like lightning from heaven, on his firſt tranſgreſſion; and well remember how immediate and dreadful his ruin was: And I foreſee, in Spirit, that renewed, ſwift, and irreſiſtable victory, of which this preſent ſucceſs of yours is an earneſt, which the preaching of the Goſpel ſhall ſhortly gain over all theſe rebel powers, who, even in their higheſt ſtrength and glory, were ſo incapable of oppoſing the arm of God." See Doddridge. We may obſerve further, that to be exalted into heaven, ſignifies to be raiſed to great powers and privileges, and particularly to ſovereign dominion; to fall from heaven therefore may ſignify to loſe one's dominion and pre-eminency. The devils, by the idolatry of the Gentiles, and the wickedneſs of the Jews, had been exalted into heaven, had ruled mankind in oppoſition to the dominion of God; but by the preaching of the Goſpel their power was to be deſtroyed in every country. Eraſmus gives the words another turn: He thinks they were deſigned as a caution to the diſciples againſt pride; as if our Lord had ſaid, "You have great powers beſtowed upon you, and you have been very ſucceſsful in the exerciſe of them; be not too much elated on this account, but remember that pride was the ſin by which Lucifer fell from his ſeat in heaven." But the firſt explanation ſeems the beſt.

Ver. 19. Behold, I give you power, &c.] To tread on ſerpents is a proverbial expreſſion, which ſignifies victory over enemies; accordingly it is added, and over all the power of the enemy. Though theſe words, in the primary ſenſe, imply, that the Apoſtles ſhould be preſerved from theſe noxious creatures, as one of them literally was, (comp. Acts xxviii. 5. and Mark xvi. 18.) yet they ſeem to have likewiſe a ſecondary ſenſe, and to be a prediction that the diſciples ſhould obtain a complete victory over the infernal ſpirits in general; the devil himſelf being frequently mentioned in Scripture, in alluſion to the fall, under the appellation of the old ſerpent. If we conſider how great an inſtrument of idolatry the ſerpent has been in all ages, it will add ſome weight to this opinion. There is no need to prove the fact; it is well known what the caſe was in Egypt, in the eaſtern countries, in Greece, and Rome, and elſewhere. This ſpecies of idolatry, however it came there, was found in America, upon the firſt diſcovery of that country. Garcilaſco del' Viga, who wrote the hiſtory of the Incas of Peru, tells us, that the Spaniards forcing into the receſs of one of their temples, found there the image of a great dragon, placed as the deity of the temple, and the object of religious worſhip. Other inſtances in abundance might be produced, from ancient as well as modern hiſtory. When we reflect how extenſive this kind of idolatry has been, how it has ſpread over the whole world, we may judge, perhaps, that the firſt prophecy has been more literally accompliſhed than has been generally ſuppoſed; and that the old ſerpent, in his old form, with his ſeed, and the Son of man, the ſeed of the woman, have been in perfect enmity, and will be, till the time appointed comes for deſtroying the power of the evil one; when the dragon, that old ſerpent, which is the devil and Satan, ſhall be caſt into, and confined for ever in the lake of fire and brimſtone. See the notes on Gen. iii. Bos, Obſerv. Crit. p. 108. and Bp. Sherlock on Prophecy, Append. p. 180.

Ver. 20. Becauſe your names are written in heaven] Not by an abſolute decree, but approved and accepted of God, on account of their faith and ſincerity. Many are of opinion that this is an alluſion to the inrolment of the citizens names in a regiſter, by which their right to the privileges of citizenſhip was acknowledged by the community; And to confirm their opinion, they obſerve, that in Rev. iii. 5. God promiſes the members of the church of Sardis that he would not blot their names out of the book of life. It ſeems moſt probable that when the ſeventy diſciples were returned, Jeſus was ſurrounded with a great multitude of people; this may be gathered at leaſt from ver. 23. where, after having ſpoken publickly to the ſeventy, we are told, that he turned unto his diſciples, and ſaid privately, Bleſſed, &c. The happineſs here praiſed was enjoyed by the ſeventy, as well as by the twelve, and conſequently it was as fit that they ſhould be made ſenſible of its greatneſs, as that the twelve ſhould underſtand it. Beſides this declaration, as well as what was ſpoken more publickly, was deſigned to moderate the joy which the ſeventy had conceived on finding the devils ſubject to him. The ſubjection of the devils to their command was not ſo great an happineſs as their being allowed to hear Chriſt's ſermons, and to ſee his miracles. Theſe things ſhew, that what our Lord ſaid privately to his diſciples, was ſaid to the LXX, as well as to the twelve. If ſo, he was now attended by the multitude; which is the more neceſſary to obſerve, as it accounted for the behaviour of the lawyer in the ſubſequent verſes.

Ver. 25—28. And behold, a certain lawyer] If the connection with which St. Luke introduces the ſubſequent tranſaction implies, that it happened immediately after what goes before in the hiſtory, it took its riſe in the following manner: A doctor of the law, who it ſeems made one of the multitude which attended Jeſus when the ſeventy returned, having liſtened to what he ſaid to his diſciples in private, concerning their enjoyment of a happineſs which many prophets and kings had deſired in vain to obtain,—(namely, the happineſs of ſeeing his miracles, and of hearing his ſermons,) thought that he would make trial of that great wiſdom which he ſaid he poſſeſſed, by propoſing to him one of the moſt important queſtions which it is poſſible for the human mind to examine, namely, what a man muſt do to inherit eternal life? For, that he aſks the queſtion not from a ſincere deſire to know his duty, but merely to try our Lord's knowledge, is evident from the text. And further, he had probably an inſidious deſign to inſnare him; for the queſtion having been decided by the Jewiſh doctors, if Chriſt had anſwered differently, he might have been accuſed of hereſy. Jeſus, alluding to the Scribe's profeſſion, made anſwer, by inquiring of him what the law taught on that point? And perhaps when our Lord ſays, how readeſt thou? he alludes to the daily ſervice of the Jews, as appears more probable from the reply which the Scribe makes: The words, thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God, being then, and continuing ſtill, to be daily read in the morning ſervice of the ſynagogues; though it is remarkable, that the laſt clauſe, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf, is omitted by them. Our Lord approved of his anſwer, and allowed, that to love God, as the law enjoined, is the means of obtaining eternal life; becauſe it never fails to

28 And he ſaid unto him, Thou haſt anſwered right: this do, and thou ſhalt live.

29 But he, willing to juſtify himſelf, ſaid unto Jeſus, And who is my neighbour?

30 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid, A certain man went down from Jeruſalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which ſtripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead.

31 And by chance there came down a certain prieſt that way; and when he ſaw him, he paſſed by on the other ſide.

32 And likewiſe a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and paſſed by on the other ſide.

33 But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he ſaw him, he had compaſſion on him, 34 And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and ſet him on his own beaſt, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him.

produce obedience to all the divine revelations and commands, conſequently obedience to the Goſpel which he was then preaching. See on Matth. xxii. 37.

Ver. 29. But he, willing to juſtify himſelf, &c.] Interpreters are not agreed in the meaning of theſe words; for it does not appear what occaſion he had for any juſtification of himſelf: No accuſation had been brought againſt him; no body had charged him with any neglect or contempt of the law; ſo far otherwiſe, that our Lord had commended his wiſe anſwer, and promiſed him life, if he obeyed the terms which he himſelf had propoſed, ver. 28. Beſides, it does not preſently appear how any juſtification of himſelf could ariſe out of this queſtion, or any anſwer that might be given to it. What fault did he mean to excuſe, by aſking, Who is my neighbour? Or how did his virtue or innocence depend upon the anſwer which ſhould be returned to this inquiry? Theſe difficulties therefore have led interpreters into different ſentiments; but, without examining their opinions, the following is propoſed, as appearing the moſt true, becauſe the moſt eaſy and natural expoſition of the paſſage. This lawyer came to our Lord, and tempting him, ſaid, What ſhall I do to inherit eternal life? Our Lord returns him to the law for an anſwer to his queſtion, ſaying, What readeſt thou? He readily anſwers, That in the law he found, that he was to love the Lord his God with all his might, and his neighbour as himſelf. This account our Saviour approves; and adds, that if he would practiſe the law as well as he ſeemed to underſtand it, he was in no danger: This do, and thou ſhalt live. But in this point, relating to practice, the lawyer well knew how this precept in particular of loving our neighbour had been loaded with exceptions and limitations by the Jewiſh doctors, and that he had never eſteemed any body to be his neighbour, who was not of the ſame blood, and who did not profeſs the ſame religion with himſelf; for which reaſons he hated many, who, according to the letter, were his neighbours, as the Samaritans were, who dwelt very near, but were the averſion of every Jew, being eſteemed as the corrupters of the faith and true religion. Since therefore eternal life depended upon his obedience to the law, as he had heard from our Saviour; and ſince whether his obedience were ſuch as it ought to be, depended wholly upon the Jewiſh interpretation of the law, and could no otherwiſe be maintained but by excluding from the rights and privileges of neighbourhood all who were not of the ſtock and faith of Iſrael; in order therefore to his own juſtification, he very properly puts the queſtion to our Lord, And who is my neighbour? For as this queſtion ſhould be reſolved, he would be found either to have fulfilled or tranſgreſſed the commandment. Had our Lord determined in favour of the Jewiſh interpretation, and told him that thoſe only were his neighbours who were of the ſame ſtock and family, and who worſhipped God in the ſame manner that he did, the lawyer had been juſtified in his practice, and his obedience might have deſerved commendation, as well as his prudent anſwer out of the law had done before; but when our Saviour had forced him into a confeſſion that even the Samaritan was his neighbour, he ſtood condemned by his own ſentence, and by the example of the Samaritan which he had approved, and was ſent away with this ſhort but full reproof and admonition, Go, and do thou likewiſe. The words thus expounded, ſhew upon what motives men act, and what it is that prejudices their minds in the interpretation of God's law: They are willing to juſtify themſelves, and therefore employ all their force and ſkill to make the command countenance their practice, and to ſpeak ſuch language only as may be conſiſtent with their inclinations. When our actions are ſuch as the law enjoins; when we do what is commanded, and forbear what is forbidden, then is our obedience perfect. This is is ſo plain a deſcription of obedience, with reſpect to the law which is to be obeyed, that it cannot be diſputed. A truly virtuous man endeavours to bend all his paſſions and inclinations towards the command, and to make them intirely ſubmiſſive to it. The man who loves not his duty, is often uneaſy and reſtleſs under the pain of ſelf-condemnation; and knowing that all would be well, did but his actions and the law agree, he labours to bend the law towards his inclinations, that it may juſtify him in all his doings, and yield him the pleaſure and ſatisfaction of thinking himſelf righteous. See Bp. Sherlock, vol. iv. diſc. 6. and Peters on Job. p. 278.

Ver. 30. And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid, A certain man, &c.] Our Lord, who well knew how to convince and perſuade, anſwered the Scribe in ſuch a manner, as to make the feelings of his heart overcome the prejudices of his underſtanding. He convinced him of the miſtake he had imbibed, by a parable; an ancient, agreeable, and inoffenſive method of conveying inſtruction, very fit to be uſed in teaching perſons who were prejudiced againſt the truth; and certainly nothing could be more much amiable in the manner, and more pertinent to the purpoſe, than the parable which our Lord here delivers. Jericho was ſeated in a valley, from whence we perceive the propriety of the phraſe went down from Jeruſalem, &c. This circumſtance is finely choſen; for ſo many robberies and murders were committed on this road, which lay through a kind of wilderneſs, that Jerome tells us it was called הרמים Edmim—The bloody way. As Jeſus was on his way to Jeruſalem when he uttered this parable, it is not improbable that he was nigh to the place where the ſcene of it is laid; a circumſtance, which could not fail of making a ſtrong impreſſion on the audience, and which ſets the whole parable in a very beautiful light. The phraſe πληγὰς ἐπιθέντες, which we render wounded him, ſtrongly implies that theſe robbers, [λησταις] did ſo with great barbarity, laying on ſtroke upon ſtroke, and wound upon wound.

Ver. 31. And by chance] Κατὰ συγκυρίαν. Dr. Gell ſays, this word may as well be derived from συν and Κυριος, the Lord, as from συγκυρειν, to happen; and ſo we may render the words, by divine Providence, Eſſay, p. 337. The propriety of the circumſtance of the prieſt and Levite coming that way, will become more evident, if we conſider, that a very numerous body of prieſts and Levites dwelt at this time at Jericho. Dr. Lightfoot produces a paſſage from a conſiderable Jewiſh writer, to prove that 12,000 prieſts and Levites dwelt at Jericho; which, if it had any ſhadow or degree of truth, ſhews with how much propriety the prieſt and Levite are here introduced. The word 'Αντιπαρῆλθεν, which we render in this and the following verſe, paſſed by on the other ſide, might with more propriety be rendered ſimply in both places, paſſed by.

Ver. 32. Came, and looked on him] Came nearer, and took a leiſurely and attentive ſurvey of the caſe; which ſeems to be the import of Ελθων και ιδών. This diverſifies the idea, and heightens the picture of Jewiſh inhumanity. See particularly Sterne's Sermons, vol. i. ſerm. 3. p. 57.

Ver. 33. But a certain Samaritan] Though the prieſt and Levite had paſſed by their diſtreſſed brother, a Samaritan, who happened to come by that way, ſhewed a different example: Seeing a fellow creature lying on the road, naked and wounded, he went up to him, and though he found it was one of a different nation, who profeſſed a religion oppoſite to his own, nevertheleſs, the violent hatred which had been inſtilled into his mind, from his earlieſt years, towards all who profeſſed that religion, and every other objection, was immediately ſilenced by the feelings of pity, awakened at the ſight of the man's diſtreſs. His bowels yearned towards the Jew; he haſtened with great tenderneſs to give him aſſiſtance. Some writers tell us, that the hatred between the Jews and Samaritans roſe ſo high, that if a Jew and a Samaritan met in a narrow way, they were exceedingly ſollicitous that they might paſs without touching each other, for fear of pollution on either ſide. If this was fact, it is a beautiful illuſtration of the humanity of this good Samaritan, who not only touched the Jew, but took ſo much pains to dreſs his wounds, and ſet him on his own beaſt; ſupporting him in his arms as he rode, as well as making ſuch kind proviſion for him in the inn. It ſeems this humane traveller, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, carried his proviſions along with him, (ſee the next note) for he was able, though in the fields, to give the wounded man ſome wine to recruit his ſpirits: Moreover, he carefully bound up his wounds, ſoaking the bandages with a mixture of wine and oil, which he poured on them, and which is of a medicinal quality; and then ſetting him on his own beaſt, he walked by him and ſupported him. As the Jew was ſtripped by the robbers, it is probable that the Samaritan uſed ſome of his own garments for the binding up his wounds, which was a further inſtance of his goodneſs;—perhaps tearing them, to make a more convenient bandage. The reader will find an account of the uſe which the ancients made of wine and oil for dreſſing freſh wounds, in Bos's Exercitations, p. 24. and Wolfius on the text.

Ver. 34. Brought him to an Inn] In ancients times travellers uſed to carry their proviſions along with them, becauſe there were then no inns for the entertainment of ſtrangers, but only houſes for lodging them; ſuch as the Khanes, or Karavanſeras in the eaſtern countries are to this day. Theſe, as travellers tell us, conſiſt of a capacious ſquare, on all ſides of which are a number of rooms on a ground floor, uſed occaſionally for chambers, warehouſes, and ſtables. Above ſtairs there is a colonade, or gallery, on every ſide of which are the doors of a number of ſmall rooms, wherein the merchants, as well ſtrangers as natives, tranſact moſt of their buſineſs. In theſe caravanſeras travellers can ſometimes purchaſe ſtraw and provender for 35 And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the hoſt, and ſaid unto him, Take care of him; and whatſoever thou ſpendeſt more, when I come again, I will repay thee.

36 Which now of theſe three, thinkeſt thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?

Ver. 35. See Matth. xx. 2.

their horſes, mules, or other beaſts, though generally ſpeaking they ſupply them with nothing but rooms to lodge in. The Πανδοχεῖον, or inn here mentioned, was of this kind; for the Samaritan, whilſt he was there furniſhed the wounded Jew with all things neceſſary out of his own ſtores, and only committed him to the care of the inn-keeper when he went away. We have two inſtances in Scripture of the cuſtom now mentioned. See Matth. xv. 32. Judg. xix. 19. Dr. Shaw, in the preface to his Travels, p. 14. mentions another ſort of inn, called Connack: This, he ſays, denotes the place itſelf, whether covered or not, where the travellers or caravans halt, to refreſh themſelves and their beaſts. Thus the Malon or inn, Gen. xlii. 27. xliii. 21. where the ſons of Jacob opened their ſacks to give their aſſes provender, was no other than one of theſe reſting-places. In the parable it is the other ſort of inn that is mentioned, as is plain from its having an inn-keeper, which the connack in the deſarts of Arabia has not. See Macknight.

Ver. 35. And—he took out two pence] The value of theſe two denarii was about fifteen pence ſterling; and from the ſmallneſs of the ſum, it is reaſonable to conclude that this charitable man was but poor; if ſo, this circumſtance greatly enhances his kindneſs to the Jews. It is a very probable circumſtance, that a man travelling without any attendants, and now going out to a conſiderable diſtance from home, ſhould not have more to ſpare, eſpecially as he was to travel through ſo dangerous a road; and ſo it would have been very imprudent to charge himſelf with much more money than he was likely to want in his journey; which would be the leſs, becauſe travellers, as we have ſhewn in the preceding note, uſed in thoſe countries to carry their proviſion with them. Comp. Gen. xxviii. 18. and Joſh. ix. 12, 13. Another circumſtance of the Samaritan's kindneſs, is obſervable in his becoming anſwerable for the whole expences incident to the man's unhappy caſe: Whatſoever thou ſpendeſt more, &c. It ſeems as if he was afraid that the mercenary temper of the hoſt might have hindered him from furniſhing what was neceſſary, if he had no proſpect of being repaid. Indeed, all the circumſtances of this beautiful parable are formed with the fineſt ſkill imaginable, to work the conviction deſigned; ſo that had the lawyer been ever ſo much diſpoſed to reckon none as his neighbours but men of his own religion, it was not in his power to do it on this occaſion. And although favours from a Samaritan had always been repreſented to him as an abomination more deteſtable even than the eating of ſwine's fleſh, he was obliged to acknowledge, that not the prieſt or the Levite, but this Samaritan, by diſcharging a great office of humanity towards the Jew in diſtreſs, was truly his neighbour, and deſerved his love more than ſome of his own nation, who ſuſtained the moſt venerable characters; that the like humanity was due from any Iſraelite to any Samaritan who ſtood in need of it; and that all men are neighbours to all men, how much ſoever they may be diſtinguiſhed from one another in reſpect of country, or kindred, or language, or religion. Mankind are intimately knit together by their common wants and weakneſſes, being ſo formed that they cannot live without the aſſiſtance of each other. And therefore the relation which ſubſiſts between them is as extenſive as their natures, and the obligations under which they lie to aid one another by mutual good offices, are as ſtrong and urgent as every man's own manifold neceſſities. By this admirable parable, therefore, our Lord has powerfully recommended that univerſal benevolence which is ſo familiar in the mouths, but foreign to the hearts, of many ignorant pretenders to religion and morality. It would appear that the preſumption of the Jews in matters of religion, exceeded all bounds; for though the Supreme Being pays very little regard to outward worſhip, and is much more delighted with the inward homage of an holy and benevolent mind, yet, becauſe they prayed daily in his temple, and offered ſacrifices there, and carried about his precepts written on their phylacteries, and had God and the law always in their mouths, they made no doubt that they worſhipped God acceptably, notwithſtanding they were ſo enormouſly wicked, that they would not put themſelves to the ſmalleſt expence or trouble, though they could have ſaved life by it; and therefore had no real love to God or their neighbour. This monſtrous preſumption being utterly ſubverſive of true religion, our Lord thought fit to condemn it, in the ſevereſt manner, and to brand it with the blackeſt, and moſt laſting note of infamy, in this charming parable. We may juſt obſerve, that as Jeſus was now in Samaria, he ſhewed great humanity, as well as juſtice, in aſſigning the benevolent charitable character in the parable, to a native of this country. A fine writer well obſerves, that nothing can be more judiciouſly circumſtanced than the principal figure in this piece. "Had the calamity befallen a Samaritan, it would have made but feeble impreſſions of pity, and thoſe, perhaps, immediately effaced by ſtronger emotions of hate. But when it was a Jew, that lay bleeding to death, the repreſentation was ſure to intereſt the hearer in the diſtreſs, and awaken a tender concern. Had the relief been adminiſtered by a Jew, the benevolence would have ſhone, but in a much fainter light; whereas, when it came from the hands of a Samaritan, whom all the Jews had agreed to abjure, to execrate, and to rank with the very fiends of hell; how bright,—how charmingly and irreſiſtably bright,—was the luſtre of ſuch charity! Let the reader conſider the temper, expreſſed in that rancorous reflection,—Thou art a Samaritan, and haſt a devil, John viii. 48.—Let him compare that inveterate malevolence, with the benign and compaſſionate ſpirit of our amiable traveller; then let him ſay, whether he ever beheld a finer or a bolder contraſt? Whether, upon the whole, he ever ſaw the ordonnance of deſcriptive painting more juſtly deſigned, or more happily executed? I would beg leave to obſerve farther, that the virulent animoſity of the Jew, diſcovers itſelf even in the lawyer's reply, He that ſhewed mercy on him. He will not ſo much as name the Samaritan, eſpecially in a caſe where he could not be named without an honourable diſtinction. So ſtrongly marked, and ſo exactly preſerved, are the manners or diſtinguiſhable qualities of each perſon, in the ſacred narrations!" See Hervey's Theron and Aſpaſio, vol. i. p. 29. in the note. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, after having given a literal interpretation of this parable; that many writers, ancient and modern, have alſo given a ſpiritual interpretation of it; which, it muſt be acknowledged, is not only extremely ingenious, but very inſtructive, and certainly can be attended with no ill effects, while the literal meaning is preſerved and adhered to: However, in the preſent commentary, having refrained from every interpretation of that kind, I ſhall at preſent only refer my reader to what I have advanced on this head, upon the foundation of the fathers and primitive Chriſtians, in my 20th diſcourſe on the parables; and ſubjoin a brief expoſition of the parable in this way, as given us by Dr. Stanhope, whoſe judgement was certainly as mature, as his piety was indiſputable. "This account, ſays he, is a moſt lively repreſentation of the merciful and loving Jeſus. He was the good Samaritan indeed, who found poor human nature wounded and bound, left more than half dead, and ſtripped of all its valuable perfections, by the mercileſs robber and adverſary of ſouls. His bowels yearned over our diſtreſſed condition; and when neither the Levitical law, nor the ſacrifices offered by Jewiſh prieſts had adminiſtered any comfort or relief, He came, a ſtranger, from his bleſſed dwelling, kindly made towards us, bound up our wounds and bruiſes, poured out his ſoul unto the death, and applied the ſovereign balſam of his own blood. He took us up, and removed us away into a more ſaving diſpenſation; cloathed us with his own righteouſneſs, as with a robe, and wrought a perfect cure upon us, at the expence of many miracles, and mighty condeſcenſions, and infinite hardſhips and ſufferings to himſelf. His occaſions indeed would not allow him to ſtay with us till all the effects of his goodneſs were accompliſhed; but he hath left us in ſafe hands, and given commiſſion for a conſtant ſupply of ſpiritual ſuſtenance and remedies; which thoſe who diſtribute faithfully, he will certainly, when he comes again, repay; and thoſe who receive regularly and thankfully, he will as certainly heal and nouriſh unto life eternal. And ought not, O my friends, ſuch a pattern as this to have the weight of ten thouſand arguments with us? How can they grudge ſuitable expreſſions of love to their brethren in diſtreſs, who at all remember what the Son of God did not, in their utmoſt, their deſperate extremity eſteem too much to do for them? Who can have the confidence to think himſelf excuſed towards thoſe of a differing judgement, or diſobliging behaviour, or moſt wrongful malice and ſpite, when they reflect, that herein chiefly God commendeth his love towards us, that while we were yet ſinners—the moſt fatally miſtaken, the worſt and moſt diſingenuous of his creatures here below, the bittereſt and moſt deteſtable of all enemies,—Chriſt died for us? For which ineſtimable benefit and love, all honour and praiſe, thankſgiving and obedience be unto Him, who left us an example, that herein we ſhould follow his ſteps." See his Epiſtles and Goſpels, vol. iii. p. 436.

Ver. 36. Which, now, of theſe three, &c.] Great pains have been taken by ſome ſo to adjuſt this caſe, as that it might yield a proper anſwer to the lawyer's queſtion. He aſked, Who is my neighbour? That is, "Who am I obliged to love as myſelf?" So that our Lord, ſay they, ought to have determined the extent and right of neighbourhood, and from thence deduced the obligations of love and aſſiſtance: Whereas, the caſe ſuppoſes the love and aſſiſtance, and from thence infers the relation of neighbourhood. The prieſt and the Levite were not neighbours, becauſe they did not aſſiſt the wounded man: The Samaritan was his neighbour, becauſe he ſhewed kindneſs to him. And if this be ſo, that no man is our neighbour till we have either ſhewed or received kindneſs from him, we cannot then from the right of neighbourhood infer the obligations of love; but muſt determine, from the mutual exerciſe of love, the notion and extent of neighbourhood. And if this be the caſe, no man can offend againſt the law of loving his neighbour; for if none are our neighbours but thoſe whom we love, then every man certainly loves his neighbour. But if we conſider the caſe fairly, and view it in its due light, this ſuppoſed difficulty will vaniſh. The queſtion was aſked by the lawyer out of a deſire to juſtify himſelf. He had learned to call no man his neighbour who was not of the ſame ſtock and religion with himſelf: Samaritans he expreſly hated, and juſtified his hatred becauſe they were diſſenters from the true worſhip, and deſpiſers of the temple at Jeruſalem. This great error our Lord was to wreſt from him, which was not to be done by combating his prejudices, and arguing upon the true ſenſe and meaning of the law: The lawyer, not unaccuſtomed to ſuch exerciſes, would have held up the diſpute, and ſtood reſolute againſt any ſuch convictions. Our Saviour therefore puts him

36 Which now of theſe three, thinkeſt thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?

37 And he ſaid, He that ſhewed mercy on him. Then ſaid Jeſus unto him, Go, and do thou likewiſe.

38 Now it came to paſs, as they went, that he entered into a certain village: and a certain woman named Martha, received him into her houſe.

39 And ſhe had a ſiſter called Mary, which alſo ſat at Jeſus' feet, and heard his word.

40 But Martha was cumbered about much ſerving, and came to him, and ſaid, Lord, doſt thou not care that my ſiſter hath left me to ſerve alone? bid her therefore that ſhe help me.

41 And Jeſus anſwered, and ſaid unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful, and troubled about many things:

42 But one thing is needful: and Mary him a caſe, and ſtates it ſo, that his prejudices were all ſhut out, and could have no influence in the determination. A Jew therefore is put into the place of diſtreſs: A certain man went down from Jeruſalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves. Here could be no exception taken againſt the perſon. Had the Samaritan been placed in the ſame caſe, and his calamities painted in the moſt moving colours, he would have found no pity from the Jew, who would have excepted to his religion, and thought himſelf very much in the right to have been an enemy to the enemy of God: but, when one of his own nation was repreſented in miſery, he ſaw reaſon in every thing that was done for his relief. A prieſt and a Levite are ſaid to paſs by and neglect him: Theſe perſons ſtood in all thoſe relations to the diſtreſſed, which the lawyer owned to be the juſt bonds and ties of neighbourhood: They were of his kindred, and they met at the ſame altar to worſhip the ſame God; he could not therefore but condemn their want of bowels to their brother. A Samaritan is repreſented as paſſing by, and ſhewing the greateſt tenderneſs and compaſſion to the poor Jew. This could not but be approved: even the prejudice of the lawyer carried him in theſe circumſtances to a right judgement; for knowing how inveterately the Jew hated the Samaritan, he could not but the more admire and approve the Samaritan's kindneſs to the Jew. Upon this caſe, our Lord puts him to determine which was neighbour to the man in diſtreſs; or, which is the ſame thing, which of the three acted moſt agreeably to the law of God, commanding that we ſhould love our neighbour as ourſelf? The lawyer anſwers, He that ſhewed mercy; confeſſing that the Samaritan had fulfilled the law, which was condemning the Jewiſh expoſition, and his own prejudices. For if a Jew was rightly forbidden to ſhew kindneſs to a Samaritan, becauſe of the difference in religion between them, the ſame reaſon made it unlawful for a Samaritan to aſſiſt a Jew. Our Saviour approves his judgement, and bids him only apply it to himſelf, Go thou and do likewiſe; that is, "Since you commend the Samaritan for acting like a neighbour to the Jew, do your learn to act like a neighbour to the Samaritan;" for this is the true force of the word likewiſe. For a Jew to be kind to a Jew only, is not to do like the good Samaritan, who was kind not to a Samaritan only, but to a Jew alſo. And thus, we ſee, the caſe led to a full determination of the queſtion propoſed, and ſhewed that no reſtrictions were to be laid upon the law of God; that even thoſe whom the lawyer accounted as his worſt enemies, the very Samaritans, were intitled to the benefit of it, and ought to be treated with the love and kindneſs which is due to our neighbours. See Sherlock as above.

Ver. 37. Then ſaid Jeſus unto him, Go, &c.] What a lively picture have we in this parable of the moſt diſintereſted and active benevolence! A benevolence, which excludes no perſon, not even ſtrangers or enemies, from its tender regards! which diſdains no condeſcenſion, grudges no coſt, in its labours of love! Could any method of conviction have been more forcible, and at the ſame time more pleaſing, than the interrogatory propoſed by our Lord, and deduced from the ſtory, ver. 36? Or can there be an advice more ſuitable to the occaſion, more important in its nature, or expreſſed with a more ſententious energy, than Go, and do thou likewiſe. In this caſe the learner inſtructs, the delinquent condemns himſelf; bigotry hears away its prejudice, and pride (when the moral ſo ſweetly, ſo imperceptibly inſinuates) even pride itſelf, lends a willing ear to admonition.

From our Lord's conduct in the caſe, we learn how to apply to the paſſions and prejudices of men, and by what art truth is beſt and moſt ſucceſsfully introduced, where error has been long in poſſeſſion. Were it a defect in our reaſon and underſtanding that made us diſagree, and judge, and act differently in caſes where we have one and the ſame rule to go by, no human application could reach the diſtemper; ſince it is not in our power to enlarge the faculties which are bounded by God and nature. But our reaſon and our underſtanding are not in fault; they want only to be ſet free, and to be delivered from the bondage of paſſion and prejudice, to judge rightly in caſes of morality and natural juſtice. It is ſelf which influences the judgement of men, when they obſtinately maintain and defend the cauſe of error or of vice: It is ſelf that always lies at the bottom: It is not ſo much the vice as ſelf that is to be defended; and if you can but ſeparate ſelf from the vice, the vice will ſoon fall under the common ſentence of reaſon, and be left to be condemned with its fellows. By this honeſt, this holy art, our Lord convinced the lawyer, who put the queſtion to him, ver. 25. He aſked the queſtion, intending that none ſhould be admitted into the number of his neighbours, who were not nearly allied to him, of the ſame nation at leaſt. Our Saviour ſtates a caſe to him, and put its ſo, that his prejudices were all thrown out and ſilenced; the conſequence was, that he who wanted to exclude almoſt all mankind from a right to his good offices, in a few minutes owns even the Samaritan, his moſt hated enemy, to be the Jew's neighbour; and by owning and accepting the Samaritan's good offices done to the Jew under the relation of a neighbour, he confeſſed the Samaritan's right in that relation to expect and receive the good offices of the Jew. From whence we may draw the following conſequences: 1. It is evident that the true art of convincing any man of his error is, to throw him as much as poſſible out of his caſe; for the leſs a man is concerned himſelf, the better he judges. You are not to ſtir and fret his prejudices, but to decline them; not to reproach him with the error you condemn, but to place the error at a ſufficient diſtance from him, that he may have a true light to view it in. We have a remarkable inſtance of this in the conduct of the prophet Nathan with David. 2. In private life it is plain from hence, that innocence is the only true preſervative of reaſon and judgement: Guilt will expoſe you to receive excuſes and ſubterfuges, and miſlead you in your opinion of yourſelf and your duty. When once you find yourſelf labouring to juſtify your actions, and ſearching for expoſitions which may ſuit your inclinations, from that moment you may date your loſs of freedom. 3. If you find yourſelf involved in the caſe you are to judge of, inſtead of ſeeking for new reaſons and arguments whereby to form your opinion, you had much better look back, and reflect what ſenſe you had of this matter before the cauſe was your own; for it is ten to one but that judgement was much more free and impartial than any you will make now; or conſider, if the caſe admits it, what is the ſenſe of the ſober and virtuous part of the world; you may more ſafely truſt them than yourſelf, when your paſſions are concerned. At leaſt, ſuppoſe your enemy in the ſame circumſtances with yourſelf, and doing what you find yourſelf inclined to, and conſider what judgement you ſhould make of him;—and ſo judge of yourſelf. By theſe means, perhaps, we may preſerve ourſelves from the fatal influence which vice and paſſion have over the reaſon and underſtanding of mankind. See Theron and Aſpaſio, vol i. and Sherlock, diſc. vi. vol. 4.

Ver. 38, 39. Now it came to paſs, &c.] Now, &c. as they journied. Wat. and MS. Our Lord, in his way to Jeruſalem, whither he was going to celebrate the feaſt of dedication, ſpent a night at Bethany, the village of Martha and Mary, two religious women, ſiſters of Lazarus. See John xi. 1. On this occaſion Martha expreſſed her regard for her divine gueſt, by the care ſhe was at in providing the beſt entertainment in her power for him and his diſciples; but Mary, the other ſiſter, ſat quietly at his feet, liſtening to his doctrine. It is well known that this was the poſture in which learners attended on their teachers; (comp. ch. viii. 35. and Acts xxii. 3.) and likewiſe grew into a proverb for humble and diligent attention. See on ch. ii. 46.

Ver. 40. But Martha was cumbered] The word περιεσπατο properly ſignifies "to be drawn as it were different ways at the ſame time," and admirably expreſſes the ſituation of a mind ſurrounded with ſo many objects of care, that it hardly knows which to attend to firſt. She had probably ſervants, to whom ſhe might have committed theſe affairs, and the humility and moderation of our bleſſed Redeemer would have taken up with what had been leſs exactly prepared; eſpecially as ſhe had ſo valuable and ſignal an opportunity of improving her mind in divine knowledge. Bid her that ſhe help me, is, "That ſhe lend her helping hand, according to the exact import of συναντιλαβηται, which is alſo with the utmoſt propriety uſed for the aſſiſtance which the Spirit of God gives to the infirmities of our frail nature. See Rom. viii. 26. Doddridge, and Wolfius.

Ver. 41. And troubled] The word τυρβάζη is no where elſe uſed in the New Teſtament. It ſeems to expreſs the ſituation of a perſon in a tumultuous crowd, where ſo many are preſſing upon him, that he can ſcarcely ſtand his ground;—or, of water in great agitation. See Mintert and Stockius on the word.

Ver. 42. But one thing is needful] "There is one thing abſolutely neceſſary, and of infinitely greater importance than any of theſe domeſtic and ſecular affairs; even the care to have the ſoul inſtructed in the ſaving knowledge of the way that leads to eternal life, and to ſecure a title to it. And Mary is wiſely attending to this; therefore, inſtead of reproving her, I muſt rather declare, that ſhe has choſen what may eminently be called the good part, which, as it ſhall not finally be taken away from her, I would not now hinder her from purſuing; but rather invite thee to join with her in attention to it, though the circumſtances of the intended meal ſhould not be ſo exactly adjuſted as thy friendſhip could deſire." There is a peculiar ſpirit and tenderneſs hath choſen that good part, which ſhall not be taken away from her.

C H A P. XI.

Chriſt teacheth his diſciples to pray, and that inſtantly; aſſuring them that God will readily give good things to thoſe who aſk him: he caſting out a dumb devil, rebuketh the blaſphemous Phariſees: and ſheweth who are derneſs in our Lord's repetition of Martha's name, Martha! Martha! See Archbp. Tillotſon's Sermons, fol. vol. i. p. 303. Nothing can be more frigid than the interpretation given by ſome of this paſſage, which certainly contains a moſt important truth: Thou art careful and troubled about many diſhes, but there is need of one only. The praiſe beſtowed on Mary, as having choſen a better part than Martha, does not imply that the contemplative life is more acceptable in the ſight of God than the active, as the Papiſts would have us believe: for though it ſhould be granted that the compariſon is carried on between the employments of Martha and Mary, as they ſtand in the ſight of God, the concluſion will not follow which they pretend to draw from it. The reaſon is plain; they are not two courſes of life, but two particular actions, which are here compared; in which caſe no body will deny that to hear the word of God, as occaſion offers, provided we do it with a view to profit by it, is more acceptable in the ſight of God, than to exerciſe any art or occupation relative to the preſent life; for no other reaſon, however, but that it tends more to the happineſs of the perſon himſelf, which is the great end that God has propoſed in all his law. In the mean time it may be doubted, whether this be the meanimg of the compariſon: Our Lord deſigned rather to ſignify, that though he was not diſpleaſed with Martha's civility, Mary's liſtening to his doctrine was more acceptable to him, becauſe he had infinitely greater pleaſure in inſtructing, ſanctifying, and ſaving ſouls, than in any kind of ſenſual indulgencies whatſoever. As he beautifully expreſſed it on another occaſion; His meat and his drink was to do the will of his heavenly Father.

REFLECTIONS ON OUR LORD'S INTERVIEW WITH MARTHA AND MARY.

The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have neſts; He that had all things, poſſeſſed nothing: Our Lord was now in his way; the ſun might ſooner ſtand ſtill than he; the more we move, the more we reſemble heaven, and God its Maker. His progreſs was now to Jeruſalem, for ſome holy feaſt: He whoſe devotion neglected not any of thoſe ſacred ſolemnities, will not neglect the due opportunities of his bodily refreſhment; he knew where a ready welcome awaited him, and retires to the village of Bethany.

There dwelt the two devout ſiſters, with their brother, his friend Lazarus: Their roof receives him: O happy houſe, into which the Son of God vouchſafed to ſet his foot! O bleſſed women, that had the grace to be the hoſteſſes of the God of heaven! How might we envy your felicity, did we not ſee the ſame favour lying open to us alſo, if we be not wanting to ourſelves. We have two ways of entertaining the Saviour;—in our members, and in himſelf: In his members, by charity and hoſpitality; for what we do to one of his little ones, we do to him; In himſelf, by faith;—If any man open, he will come in, and ſup with him.

Martha, it ſeems, as being the eldeſt ſiſter, bore the name of the houſekeeper; Mary was her aſſiſtant in the charge; a bleſſed pair, ſiſters not more in nature than in grace, in ſpirit no leſs than in fleſh. How happy a thing is it, when all the parties in a family are jointly agreed to entertain Chriſt!

Whilſt his bodily repaſt is preparing, he prepares ſpiritual food for his hoſts: His beſt cheer was to ſee them ſpiritually fed; how then ſhould they whom he hath called to the ſacred function be inſtant in ſeaſon, and out of ſeaſon, after his bleſſed example! They are, by his divine ordination, the lights of the world: And we know that no ſooner is the candle lighted, than it communicates the light which it hath received, never intermitting, till it be waſted to the ſnuff.

Martha's houſe is become a ſchool of divinity. Jeſus, as the doctor, ſits in the chair: Martha, Mary, and the reſt, ſit as diſciples at his feet. Had theſe ſiſters provided our Saviour never ſuch coſtly delicates, or waited on his board never ſo officiouſly, yet, had they not liſtened to his inſtructions, they would never have bidden him welcome, nor would he ſo well have liked his entertainment. This was truly the way to feaſt him;—to feed their ears with his heavenly doctrine: O Saviour, let my ſoul be thus feaſted by thee; do thou thus feaſt thyſelf by feeding me: This mutual diet ſhall be thy praiſe, and my happineſs.

Though Martha were for a time an attentive hearer, yet now her care of Chriſt's entertainment removes her from his audience. Mary ſits ſtill: Martha's care is to feaſt Jeſus, Mary's to be feaſted of him: Good Martha was deſirous to expreſs her joy and thankfulneſs for the preſence of ſo bleſſed a gueſt, by a careful and plenteous entertainment: And who will cenſure this exceſs of her ſolicitude to welcome her Saviour? Doubtleſs ſhe herſelf thought ſhe did well, and out of that confidence, fears not to complain to Chriſt of her inactive ſiſter.

I do not ſee her come to her ſiſter, and whiſper in her ear the great need of her aid; but ſhe comes to Jeſus, and in a ſort of petulent expoſtulation, addreſſes him, (ver. 40.) Lord, doſt thou not care that my ſiſter hath left me to ſerve alone? Why did not ſhe rather make the firſt application to her ſiſter? Was it that ſhe knew Mary's ears were ſo tied with thoſe adamantine chains which iſſued from Chriſt's mouth, that till his ſilence and diſmiſſion ſhe had no power to ſtir? Or was it out of honour and reſpect to Chriſt, that in his preſence ſhe would not preſume to call off her ſiſter, without his leave.

We cannot, however, excuſe this holy woman from ſome weakneſſes; it was a fault to meaſure her ſiſter by herſelf; and, apprehending her own act to be good, to think her ſiſter could not do well, if ſhe did not ſo too. It was a fault, that ſhe thought an exceſſive care for the liberal outward entertainment of Chriſt, was to be preferred to a diligent attention to His ſpiritual entertainment of them; and it was a fault, that ſhe preſumed, as it were, to queſtion her Saviour, as of a kind of diſreſpect to her toil:—Lord, doſt thou not care?

And yet, ſurely, Martha, it will be allowed, here wanted not fair pretences for the ground of thy expoſtulation: Mary, the younger, ſits ſtill, while thou art cumbered with much ſerving: And what work was thine, but the hoſpitable reception of thy Saviour and his train? Not for the gratification of thy own, or any carnal friend's luxury, but for the refreſhment of Chriſt himſelf, to whom thou couldſt never be too obſequious:—All this, however, cannot deliver thee from the juſt blame of this haſty and petulant complaint. How ready is our weakneſs, upon every diſcontentment, to quarrel with our beſt friend; yea, with our good God; and the more we are touched, to think ourſelves the more neglected, and to challenge heaven for our neglect!

It could not but trouble devout Mary, to hear her ſiſter's impatient remonſtrance: A remonſtrance, urged too with ſo great vehemency, as if ſuch a ſtrangeneſs had now ſubſiſted between the two ſiſter's, that the one would do nothing for the other, without the compulſion of a ſuperior.—And yet, we hear not one word of reply from that modeſt mouth. O holy Mary, I admire thy patient ſilence; Thy ſiſter now blames thee for thy piety; the diſciples (afterwards) blame thee for thy bounty and coſt: Not a word falls from thee, in juſt vindication of thine honour and innocence; but in an humble taciturnity thou leaveſt thine anſwer to thy Saviour. What an admirable leſſon is this for us, when complained of for well-doing, to ſeal up our lips, and wait our vindication from above!

And how ſure and ready is our Lord to ſpeak in the caſe of the modeſtly-dumb; Martha, Martha, &c. (ver. 41.)! What needed Mary to ſpeak for herſelf, when ſhe had ſuch an Advocate? Doubtleſs, Martha had been in a manner divided from herſelf with the multiplicity of her anxious thoughts: Our Lord, therefore, doubles her name in his compellation; that thus, amidſt ſuch diſtraction, he may both find, and fix her heart: Doubtleſs, ſhe fully expected that Chriſt would have ſent away her ſiſter with a check, and herſelf with thanks; but now her hopes fail her; and though ſhe be not directly reproved, yet ſhe hears her ſiſter more approved than ſhe. Martha, Martha! thou art careful, and troubled about many things. Our Saviour receives courteſy from her in this diligent and coſtly entertainment; yet will he not gloſs over her error, or ſoothe her in her weak miſpriſion. A caution to us, that no obligations may ſo enthral us, as that our tongues ſhould not be free to reprove faults where we find them.

Alas! how much care do we ſee every where, but how few Martha's? Her ſolicitude was for her Saviour's entertainment, ours for ourſelves: One finds perplexities in his eſtate, which he deſires to extricate; another racks his thoughts, for the raiſing of his houſe, or diſtracts his imagination about the doubtful condition, as he thinks, of the times, and caſts in his anxious fancy, the poſſible events of all things,—oppoſing his hopes to his fears. O why do we ſo needleſsly, ſo fondly ſet our hearts upon the rack, and with ſuch avidity endure to bend under thoſe unequal burdens, which more able ſhoulders have offered to undertake for our eaſe?

Whether Martha be pitied or taxed for her aſſiduity, Mary is evidently applauded for her devotion: (ver. 42.) One thing is needful; and Mary hath choſen, &c. One thing is neceſſary, not by way of negation, as if nothing were neceſſary but this; but comparatively, ſince nothing elſe is ſo neceſſary. There muſt be no oppoſition, but a ſubordination only, between ſpiritual and temporal things; the body and ſoul muſt be friends, not rivals; nor may we ſo cultivate the Chriſtian, as to neglect the man.

How great is the vanity of thoſe men, who, neglecting that one thing neceſſary, affect many things ſuperfluous! Nothing is needleſs with worldly minds, but this only neceſſary, the care of their ſouls. How juſtly do they loſe that which they care not for, while they take an over-care for that, which is neither their purſuit, nor poſſible to be kept. Mary choſe the good part; it was not forced upon her, but taken up by her own option; and we too have ſtill this holy freedom of choice, through the divine operation of him, who hath called us unto the glorious liberty of the ſons of God. Happy are we, if we improve this liberty to the beſt advantage of our ſouls.

The ſtability and perpetuity of good, adds much to its praiſe: Martha's part was ſoon gone; the thanks and uſe of a little outward hoſpitality cannot long continue; but Mary's ſhall not be taken away from her. The act of her hearing was tranſient; the fruit was permanent; ſhe now hears that, which ſhall abide with her for ever.

But what couldſt thou hear, O Mary, from thoſe ſacred lips which we hear not ſtill? That heavenly doctrine, for ever ſtill the ſame, and equally unchangeable with its Author. It is not impoſſible that the exerciſe of the Goſpel ſhould be taken from us; but the benefit and virtue of the Goſpel is as inſeparable from our ſouls, as is their being: In the hardeſt times, they ſhall take the cloſeſt hold upon us; and till death, and in death, yea, and after death, ſhall make us eternally happy.

bleſſed: preacheth to the people, and reprehendeth the outward ſhew of holineſs in the Phariſees, ſcribes, and lawyers.

AND it came to paſs, that as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceaſed, one of his diſciples ſaid unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John alſo taught his diſciples.

2 And he ſaid unto them, When ye pray, ſay, Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, ſo in earth.

3 Give us day by day our daily bread.

4 And forgive us our ſins; for we alſo forgive every one that is indebted to us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil.

5 And he ſaid unto them, Which of you ſhall have a friend, and ſhall go unto him at midnight, and ſay unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves;

6 For a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to ſet before him?

7 And he from within ſhall anſwer and ſay, Trouble me not: the door is now ſhut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot riſe and give thee.

8 I ſay unto you, Though he will not riſe and give him, becauſe he is his friend, yet becauſe of his importunity, he will riſe, and give him as many as he needeth.

9 And I ſay unto you, Aſk, and it ſhall be given you; ſeek, and ye ſhall find; knock, and it ſhall be opened unto you.

10 For every one that aſketh, receiveth; and he that ſeeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it ſhall be opened.

11 If a ſon ſhall aſk bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a ſtone? or if he aſk a fiſh, will he for a fiſh give him a ſerpent?

12 Or if he ſhall aſk an egg, will he offer him a ſcorpion?

13 If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more ſhall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that aſk him?

14 And he was caſting out a devil, and it was dumb. And it came to paſs, when the devil was gone out, the dumb ſpake; and the people wondered.

Chap. XI. Ver. 1. As he was praying] While Jeſus was in the country beyond Jordan, he happened to pray publickly with ſuch fervency, that one of his diſciples, exceedingly affected both with the matter and manner of his addreſs, begged that he would teach them to pray. This diſciple probably had not been preſent when our Lord, in the beginning of his miniſtry, gave his hearers directions concerning their devotions. Wherefore Jeſus, who always rejoiced to find his hearers deſirous of inſtruction, willingly embraced this opportunity, and repeated the diſcourſe on prayer, which he had formerly delivered in his ſermon on the mount; but with this difference, that he now handled the arguments which he had offered as motives to the duty, a little more fully than before. Many learned men ſuppoſe, that the Jewiſh maſters uſed to give their followers ſome ſhort form of prayer, as a peculiar badge of their relation to them. John the Baptiſt had probably done this; in which view only we can ſuppoſe the diſciples could now aſk Jeſus to teach them to pray; for it is not to be thought, that, in the three preceding years of his miniſtry, he had not often given them inſtructions, both as to the matter and manner of prayer. See Mede's works, p. 1. and Lightfoot's Hor. Heb.

Ver. 5—8. And he ſaid unto them, Which, &c.] Having taught his diſciples, by the preceding ſhort form, that they were not, in prayer, to uſe a multiplicity of words, with vain repetitions; he proceeded to caution them on the other hand againſt coldneſs, indifferency, and ſlackneſs in their ſupplications. The evil of this, and the neceſſity of aſking affectionately, with importunity and perſeverence, he taught them by a parable, in which he ſhewed them that importunity, i. e. earneſtneſs and frequency in aſking, was the proper and natural expreſſion of ſtrong deſires; and by conſequence, that God very properly requires theſe things in men, before he beſtows on them ſuch favours as they ſtand in need of; juſt as he requires them to be earneſtly deſirous of theſe favours before he bleſſeth them therewith. The paſſage, My children are with me in bed, ver. 7. might be rendered, My ſervants, together with me, or as well as myſelf, are in bed. "My ſervants are in bed, as well as myſelf; and very probably they are faſt aſleep, ſo that there is no body at hand to give you what you want." See 1 Sam. xxi. 5. in the LXX, and Macknight.

Ver. 12. If he ſhall aſk an egg] Naturaliſts tell us, that the body of a ſcorpion is very like an egg, eſpecially if the ſcorpion is of the white kind, which is the firſt ſpecies mentioned by Ælian and others. Bochart has produced teſtimonies to prove, that the ſcorpions in Judea were about the bigneſs of an egg; and therefore, in Judea, a white ſcorpion, nearly reſembling an egg, might, to children, who were not capable of diſtinguiſhing the one for the other, be offered in the place thereof, if the perſon ſo doing meant that it ſhould ſting them to death. The author of the Obſervations informs us that St. Jerome reckons wine, liquamen, fiſh, and eggs, together with honey, in his catalogue of delicacies: So that poſſibly, on being told that the diſciples gave our Lord a piece of a broiled fiſh, and of a honey-comb, ch. XXIV. 42. we, who have been ready to look upon it as a ſtrange aſſociation of diſhes (if underſtood of a proper honey-comb, and not of a ſort of bread,) have ſuffered this ſurprize from not entering into the views of the diſciples; they probably not attending to any order,

> ——— So contriv'd, as not to mix

As Eve did, according to Milton; but only deſigning to expreſs their great veneration for their Maſter, by ſetting before him the moſt grateful things in their power, and leaving it to him to eat of which he pleaſed. I am not ſure that there was no view, in like manner, to the delicacy of eggs in the paſſage before us, where our Lord is ſpeaking of fiſh and eggs. On the contrary, perhaps, it may add to the beauty of the paſſage, if we underſtand it as ſignifying, that "if a child ſhould aſk an earthly parent for bread, a neceſſary of life, he will not deny him what is requiſite for his ſupport, putting him off with a ſtone; and if he ſhould aſk him for a ſort of food of a more delicious kind, a fiſh, or an egg, he will not, we may aſſure ourſelves, give his child what is hurtful, a ſerpent, or a ſcorpion. If ſinful men then will give good gifts to their children, how much more will your heavenly Father give the neceſſary and the more extraordinary gifts of his Spirit to them that ſupplicate for them? Not giving up to hurtful illuſions thoſe who affectionately pray for the hallowing his name, and the coming of his kingdom, petitions, which involve in them the aſking for the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit." ver. 20. But, whatever might be the view of our Lord, it is certain that St. Jerome was right in putting eggs into his liſt of eaſtern delicates; for nothing is more common than to meet with eggs in modern entertainments there, when they would treat perſons in the moſt reſpectful manner. So Dr. Pococke deſcribes a very grand morning collation, given in Egypt to a perſon of diſtinction, as conſiſting of the beſt ſort of bread, made with butter, fried eggs, honey, green ſalted cheeſe, olives, and ſeveral other ſmall things. He mentions alſo eggs very often in the accounts he gives of the entertainments made for him by the Sheiks in the Holy-Land: agreeably to which, M. D'Arvieux tells us, that a ſupper prepared by the peaſants of a village near Mount Carmel for him and for their governor, and attended with all the marks of reſpect they were capable of expreſſing, conſiſted of wine, fried fiſh, eggs, and ſome other things. It muſt be the reputed delicacy of eggs alſo, one would imagine, that occaſions them ſo frequently to be ſent to perſons of figure for preſents in thoſe countries; fifty eggs being ſent at one time to the Engliſh conſul, whom Bp. Pococke attended to Cairo, and an hundred at another. See Obſervations, p. 168.

By this word the ancient heathens underſtood inferior deities or ſpirits, both good and bad; but the ancient Jews diſtinguiſhed good and evil ſpirits by ſeveral different names, the former of which are, in the verſion of the LXX, generally called ἄγγελοι, and the latter δαιμόνια. 19 And if I by Beelzebub caſt out devils, by whom do your ſons caſt them out? therefore ſhall they be your judges.

20 But if I with the finger of God caſt out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you.

the good ſpirits or angels, they are frequently mentioned as appearing to the patriarchs, and other pious men; but in Deut. xxxii. 19. the Iſraelites are charged with having ſacrificed unto demons [δαιμόνιοις,] and not to God; by which it appears, that they worſhipped evil ſpirits ſo early: and Pſ. xcvi. 5. it is ſaid, all the gods of the heathens are demons—δαιμόνιοι. See alſo Pſ. cvi. 37. Tobit vi. 17. Baruch iv. 35. In all which paſſages, as well as many others both of the Old and New Teſtament, the word δαιμόνιον is tranſlated devil in our verſion; whereas the Greek word διαβολος, from whence comes the Engliſh name devil, ſignifies, as we have before obſerved, an adverſary, or one who brings a charge againſt another; and is never applied in the ſacred writings to evil ſpirits, in the plural number, but always attributed to Satan only, in the ſingular; agreeably to which he is alſo called the accuſer of the brethren. Rev. vii. 10. See on Matth. iv. 1. And it ſeems highly probable that the notion of Satan, as an enemy to mankind in general, was in ſome meaſure retained from the fall of our firſt parents, and the promiſe made conſequent upon it. Comp. Gen. iii. 15. and Rev. xii. 9. xx. 2. In our Saviour's time, the name given to the prince of demons by the Jews was Beelzebub, with whom they charged him as being a confederate (ſee the next verſe); and by their allowing that he caſt out other demons by his aſſiſtance, it is plain they retained the notion of evil ſpirits in general. The like alſo appears from the ſeveral inſtances of demoniacs who were cured by our Saviour. In Acts xxiii. 8. we are told, that the Sadducees ſay, that there is no reſurrection, neither angel, nor ſpirit; but the Phariſees confeſs both. From the different ſentiments therefore of theſe two ſects of the Jews it is plain, that the latter of them believed the exiſtence of good ſpirits, here called angels; and that they believed the ſame of evil ones, (whatever may be meant by the following word πνευμα,) appears from their charge above-mentioned againſt our Saviour. See Ward's Diſſert. p. 70. and an excellent eſſay on the demoniacs in the Goſpels, vol. ii. p. 172. of Macknight's Harmony.

If thy mind is ſo completely enlightened by reaſon, that no evil paſſion or affection interrupts the emanations of its light in any degree, the whole faculties of thy ſoul ſhall be as much enlightened, enlivened, and aſſiſted, as the members of thy body are, when the bright ſhining of a candle gives thee light, and puts thee in a capacity of uſing them. Thus, comparing the direction of reaſon to the ſhining of a candle, Jeſus ſhewed, that by a parable of a lighted candle, he had intended to explain wherein the proper uſe of reaſon conſiſts."

Ver. 40. Ye fools, &c.] Dr. Waterland follows Elſner in reading this verſe, Ye fools, he that hath cleanſed the outſide hath not [thereby] cleanſed the inſide alſo: But this ſenſe is certainly very unuſual, and the commonly-received tranſlation much more lively and important. See Pſ. viii. 9. Dr. Doddridge, inſtead of fools, reads ye thoughtleſs creatures,—ἄφρονες, which is certainly a much milder word than μῶροι.

Ver. 41. But, &c.] But rather give alms of ſuch things as you are able. Wat. In proportion to your ſubſtance. MS. Doddridge, &c. We are not to imagine, that alms-giving was particularly mentioned by Chriſt in his exhortation to the Phariſees becauſe it is of greater value and neceſſity to the other virtues; He recommended it to that ſect, becauſe they were generally remarkable for their covetouſneſs and extortion; vices which muſt be repented of, by making reſtitution to thoſe who have been injured by them; and when theſe cannot be known or found, the compenſation muſt be made to the poor, as having the next right, becauſe what is given to them is lent to the Lord. But the Phariſees were of an incorrigibly ſtubborn diſpoſition, which no inſtruction, whether mild or perſuaſive, could influence; wherefore our Lord, on this occaſion, wiſely treated them with a kind of wholeſome ſeverity; denouncing moſt dreadful woes againſt them, for being ſo zealous in the ceremonial inſtitutions of religion, while they utterly neglected the precepts of morality. See on Matth. xxiii. Bos, Grotius, and Macknight.

Ver. 44. Woe unto you, Scribes, &c.] The Scribes were called, in the Hebrew language, ſopherim,—writers, and are often mentioned in the ſacred hiſtory as perſons of great authority in the Jewiſh commonwealth. They were originally ſecretaries in the church, the ſtate, the army, revenue, &c. to which offices thoſe were intitled who could write, becauſe anciently that art was practiſed but by few. When Ezra made the reformation, which has rendered him ſo famous among the Jewiſh doctors, he was aſſiſted by the Scribes in reviſing the canon of Scripture, and ordering matters ſo, that from thenceforth a ſufficient number of them ſhould always be employed in multiplying the copies of it. This claſs of men, therefore, being much converſant in the ſacred writings, acquired a ſingular knowledge of them, and in proceſs of time expounded them to the common people with ſuch reputation, that at length they obtained the title of doctors or teachers, and were conſulted upon all difficult points of faith. See Matth. vii. 39. Luke ii. 46. Matth. ii. 4. Hence they are ſaid by our Lord to ſit in Moſes's chair, and to determine what doctrines are contained in Scripture; and hence an able miniſter of the New Teſtament is called a ſcribe inſtructed unto the kingdom of heaven. See Matth. xxiii. 3. Mark xii. 35. But as the Jews were divided into ſeveral religious ſects, it is natural to imagine, that each ſect gave ſuch interpretations of Scripture as beſt agreed with their peculiar tenets. Wherefore it cannot be doubted that the doctors ſtudied and expounded the ſacred writings with a view to authorize the ſeveral opinions of the party they eſpouſed. Accordingly, in Acts xxiii. 9. mention is made of the Scribes that were of the ſect of the Phariſees;—οι γραμματεις τȣ μερȣς των Φαρισαιων, which plainly implies, that ſome of the Scribes were of the other ſects. It is true the Scribes are diſtinguiſhed from the Phariſees in the woes which our Lord now pronounced, and in ſeveral other paſſages, particularly Matth. v. 20. xxiii. 2. but from the latter of theſe paſſages it ſeems evident, that by the Scribes and Phariſees, are commonly meant the Phariſaic Scribes, according to the idiom of the Hebrew language: for as the name Phariſees denoted a ſect, and not an office, it could by no means be ſaid of the whole ſect that they ſat in Moſes's chair. A character of this ſort was applicable only to the doctors, or ſcribes of the ſect. In other inſtances, where the Scribes are diſtinguiſhed from the Phariſees, the Sadducean doctors may be intended. The badge of a Phariſee was his placing the tradition of the elders on an equality with Scripture; whereas the Sadducees rejected all the pretended oral traditions, and adhered ſo cloſely to the text, that they acknowledged nothing as a matter of faith, which was not expreſly contained in the ſacred books. And in this they were followed by the Karaites, or Scripturiſts, a ſect which ſubſiſts among the Jews to this day. It is generally ſuppoſed indeed, that the Sadducees acknowledged the authority of none of the ſacred books, except the writings of Moſes; nevertheleſs there is reaſon to believe that they received all theſe books: for had they denied the authority of any of them, our Lord, who ſo ſharply reproved their other corruptions, would not have let this paſs uncenſured. Nay, Joſephus himſelf, who was no friend to the Sadducees, does not, in the whole compaſs of his writings, charge them with rejecting any of the ſacred books. He ſays they rejected the traditions of the elders, ſo much cried up by the Phariſees; affirming, that nothing ought to be held as an inſtitution or rule, but what was written. Perhaps of all the ſacred writings the Sadducees preferred the books of Moſes; all the Jews did ſo, and do ſtill; but whether in this point the Sadducees outſtripped the reſt of the ſects, is hard to ſay. In the mean time, conſidering the veneration which the Jews had for the books of the law, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that ſome of the doctors of each ſect would apply themſelves more eſpecially to the ſtudy of theſe books in private, and to the explication of them in public, and that ſuch as did ſo might obtain the appellation of lawyers. Accordingly the ſame perſon is called a Phariſee and a lawyer, Matth. xxii. 35. whom St. Mark calls a ſcribe. Farther, it is not improbable that the Phariſean lawyers, fond of their own particular ſtudy, might exalt the law not only above the reſt of the ſacred writings, but above the traditions of the elders; in which reſpect they were diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of their ſect, paying only a ſecondary ſort of regard to theſe traditions. It was on this account that one of them was now ſo diſpleaſed, when he heard Jeſus join the whole body of the Scribes indiſcriminately, and conſequently the lawyers with the Phariſees, in the woes which he now denounced againſt them, for the hypocritical ſhew of piety by their zeal in giving tithes of mint, aniſe, and cummin, according to the precepts of the divine law, whilſt they omitted judgement and the love of God, expreſly enjoined by that law. It ſeems he thought the rebuke undeſerved on the part of the lawyers, even of the Phariſean ſect, becauſe they did not pay that ſuperlative regard to tradition for which the reſt were ſo remarkable.

For ye are as graves, &c.] In the repetition of the woes, Matth. xxiii. 27. this is differently expreſſed: Woe unto you, Scribes and Phariſees, for ye are like unto whited ſepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outwardly, but are within full of dead mens bones, and of all uncleanneſs. Perſons of fortune among the Jews often raiſed fine ſtone ſtructures over their dead, eſpecially when they buried them in the fields, and theſe they whitened from to time to time, to make them look beautiful. Dr. Shaw (Travels, p. 219.) gives us the following account of thoſe ſepulchres: "If we except a few perſons who are buried within the precincts of the ſanctuaries of the Marabutts,—or tutelar ſaints of the country,—the reſt are carried out at a ſmall diſtance from their cities and villages, where a great extent of ground is allotted for the purpoſe. Each family has a particular part of it walled in, like a garden, where the bones of their anceſtors have remained for many generations; for in theſe incloſures the graves are all diſtinct and ſeparated, each of them having a ſtone placed upright at the head and feet, inſcribed with the name or title of the deceaſed (2 Kings xxiii. 17.) whilſt the intermediate ſpace is either planted with flowers, bordered round with ſtones, or paved with tiles. The graves of the principal citizens are farther diſtinguiſhed by having cupolas or vaulted chambers, of three, four, or more ſquare yards built over them; and as theſe very frequently lie open, and occaſionally ſhelter us from the inclemency of the weather, the demoniac, Mark v. 5. might with propriety enough have had his dwelling among the tombs; as others are ſaid, Iſai. lxv. 4. to remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments (mountains). And as all theſe different ſorts of tombs and ſepulchres, with the very walls likewiſe of their reſpective cupolas and incloſures, are conſtantly kept clean, white-waſhed, and beautified, they continue to illuſtrate thoſe expreſſions of our Saviour, where he mentions the garniſhing of ſepulchres, and compares the Scribes, Phariſees, and hypocrites to whited ſepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead mens bones, and all uncleanneſs."—But though 45 Then anſwered one of the lawyers, and ſaid unto him, Maſter, thus ſaying, thou reproacheſt us alſo.

46 And he ſaid, Woe unto you alſo, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourſelves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers.

47 Woe unto you! for ye build the ſepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them.

48 Truly ye bear witneſs, that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: for they indeed killed them, and ye build their ſepulchres.

49 Therefore alſo ſaid the wiſdom of God, I will ſend them prophets and apoſtles, and ſome of them they ſhall ſlay and perſecute:

50 That the blood of all the prophets, which was ſhed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation;

51 From the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, which periſhed between the altar and the temple: verily I ſay unto you, It ſhall be required of this generation.

52 Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourſelves, and them that were entering in, ye hindered.

53 And as he ſaid theſe things unto them, the ſcribes and the Phariſees began to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him to ſpeak of many things;

54 Laying wait for him, and ſeeking to catch ſomething out of his mouth, that they might accuſe him.

Ver. 46. Matth. xxiii. 4.—V. 47. Matth. xxiii. 29.—V. 49. Matth. xxiii. 34.—V. 51. Gen. iv. 8. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21.—V. 52. Matth. xxiii. 13. Or, forbad.

the ſepulchres of the rich were thus beautified, the graves of the poor were oftentimes ſo neglected, that if the ſtones by which they were marked happened to fall, they were not ſet up again; by which means the graves themſelves did not appear; they were αδηλα, as they are called in the text, ſo that men might tread upon them inadvertently. By the law, Numb. xix. 16. graves of all ſorts polluted the perſons who touched them, as well thoſe ſepulchres which were kept perfectly neat and beautiful, as thoſe which were neglected. Hence, to ſhew the hypocriſy of the Phariſees, our Lord, in the one woe, likened them to graves which did not appear,—had no mark to know them by,—and which being covered with graſs, men were polluted by going over them ere they were aware. In the other woe, he likened them to whited ſepulchres, which, though they looked fair and beautiful outward, were full of uncleanneſs. The Scribes and Phariſees, however holy they might appear by their exactneſs in the externals of religion, were polluted with the groſſeſt vices; inſomuch that by the contagion of their example they defiled all who were much in their company. See Macknight.

Ver. 46. Ye lade men with burdens] See on Matth. xxiii. 4. Perhaps the conſciences of theſe lawyers might charge them with ſome private contempt of the injunctions they moſt rigorouſly impoſed upon others, in ceremonial precepts as well as moral; or it may refer to a want of due tenderneſs for the comfort of mens lives, which they imbittered by ſuch rigour.

Ver. 48. That ye allow] That ye approve. See Archbp. Tillotſon's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 195, 196.

Ver. 49. Therefore alſo ſaid the wiſdom of God] Some think that by the wiſdom of God here, we are to underſtand Chriſt, becauſe in the parallel paſſage, Matth. xxiii. 34. he aſcribes this ſaying to himſelf; and becauſe St. Paul calls him expreſly the wiſdom of God, 1 Cor. i. 24. Others ſuppoſe, that the Father is meant; the wiſdom of God being a periphraſis for God himſelf, who might be ſaid to ſpeak the words himſelf, becauſe he commiſſioned the Son to ſpeak them in his name.

Ver. 50, 51. This generation] This nation. MS.

Ver. 52. For ye have taken away the key, &c.] Vitringa underſtands this of one fundamental truth, which would have led them into the knowledge of the reſt: But all their endeavours to embarraſs and bias the minds of men in their inquiries after truth might be intended here, as well as more eſpecially their diſguiſing the prophecies which relate to the Meſſiah. If a key was delivered to the rabbies when they were admitted into their office, in token of the power given them to open and expound the Scripture, as the writers of antiquities inform us was the cuſtom, here may be a beautiful alluſion to that circumſtance; as if he had ſaid, "you take that key, not to uſe, but to ſecrete it." It is certain that the heathen prieſts were called χλειδουχοι, key-bearers. See Archbp. Tillotſon, vol. i. p. 208. Bos. Obſerv. vol. i. p. 228. and the note on the 63d verſe of my tranſlation of Callimachus's hymn to Ceres. Inſtead of ye entered not,—ye hindered; the MS. reads, ye have not entered, ye have hindered.

Ver. 53, 54. Began to urge him vehemently] Δεινῶς ἐνέχειν, which properly ſignifies to faſten fiercely upon him. Several more of the words here uſed are metaphors taken from hunting, ἀποστοματίζειν, which we render to provoke, to ſpeak, might be rendered to mouth, or "bear down with the violence of their words," as Theophilact excellently explains it: and the word θηρεῦσαί, rendered to catch, has in this connection a moſt beautiful propriety; for it expreſſes the eagerneſs with which ſportſmen beat about for their game, to ſtart it from its covert. It is very probable that the Phariſee who was maſter of the houſe, had invited a great many of his brethren and learned friends, on purpoſe to make a more formidable attack upon Chriſt, and by their concurrent teſtimony to charge upon him any thing which might render him obnoxious; and the preſence of ſo many of them made the diſcourſe delivered at this time more proper, and the courage and zeal it expreſſed more remarkable. See Craddock's Harmony, part 2. Doddridge, and Mintert.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XI.

Well does that petition become every diſciple of Chriſt, Lord, teach us to pray! ver. 1. Thou haſt taught us by thy example, and by the precepts of thy word, teach us alſo by thine holy Spirit! Excellent is this form of ſound and divine words, which our gracious Maſter here recommends: It is our duty to ſtudy it attentively, that, conciſe and expreſſive as it is, our thoughts may go along with its ſeveral petitions.

Let us learn to reverence and love God, and to conſider ourſelves as brethren in his family. Let the glory of his name, and the proſperity of his kingdom, be much dearer to us, than any ſeparate intereſt of our own. Let it be our cordial deſire, that his will may be univerſally obeyed, and with the moſt entire conſent of ſoul acquieſced in by all his creatures, both in heaven and on earth. Let our appetites and paſſions be ſo moderated, that having even the plaineſt food and raiment, we may be therewith content; and on the other hand, how plentiful ſoever our circumſtances may be, let us remember, that day by day we depend on God for our daily bread. Nor do we need even the moſt neceſſary ſupplies of life, more than we need daily pardon; for which therefore we ſhould be putting in our conſtant prayer; heartily forgiving all our brethren, as we deſire to be forgiven of God. Conſcious of our own weakneſs, let us, as far as we can, endeavour to avoid circumſtances of temptation; and when neceſſarily led into them, let us look up to heaven for ſupport; labouring, above all things, to preſerve our integrity, and to maintain a conſcience void of offence.

Depending on the certainty of the gracious promiſes here given, (ver. 9, 10.) and encouraged by the experience of ſo many thouſands, who have on aſking received, and on ſeeking found; let us renew our importunate addreſſes to the throne of divine grace; and remembering the compaſſion of our heavenly Father, let us be emboldened in the full aſſurance of faith, to aſk every neceſſary bleſſing; eſpecially the communication of that enlightening and ſanctifying Spirit, without which our corrupt hearts will find out a ready way to abuſe the choiceſt of his providential favours, to the diſhonour of his holy name, and the deeper wounding of our own miſerable ſouls.

[For Reflections from ver. 14. to 36. ſee on Matth. chap. xii.]

As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, ſo is a wiſe reprover upon an obedient ear. Chriſt was indeed a wiſe and faithful reprover, but the ears of theſe Phariſees were diſobedient and uncircumciſed, ver. 37, 38. How well had all the entertainments of the Phariſee's table been repaid, had he and his brethren heard our Lord's reproof with candour, humility, and obedience! Theſe men deſpiſed them, to their ruin; let us often review them for our inſtruction, that none of theſe dreadful woes may come upon us.

This diſcourſe of our Lord is a moſt juſt and ſevere rebuke to every hypocritical profeſſor; who is ſcrupulous and exact in matters of ceremony, while he neglects morality; and is ſtudious to ſhine in the ſight of men, while he forgets the all-penetrating eye of GOD. It expoſes the oſtentation of thoſe, who pride themſelves in empty titles of honour, and eagerly affect precedence and ſuperiority; and it evidently chaſtiſes thoſe who preſs upon others the duties they neglect themſelves; and ſo are moſt righteouſly judged out of their own mouths.

How melancholy is it to obſerve in inſtances like theſe, (ver. 44.) the hypocriſy and deceitfulneſs of the human heart, and to ſee men impoſe on themſelves with empty appearances! Like theſe Phariſees, who built the ſepulchres of the former prophets, while they were

CHAP. XII.

Chriſt preacheth to his diſciples to avoid hypocriſy, and fearfulneſs in publiſhing his doctrine; warneth the people to beware of covetouſneſs, by the parable of the rich man who ſet up greater barns. We muſt not be over-careful of earthly things; but ſeek the kingdom of God, give alms, and be ready at a knock to open to our Lord, whenſoever he cometh. Chriſt's miniſters are to ſee to their charge, and look for perſecution. The people muſt make uſe of this time of grace, becauſe it is a fearful thing to die without reconciliation.

IN the mean time, when there were gathered together an innumerable multitude of people, inſomuch that they trode one upon another, he began to ſay unto his diſciples firſt of all, Beware ye of the leaven of the Phariſees, which is hypocriſy.

2 For there is nothing covered, that ſhall not be revealed; neither hid, that ſhall not be known.

3 Therefore, whatſoever ye have ſpoken in darkneſs, ſhall be heard in the light; and that which ye have ſpoken in the ear in cloſets, ſhall be proclaimed upon the houſe-tops.

4 And I ſay unto you, my friends, Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that, have no more that they can do.

5 But I will forewarn you whom ye ſhall fear: Fear him, which, after he hath killed, hath power to caſt into hell; yea, I ſay unto you, Fear him.

6 Are not five ſparrows ſold for two farthings? and not one of them is forgotten before God:

7 But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore: ye are of more value than many ſparrows.

8 Alſo I ſay unto you, Whoſoever ſhall confeſs me before men, him ſhall the Son of man alſo confeſs before the angels of God:

9 But he that denieth me before men, ſhall be denied before the angels of God.

10 And whoſoever ſhall ſpeak a word againſt the Son of man, it ſhall be forgiven him: but unto him that blaſphemeth againſt the Holy Ghoſt, it ſhall not be forgiven.

11 And when they bring you unto the ſynagogues, and unto magiſtrates, and powers, take ye no thought how or what thing ye ſhall anſwer, or what ye ſhall ſay:

12 For the Holy Ghoſt ſhall teach you in the ſame hour what ye ought to ſay.

13 And one of the company ſaid unto him, Maſter, ſpeak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me.

14 And he ſaid unto him, Man, who made me a judge, or a divider over you?

15 And he ſaid unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetouſneſs: for a man's life conſiſteth not in the abundance of the things which he poſſeſſeth.

16 And he ſpake a parable unto them, were perſecuting thoſe of their own day; and in contempt of all that was ſaid by the meſſengers of God, were filling up the meaſure of their iniquities, till the cloud which had been ſo long gathering burſt on their heads, and poured forth a ſtorm of aggravated wrath and ruin.

May that God, who has immediate acceſs to the hearts of men, deliver all Chriſtian countries, and eſpecially all proteſtant churches, from ſuch teachers as are here deſcribed, (ver. 52.) who take away and ſecrete the key of knowledge, inſtead of uſing it; and obſtruct, rather than promote men's entrance into the kingdom of heaven! How loudly will the blood of thoſe they have deſtroyed cry againſt them in the aweful day of account; and how little will the wages of unrighteouſneſs, and the rewards of worldly policy, be able to arm them againſt deſtruction, or to ſupport them under it!

Chap. XII. Ver. 1. When there were gathered together an innumerable multitude] Many thouſands of people;—τῶν μυριάδων τȣ ὄχλȣ;—literally, many myriads. Perhaps this vaſt aſſemblage of people might be owing to an apprehenſion, either that Chriſt might meet with ſome ill uſage among ſo many of his enemies, or that he would ſay or do ſomething peculiarly remarkable on the occaſion. It was in the hearing of this vaſt aſſembly, that he gave his diſciples in general a charge and exhortation, ſimilar to that which he had given to the twelve apoſtles after their election. The precept, Beware of the leaven of the Phariſees, with which he began this charge, is ſimilar to that, which in the charge to the twelve runs thus, Be ye wiſe as ſerpents, and harmleſs as doves; Matth. x. 16. For though the apoſtles and the diſciples were to be remarkably prudent in their behaviour, yet the leaven of the Phariſees, which is hypocriſy and deceit, was not to enter into the compoſition of their prudence; becauſe hypocriſy is only an expedient to ſerve a turn, the maſk being always torn from hypocrites ſooner or later. See the parallel places.

Ver. 6. For two farthings] Ἀσσαρίων δύο.—The aſs, or anciently aſſarius, which was the tenth part of the denarius, or Roman penny, was alſo a Roman coin then current in Judea, and in value, as is generally thought, about three farthings of our money. See on Matth. x. 29.

Ver. 10. It ſhall be forgiven him] It may be forgiven him: Doddridge: Who obſerves, that the common reading of ἀφεθήσεται, is more literal, but the connection ſhews, it muſt be taken according to the tranſlation here given; for it would be madneſs to imagine that in ſuch a caſe as this, forgiveneſs muſt come of courſe, whether the blaſphemer doth or doth not repent. What grammarians call an enallagé of words and tenſes, is very frequent in the ſacred writings.

Ver. 13, 14. Maſter, ſpeak to my brother] While Jeſus was thus exhorting his diſciples, a certain perſon in the crowd begged that he would perſuade his brother, who probably was preſent, to decide their paternal inheritance, and give him his ſhare. The appellant probably thought, that as the Meſſiah, he would act in the character of a prince, who would decide controverſies relating to property; but, becauſe judging in civil matters was the province of the magiſtrate, and foreign to the end of our Lord's coming into the world, he refuſed to meddle in their quarrel. See Exod. ii. 14.

Ver. 15. Take heed, and beware of covetouſneſs] See to it, and be upon your guard againſt covetouſneſs. The original is very lively, and the full force of it not eaſy to be expreſſed. Some old verſions, and very good copies, read, all covetouſneſs. It is not ſaid which of theſe brothers was in the wrong; only becauſe the diſpoſition which they diſcovered, afforded a fit opportunity for religious advice, our Lord embraced it, and cautioned his hearers, in the moſt ſolemn manner, againſt covetouſneſs; declaring, that neither the length, nor the happineſs of a man's life depends upon the greatneſs of his poſſeſſions. Human life is ſuſtained by little, and therefore abundance is not neceſſary, either to the ſupport or comfort of it. It is not a great eſtate and vaſt poſſeſſions which make a man happy in this world; but a mind that is equal to its condition, whatever it may be. Archbp. Tillotſon obſerves upon this verſe, that "it contains a peculiar kind of caution, no where elſe, nor upon any other occaſion, that I know of, ſays he, uſed in Scripture; in which, for the greater emphaſis and weight, the words of caution are doubled, as if the matter were of ſo much concernment, that no caution about it could be too much; to ſignify to us, both the great danger of this ſin of covetouſneſs, and the great care men ought to uſe to preſerve themſelves from it." See his Sermons, vol. vi. p. 69. and my Eleventh Diſcourſe on the Parables.

Ver. 16. And he ſpake a parable unto them] The firſt thing to be ſaying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully:

17 And he thought within himſelf, ſaying, What ſhall I do, becauſe I have no room where to beſtow my fruits?

18 And he ſaid, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I beſtow all my fruits and my goods.

19 And I will ſay to my ſoul, Soul, thou haſt much goods laid up for many years; take thine eaſe, eat, drink, and be merry.

20 But God ſaid unto him, Thou fool, this night thy ſoul ſhall be required of thee: then whoſe ſhall thoſe things be, which thou haſt provided?

21 So is he that layeth up treaſure for himſelf, and is not rich towards God.

22 And he ſaid unto his diſciples, Therefore, I ſay unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye ſhall eat; neither for the body, what ye ſhall put on.

23 The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment.

enquired into is the true drift and meaning of this parable. In the 15th verſe our Lord warns his hearers to beware of covetouſneſs. In this parable, he repreſents the fooliſh rich man enlarging his barns, that he might heap up his goods in ſtore: In the text he warns us of the danger of laying up treaſures for ourſelves, while we neglect being rich towards God; and ver. 33. he exhorts us to ſell what we have, and give alms; to provide for ourſelves bags which wax not old; a treaſure in the heavens that faileth not; where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. From theſe circumſtances it is commonly underſtood, that covetouſneſs was the rich man's crime; that enlarging his barns to receive his plentiful crop was the inſtance and proof of it; and that the only way to be rich towards God, is to ſell our goods, and to diſtribute them in works of charity and mercy. Thus the parable is commonly underſtood;—but I think, not rightly. Our Saviour, it is true, introduces this parable in conſequence of the caution he had given againſt covetouſneſs: But he had before given a reaſon againſt covetouſneſs, ver. 15. and the parable was added to illuſtrate this reaſon given againſt covetouſneſs, and not to diſplay the folly or vice of covetouſneſs in general. The rich man is not deſcribed in the colours of a covetous man; his wealth aroſe from no oppreſſion or uſury; it was the product of his own land, which has always been eſteemed as an honeſt way of being rich, and to proceed as much from the immediate bleſſing of God, as any whatever. The ground was his own; he is not ſaid to with-hold it from the rightful poſſeſſor by violence or fraud. Thus far then there is no mark of covetouſneſs, or any other fault. But when he found his crop to be great, he enlarged his barns; and this perhaps was his crime. But where was the iniquity of this? Does not every man endeavour that his barns ſhould be in proportion to the product of his lands? May not the moſt charitable man in the world have, or build a barn large enough to receive his crop, and yet be guiltleſs? Nay, it is evident from hence, that covetouſneſs, properly ſo called, was not his fault; for he built his barn to lay up ſtores for many years, propoſing reſt and ſatisfaction in the goods already gotten, and intending to trouble himſelf no further about wealth; he had enough. A covetous man would rather have turned his goods into money, and put it to uſury, and ſlaved on ſtill for more. Beſides, in ver. 20. where God is brought in reproving the rich man for his folly, there is not one word ſaid of his building large barns to receive his fruits:—Thou fool, this night ſhall thy ſoul be required of thee! But, if the large barn had been the crime, the conſiſtency of the parable requires, that the reproof ſhould have pointed to the crime, and it ſhould have been ſaid, "Thou fool! this night ſhall the lightning from heaven conſume thy large barns," or ſomething to this purpoſe. Further, neither upon this is it rightly concluded from the circumſtances of the parable, that this rich man was void of charity to the poor: He is repreſented as fully ſatisfied in his abundance. There had been much more reaſon to have thought him uncharitable, had he been repreſented as not contented with his abundance, but ſtill fearful of poverty and want; which is often the caſe, and the pretence of the rich uncharitable man. Nor, laſtly, is it reaſonable to limit and confine the notion of being rich towards God, to works of charity only; all good works in proportion make us rich towards God. St. Paul ſpeaks in general of the richneſs of good works, and St. James of the richneſs of faith: And in the preſent paſſage, to be rich to God, does particularly ſignify to truſt and rely upon his providence for our life and ſupport, in oppoſition to relying on treaſures of our own heaping up, or large barns of our own building and filling. And now, having thus far examined the common interpretation, and ſhewn how much it falls ſhort of our Saviour's true aim and intent, I ſhall endeavour to point out the true meaning, which will lead us into the right underſtanding of the inference drawn by our Lord, ver. 21. When our Saviour exhorted his hearers to beware of covetouſneſs, he ſupported his advice with this reaſon, for a man's life conſiſteth not in the abundance of the things which he poſſeſſeth; this reaſon he illuſtrates and confirms in the following parable. So that the aim of the parable is to ſhew, that wealth is no ſecurity; that it is folly to pretend, by heaping up treaſures, to arm ourſelves againſt the accidents or caſualties of life, from which nothing can protect us, but the good providence and care of our heavenly Father. In this point all the circumſtances of the parable meet. The rich man is repreſented as flowing in plenty, ſo that he was neceſſitated to pull down his barns and ſtorehouſes, in order to enlarge them. This plenty made him forget God, and vainly imagine that he had a ſecurity in his own hands againſt all the calamities of life. His riches made him promiſe himſelf many happy days and years; in which confidence he expreſſes himſelf as in ver. 19. This folly God reproves him for, and checks him in his preſumptuous ſecurity, ver. 20. Thou fool, &c.—"Thou ſhalt die;—and what then muſt become of thoſe mighty pledges of thy ſecurity? So little will they avail thee, that they themſelves will fall under the power of another, never to return to thee again. So is he, continues our Lord, who lays up treaſure for himſelf, and is not rich towards God." Which words being the moral of this parable, muſt be expounded ſo, as to anſwer the deſign of the parable; and therefore to lay up treaſures for ourſelves, muſt ſignify, to lay them up for our own ſecurity, as if we meant to become thereby the carvers of our own fortune. Conſequently, to be rich towards God, being placed in oppoſition to laying up treaſures for ourſelves, muſt denote our placing confidence and truſt in Him; our endeavouring to procure his favour and protection, as knowing that in them only is all our hope and ſtability. See Bp. Sherlock's Diſcourſes, vol. ii. diſc. 15. and the Reflections at the end of the chapter.

Ver. 18. All my fruits and my goods] All my increaſe and good things; that is, "There will I collect and lay up all this year's increaſe, and likewiſe the produce of former years, which I have in ſtore."

Ver. 19. Take thine eaſe, &c.] The original is remarkably lively and expreſſive, and contains one proof, amongſt a thouſand, of the propriety and elegance of the Scripture language. Ἀναπαύου, φαγε, πιε, ευφραινου: Take thy reſt, eat, drink, be joyful. Nothing can more ſtrongly expreſs the ſelf-ſatisfied hilarity of a ſenſualiſt.

Ver. 20. Shall be required of thee] It is in the original ἀπαιτοῦσιν, they ſhall require; which Elſner thinks alludes to the meſſengers ſent to fetch away the ſoul; and he produces a remarkable and well-known paſſage from Plato to prove that Socrates thought this the office of a Spirit ſuperior to men. Others, to preſerve the literal meaning of the words, ſuppoſe, that thieves broke into this man's houſe, and robbed him of his life, together with his riches; but it is moſt probable that, according to an uſe of the plural number very familiar in the Hebrew language, theſe words may ſignify no more than that his life ſhould be taken away, without determining whether angels, as executioners of the divine decree, or men ſhould take it away. See Macknight, and Elſner's Obſervations, vol. i. p. 231.

Ver, 21. And is not rich towards God] There is a force and propriety in the phraſe εἰς Θεὸν, here rendered towards God, which our language will not exactly expreſs; it repreſents God as a depoſitary, in whoſe hands the good man hath lodged his treaſure, and who hath as it were made himſelf accountable for it in another and better world. See Prov. xix. 17. and Doddridge.

Ver. 22. Take no thought] Be not ſolicitous. Wat. Our Lord having ſpoken the parable of the rich glutton, proceeded in the charge: and becauſe a hurry of buſineſs is often a great enemy to religious diſpoſitions, he cautioned his diſciples againſt anxious cares about the world, from the conſideration of God's providence, which is ſo extenſively perfect, as to comprehend all his works, great and ſmall, without exception. The caution to beware of covetouſneſs, and the parable whereby he enforced that caution was ſpoken to the contending covetous brothers, and to the multitude. This part of his diſcourſe he directed to his diſciples, founding it upon the caution and parable; as if he had ſaid, "Since a man's life conſiſteth not in the abundance of the things which he poſſeſſeth; ſince plenty of goods and fruits is not capable of prolonging a man's life one moment beyond the term fixed for it by God, You my diſciples more eſpecially ought, for that reaſon, to take no thought for the prolongation of your life, by anxiouſly laying up a ſtore of proviſions and of cloaths, as if theſe could preſerve life. No; you ſhould conſider that the life, &c." ver. 23. The ſentiments in this and the following verſes are great and ſublime; the ſame with thoſe contained in the ſermon on the mount; Matth. vi. 25, &c. which ſee.

Ver. 24. Conſider the ravens] Our Saviour, as we have obſerved, often alluded to things preſent, in his parabolical diſcourſes; and therefore St. Matthew, vi. 26. writing to the Jews, retains this mode of expreſſion, and ſays, Behold, or look on, the fowls of the air. But houſe, nor barn; and God feedeth them: How much more are ye better than the fowls?

25 And which of you, with taking thought, can add to his ſtature one cubit?

26 If ye then be not able to do that thing which is leaſt, why take ye thought for the reſt?

27 Conſider the lilies how they grow: They toil not, they ſpin not; and yet I ſay unto you, That Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of theſe.

28 If then God ſo clothe the graſs, which is to-day in the field, and to-morrow is caſt into the oven; how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith?

29 And ſeek not ye what ye ſhall eat, or what ye ſhall drink, neither be ye of doubtful mind.

30 For all theſe things do the nations of the world ſeek after: and your Father knoweth that ye have need of theſe things:

31 But rather ſeek ye the kingdom of God; and all theſe things ſhall be added unto you.

32 Fear not, little flock: for it is your Father's good pleaſure to give you the kingdom.

33 Sell that ye have, and give alms: provide yourſelves bags which wax not old, a treaſure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth.

34 For where your treaſure is, there will your heart be alſo.

35 Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning;

36 And ye yourſelves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately.

37 Bleſſed are thoſe ſervants, whom the lord when he cometh ſhall find watching:

the Gentiles were to make the reflection for themſelves; and hence St. Luke, with great propriety, ſubſtitutes the word conſider in its ſtead. Dr. Heylin renders the laſt clauſe in this verſe, Of how much greater value are ye than the fowls? See Owen's Obſervations on the four Goſpels.

Ver. 26. To do that which is leaſt] This proves, that to add one cubit to a thing, was a proverbial expreſſion for making the leaſt addition to it.

Ver. 29. Neither be ye of doubtful mind] Neither be ye ſet afloat [with deſire]. Wat. Μὴ μετεωρίζεσθε: "Be not (like meteors in the air, which are toſſed about by every blaſt of wind) hurried with anxious cares, and agitated with a variety of reſtleſs and uneaſy thoughts." Any ſpeculations and muſings, in which the mind fluctuates or is ſuſpended in an uneaſy heſitation, might well be expreſſed by the word μετεωρίζω; which ſee in Mintert, and in Wolfius on the place.

Ver. 32—34. Fear not, little flock] "Since God hath deſtined you to everlaſting happineſs, he will ſurely beſtow on you the neceſſaries of the preſent life." This part of the charge may be conſidered as parallel to the directions given to the twelve, Matth. x. 9. Provide neither gold, &c. That is, "Make no proviſion for your journey, but rely wholly on the providence of God." Only our Lord added a precept peculiarly calculated for thoſe times, in which the profeſſion of the Goſpel expoſed men to the loſs of all their goods; ver. 33, 34. Sell that ye have, &c. "By beſtowing that wealth in charities, ſend it before you into heaven, where it ſhall be ſecured from all accidents, and be a ſource of eternal joy to you; and if your treaſure be thus laid up in heaven, your heart will be there; conſequently, your diſpoſitions, actions, and hopes will all be heavenly." This counſel was deſigned principally for the Apoſtles, who, being choſen from among all the diſciples to go out into the world, and convert mankind, could have no fixed poſſeſſions, conſiſtently with the duties of their function; neither had they any occaſion for them, being the peculiar charge of Providence. Beſides, that the firſt preachers of the Goſpel ſhould be poor, was altogether neceſſary, becauſe, if it had been otherwiſe, the world might have ſuſpected that the tie which united them in the great undertaking of converting the world, was of a ſecular and ſelfiſh nature. See on Matth. xix. 21. However, though this direction was given to the Apoſtles in particular, the diſciples in general ſeem to have followed it after the day of Pentecoſt, when they ſold their poſſeſſions, and put the price of them into a common ſtock, wherewith they ſupported their brethren: for it can hardly be doubted that their behaviour in this matter proceeded from the regard which they paid to the preſent admonition of our Lord, joined with their charitable diſpoſitions, and their expectation of better poſſeſſions in the Meſſiah's kingdom. Nevertheleſs, from what St. Peter ſaid to Ananias, Acts v. 4. we learn, that this precept did not abſolutely oblige them, being calculated, as we have already obſerved, for the Apoſtles. See Macknight. Dr. Doddridge, upon the word εὐδόκησεν, ver. 32. remarks, that it generally ſignifies a pleaſurable acquieſcence. Its beautiful and wonderful import here is, "God takes pleaſure in the thought of making you everlaſtingly great and happy in his kingdom." And, agreeably to this, it is pleaſing to obſerve how God is repreſented in Scripture, as enjoying his own preſence as it were with a peculiar reliſh, in the view of thoſe glories which he hath prepared for his people. Hence theſe emphatical phraſes of wiſdom rejoicing in the habitable parts of the earth, Prov. viii. 31. or in the proſpect or idea of them, before they were actually made: of God's knowing the thoughts he thinks towards his people; Jer. xxix. 11. and of his rejoicing over them with joy, and ſilently reſting in his love to them. Zeph. iii. 17. The tenderneſs and energy of innumerable Scriptures depends on this remark; and many of thoſe relating to election, predeſtination, &c. which have been as dry rods of controverſy, when conſidered in this view bud out into at houſand fair leaves, and fragrant bloſſoms of hope and love.

Ver. 35—36. Let your loins be girded] As the eaſtern nations wore long garments, it was neceſſary that, when they had any thing to do which required them to exert their ſtrength or agility, they ſhould tuck them up, and gird them cloſe; a practice to which there are frequent references both in the Old Teſtament and the New. That the lamps ſhould be found extinguiſhed, might be an inconvenient circumſtance to the maſter, would deprive his proceſſion of all its grandeur, and would be a demonſtration of the ſervant's idleneſs. The expreſſions taken together may intimate the care which we ſhould take to inform ourſelves in our duty, and the reſolution with which we ſhould apply to the performance of it. There does not appear to be any particular myſtery in the circumſtance of the wedding; wherein our Lord probably choſe to inſtance, becauſe marriage feaſts were generally the moſt ſplendid, and ſo prolonged to the lateſt hour. See Doddridge, and the note on Matth. xxv. 1. Inſtead of men, ver. 36. Dr. Waterland reads ſerving-men,—or ſlaves; for ſo the word ἄνθρωποι ſometimes imports.

Ver. 37—40. Will come forth and ſerve them] It was uſual for ſervants to ſit at table, and for the maſter to wait upon them, amongſt the Babylonians, at their feaſt called Saccas; amongſt the Cretans, in their Hermœa; and amongſt the Romans, in their Saturnalia: but whether our Lord alluded to theſe, or any of theſe, it is difficult to judge. The words certainly are very intelligible, without ſuppoſing any ſuch reference. Our Lord, in the next verſe, inforced conſtant watchfulneſs, and habitual preparation, from the conſideration of the uncertainty of his coming; telling them, that as there is no maſter of a family but would make ſome preparation againſt a thief, if he knew of his coming, ſo it would be no great matter if they ſhould make ſome ſlight preparation on receiving certain information of his approach; for which reaſon their zeal could only ſhew itſelf by keeping in a conſtant readineſs, as they did not know at what hour he would come. The coming of the Son of man, as we have before remarked, often ſignifies his providential interpoſition for the deſtruction of Jeruſalem: but here, (ver. 40.) it cannot be taken in ſuch a ſenſe, becauſe our Lord ſpeaks of an immediate reward to be beſtowed on all faithful ſervants, and an immediate puniſhment to be executed on all that were unfaithful; and expreſly declares this to be a matter of univerſal concern: all which particulars have very little ſenſe or propriety, when applied to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. It muſt therefore be underſtood of his coming to remove them from the capacities of ſervice here, to give up their account; and if we ſuppoſe it to relate to death, as well as judgement, which, by conſequence at leaſt, it undoubtedly does, it ſtrongly intimates his having ſuch a dominion over the inviſible world, that every ſoul removed into it might be ſaid to be fetched away by him. Compare Rev. i. 18. and the note on ver. 56. and ſee Whitby, Grotius, and Doddridge. Inſtead of and this know, ver. 39. Dr. Waterland reads, but this you know.

Verily, I ſay unto you, That he ſhall gird himſelf, and make them to ſit down to meat, and will come forth and ſerve them.

38 And if he ſhall come in the ſecond watch, or come in the third watch, and find them ſo; bleſſed are thoſe ſervants.

39 And this know, that if the good-man of the houſe had known what hour the thief would come, he would have watched, and not have ſuffered his houſe to be broken through.

40 Be ye therefore ready alſo: for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not.

41 Then Peter ſaid unto him, Lord, ſpeakeſt thou this parable unto us, or even to all?

42 And the Lord ſaid, Who then is that faithful and wiſe ſteward, whom his lord ſhall make ruler over his houſhold, to give them their portion of meat in due ſeaſon?

43 Bleſſed is that ſervant, whom his lord when he cometh, ſhall find ſo doing.

44 Of a truth I ſay unto you, That he will make him ruler over all that he hath.

45 But and if that ſervant ſay in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; and ſhall begin to beat the men-ſervants, and maidens, and to eat and drink, and to be drunken;

46 The lord of that ſervant will come in a day when he looketh not for him, and at an hour when he is not aware, and will cut him in ſunder, and will appoint him his portion with the unbelievers.

47 And that ſervant which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himſelf, neither did according to his will, ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes.

48 But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of ſtripes, ſhall be beaten with few ſtripes. For unto whomſoever much is given, of him ſhall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will aſk the more.

49 I am come to ſend fire on the earth, and what will I, if it be already kindled?

50 But I have a baptiſm to be baptized with, and how am I ſtraitened till it be accompliſhed!

51 Suppoſe ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, Nay; but rather diviſion:

Matth. x. 34. Mic. vii. 6. John vii. 43. ix. 16. x. 19.

Ver. 41, 42. Then Peter ſaid, &c.] St. Peter, who had been giving great attention to the whole of this ſermon, was, it ſeems, at a loſs to know, whether the parable of the watching ſervants was ſpoken to the multitude in general, or to the Apoſtles in particular; he therefore begged his maſter to ſatisfy him as to that point. The parable was directed to all the diſciples; but it contained inſtructions which Peter thought were peculiar to the twelve: Accordingly, by the ſteward Jeſus ſhewed him, that though his exhortations were directed to all, they had a more eſpecial relation to thoſe who were entruſted with the care of the ſouls of others. The interrogation, Who then, &c. ver. 42. had a lively force to turn their thoughts inward, that each one might aſk himſelf whether he was the man. The meaning is, "What do you think ought to be the character and conduct of a ſteward, to whom his Lord committeth the care of his family in his abſence, as I do the care of my church to you? Why certainly he ſhould be both wiſe, to know in what manner to govern the family, and faithful in executing whatever his wiſdom and prudence direct, as fit to be done; for thus only all the members of the family under his care will have due proviſion made for them." The word θεραπέια, rendered houſhold, exactly anſwers to the Latin famulitium, all the ſervants of a family, for which we have no one Engliſh word;—any more than for σιτομέτριον, which ſtrictly ſignifies "a determinate meaſure of wheat," but is here put for all the daily food. By ſuch a verſion the diſtinction between this and the 44th verſe is ſet in a clearer light than critics have general given it. To be raiſed from the care of giving out food to the ſervants, to have the charge of the whole eſtate, was a noble preferment. See Macknight, Eraſmus, and Elſner.

Ver. 46. And cut him aſunder] See the note on Matth. xxiv. 51.

Ver. 47, 48. And that ſervant which knew his Lord's will] Leſt the conſideration of the ſtrictneſs of the account, and the greatneſs of the puniſhment deſcribed in the parable, might terrify men of honeſt diſpoſitions, who are liable to err merely through weakneſs, Jeſus ſhewed them, that as offences differ greatly in their circumſtances and aggravations, ſo ſhall they differ in their puniſhment alſo. To underſtand this part of our Lord's diſcourſe, we muſt ſuppoſe, that the ſervant here ſpoken of had received full inſtruction from his Lord, either before his departure, or afterwards by letters, how he was to employ himſelf, and the ſervants under his care; wherefore, if he neglected his duty, he was more to blame than the inferior ſervants, who had no knowledge of their Lord's will but from the ſteward or ſuperior ſervant, who might conceal it from them, if he had a mind to ſerve any by-end of his own. There is great emphaſis in the words prepared not himſelf, neither did according to his Lord's will. The ſenſe riſes on that of the foregoing verſe; as if our Lord had ſaid, "Think not that I merely intend to forbid ſuch groſs immoralities as drunkenneſs, riot, oppreſſion, &c. but be aſſured that ſins of omiſſion, where there have been fair opportunities of learning your duty, will expoſe you to the divine correction." Scourging was an uſual puniſhment for negligent ſervants. See Deut. xxv. 2, 3. Our Lord, by telling us that the ſervant who knew not his Lord's will, ſhall be beaten, though with few ſtripes, if committing things worthy of ſtripes, ſtrongly intimates, that ignorance will not intirely excuſe any who have neglected God's ſervice, ſince they might in general have known at leaſt the main branches of their duty, as every ſervant may know in the main what kind of conduct his maſter will approve; though ſome may be much more fully inſtructed than others, as to his particular pleaſure. We may obſerve further, that, as rational creatures, it is as much our duty to cultivate our reaſon, and to inquire into and know our duty, as it is to act agreeably to the knowledge we have. With reſpect to the diſtinctions above made, how fitly does this parable deſcribe the aggravation of the ſin of miniſters and teachers of religion, who have ſuch ſuperior and ſingular advantages for knowing Chriſt's will! In this light it ſhews the juſtice of the more ſevere puniſhments here denounced, as to be inflicted on them for ſuch wilful neglects and miſcarriages as they are found to be guilty of in the diſcharge of their office. Indeed, all who are in any meaſure diſtinguiſhed by the gifts of the divine bounty to them, or by their ſtations, whether in civil or ſacred offices, ſhould attentively dwell on the great truth ſo ſolemnly repeated in this 48th verſe, and ſhould ſeriouſly conſider it with a view to their own account,—that to whomſoever much is given, of him ſhall much be required.

Ver. 49. I am come to ſend fire, &c.] Jeſus concluded the charge with foretelling the diviſions which ſhould be occaſioned by his Goſpel: I am come ſend fire on the earth, (ſee on Matth. x. 34.) and what will I, if it be already kindled?—τί θέλω,—what wiſh I? "Do I wiſh to eſcape that fire myſelf, if it be already kindled?" The fire our Lord here ſpeaks of, as the effect of his coming, being the fire of diviſion and perſecution, it was already kindled, and about to ſeize himſelf: But by this queſtion, and what he immediately ſubjoins, he declared he was willing to be the firſt victim who ſhould be conſumed in that fire, as it would tend ſo abundantly to the ſpiritual welfare of mankind. Our bleſſed Lord ſeems to have glowed with the moſt ardent zeal for the good of the human race, when he breathed out this generous wiſh. Dr. Waterland renders it, and how do I wiſh, or how deſirous am I that it were already kindled? And the MS. What will I?—That it were, &c.

Ver. 50. But I have a baptiſm, &c.] And I have. Wat. and MS. "But I have indeed, in the mean time, a moſt dreadful baptiſm to be baptized with, and know that I ſhall ſhortly be baptized as it were in blood, and plunged in the moſt overwhelming diſtreſs;" (ſee on Matth. xx. 23.) "Yet how am I ſtraightened [συνέχομαι] and uneaſy, through the earneſtneſs of my deſire, till, terrible as it is, it be fully compleated, and the glorious birth produced, whatever agonies may lie in the way to it." See 2 Cor. v. 14. John xvi. 21. and Acts xviii. 5.

Ver. 51. Suppoſe ye, &c.] By ſubduing all the nations of the world into one great monarchy under the Jews?—I tell you nay. There are 52 For from henceforth there ſhall be five in one houſe divided, three againſt two, and two againſt three.

53 The father ſhall be divided againſt the ſon, and the ſon againſt the father; the mother againſt the daughter, and the daughter againſt the mother; the mother-in-law againſt her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law againſt her mother-in-law.

54 And he ſaid alſo to the people, When ye ſee a cloud riſe out of the weſt, ſtraightway ye ſay, There cometh a ſhower; and ſo it is.

55 And when ye ſee the ſouth wind blow, ye ſay, There will be heat; and it cometh to paſs.

56 Ye hypocrites, ye can diſcern the face of the ſky, and of the earth; but how is it, that ye do not diſcern this time?

57 Yea, and why even of yourſelves judge ye not what is right?

58 When thou goeſt with thine adverſary to the magiſtrate, as thou art in the way, give diligence that thou mayeſt be delivered from him; leſt he hale thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and the officer caſt thee into priſon.

59 I tell thee, thou ſhalt not depart thence, till thou haſt paid the very laſt mite.

Ver. 54. Matth. xvi. 2.—V. 58. Prov. xxv. 8. Matth. v. 25. See Pſ. xxxii. 6. Iſai. lv. 6.—V. 59. See Mark xii. 42.

ſo many prophecies of the peaceful ſtate of the Meſſiah's kingdom, that it is hard to ſay how Chriſt could completely anſwer the character of the Meſſiah, if he ſhould never give peace on earth. But the error of the Jews lay in ſuppoſing that he was immediately to accompliſh it; whereas the prophecies of the New Teſtament, eſpecially in the book of the Revelation, ſhew, and thoſe of the Old Teſtament moſt plainly intimate, that this proſperous ſtate of his kingdom was not only to be preceded by his own ſufferings, but by a variety of perſecutions, trials, and ſufferings, which ſhould in different degrees attend his followers, before the kingdoms of the earth became, by a general converſion, the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Chriſt. See Rev. xi. 15. and Leland's Anſwer to the Moral Philoſopher, p. 353.

Ver. 53. The mother-in-law againſt the daughter, &c.] The mother-in-law againſt her Son's wife, and the daughter-in-law againſt her huſband's mother. This is the exact rendering of the original words. Our Lord might mention this relation, becauſe, in conſequence of the obligation which the Jewiſh children were under to maintain their aged parents, a young man might, when he ſettled in the world, often take his mother, if a widow, into his family; and her abode in it might occaſion leſs uneaſineſs than that of a mother-in-law in any other ſenſe. This and the foregoing verſe may be underſtood to expreſs thus much;—"So high a value ſhall mankind put upon my religion, that for its ſake they ſhall forego the friendſhip and affection of their neareſt and deareſt relations; who will perſecute them bitterlly, becauſe they have caſt off their paternal worſhip."

Ver. 54, 55. And he ſaid alſo to the people] When Jeſus had done ſpeaking to his diſciples, he addreſſed the unbelieving multitude, who on this occaſion were gathered together, and ſtood round, hearing the inſtruction which he gave to his diſciples, ver. 1. The Mediterranean ſea lying weſt of Judea, the clouds and ſhowers uſually came from that quarter. See 1 Kings xviii. 44. Ὄμβρος properly ſignifies a ſhower; and καύσων, in the next verſe, ſultry or ſcorching heat. The wind which is ſouth of Judea, blowing over the hot ſands of Arabia and Egypt, occaſions a great heat in the air. Thoſe which are properly called the hot winds in that climate are ſo hot, that they bring on a faintneſs and difficulty of breathing. See Obſervations on S. S. p. 38.

Ver. 56. Ye hypocrites, &c.] "Since ye can form a judgement of the weather which ſhall happen, by the ſigns appearing in the earth and ſky, what is the reaſon that you do not diſcover this time by its ſigns?" Our Lord meant the time of the Meſſiah's appearing on earth, to accompliſh the ſalvation of the world, according to the ancient prophecies. See Mark viii. 11. Matth. xvi. 1. Alſo, the time of his coming to deſtroy the Jewiſh nation, which he had deſcribed under the ſimilitude of one who comes ſecretly and unexpectedly to rob a houſe, ver. 39, 40.

Ver. 57. Yea, and why even of yourſelves, &c.] The prediction of the coming of the Son of man to puniſh the Jews for their perfidy and rebellion, was a loud call to a national repentance: wherefore, as the improvement of that prediction, Jeſus exhorted them to a ſpeedy reformation; telling them, that common ſenſe, with a very ſmall degree of reflection, would point it out to them as the very beſt thing they could do, for the averting the impending judgements of God:—Why, even of yourſelves, judge ye not what is right? The phraſe ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν does not ſeem here to ſignify "from the like principles of good ſenſe which you uſe in common affairs, or in matters relating to yourſelves;" but it ſeems an advance on that thought: as if our Lord had ſaid, "Even though I had not ſo expreſly drawn the conſequence; yet, from the tenor of my doctrine and character, as well as from my miracles, you might have diſcerned yourſelves, that it muſt be a very wrong and very dangerous thing to reject and ſlight me."

Ver. 58. When thou goeſt, &c.] As you are going with your adverſary to the governor, endeavour to ſatisfy him, and get your diſcharge, while you are in the way; leſt he carry you by force before the judge, &c. We are all on our way to judgement: although we had no divine revelation, or ſupernatural teſtimonies concerning it, yet, if we will but diſcern what is juſt, (ver. 57.) by the mere light of conſcience, we muſt ſee the neceſſity of reconciling ourſelves to our adverſary, even the great God: for he muſt be our adverſary, as long as we continue in wilful diſobedience. His juſtice has claims, which nothing without repentance can ſatisfy. See Heylin, and the note on Matth. v. 25.

REFLECTIONS ON THE PARABLE OF THE RICH FOOL. Ver. 15—21.

From this ſtriking parable before us, particularly as explained in the note on ver. 16. we may eaſily collect what are the dangerous circumſtances attending riches, which make them often prove ſo fatal to their owners; namely, that they beget an irreligious confidence and preſumption in the heart of man, inclining him to forget God who formed him. A ſenſe of want is a conſtant remembrance of our dependance, and is ever calling us to look up to Him, upon whoſe mercy and goodneſs we exiſt.

A life ſpent in difficulties, and ſupported beyond all the reaſonable hopes of narrow circumſtances, ſuggeſts to us every moment, how wonderfully God has brought us on our way, when we had neither ſtaff, nor ſhoes, nor money in our ſcrip. Theſe are the natural thoughts and ſuggeſtions of poverty: but the man who lives in the midſt of plenty, and fears no want, is not apt to think often of the need he has to be aſſiſted. He that remembers nothing, but that his large eſtate has ever ſupplied both his neceſſities and ſuperfluities, will hardly reflect further, ſo as to come to an acknowledgment that God has been his ſtay ever ſince he fell from his mother's womb. This is the common caſe of riches; they ſteal the heart from God, and render it inſenſible to the duties of religion, by taking away the foundation of all religion,—the ſenſe of our dependance on the providence and care of heaven; and this it was which made our Lord cry out, How hardly ſhall a rich man enter into the kingdom of heaven!

It is this irreligiouſneſs of mind, this diſregard to God, and every thing that is good, which are the too common companions of a plentiful fortune, that have made riches to be ſo hardly ſpoken of in Scripture. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, it is not eaſy to find upon what account the rich man was condemned, as the caſe is generally ſuppoſed to be ſtated. The rich man is ſaid to be cloathed in purple and fine linen, and to fare ſumptuouſly every day. He was not covetous, it ſeems; he lived anſwerably to his fortune. His life is repreſented as a ſcene of eaſe and pleaſure; but is not taxed with any notable vice or enormity. But was he not, you will ſay, uncharitable? For poor Lazarus lay at his door, deſiring the crumbs that fell from his table. This circumſtance rather ſhews that the poor uſed to be fed at his door. Had the intent of the parable been to have repreſented the rich man as hard to the poor, would it not have been ſaid, that his ſervant drove away the poor from his door, or at leaſt when they came, that they were ſent empty away? Neither of theſe, however, is ſaid; but Lazarus is repreſented as feeding upon the crumbs of the rich man's table.

And this is the image given us of their different conditions in this world. The rich man ſate down to a ſumptuous table; the poor man was glad to feed upon the crumbs and ſcraps which fell from it. The end of theſe men is well known; Lazarus was carried by angels into Abraham's boſom; the rich man was tormented in hell flames!

What then does the parable teach us?—Why it repreſents to us the dangerous ſtate of great men, who live without the fear or love of God in their hearts; and the much happier condition of the poor, who have their ſhare of miſery in this world, which often leads to glory and immortality hereafter.

If we look forward, we ſhall ſee that this is the true aim of the parable: When the rich man applies to Abraham for relief, and finds none, he then petitions for his brethren, that they might be warned againſt the danger that hung over their heads,—againſt coming into the ſame ſad ſcene with himſelf. Here, we may well imagine that he would deſire they ſhould be particularly warned againſt thoſe crimes, which had proved his ruin; but of this nothing is ſaid: He only only deſires that Lazarus might go, in quality of a prophet, and teſtify the reality of a future ſtate; which plainly ſhews, that his condemnation was the effect of irreligion and unbelief, rather than of intemperance or uncharitableneſs: He lived at eaſe, and God was

CHAP. XIII.

Chriſt preacheth repentance, upon the puniſhment of the Galileans, and others. The fruitleſs fig-tree may not ſtand. He healeth the crooked woman: ſheweth the powerful working of the word in the hearts of his choſen, by the parable of the grain of muſtard-ſeed, and of leaven: exhorteth to enter in at the ſtrait gate: and reproveth Herod and Jeruſalem.

THERE were preſent at that ſeaſon ſome that told him of the Galileans, whoſe blood Pilate had mingled with their ſacrifices.

2 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid unto them, Suppoſe ye that theſe Galileans were ſinners above all the Galileans, becauſe they ſuffered ſuch things?

3 I tell you, Nay: but, except ye repent, ye ſhall all likewiſe periſh.

4 Or thoſe eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and ſlew them, think ye that they were ſinners above all men that dwelt in Jeruſalem?

Ver. 4. Or, debtors.

not in all his thoughts. To his requeſt Abraham replies, they have Moſes and the prophets, let them hear them; ſhewing us again, that the fault of theſe rich men was contempt of the prophets, and irreligion. The rich man tacitly owns this contempt, both for himſelf and his brethren, by ſaying, Nay, but if one went from the dead, they will repent; which was confeſſing that they had not reverence enough for Moſes and the prophets, to repent upon their authority and admonition; but wanted ſome greater motive, which he thought might be found in the appearance of one coming from the grave. From theſe circumſtances, it is evident, that the purport of this parable, as well as of that in the above chapter, is not to repreſent to us the heinouſneſs of any one particular crime, for which the rich man ſuffered, but to ſhew how fatally riches influence the mind to irreligion, and make men forget God; whilſt the poor, living in continual want, have a perpetual ſenſe of their dependance, and do in all their diſtreſs look up to Him, of whom cometh their ſalvation. This ſenſe of dependance creates in the poor man a fear to offend, a deſire to pleaſe; whilſt the rich man, wanting, as he thinks, nothing from God, has no deſire to court his favour; but grows negligent and remiſs in all the parts of religion, from whence it is a very eaſy ſtep to infidelity.

It is from theſe conſiderations that the love of the world is ſaid in Scripture to be enmity with God. All vices are not attended with hatred and contempt of God; not all the vices that are commonly aſcribed to riches: and therefore, the love of the world that is enmity with God, is not to be expounded by covetouſneſs, or uncharitableneſs, or any other particular vice; but denotes the rich man's temper and diſpoſition,—the habit of mind that grows out of a plentiful eſtate: And this, indeed, is very commonly enmity with God; inclining men, not only to diſobey his commands, but, as far as in them lies, to throw him out of the world, and to depoſe him from the throne of heaven.

Thus we ſee plainly what it is that makes wealth to be ſo dangerous a poſſeſſion; namely, becauſe it is the rival of God in the heart: And if it once get poſſeſſion of the mind, it will expel all truſt and confidence in God, all regard to faith and religion; for, as our Lord elſewhere ſpeaks without a parable, ye cannot ſerve God and mammon.

Hence then we may learn, where the rich man ought to place his guard: If he is not covetous or uncharitable, if he is not luxurious and intemperate, ſo far it is well. But above all, let him take heed, that the pride and inſolence of mind too common in plentiful circumſtances, grow not upon him; the pride, I mean, of ſelf-ſufficiency, as if he were able to guide and to guard himſelf through the world, and had not ſo much need of the care of God over him, as the poor, who enjoy nothing. Let him learn to know, that in riches is no ſecurity, and that he wants the protection of heaven as much as the pooreſt wretch in the world. A rich man that has this ſenſe, as he ought to have, will in conſequence have the other virtues proper to his ſtate: He will be gentle, affable, kind, and charitable, and his ſpirit, in the height of fortune, will be adorned with the meekneſs of the Goſpel of Chriſt.

A man of ſenſe need not go farther than this to learn ſubmiſſion to God in the higheſt fortune. Our Lord's argument, ver. 23. will teach him the reaſonableneſs of the duty: The life, ſays he, is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment. The utmoſt Riches can do, upon the largeſt conceſſions made to them, is to provide food and raiment, and ſuch like neceſſaries and conveniences of life. Put the caſe then, that by being maſter of a great eſtate, you are maſter of food and raiment, and can have them in what quantity or quality you pleaſe:—What then? Have you leſs reaſon, upon this account, to depend upon God, and implore his aid? Conſider a little, To what purpoſe ſerves food?—Is it not for the ſupport of life?—But can food ward off death? Are you, in all your plenty of proviſions, one jot more ſecure againſt ſickneſs, or any accident which may rob you of your life, than the pooreſt man? If this be the caſe, is it not very abſurd to plume yourſelf, and think of ſecurity, becauſe of your plenty, when life itſelf, which is more than meat, is ſtill expoſed, and for which you can have no ſecurity, but in the goodneſs of God?

You have many changes of raiment, and the poor have only rags. —But, will the gout, or ſtone, or burning fever, pay ſuch reſpect to fine cloaths, as not to approach them? Will health always attend upon gold lace and embroidery? If it will, you are right to multiply garments: But if, after all your care for raiment, you, as well as the beggar, muſt ſtill depend upon God for health and ſtrength of body,—how ridiculous is the joy over many changes of garments! Is not the body more than raiment? Since then you muſt truſt God for your life and ſtrength, becauſe they are things which no care of your own, no degree of wealth can inſure; had you not even as good truſt him a little further, and eaſe yourſelf of this unreaſonable care for the things of life?

From theſe, and the like conſiderations, we may ſee, that dependance upon God,—the great moral leſſon inculcated by our Lord in the parable before us,—is as much the rich man's duty and intereſt, as it is the poor man's: That to truſt God, and rely upon his goodneſs, is to be rich towards God, and is that ſort of riches which will make us eaſy and happy in this life, and glorious and ever-bleſſed in that which is to come. By theſe means we may ſtill enjoy our fortunes; and, as our church hath taught us to pray, "We may ſo paſs through things temporal, that we finally loſe not the things eternal."

Chap. XIII. Ver. 1. There were preſent, &c.] Some of our Lord's hearers thought proper to confirm the doctrine in the latter part of the preceding chapter by what they ſuppoſed an example of it; for the ſcope and connection of the paſſage, as well as Chriſt's anſwer, ſhew it to have been the thought of theſe perſons, that Providence had permitted the Galileans to be maſſacred at their devotions for ſome extraordinary wickedneſs. Theſe Galileans were the followers of Judas Gaulonites, (ſee Acts v. 37.) and had rendered themſelves obnoxious to the Roman power by ſome acts or principles of reſiſtance to it. Joſephus has given us the ſtory of this Judas Gaulonites at large, Antiq. lib. xviii. c. 1. It appears that he was the head of a ſect who aſſerted God to be their only ſovereign, and were ſo utterly averſe to a ſubmiſſion to the Roman power, that they counted it unlawful to pay tribute to Cæſar, and rather would endure the greateſt torments, than give any man the title of lord. Joſephus does not mention the ſlaughter of theſe Galileans; but he records an action of Pilate which much reſembles it, concerning the manner of his treating the Samaritans; Antiq. lib. xviii. c. 4. Perhaps this ſtory of the Galileans might now be mentioned to Chriſt with the deſign of leading him into a ſnare, whether he ſhould juſtify or condemn the perſons that were ſlain. Some are of opinion, that theſe Galileans were ſlain, by Pilate's order, at the altar, in contempt of the temple; ſo that their blood was literally mingled with their ſacrifices.

Ver. 2, 3. Suppoſe ye that theſe Galileans, &c.] Our Lord's hearers had inſinuated a very wrong notion of Providence; for which cauſe he not only condemned it in the queſtion juſt now mentioned, but told them expreſly, that theſe Galileans were not to be reckoned greater ſinners than others, becauſe they had fallen by ſo ſevere a calamity; and exhorted them, inſtead of forming harſh judgements of others from ſuch examples of ſufferings, to improve them as incitements to themſelves to repent; aſſuring them, that if they did not, they ſhould all likewiſe periſh; or, as it may be rendered, you ſhall all periſh thus: Which is not only more literal, but the rather to be choſen, becauſe, as Grotius, Tillotſon, Whitby, and many others have obſerved, there was a remarkable reſemblance betwen the fate of theſe Galileans, and that of the whole Jewiſh nation; the flower of which was ſlain at Jeruſalem by the Roman ſword, while they were aſſembled at one of their great feſtivals, and many thouſands of them periſhed in the temple itſelf, and were, as their own hiſtorian repreſents it at large, literally buried under its ruins. See Joſephus's Jewiſh War, b. vi. c. 4.

Ver. 4. The tower in Siloam] This tower, by its name, appears to have been built beſide the baſon, or pool of Siloam, (ſee on John ix. 7.) whoſe waters, running into a lower baſon, formed what was called the pool of fleeces, probably from the ſheep which were waſhed in it. The upper baſon or pool of Siloam, ſeems to have been uſed as a bathing-place for men; and if it had porticos round it for them to undreſs in, will anſwer to the deſcription of the pool of Betheſda, John v. 2. Beſides the ſituation of Betheſda, hard by the ſheep-gate, agrees with this ſuppoſition; for that gate had its name from the ſheep-market which was kept at it, and to which the ſheep were driven, after having been waſhed in the pool of fleeces. The tower in Siloam, therefore, which fell, and ſlew the eighteen perſons here mentioned, may have been one of the porticos of Betheſda. This laſt inſtance might ſeem in ſome reſpects more to the purpoſe than the former, as there was no human interpoſition attending the death of theſe men; ſo that it ſeemed more immediately providential than that of the Galileans whom Pilate had maſſacred. See Macknight, and Druſius.

5 I tell you, Nay: but, except ye repent, ye ſhall all likewiſe periſh.

6 He ſpake alſo this parable; A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and ſought fruit thereon, and found none.

7 Then ſaid he unto the dreſſer of his vineyard, Behold, theſe three years I come ſeeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?

8 And he anſwering, ſaid unto him, Lord, let it alone this year alſo, till I ſhall dig about it, and dung it:

9 And if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou ſhalt cut it down.

10 And he was teaching in one of the ſynagogues on the ſabbath.

11 And behold, there was a woman which had a ſpirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wiſe lift up herſelf.

12 And when Jeſus ſaw her, he called her to him, and ſaid unto her, Woman, thou art looſed from thine infirmity.

13 And he laid his hands on her: and immediately ſhe was made ſtraight, and glorified God.

14 And the ruler of the ſynagogue anſwered with indignation, becauſe that Jeſus had healed on the ſabbath-day, and ſaid unto the people, There are ſix days in which men ought to work: in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the ſabbath-day.

15 The Lord then anſwered him, and ſaid, Thou hypocrite, doth not each one of you on the ſabbath looſe his ox or his aſs from the ſtall, and lead him away to watering?

16 And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, theſe eighteen years, be looſed from this bond on the ſabbath-day?

17 And when he had ſaid theſe things, all his adverſaries were aſhamed: and all the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him.

18 Then ſaid he, Unto what is the king-

Ver. 5. Ye ſhall all likewiſe periſh] That is, "either by the ſword, or in the ruins of your city." See on ver. 2, 3.

Ver. 7. Behold, theſe three years I come] Theſe three years in the parable, are ſuppoſed by many to repreſent the miniſtry of Chriſt, which from hence they conclude to have laſted only three years; but the argument has no force in it, becauſe the other year which the fig-tree was allowed to remain, evidently comprehends the ſpace of forty years; ſo long time having paſſed between Chriſt's aſcenſion, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. Wherefore, we may conclude that the years in the parable denote the whole duration of the Jewiſh diſpenſation,—very properly repreſented by a term of three years, in a parable taken from a fig-tree, whoſe fruit does not come to maturity till the third year. But though this parable was originally meant of the Jews, it may be applied to men in every age; for it exhibits a law obſerved in the divine adminiſtration, which ſhould ſtrike terror into all who enjoy ſpiritual privileges, without improving them. Every man is allowed a certain time of trial, during which he enjoys the means and helps neceſſary to virtue. If he continues ignorant of God's viſitation, deſpiſes the riches of the divine mercy, and goes on obſtinately in ſin, theſe advantages are commonly taken away from him, his day of grace ends; the utmoſt term of God's patience is paſt for ever; the divine ſpirit being grieved, is provoked to depart, and the man is delivered over to an hardened heart; after which his repentance and ſalvation become impoſſible. See Macknight.

Ver. 9. And if it bear fruit, well] Perhaps it may bear fruit; but if not, &c. Heylin, and Doddridge. It is in the original ſomething of an abrupt way of ſpeaking, of which the reader will find many examples in Raphelius Annot. ex Xenoph. p. 102. By this parable our Lord plainly repreſented to the Jews the divine diſpleaſure againſt them, for having neglected the many opportunities they had enjoyed, as planted in the vineyard of God's church; (comp. Iſai. v. 1, 2. xxvii. 2, 3.) and in an aweful manner intimated, that though they had hitherto, at his interceſſion, been ſpared, yet, if they continued unfruitful under the additional cultivation, they were ſhortly to receive on the deſcent of the ſpirit, and the propoſal of the Goſpel in its full extent and evidence they muſt expect nothing but ſpeedy, irreſiſtable, and irrecoverable ruin, the extraordinary means uſed to bring them to repentance, after the reſurrection of Chriſt, by the effuſion of his ſpirit, and the preaching of the Apoſtles, might with great propriety be expreſſed by digging round the barren tree, and dunging it. As what our Lord threatened in this parable was ſo remarkably fulfilled, it may be conſidered alſo as a prophecy of the deſtruction of the Jewiſh ſtate by the Romans, under Veſpaſian and Titus.

Ver. 11. There was a woman, &c.] Jeſus happening to preach in one of the ſynagogues of Perea on a ſabbath-day, caſt his eyes upon a woman in the congregation, who had not been able to ſtand upright during the ſpace of eighteen years. Wherefore, pitying her affliction, he reſtored her body to its natural ſoundneſs. What the Evangeliſt means by a ſpirit of infirmity, we learn from our Lord himſelf, ver. 16. A daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, theſe eighteen years. It is well known that the Jews apprehended, that all remarkable diſorders of body proceeded from the operation of ſome malignant demon. Perhaps they might draw an argument from what is ſaid of Satan's agency in the affliction of Job, in the caſe of Samuel, 1 Sam. xvi. 14. and from Pſ. xci. 6. They alſo conſidered Satan as inveſted with the power of death, Heb. ii. 14. Now that in ſome maladies this was indeed the caſe, is intimated by our Lord's reply, ver. 16. and by St. Paul's words, 1 Cor. v. 5. where he ſpeaks of delivering an offender to Satan, for the deſtruction of the fleſh. See Howe's works, vol. ii. p. 360. and Wolfius on the text. The laſt clauſe of this verſe is better rendered by Dr. Heylin, Could by no means raiſe herſelf up; or, was utterly unable to raiſe herſelf upright.

Ver. 13. And immediately ſhe was made ſtraight] The great favour conferred on her ſo ſuddenly, filled the woman with admiration and gratitude; inſomuch, that ſhe immediately offered up thankſgiving to God, to whom, piouſly and wiſely, ſhe referred her recovery. As our bleſſed Lord undertook this benevolent miracle without any ſolicitation, it affords us a ſtrong idea of his humanity and kindneſs. The length of time which her weakneſs had continued, is a ſtrong proof that there could have been no colluſion; and the inſtantaneous manner in which ſo inveterate and incurable a diſorder was remedied, plainly indicates that the hand of God was concerned in the cure. Dr. Mead obſerves, that the infirmity under which this woman ſuffered, often befals thoſe who have been very much afflicted with a diſorder of the loins, whence the muſcular fibres of that part become contracted and rigid; wherefore, it is very probable, that this tedious diſeaſe proceeded from that very cauſe, and was curable by the divine aſſiſtance only. See his Medica Sacra, ch. xii.

Ver. 15. Doth not each one of you] Our Lord ſoon put the hypocritical ruler to ſilence, by placing the action which he found fault with in the light of their allowed practice. They looſed and led their cattle on the ſabbath-day to water, and thought the mercy of the work juſtified them in ſo doing. He, by uttering a word, had looſed a woman, a reaſonable creature; nay, and what heightens the colouring, a daughter of Abraham, who had been bound with an incurable diſtemper, not for a ſingle day, but for eighteen years! Without doubt, the far greater mercy of this and the other godlike works which Jeſus did, juſtified his performing them on the ſabbath, as the ruler might eaſily have ſeen, had he not been wholly blinded by his ſuperſtition. It is not improbable, that this ruler might that very day have been performing ſuch an office for one of his cattle with his own hands, as is here ſpoken of; for it was by no means neceſſary to his being a ruler of the ſynagogue that he ſhould be a perſon of wealth or dignity in common life. Critics have collected paſſages from rabbinical writers, in which they allow it to be lawful to feed or water a beaſt on the ſabbath-day. See Lighfoot's Hor. Heb. on the text, where he ſhews they were expreſly allowed even to draw water for their beaſts, a more laborious work than leading them to it. We may remark, that the folly even of the men of learning among the Jews, conſpicuous in this and ſome other inſtances mentioned in the Goſpels, ſhews the malignant nature of ſuperſtition. It is capable of extinguiſhing reaſon, of baniſhing compaſſion, and of eradicating the moſt eſſential principles and feelings of the human mind. See Macknight, and Wotton's Miſcellanies, vol. 2.

Ver. 23, 24. Lord, are there few that be ſaved] Our Lord was now travelling by ſlow journies towards Jeruſalem, being on his way to the Jordan, from the north-eaſt parts of Judea. Somewhere on the road, probably ſoon after he had deſcribed the ſucceſs of the Goſpel by the parables of the muſtard-ſeed and the leaven, his opinion was aſked concerning the number of thoſe who ſhould be ſaved. The perſon who propoſed the queſtion ſeems to have heard the parables above-mentioned; if he did, his notions of the kingdom of God being ſuch as the Jews at that time entertained, he perhaps meant a temporal ſalvation, by admiſſion into the Meſſiah's kingdom: but as no ſecular kingdom was ever to be erected by their great deliverer, Jeſus anſwered the queſtion in its ſpiritual meaning. Or we may ſuppoſe that this Jew inquired concerning the eternal ſalvation of men; for though he could eaſily believe that all his brethren were to be ſaved, yet he could not ſo eaſily bring himſelf to believe that ſalvation was not confined to his own nation: wherefore, having an high opinion of Jeſus as a teacher, he propoſed his doubts to him. But, in whatever ſenſe we underſtand this queſtion, our Lord's anſwer contains an exhortation, which implies that a ſmall number of Jews only ſhould be ſaved. He ſaid, ſtrive to enter in at the ſtrait gate. "By inquiring thus curiouſly into the ſtate of others, you ſeem to be at eaſe with reſpect to your own ſalvation; I muſt therefore tell you, that, though as Jews you have great advantages, the gate to life is ſtill ſtrait; and that, if you would be ſaved, you muſt exert yourſelves to the utmoſt. Of this you will be the more convinced, when I aſſure you, that many of your brethren who, becauſe they truſted to their privileges as Jews, lived all along ſecurely, ſhall be for ever excluded from heaven: For many, I ſay unto you, will ſeek to enter in, and ſhall not be able; i. e. ſhall ſeek to enter in, at an improper ſeaſon, namely by importunate intreaties, after the period of their trial is concluded, and their ſtate finally and irreverſibly determined;"—as is evident from the next verſe. The word ἀγωνιζεσθε, rendered ſtrive, imports the act of contending, in the moſt ardent and reſolute manner, with antagoniſts in games, or in war, and may well intimate, that the ſtrait gate is beſet with a variety of enemies, through which, if we aſpire to a crown of eternal glory, we muſt break and force our way; a repreſentation equally juſt and awakening! See 1 Cor. ix. 25. Col. i. 29. 1 Tim. vi. 12. 2 Tim. 47. Foſter's Diſcourſes, vol. i. ſerm. 3. quarto. and the Reflections at the end of this chapter.

Ver. 26. We have eaten and drunk in thy preſence] "Over and above the privileges which you have enjoyed by the Moſaic diſpenſation, you ſhall plead on that occaſion the peculiar favour which I ſhewed you in the days of my fleſh, by exerciſing my miniſtry among you, and by converſing familiarly with you." Perhaps ſome of the nine thouſand whom Jeſus had fed by miracle, may at laſt be in this miſerable number. Comp. John vi. 26. Brennius refers it to their having eaten the ſacrifices preſented to God according to the Moſaic conſtitution; but different perſons may uſe this plea in different ſenſes, and they who, while their hearts were hardened in impenitence and unbelief, have profaned the Lord's ſupper, by an unworthy participation of it, will find a ſad ſenſe, peculiar to themſelves, though it might not be chiefly intended. The paraphraſe of Eraſmus on this verſe deſerves attention: "Wherefore, Lord, doſt thou not know us, or acknowledge us to be thine, whereas thou waſt born amongſt us, we have eaten and drank in thy preſence, and thou haſt taught in our ſtreets; nay, we are thy diſciples, and have more than once healed the ſick, and caſt out devils in thy name?—Upon this the maſter of the family ſhall anſwer, "All thoſe things which ye have enumerated are inſufficient to prove you my true diſciples. He that walks in my ſteps ſhall be acknowledged for my diſciple. But do you depart from me, it will avail you nothing to have known the law, to have heard me, to have been my countrymen, my diſciples, or to have wrought miracles in my name; for whoſoever is defective in ſocial virtue and internal piety, him I will never own to belong to me. Go your ways therefore, and receive your due reward from him whom you have obeyed and ſerved."

Ver. 29. They ſhall come, &c.] This part of the anſwer was levelled directly againſt the Jewiſh prejudice, and is a plain declaration that the ſalvation of God ſhall be extended to people of all parts of the world; and that many who thought themſelves alone intitled to God's favour, in virtue of their peculiar privileges, ſhall, for their miſconduct, be finally excluded from his preſence. See Sherlock's Diſcourſes, vol. ii. p. 91. and on Matth. iii. 9. viii. 11, 12.

Ver. 31. There came certain of the Phariſees] From the known diſpoſition of the Phariſees, who were always the profeſſed enemies of Chriſt, as well as from his anſwer, it is more than probable that their concern for his ſafety was feigned, and that their real deſign was to intimidate him, and make him flee into Judea, not doubting that the haughty prieſts would fall upon ſome method of putting him to death. Herod too ſeems to have been in the plot; he now began to take umbrage at Chriſt's fame and authority, fearing that it might occaſion him ſome embaraſſment, either with his people or with the Romans; but he dreaded to make an attempt on his life, remembering the agonies of mind he had ſuffered on account of the Baptiſt's murder. He therefore inſidiouſly ſent the Phariſees to him, with the meſſage in the preſent verſe, Get thee out, and depart hence, for Herod is determined to kill thee. Such is the force of the original; and in this view there is a peculiar propriety in our Lord's reply, and in his calling Herod a fox, rather than a lion, wolf, or bear. See the note on Matth. iii. 7.

Ver. 32. I do cures to-day and to-morrow] Some apply this to the years of Chriſt's miniſtry, ſuppoſing that a day is put for a year; but the explication is improper, becauſe if the three days here mentioned were intended to comprehend the whole years of our Lord's miniſtry, this converſation muſt have happened in the firſt year thereof, contrary to St. Luke himſelf, who tells us, ch. ix. 51. that the time was come that he ſhould be received up. Beſides, according to this interpretation, cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I ſhall be perfected.

33 Nevertheleſs, I muſt walk to-day and to-morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that a prophet periſh out of Jeruſalem.

34 O Jeruſalem, Jeruſalem, which killeſt the prophets, and ſtoneſt them that are ſent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!

35 Behold, your houſe is left unto you deſolate: And verily I ſay unto you, Ye ſhall not ſee me, until the time come when ye ſhall ſay, Bleſſed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

V. 32. Hebr. ii. 10.—V. 34. Matth. xxiii. 37.—V. 35. Pſ. cxviii. 26.

tation, Chriſt's being perfected on the third day, will imply that he was to ſuffer in the third year of his miniſtry, which is far from being a certain point. The real meaning of the words ſeems to be as follows: "I ſhall not be very long with you on earth; yet, while I am here, I will perform the duties of my miniſtry, without being afraid of any man; becauſe my life cannot be taken from me, but in the place, and at the time appointed by God. Τελειοῦμαι, rendered I ſhall be perfected, may refer to Chriſt's finiſhing the work of redemption, and being by death conſecrated to his office, as our great high-prieſt:—as the word is uſed, Heb. ii. 10. v. 8, 9. x. 7. xxvii. 28. See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 33. Nevertheleſs I muſt walk, &c.] I muſt do what I have to do, &c. MS. I muſt continue my courſe. Heylin. "I know all that is to befal me; I know who are my enemies, what their intentions are, and how far they will be able to accompliſh them; for which reaſon you need give yourſelves no trouble about me. I muſt continue my courſe to-day and to-morrow; no malice or power of men can hinder me from accompliſhing my miniſtry; for it cannot be that a prophet periſh out of Jeruſalem. As the court of prieſts, whoſe prerogative it was to judge prophets, had its ſeat in Jeruſalem, our Lord, by putting the Phariſees in mind that a prophet could not periſh out of Jeruſalem, inſinuated, that he knew their intentions too well to pay any regard to their advice: or in making this obſervation, his deſign may have been to diſplay the wickedneſs of that city, the inhabitants of which had been in every age the chief enemies of the meſſengers of God, inſomuch that none of them were put to death any where elſe: And to this agrees what our Lord ſays of Jeruſalem in the prophetic lamentation which he now uttered concerning it, on account of its crimes, its obſtinacy, and its puniſhment. See the next verſes, and on Matth xxiii. 37. For it cannot be—would be rendered more properly, for it cannot be ſuppoſed.

REFLECTIONS ON THE QUESTION PROPOSED Ver. 23. AND ON OUR LORD'S REPLY.

Amongſt all the ſtratagems whereby the great enemy of mankind plots and contrives their ruin, few are more unhappily ſucceſsful than the fond perſuaſion with which he hath inſpired them, that heaven and everlaſting happineſs are eaſily attainable. The doors of the Chriſtian church are now expanded very wide, and men indeed have acceſs to them upon eaſy terms. Nay, this privilege, it ſeems, deſcends unto men by their birth, and they are reckoned Chriſtians before they well know what it means. The ordinances and myſteries of our religion are common to all, ſave thoſe whom groſs ignorance or notorious crimes exclude. There are no marks on the foreheads of men whereby we can judge of their future condition. They die, and are laid in their graves; none cometh back, to tell us how it fareth with them, and we deſire to think the beſt of every particular.

But, whatever charity be in this, there is little prudence in the inference which many draw from it, who think that they may live as their neighbours do, and die as happily as they; and "ſince the greateſt part of men are ſuch as themſelves, heaven muſt be a very empty place, if all of them be debarred." In ſhort, intereſt and ſelf-love do ſo ſtrongly blind the minds of men, that they can hardly be wreſted from the belief of that which they would very fain have to be true: and hence it is that, notwithſtanding all we are told to the contrary, the opinion of the broadneſs of the way that leads to heaven, and the eaſy acceſs unto it, is ſtill the moſt epidemical, and I fear the moſt dangerous hereſy.

Now to obviate this certain but lamentable error, it may be uſeful to propoſe here ſome conſiderations for the better underſtanding what great things are required in thoſe who look for eternal happineſs, and then to reflect upon the actions and ways of men, that, comparing the one with the other, we may ſee how little ground of hope there remains for the greateſt part to build on.

And if, firſt, we conſider the nature of that divine majeſty, whoſe preſence and enjoyment make heaven ſo deſirable, we muſt be led to think how inconſiſtent it is with his infinite holineſs to admit impenitent ſinners into the habitation of his glory. (See Heb. i. 13. Pſ. v. 4, 5.) It is ſtrange what conceptions fooliſh men entertain of Almighty God, who imagine that thoſe who have been all their days wallowing in ſin, ſhall be admitted into everlaſting friendſhip with him! For ſooner ſhall light and darkneſs dwell together, and heat and cold in their greateſt violence combine, and all the contrarieties of nature be reconciled. Men are wont to frame a notion of God ſuitable to their wiſhing; and this is the common ſhelter againſt every convincing reproof; but this temerity ſhall at length ſufficiently confute itſelf, and feel that juſtice hereafter which it will not now believe.

But if, ſecondly, we conſider that happineſs which every one is ſo confidently fond to promiſe himſelf, it ſeems not very likely that it ſhould be ſo eaſily attained. Glorious things are every where ſpoken of that heavenly Jeruſalem; and all that is excellent or deſirable in the world is borrowed to ſhadow it forth in the Holy Scriptures; but all theſe metaphors and allegories do not ſuffice to convey any full idea of the happineſs we expect; they only tend to aſſiſt our minds a little, and to give us ſome confuſed idea of thoſe unſeen, unheard, and inconceivable things which God hath prepared for thoſe who love him.

And can we then expect that ſo glorious a prize ſhall be gained without any labour? That ſuch a recompence ſhall be beſtowed on thoſe who never were at any pains to procure it?—What toil and anxiety doth it coſt a man to amaſs together that white and yellow earth, which men call money! With what care and pains do others aſcend to any degree of preferment! What induſtry and ſtudy do men employ to reach a little knowledge, and be reckoned amongſt the learned!—And ſhall heaven and everlaſting happineſs ſlide into our arms while we ſleep? No, certainly; God will never diſparage the glories of that place, to beſtow them upon thoſe who have not thought them worthy of their moſt ſerious endeavours.

Again, the joys of that place are pure and ſpiritual, and no unclean thing ſhall enter there. The felicity of the bleſſed ſpirits conſiſts in beholding and admiring the divine perfections, and finding the image of them ſhining in themſelves; in a perfect conformity to the will and nature of God, and in an intimate and delightful ſociety of communion with him:—and ſhall ſuch ſouls then be bleſſed in ſeeing and partaking of the divine likeneſs hereafter, who never loved it, and who would chooſe any thing rather than converſe with him here?

If, once more, we reflect on the endeavours of thoſe who have gone to heaven before us, how they fought and ſtrove, how they wreſtled and ran, to obtain that glorious prize, we ſhall ſee how improbable it is that the greateſt part of men ſhould reach it, with ſo little pains as they are willing to exert. Conſider the patriarchs and ſaints of old; conſider the holy violence wherewith the firſt Chriſtians forced open the gates of heaven, and took poſſeſſion of its joys. The ardent affection wherewith theſe bleſſed ſouls were inflamed towards their Maker and Redeemer, made them willingly give up their bodies to the fire, for the glory of God, and the propagation of the Chriſtian faith. Their conſtancy in their ſufferings amazed their bloody perſecutors, and outwearied the cruelty of their tormentors; nay, they rejoiced in nothing more than that they were accounted worthy to ſuffer ſhame for the name of Jeſus. And what ſhall we ſay of their univerſal charity and love, which reached their very enemies? Of their humility and meekneſs, their juſtice and temperance, and all thoſe other virtues which many of the heathens themſelves obſerved and admired?

Such were the primitive Chriſtians, our ſpiritual anceſtors;—and tell me now, I pray you, what are we to think of theſe men? Did they ſupererrogate and go beyond their duty, or were they fools in doing theſe things, when half the pains might have ſerved the turn?—Did heaven and eternal happineſs coſt them ſo much labour,—and ſhall we think to be carried thither faſt aſleep, or rather while bending all our forces quite another way?

But to come yet nearer to the preſent purpoſe,—a ſerious conſideration of the laws and precepts of the Goſpel will fully convince us of the ſtraitneſs of the gate, and narrowneſs of the way, that leads to eternal life. Look through that excellent ſermon on the mount, and ſee what our Saviour requires of his followers; there you will find him enjoining ſuch a profound humility, as ſhall make us think nothing of ourſelves, and be content that others think nothing of us; a meekneſs which no injuries can overcome, or indignities exaſperate; a chaſtity which reſtraineth the ſeeing of the eyes, and the wandering of the deſires; and ſuch an univerſal charity, as ſhall make us tender other mens welfare as our own, and never to take any revenge againſt our moſt bitter enemies, but to wiſh them well, and to do them all the good we can, whether they will do the ſame by us or no.

Thus then we ſee by what ſtrict rules he muſt ſquare his actions who can with any ground hope to be ſaved. It is now time to turn our view from theſe neceſſary qualifications for obtaining an entrance into heaven, and caſt our eyes upon the world, to ſee how the tempers and actions of men agree with them. If we look back upon the old world, we ſhall ſee how ſoon wickedneſs overſpread the earth; and of all the multitudes then in the world, only Noah and his family were found worthy to eſcape the general deluge; and after that, the church of God was confined to a very narrow quarter, Paleſtine only being enlightened with the true knowledge of God. Pſ. cxlvii. 19, 20.

CHAP. XIV.

Chriſt healeth the dropſy on the ſabbath: teacheth humility: to feaſt the poor: under the parable of the great ſupper, ſheweth how worldly-minded men, who contemn the word of God, ſhall be ſhut out of heaven. Thoſe who will be his diſciples, to bear their croſs muſt make their accounts aforehand, leſt with ſhame they revolt from him afterward, and become altogether unprofitable, like ſalt that hath loſt its ſavour.

AND it came to paſs, as he went into the houſe of one of the chief Phariſees to eat bread on the ſabbath-day, that they watched him.

2 And behold, there was a certain man before him which had the dropſy.

3 And Jeſus anſwering, ſpake unto the lawyers and Phariſees, ſaying, Is it lawful to heal on the ſabbath-day?

4 And they held their peace. And he took him, and healed him, and let him go;

5 And anſwered them, ſaying, Which of you ſhall have an aſs or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not ſtraightway pull him out on the ſabbath-day.

6 And they could not anſwer him again to theſe things.

7 And he put forth a parable to thoſe which were bidden, when he marked how they choſe out the chief rooms; ſaying unto them,

8 When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, ſit not down in the higheſt room; leſt a more honourable man than thou be bidden of him;

9 And he that bade thee and him, come and ſay to thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with ſhame to take the loweſt room.

10 But when thou art bidden, go and ſit down in the loweſt room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may ſay unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then ſhalt thou have worſhip in the preſence of them that ſit at meat with thee.

11 For whoſoever exalteth himſelf ſhall be abaſed; and he that humbleth himſelf ſhall be exalted.

12 Then ſaid he alſo to him that bade him, When thou makeſt a dinner or a ſupper,

Ver. 3. Matth. xii. 10.—V. 5. Exod. xxiii. 5. Deut. xxii. 4. Ch. xiii. 15.—V. 10. Prov. xxv. 6, 7.—V. 11. Job xxii. 29. Prov. xxix. 23. Matth. xxii. 12. Ch. xviii. 14. Jam. iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 5.

But leaving thoſe times, let us conſider the preſent;—let us view our cotemporaries, our fellow-chriſtians, thoſe who live in communion with ourſelves, and ſee what is to be thought of their ſtate in general. How many of them ſhall we find ſo groſly ignorant, that they even know not the way that leads to life. But beſides thoſe many thouſands who periſh for lack of knowledge, how great is the number of vicious and ſcandalous perſons? Remove but our gluttons and drunkards, our thieves and deceivers, our oppreſſors and extortioners, our ſcorners and revilers, our fornicaters and adulterors, our blaſphemers, our falſe-ſwearers, and that horrid crew eſpecially of common ſwearers;—how thin would be our churches? To what a few indeed ſhould we quickly be reduced! What ſhall we ſay of our other frequent enormities? Alas! virtue and vice ſeem to have ſhifted places, evil and good to have changed their names. It is accounted a gallant thing to deſpiſe all laws, human and divine; no man is reckoned generous, unleſs he be extremely ambitious; and it is deemed want of courage to forgive an injury. O religion, whither art thou fled! In what corner of the world ſhall we find thee? Shall we ſearch after thee in courts, and the palaces of great men?—But pride and luxury have driven thee thence; and they are too much engaged in the buſineſs and pleaſure of this world, to mind thoſe of another. Shall we ſeek thee in the cottages of the poor?—But envy and diſcontent lodge there; their outward wants take up all their thoughts, and they have little regard for thoſe of their immortal ſouls.

Religion ſtands not in negatives, and though any man could urge his being free from the groſs and more ſcandalous vices, this is a poor plea for heaven. Nothing but the love of God, and its attendant graces, can qualify us for celeſtial enjoyments; that love of God, which every one readily pretends to; but oh how few are there in the world that underſtand its meaning, or feel its renovating power! If we would but examine ourſelves by the holy meaſures and reſtrictions of this divine love; moſt of us, I fear, ſhould find our vaineſt confidence in futurity, built upon a very ſandy foundation, and the doctrine too true, that few are they that ſhall be ſaved.

I am fully convinced, indeed, that when we have ſaid all we can ſay upon this tremendous ſubject, there are many who will never be perſuaded of the truth of what has been here advanced. "They cannot think it conſiſtent with the goodneſs and mercy of God, that the greateſt part of mankind ſhould be miſerable: They cannot imagine that heaven ſhould be inhabited by ſo very few." But oh what folly and madneſs is this, for ſinful men to ſet rules for the divine goodneſs, and draw concluſions from it, ſo contrary to what himſelf hath revealed!

There are thouſands of angels continually in the preſence of God, and ten thouſand times ten thouſand that ſtand about his throne: Little do we know the extent of the univerſe, or what proportion the wicked and miſerable part of rational beings beareth to thoſe that are good and happy: But this we aſſuredly know, that God was infinitely happy before he had made any creature; that he needs not even the ſociety of the holy angels, and will never admit, therefore, that of wicked and irreligious men.

Sad and lamentable as is the doctrine here inſiſted on, yet may the conſideration of it be very uſeful to rational and thinking minds. It muſt needs touch every ſerious perſon with grief and trouble to behold a multitude of people convened together on this globe, and to think that ere thirty or forty years,—or a little more,—or a great deal leſs,—theſe all ſhall go down to the dark and ſilent grave,—and the greater,—far greater part of their ſouls, be plunged into endleſs and unſpeakable torments! But ſhall not this then ſtir us up to the greateſt diligence and care, for the prevention of ſo horrible an event? Were the ſenſe of this deeply engraven on all our minds, with what ſeriousneſs, with what zeal would miniſters deal with the people committed to their charge, if that by any means they might ſave ſome! How would parents, huſbands, wives, ſons, daughters, friends, employ their diligence, and make uſe of every method for reclaiming their near relations, and the companions of their moſt pleaſing hours, and for plucking them from the road and brink of hell! Laſtly, what holy violence would each of us apply, for ſaving ourſelves from this common ruin, for making our calling and election ſure, and thus happily adding to the number of the few that ſhall be ſaved.

This is the uſe to be derived from what we have been here conſidering. May God Almighty ſo accompany it with his bleſſing and power to every reader, and render it effectual to ſo excellent and glorious a purpoſe See Scougal's works.

Chap. XIV. Ver. 1. One of the chief Phariſees] A member of the great council, or ſanhedrim, who had a country-ſeat in Perea. The higher courts amongſt the Jews always allowed ſome receſs to their members. This perſon's invitation to our Lord was inſidious; for we are told that they watched him.

Ver. 2. There was a certain man before him] He was either ſet before him by way of a ſnare, or had conveyed himſelf thither in hopes of a cure, which is the moſt probable; for it appears from ver. 4. that he was not one of the family, becauſe Chriſt diſmiſſed, or let him go.

Ver. 4. And he took him] The original, ἐπιλαβόμενος, ſignifies either his taking hold of him, or laying his hand upon him. Doubtleſs, our Lord could have accompliſhed this cure as well by a ſecret volition, and ſo might have cut off all manner of cavilling, but he choſe rather to produce it by an action in which there was the very leaſt degree of bodily labour that could be, becauſe thus he had an opportunity of reproving the reigning ſuperſtition of the times.

Ver. 7. Chief rooms] Chief places:—πρωτοκλισίας, chief ſeats, and ſo where the word room occurs. From this circumſtance, and from what is ſaid, ver. 12. it appears that this was a great entertainment, to which many were invited. Very probably therefore the meeting was concerted, and the company choſen, with a view to enſnare Jeſus,—as we obſerved on ver. 1. So that his being invited was a matter, not of accident, but of deſign.

Ver. 10. Go, and ſit down in the loweſt room] It is moſt probable that Chriſt himſelf, as illuſtrious a perſon as he was, had done thus, and ſat down amongſt them in the loweſt place at the table.

Ver. 12. When thou makeſt a dinner, &c.] "By no means confine thy hoſpitality to thy rich relations, acquaintance, and neighbours, leſt call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinſmen, nor thy rich neighbours; leſt they alſo bid thee again, and a recompence be made thee.

13 But when thou makeſt a feaſt, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind:

14 And thou ſhalt be bleſſed; for they cannot recompenſe thee: for thou ſhalt be recompenſed at the reſurrection of the juſt.

15 And when one of them that ſat at meat with him, heard theſe things, he ſaid unto him, Bleſſed is he that ſhall eat bread in the kingdom of God.

16 Then ſaid he unto him, A certain man made a great ſupper, and bade many:

17 And ſent his ſervant at ſupper-time, to ſay to them that were bidden, Come; for all things are now ready.

18 And they all with one conſent began to make excuſe. The firſt ſaid unto him, I have bought a piece of ground, and I muſt needs go and ſee it: I pray thee have me excuſed.

19 And another ſaid, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them: I pray thee have me excuſed.

20 And another ſaid, I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come.

21 So that ſervant came, and ſhewed his lord theſe things. Then the maſter of the houſe, being angry, ſaid to his ſervant, Go out quickly into the ſtreets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind.

22 And the ſervant ſaid, Lord, it is done as thou haſt commanded, and yet there is room.

23 And the lord ſaid unto the ſervant, Go out into the highways, and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my houſe may be filled.

Ver. 13. Neh. viii. 10, 12. Tob. iv. 7.—V. 15. Rev. xix. 9.—V. 16. Matth. xxii. 2.—V. 17. Prov. ix. 2, 5.

leſt the whole of thy reward be an invitation from them to a like entertainment;" for that the text here, as in ſome other inſtances, requires the addition of the particle only to limit it, appears from this, that our Lord cannot be ſuppoſed to exclude from the entertainments of the rich, all who are not objects of charity; or to forbid every ſort of expence, which hath not the poor for its immediate object. His going to entertainments frequently, as well as his ſuffering himſelf to be thrice anointed with precious ointments, ſhew plainly, that the obligations we are under of being charitable to the poor, does not hinder us from doing honour to thoſe whom we eſteem, though it ſhould be attended with conſiderable expence. From this example, therefore, as well as from many others which might be mentioned, it appears, that in the revelation which God hath made of his will to men, he conſiders them as rational creatures; having left them, in the explication and application of his laws, to uſe the faculties of reaſon and underſtanding which he hath given them. It is very apparent, that the word rich refers not merely to neighbours, but to the kindred, and other perſons who are mentioned with them. For if theſe were in low circumſtances, their being related to them was an argument why they ſhould be regarded, rather than neglected. It is probable that our Lord obſerved in the Phariſees an humour of making magnificent feaſts on the ſabbath-days, and on other occaſions; and of treating great perſons chiefly out of pride, ambition, and oſtentation, which might render this advice peculiarly proper, eſpecially if he who now gave the entertainment was, as many of his brethren certainly were, very deficient in works of charity. See Doddridge and Grotius.

Ver. 13. The maimed] 'Αναπήρους, the diſabled; the word takes in both the lame and the blind; and may alſo include thoſe whom the infirmities of age have rendered helpleſs. See a fine parallel paſſage in Pliny's Epiſtles, lib. ix. epiſt. 30.

Ver. 14. At the reſurrection of the juſt] Dr. Clarke ſuppoſes that δικαίων may here ſignify charitable men, and in that ſenſe agree well with the context. But we may well underſtand the words in their proper ſenſe; in which they afford a ſtrong and awakening intimation, that none who neglect works of charity ſhall have their final lot among the righteous; which is evident from the many hundred Scriptures, indiſpenſibly requiring mercy as well as juſtice. See Pſ. i. 5.

Ver. 15. Bleſſed is he that ſhall eat bread, &c.] The phraſe to eat bread, ſignifies making a meal, and this not merely at a common table, but ſometimes at a feaſt, where the proviſion is very ſumptuous. See 2 Sam. ix. 7, 10. xii. 17, 20. Prov. ix. 5. The Jews were accuſtomed to think of the felicity of good men in the life to come, under the notion of a ſumptuous entertainment. See Matth. viii. 11. Wherefore, when Jeſus mentioned the reſurrection of the juſt, one of the gueſts, raviſhed with the delightful proſpect, cried out, "Bleſſed is he who, being admitted into heaven, ſhall enjoy the converſation of the inhabitants of that glorious place; for theſe ſpiritual repaſts muſt regale and invigorate his mind beyond expreſſion." Perhaps in this exclamation the Phariſee meant both to congratulate the felicity of his countrymen, who looked upon themſelves as the children of the kingdom; and to condole the lot of the heathen, who, as he imagined, were all to be excluded from heaven. Conſidered in this light, the ſubſequent parable appears with the greateſt propriety and beauty, as the beſt reply to ſuch an error, and the fitteſt method to correct and explode it.

Ver. 18. With one conſent] 'Απὸ μιᾶς is all that is in the original. It ſeems the moſt natural to ſupply the ellipſis by the word γνώμης,—conſent, as our tranſlators have done. See Wolfius on the text.

Ver. 19. I pray thee have me excuſed] It is a beautiful circumſtance that our Lord repreſents both theſe bargains as already made; ſo that going to ſee the farm and to prove the oxen that evening, rather than the next morning, was merely the effect of rudeneſs, on the one hand, and of a fooliſh impatient humour on the other, and could never have been urged, had they eſteemed the inviter, or his entertainment. Accordingly, it is commonly found in fact, that men neglect the bleſſings and commands of the Goſpel, not for the moſt important affairs of life, (with which they ſeldom interfere) but to indulge the caprice and folly of their own tempers, and to gratify the impulſe of preſent paſſions, ſometimes excited on very low occaſions. See Doddridge.

Ver. 20. Another ſaid, I have married a wife] As the proceſs of the parable repreſents a wiſe and good man offended with this excuſe amongſt the reſt, we muſt ſuppoſe ſomething in the circumſtance of his receiving the meſſage, or of his appointing the time for entertaining the company on his own marriage, which implied a rude contempt of the inviter, and made the reply indecent: It was not neceſſary to deſcend to particulars. If the firſt of the perſons here invited had had ſo important an affair to tranſact as the purchaſing of a farm, or the ſecond, as the buying of five yoke of oxen, or the third, as the marrying of a wife, and if theſe affairs had come upon them unexpectedly, the very evening they had promiſed to ſpend at a rich neighbour's houſe, but eſpecially if theſe affairs could not have been delayed, without miſſing the opportunity of doing them, their excuſes would have been reaſonable; but none of all theſe was the caſe. The farm and the oxen were already purchaſed, and the wife was married; ſo that the ſeeing of the farm, and the proving of the oxen were pieces of unſeaſonable curioſity, which might eaſily have been deferred till next morning. And with reſpect to the new-married man's pretending that he could not leave his wife for a few hours, it was ſuch an exceſs of fondneſs, as was perfectly ridiculous; not to mention that he ought to have thought of this, when the invitation was ſent him the preceding day; wherefore, their refuſing ſo late to come to their rich friend's ſupper on ſuch trifling pretences, was the height of rudeneſs, inaſmuch as it implied the greateſt diſreſpect to their friend, and contempt of his entertainment. See Macknight, and the notes on Matth. xxii. 1. &c.

Ver. 23. Compel them] Preſs them. Wat. "Uſe the moſt earneſt intreaties with thoſe who ſhew any unwillingneſs." The word αναγκασον, rendered compel, does not neceſſarily imply that any external violence was to be uſed with theſe perſons; a ſingle ſervant was ſent out to them, who ſurely, was not capable of forcing ſo great a multitude to come in, as was neceſſary to fill his lord's houſe. The proper meaning of the expreſſion is, "Uſe the moſt powerful perſuaſion with them;" and ſo it fitly denotes the great efficacy of the Apoſtle's preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles, whereby vaſt numbers of them were prevailed with to embrace the Goſpel. See Prov. vii. 21. in the LXX, and Luke xxiv. 29. Indeed, force has no manner of influence to enlighten mens conſciences; ſo that though one ſhould pretend to believe, and ſhould actually practiſe a worſhip contrary to his opinion, it could never pleaſe God, being mere hypocriſy; wherefore St. Auſtin and others, who ſuppoſe that this paſſage of the parable juſtifies the uſe of external violence in matters of religion, are groſly miſtaken. The author of the Obſervations, deſcribing the hoſpitality maintained in the Arab villages, tells us, from La Roque, that as ſoon as the cheikh,—who is as the lord of the village,—is informed that ſtrangers are coming, he goes to meet them, and having ſaluted them, marches at their head to the place ſet apart for their reception, if they are diſpoſed to dine or lodge in the village:

24 For I ſay unto you, That none of thoſe men which were bidden ſhall taſte of my ſupper.

25 And there went great multitudes with him: and he turned, and ſaid unto them,

26 If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and ſiſters, yea, and his own life alſo, he cannot be my diſciple.

27 And whoſoever doth not bear his croſs, and come after me, cannot be my diſciple.

28 For, which of you, intending to build a tower, ſitteth not down firſt, and counteth the coſt, whether he have ſufficient to finiſh it?

29 Leſt haply, after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finiſh it, all that behold it begin to mock him,

30 Saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finiſh.

31 Or what king, going to make war againſt another king, ſitteth not down firſt, and conſulteth whether he be able with ten thouſand to meet him that cometh againſt him with twenty thouſand?

32 Or elſe, while the other is yet a great way off, he ſendeth an ambaſſage, and deſireth conditions of peace.

33 So likewiſe, whoſoever he be of you, that forſaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my diſciple.

34 Salt is good: but if the ſalt have loſt his ſavour, wherewith ſhall it be ſeaſoned?

35 It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill; but men caſt it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

Ver. 26. Deut. xiii. 6. xxxiii. 9. Matth. x. 37. Rom. ix. 13. Rev. xii. 11.—V. 27. Matth. xvi. 24. Mark viii. 34. Ch. ix. 23. V. 28. Prov. xxiv. 27.—V. 34. Matth. v. 13. Mark ix. 50.

But La Roque gives us to underſtand, that frequently thoſe travellers only juſt ſtop to take a bit, and then go on; in which caſe they are generally inclined to ſtay out of the village, under ſome tree. Upon this, the cheikh goes, or ſends his people to the village, to bring them a collation; which, as there is not time to dreſs meat for them, conſiſts of eggs, butter, curds, honey, olives, and fruit. After they have eaten, they thankfully take leave of the cheikh, who commonly eats with them, and then purſue their journey. This may ſerve to explain the paſſage before us. Thoſe in the highways, were ſtrangers, paſſing on without any intention of ſtopping; and thoſe under the hedges, where travellers frequently ſat down, were ſuch as had declared themſelves averſe to ſtay, and only juſt ſat down to take a little refreſhment. The ſheltering themſelves under trees and hedges doth not import, as ſome eminent commentators have imagined, their being the pooreſt and moſt helpleſs of travellers, which does not at all agree with the preſſing them to come in, for ſuch muſt be ſuppoſed ready enough to have come;—but it points out their being ſtrangers, by no means inclined to receive ſuch a favour, as it would ſo retard them as to break in upon their meaſures. See Obſervat. p. 220.

Ver. 24. I ſay unto you, that none, &c.] See the interpretation of the parable, Matth. xxii. To which nothing need be added, except the explication of a circumſtance mentioned here, which is not in the parable, as it was then delivered, namely, the two diſtinct calls; firſt, to thoſe in the ſtreets and lanes of the city, and then to thoſe in the highways and hedges: the former are ſuppoſed to be the Gentile proſelytes, to whom the Goſpel was preached after it was rejected by the Jews; the latter are the idolatrous Gentiles, who had the Goſpel offered to them laſt of all, the proſelytes not being ſufficient in number to compoſe the church of God. The circumſtance too, in the preſent verſe, is wanting in the repetition of the parable, Matth. xxii. The thing ſignified by it is, that becauſe the Jews rejected Jeſus and his apoſtles, they were given over by God to a hardened and reprobate mind: Only the reader muſt remember, that not the condition of individuals, but the general ſtate of the nation is here deſcribed; in which view the parabolical repreſentation is perfectly juſt, notwithſtanding many individual Jews believed in Jeſus, and obtained eternal life. See Macknight.

Ver. 26. And hate not his father, &c.] Strictly ſpeaking, to hate our neareſt relations, and our own lives, would be unnatural wickedneſs, and equally contrary to the dictates of humanity, and the genius of the Goſpel. But it is well known that one thing is ſaid to be loved, and another hated in Scripture, when the former is much preferred; and eſpecially when, out of regard to it, the latter is neglected and forſaken. Comp. Gen. xxix. 13. Deut. xxi. 15—17. Mal. i. 3. Rom. ix. 13. Matth. vi. 24. Father and Mother, and other relations were particularly mentioned by our Lord, becauſe, as affairs then ſtood, the profeſſion of the Goſpel was apt to ſet a man at variance with his neareſt relations.

Ver. 28. To build a tower] We learn from eaſtern writers, that beſides fortified towns and cities, they uſed to have towers for the people of open towns to fly to in time of danger, as well as magnificent towers for pleaſure, in their gardens. Our Lord probably refers to a tower of this latter kind; for one can hardly think, with ſome commentators, that he is ſpeaking of the ſlight and unexpenſive buildings in a vineyard, which indeed are ſometimes ſo ſlight, as to conſiſt only of four poles, with a floor on the top of them, to which they aſcend by a ladder; but rather of thoſe elegant turrets erected in gardens, where the eaſtern people of fortune ſpend a conſiderable part of their time. See the Obſervat. p. 344.

Ver. 31, 32. Or, what king, &c.] According to Sir Iſaac Newton's Chronology, theſe words were ſpoken at our Lord's laſt paſſover, and might poſſibly refer to Herod's leading his army through Judea, againſt Aretas king of Arabia. The phraſe repreſenting the feebler perſon as begging a peace, ſupplies us with a proper emblem of the humility and reſignation with which peace is to be ſought from an offended God, who is poſſeſſed of a ſtrength not as in the caſe ſuppoſed here, but infinitely ſuperior to ours.

Ver. 33. So likewiſe] "Whoever engages to be my diſciple, without counting the coſt, and reſolving to part with all that he hath, will certainly be diſheartened by the unexpected difficulties which he ſhall meet with; and abandoning my ſervice, will expoſe himſelf to great ſhame and loſs." It would be very fooliſh to urge the letter of this precept ſtrictly, and maintain that a man cannot be Chriſt's diſciple, unleſs he throws all his goods into the ſea, divorces his wife, and bids farewel to his children and relations. None more truly renounceth all that he hath, than the man who preſerves himſelf ready every moment to do ſo, and follows his buſineſs free and diſintangled. Such a perſon will chearfully part with life, and every thing dear in life, when called thereto. It was in this ſenſe that the Apoſtles underſtood their maſter; for though they are ſaid to have forſaken all, and followed him, they ſtill retained the property of their goods, as is evident from the mention of John's houſe, into which he took our Lord's mother after the crucifixion; and from Peter and the other diſciples following their old trade of fiſhing, with their own boat and nets, after their Maſter's reſurrection. Beſides, we find Peter paying the tribute in Capernaum, as an inhabitant of the town; and it was in his houſe that our Lord reſided, when he was at Capernaum. Neverthеleſs, though the Apoſtles thus retained the dominion and uſe of their property, they had truly forſaken all, in the higheſt ſenſe of their maſter's precept, being ready, at his call, to leave their families, occupations, and poſſeſſions, as often and as long as he thought fit to employ them in the work of the Goſpel. Upon the whole then it appears, that the renunciation and ſelf-denial which Chriſt requires, does not conſiſt in actually parting with all, before he calls us to do ſo; but in being ſo diſpoſed to part with all, that, when he calls we may do it. See on Matth. xix. 29. and Macknight.

REFLECTIONS ON THE ABSURDITY AND INIQUITY OF PERSECUTION FOR RELIGION, Ver. 23.

In explaining this verſe it has been ſhewn, that no poſſible countenance is or can be given by it to perſecution, on the ſcore of religion, or for conſcience ſake. Indeed nothing is more abſurd and iniquitous; as will appear from the following conſiderations.

1. Perſecution for conſcience ſake, that is, inflicting penalty upon men, merely for their religious principles or worſhip, is plainly founded on a ſuppoſition that one man has a right to judge for another in matters of religion; which is manifeſtly abſurd, and has been fully proved to be ſo by many excellent writers of our church.

2. Perſecution is moſt evidently inconſiſtent with that fundamental principle of morality, That we ſhould do to others, as we could reaſonably wiſh they ſhould do to us: A rule, which carries its own demonſtration with it, and was intended to take off that bias of ſelf-love, which would divert us from the ſtrait line of equity, and render us partial judges betwixt our neighbours and ourſelves. I would aſk the advocate of wholeſome ſeverities, How he would reliſh his own arguments, if turned upon himſelf? What if he were to go abroad into the world,—among Papiſts, if he be a Proteſtant; amongſt Mahometans, if he be a Chriſtian? Suppoſing he was to behave like an honeſt man, a good neighbour, a peaceable ſubject, avoiding every injury, and taking all opportunities to ſerve and oblige thoſe about him;—would he think that, merely becauſe he refuſed to follow his neighbours to their altars, or their moſques, he ſhould be ſeized and impriſoned, his goods confiſcated,—his perſon condemned to tortures or death? Undoubtedly, he would complain of

CHAP. XV.

The parable of the loſt ſheep: of the piece of ſilver: and of the prodigal ſon.

THEN drew near unto him all the publicans and ſinners, for to hear him.

2 And the Phariſees and ſcribes murmured, ſaying, This man receiveth ſinners, and eateth with them.

3 And he ſpake this parable unto them, ſaying,

4 What man of you, having an hundred

Ver. 1. Matth. ix. 10.—V. 2. Gal. ii. 12.—V. 4. Matth. xviii. 12.

this, as a very great hardſhip, and ſoon ſee the abſurdity and injuſtice of ſuch a treatment, when it fell upon him, and when ſuch meaſure as he would mete to others, was meaſured to him again.

3. Perſecution is abſurd, as being by no means calculated to anſwer the end which its patrons profeſs to intend by it; namely, the glory of God, and the ſalvation of men: Now if it does any good to men at all, it muſt be by making them truly religious: But religion is not a mere name, or a ceremony: True religion imports an intire change of heart, and it muſt be founded in the inward conviction of the mind, or it is impoſſible it ſhould be, what yet it muſt be, a reaſonable ſervice. Let it only be conſidered, what violence and perſecution can do, towards producing ſuch an inward conviction: A man might as reaſonably expect to bend an immaterial ſpirit with a cord, or to beat down a wall by an argument, as to convince the underſtanding by threats or tortures. Perſecution is much more likely to make men hypocrites, than ſincere converts. They may, perhaps, if they have not a firm and heroic courage, change their profeſſion, while they retain their ſentiments; and, ſuppoſing them before to have been unwarily in the wrong, they may learn to add falſhood and villainy to error. How glorious a prize! eſpecially when one conſiders at what an expence it is gained. But

4. Perſecution tends to produce much miſchief and confuſion in the world: It is miſchievous to thoſe on whom it falls, and in its conſequences ſo miſchievous to others, that one would wonder any wiſe princes ſhould ever have admitted it into their dominions, or that they ſhould not have immediately baniſhed it thence: For, even where it ſucceeds ſo far, as to produce a change in men's forms of worſhip, it generally makes them no more than hypocritical profeſſors of what they do not believe, which muſt undoubtedly debauch their characters; ſo that, having been villains in one reſpect, it is very probable that they will be ſo in another, and having brought deceit and falſhood into their religion, that they will eaſily bring it into their converſation and commerce.

This will be the effect of perſecution, where it is yielded to; and where it is oppoſed, (as it muſt often be by upright and conſcientious men, who have the greater claim upon the protection and favour of governments,) the miſchievous conſequences of its fury will be more flagrant and ſhocking. Nay, perhaps, where there is no true religion, a native ſenſe of honour in a generous mind may ſtimulate it to endure ſome hardſhips for the cauſe of truth: "Obſtinacy, as one well obſerves, may riſe, as the underſtanding is oppreſſed, and continue its oppoſition for a while, merely to avenge the cauſe of its injured liberty."

Nay, 5, the cauſe of truth itſelf, muſt, humanly ſpeaking, be not only obſtructed, but deſtroyed, ſhould perſecuting principles univerſally prevail. For, even upon the ſuppoſition, that in ſome countries it might tend to promote and eſtabliſh the purity of the Goſpel, yet it muſt ſurely be a great impediment to its progreſs. What wiſe heathen or Mahometan prince would ever admit Chriſtian preachers into his dominions, if he knew it was a principle of their religion, that as ſoon as the majority of the people were converted by arguments, the reſt, and himſelf with them, if he continued obſtinate, muſt be proſelyted, or extirpated by fire and ſword?

If it be, as the advocates for perſecution have generally ſuppoſed, a dictate of the law of nature, to propagate the true religion by the ſword; then certainly, a Mahometan or an idolater, with the ſame notions, ſuppoſing himſelf to have truth on his ſide, muſt think himſelf obliged in conſcience to arm his powers for the extirpation of Chriſtianity: And thus an holy war muſt cover the face of the whole earth, in which nothing but a miracle could render Chriſtians ſucceſsful, againſt ſo vaſt a diſproportion in numbers. Now it ſeems hard to believe That to be a truth, which would naturally lead to the extirpation of truth in the world; or that a divine religion ſhould carry in its bowels the principle of its own deſtruction.

But, 6. This point is clearly determined by the lip of truth itſelf; and perſecution is ſo far from being encouraged by the Goſpel, that it is moſt directly contrary to many of its precepts, and indeed to the whole genius of it. It is condemned by the example of Chriſt, who went about doing good; who came not to deſtroy men's lives, but to ſave them; who waved the exerciſe of his miraculous power againſt his enemies, even when they moſt unjuſtly and cruelly aſſaulted him, and never exerted it to the corporal puniſhment even of thoſe who had moſt juſtly deſerved it: And his doctrine alſo, as well as his example, has taught us, to be harmleſs as doves; to love our enemies; to do good to them that hate us, and to pray for them that deſpitefully uſe and perſecute us.

Such are the principal arguments againſt perſecution for religious matters; from the conſideration whereof the following ſhort Reflections naturally ariſe:

Let us bleſs God, that we are free from the guilt of perſecuting others, and from the miſery of being perſecuted ourſelves. Had we been born in Spain or Portugal, education and example might have corrupted our judgements ſo much, that without further inquiry we might have taken it up as a firſt principle, that hereticks are to be puniſhed with death. And on this foundation we might have practiced or applauded the greateſt inhumanities, perhaps towards the beſt of men. We might have been preſenting to God, even murder for a burnt-offering; and truſting in that for the expiation of our other offences, which is in itſelf one of the greateſt enormities which human nature can commit: Let us alſo thankfully acknowledge it as an inſtance of the divine goodneſs, that we are not ſuffering by perſecution; that we are not plundered or baniſhed, impriſoned or tortured for conſcience-ſake, and thus brought under a formidable temptation to make ſhipwreck both of that and of faith. Let us envy none that liberty of conſcience which they enjoy upon ſuch equitable principles. While we rejoice in a toleration ourſelves, it were inexcuſable to be diſſatisfied, that many who moſt widely differ from us, ſhare in the ſame common benefit. Let us not indulge, even to a ſecret wiſh, that there were a ſword in our hand to ſlay, or a chain to bind them; but if fair argument and love will not fix conviction in their minds, in favour of what we apprehend to be right, let us leave them to worſhip God in their own way, without peremptorily inſiſting that they do it in ours. In ſhort, let us act upon the great principles of virtue and benevolence, which, bleſſed be God, are not confined nor peculiar to any diſtinguiſhing forms of religious profeſſion amongſt us; always remembering, that the ſervant who knoweth his maſter's will, and prepareth not himſelf to act accordingly, will be beaten with many ſtripes; that the freeſt profeſſion of the pureſt religion upon earth will ſignify nothing, if it be no more than a profeſſion; and that all zeal for liberty, which can conſiſt with being the ſlave of ſin at the ſame time, is only a natural haughtineſs of ſpirit, which will aggravate a man's guilt, rather than extenuate it.

Chap. XV. Ver. 1, 2. Then drew near—all the publicans, &c.] To do good unto all ſorts of men, was the employment and higheſt pleaſure of the Son of God; accordingly, when the tax-gatherers and ſinners came to hear him, he rejoiced at the opportunity, received them courteouſly, and though they were perſons of infamous characters, went with them to their houſes, that he might ſcatter the ſeeds of wiſdom among them, and, if poſſible, bring them to a right temper of mind. Some ſuppoſe that theſe publicans and ſinners came by a particular appointment from all the neighbouring parts; but, as St. Luke goes on with the ſtory, without any intimation of a change either in the time, or the ſcene of it, it is moſt probable that theſe diſcourſes were delivered the ſame day that Chriſt dined with the Phariſee, which being the ſabbath day, would give the publicans, who on other days were employed in their office, a more convenient opportunity of attending him. The Phariſees, whoſe pride was intolerable, thinking our Lord's behaviour inconſiſtent with the ſanctity of a prophet, were much diſpleaſed with him for it, and murmured at his charitable condeſcenſion, which ought rather to have given them joy. Wherefore, that he might juſtify his converſing familiarly with ſinners, in order to reform them, he delivered the parable of the loſt ſheep, which he had ſpoken once before, (See Matth. xviii. 12.) together with the parables of the loſt money and prodigal ſon. From men's conduct in the common affairs of life, deſcribed in the parable of the loſt ſheep and loſt money, Chriſt proved it to be the general ſenſe of mankind that every ſinner ſhould be ſought after by the teachers of religion: For as men are ſo moved by the loſs of any part of their property, that they ſeem to neglect what remains while they are employed in recovering that which happens to be miſſing, and when they have found it, are ſo overjoyed, that they cannot contain themſelves; but,—calling their friends, to whom they had given an account of their misfortune,—tell the good news, that they may partake in their joy; ſo the ſervants of God ſhould labour with the greateſt ſolicitude to recover whatever part of his property is loſt; ſuch of his reaſonable creatures as, having ſtrayed from him, are in danger of periſhing: And they have powerful encouragement to do ſo, as the reformation of a ſingle ſinner occaſions more joy in heaven, than the ſteadfaſtneſs of ninety-nine juſt perſons, who need no repentance; that is to ſay, converſion; for ſo the word ſignifies, as it ſhould be tranſlated, ver. 7.—Unleſs by the juſt perſons here mentioned we underſtand the glorified ſaints. By this circumſtance likewiſe our Lord inſinuated, that the Phariſees, who pretended to more holineſs than others, inſtead of repining at his converſing with and inſtructing ſinners, ought to have imitated the example of the heavenly beings, and to have rejoiced to find theſe men delighted with his company and diſcourſes; as he enjoined them a much ſtricter life than they hitherto had been uſed to, and ſince this was a certain token of their repentance, and ſeemed to promiſe a ſpeedy and thorough reformation. The drift of both parables is to ſhew, that the converſion of ſinners is a thing highly acceptable to God, and conſequently, that whatever is neceſſary thereto is ſo far from being inconſiſtent with goodneſs, that it is the very perfection and excellence of it. See Dan. xii. 3. and Macknight.

Ver. 4. In the wilderneſs] Uncultivated ground, uſed merely as common paſture, was called wilderneſs, or deſart, by the Jews, in ſheep, if he loſe one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderneſs, and go after that which is loſt, until he find it?

5 And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his ſhoulders, rejoicing.

6 And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, ſaying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my ſheep which was loſt.

7 I ſay unto you, that likewiſe joy ſhall be in heaven over one ſinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine juſt perſons, which need no repentance.

8 Either what woman, having ten pieces of ſilver, if ſhe loſe one piece, doth not light a candle, and ſweep the houſe, and ſeek diligently, till ſhe find it?

9 And when ſhe hath found it, ſhe calleth her friends and her neighbours together, ſaying, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had loſt.

10 Likewiſe I ſay unto you, There is joy in the preſence of the angels of God, over one ſinner that repenteth.

11 And he ſaid, A certain man had two ſons:

12 And the younger of them ſaid to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living.

13 And not many days after, the younger ſon gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there waſted his ſubſtance with riotous living.

14 And when he had ſpent all, there aroſe a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want.

15 And he went and joined himſelf to a citizen of that country; and he ſent him into his fields to feed ſwine:

16 And he would fain have filled his belly

Ver. 6. 1 Pet. ii. 10, 25.—V. 7. Ch. v. 32.—V. 8. Drachma, here tranſlated a piece of ſilver, is the eighth part of an ounce, which comes to ſeven pence halfpenny, and is equal to the Roman penny: Matth. xviii. 28.—V. 12. Mark xii. 44.

diſtinction from arable, or incloſed land, as we have had occaſion more than once to obſerve. Some would read, Doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and go into the wilderneſs after that which was loſt? which agrees beſt with Matth. xviii. 12.

Ver. 7. Likewiſe joy ſhall be in heaven] Greater joy will be in heaven over one penitent ſinner, than over, &c. The deſign of this parable being to repreſent divine things by images taken from the manner of men, what is here ſaid of God and of the angels, (ſee ver. 10.) muſt be underſtood ſuitably to the nature of human paſſions, which are much more ſenſibly affected with the obtaining of what they have long vehemently deſired, or with the ſaving of that which was looked upon as loſt, than they are with the continuance of goods long enjoyed. However, it ſeems no improbable concluſion from ver. 10. that, at leaſt in ſome extraordinary caſes, the angels are either by immediate revelation or otherwiſe informed of the converſion of ſinners, which muſt, to thoſe benevolent ſpirits, be an occaſion of joy. Nor could any thing have been ſuggeſted more proper to encourage the humble penitent, to expoſe the repining Phariſee, or to animate all to zeal, in ſo good a work as endeavouring to promote the repentance and converſion of others. Indeed, this part of the preſent and the following parable is finely imagined. The angels, though high in nature, and perfect in bleſſedneſs, are repreſented as bearing a friendly regard to their kindred eſſences on earth, and as having a knowledge of many things done here below. It may be neceſſary to obſerve, that it cannot be our Lord's meaning here that God eſteems one penitent ſinner more than ninety and nine confirmed and eſtabliſhed believers, who are undoubtedly the perſons ſpoken of as needing no converſion,—no μετανοια, or univerſal change of heart and life; for it would be inconſiſtent with the divine wiſdom, goodneſs, and holineſs to ſuppoſe this: But it is plainly as if he had ſaid, "As a father peculiarly rejoices, when an extravagant child is reduced to a ſenſe of his duty, and when one whom he had conſidered as utterly ruined by his follies, and perhaps as dead, returns with remorſe and ſubmiſſion; Or as any other perſon who has recovered what he had given up for loſt, has a more ſenſible ſatisfaction in it, than in ſeveral other things equally valuable, but not in ſuch danger; ſo do the holy inhabitants of heaven rejoice in the converſion of the moſt abandoned ſinners, and the great Father of all ſo readily forgives and receives them, that he may be repreſented as having part in the joy." Though by the way, when human paſſions are aſcribed to God, it is certain they are to be taken in a figurative ſenſe, intirely excluded from thoſe ſenſations which reſult from the commotions of animal nature in ourſelves. Some have ſuppoſed that our Saviour, by the word juſt perſons, meant to glance at the Phariſees, who truſted in themſelves that they were righteous. See Archbp. Tillotſon's Sermons, vol. i. ſerm. 16. and my ninth diſcourſe on the Parables.

Ver. 9. She calleth her friends, &c.] Her female friends,—τας φιλας. It might ſeem hardly worth while to aſk the congratulation of her friends on ſo ſmall an occaſion as finding a drachma; (for that is the piece of coin here mentioned, in value not above nine-pence;) but it is repreſented as the tenth part of her little ſtock; and the impreſſible and ſocial temper of the ſex may perhaps be thought of, as adding ſome propriety to the repreſentation. See Doddridge.

Ver. 11. A certain man had two ſons] Our Lord next delivered the parable of the loſt or prodigal ſon, which of all his parables is the moſt delightful; not only as it enforces a doctrine full of inexpreſſible comfort, but becauſe it abounds with the tender paſſions, is finely painted with the moſt beautiful images, and is to the mind what a charming, diverſified landſcape is to the eye.

Ver. 12. And the younger of them, &c.] Our Lord with great propriety makes uſe of the youngeſt ſon as an example of a depraved mind, youth being naturally impotent in ſelf-government, thro' want of experience; hurried away by the impetuoſity of the paſſions; not only deaf, but even rude to the interpoſitions of advice, and totally abandoned to the pleaſures of ſenſe. It had been uſual, in commercial ſtates, to aſſign ſome portion to children when of age; and as the proportion is generally ſettled by law, the propriety of this circumſtance, and of the expreſſion, Give me that portion which falls to me, will appear in a ſtrong and beautiful light. It is plain that no ſignificant ſenſe can be put upon the laſt circumſtance mentioned in this verſe, as referring to the diſpenſations of God to his creatures: It is one of thoſe ornamental circumſtances, which are frequently found in parables, and which it would be wrong over-religiouſly to accomodate to the general deſign. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Ambroſe.

Ver. 13. With riotous living] Ζῶν ἀσώτως implies, that he lived in every degree of luxury and ſenſuality. "The account before us is ſhort," ſays a ſpirited, and pathetic writer, (O that he thus had always employed his pen!)—"The intereſting and affecting paſſages with which ſuch a tranſaction would neceſſarily be connected, are left to be ſupplied by the heart. The ſtory is ſilent,—but nature is not. Much kind advice, and many a tender expoſtulation would fall from the father's lips, no doubt, upon this occaſion. He would diſſuade his ſon from the folly of ſo raſh an enterprize, by ſhewing him the dangers of the journey, the inexperience of his age, the hazards his life, his fortune, his virtue would run, without a guide, without a friend: He would tell him of the many ſnares and temptations which he had to avoid, or encounter, at every ſtep; the pleaſures which would ſolicit him in every luxurious court, the little knowledge he could gain, except that of evil: He would ſpeak of the ſeductions of women, their charms, their poiſons; what hapleſs indulgences he might give way to, when far from reſtraint, and the check of giving his father pain.—The diſſuaſive would but inflame his deſire.—He gathers all together.—I ſee the picture of his departure; the camels and aſſes laden with his ſubſtance detached on one ſide of the piece, and already on their way;—the prodigal ſon ſtanding on the fore-ground, with a forced ſedateneſs, ſtruggling againſt the fluttering movement of joy, upon his deliverance from reſtraint:—The elder brother holding his hand, as if unwilling to let it go:—The father,—ſad moment! with a firm look covering a prophetic ſentiment, that "all would not go well with his child,"—approaching to embrace him, and bid him adieu.—Poor inconſiderate youth! from whoſe arms art thou flying? From what a ſhelter art thou going forth into the ſtorm? Art thou weary of a father's affection, or a father's care? Or hopeſt thou to find a warmer intereſt, or truer counſellor, or a kinder friend in a land of ſtrangers,—where youth are made a prey, and ſo many thouſands are confederated to deceive them, and live by their ſpoils?" See Sterne's Sermons, vol. 3.

Ver. 15. He went and joined himſelf, &c.] So he put himſelf into the ſervice of one of the inhabitants, who ſent him to his farm to keep ſwine. Heylin. It is true, that amongſt the ancient Greeks the chief ſwineherd was looked upon as an officer of no inconſiderable rank, as evidently appears from the figure which Eumæus makes in the Odyſſey;—but this was an age of greater refinement; the unhappy youth was obliged to tend the ſwine himſelf; and if conſidered as a Jew, the averſion of that nation to this unclean animal muſt render the employment peculiarly odious to him; And probably this circumſtance was choſen by our Lord, to repreſent him as reduced to the moſt mean and ſervile ſtate, from a life of the greateſt luxury and extravagance.

Ver. 16. He would have filled his belly with the huſks] The verſion with the huſks that the ſwine did eat: and no man gave unto him.

17 And when he came to himſelf, he ſaid, How many hired ſervants of my father's have bread enough and to ſpare, and I periſh with hunger.

18 I will ariſe, and go to my father, and will ſay unto him, Father, I have ſinned againſt heaven, and before thee,

19 And am no more worthy to be called thy ſon: make me as one of thy hired ſervants.

20 And he aroſe, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father ſaw him, and had compaſſion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kiſſed him.

21 And the ſon ſaid unto him, Father, I have ſinned againſt heaven, and in thy ſight, and am no more worthy to be called thy ſon.

22 But the father ſaid to his ſervants, Bring forth the beſt robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and ſhoes on his feet.

23 And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry:

24 For this my ſon was dead, and is alive again; he was loſt, and is found. And they began to be merry.

25 Now his elder ſon was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the houſe, he heard muſick and dancing.

26 And he called one of the ſervants, and aſked what theſe things meant.

27 And he ſaid unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, becauſe he hath received him ſafe and ſound.

Ver. 20. Acts ii. 39. Epheſ. ii. 13, 17.—V. 21. Pſ. li. 4.

of 1729 renders the word κερατίων, by Carruways, or the fruit of the Carub tree, which bore a mean, though ſweetiſh kind of fruit, in long crooked pods, which by ſome is called St. John's bread. But if the account which Saubert, (who is a great favourer of this interpretation,) gives of this plant be true, ſwine would hardly have been fed with any thing but the huſky part of this in a time of extreme famine: Poſſibly theſe were the huſks of a fruit, ſomething of the wild cheſnut kind. The laſt clauſe is in the original, For no man gave him meat, και ὀυδεὶς ἐδίδυ ἀυτῳ, the word φαγειν, or ἐσθιειν, being underſtood; as is plain from hence, that the clauſe contains a reaſon for his deſiring to fill his belly with the huſks, and not for his abſtaining from them. His abſtaining from the huſks was owing to their being the food of beaſts, and not to his wanting permiſſion to eat them; for this debauched youth cannot be ſuppoſed to have poſſeſſed ſuch a principle of honeſty, that he would rather die with famine, than without his maſter's leave take ſo ſmall a matter as a few huſks, which the ſwine ſeem to have had in great plenty. See Druſius, Doddridge, and Browne.

Ver. 17—19. When he came to himſelf] That is, to a true ſenſe of his preſent ſtate, and the right uſe of his reaſon, which had before been dethroned and extinguiſhed by the mad intoxications of ſenſual pleaſure. When he ſays, I have ſinned againſt heaven, and before thee, he means, that God was injured, in the perſon of his earthly father; and certainly nature itſelf teaches this, that whoever is inſolent or diſreſpectful to his parents, rebels againſt God, who, by making them the inſtruments of communicating life to their children, has imparted to them ſome of his own paternal honour. Dr. Goodman obſerves, "this was an acknowledgment that his father's yoke had been ſo eaſy, that his throwing it off had been an act of rebellion againſt God; and it ſhewed alſo, that his heart was touched with a ſenſe not only of the folly, but of the guilt of his conduct, and that the fear of God began to take hold of him. Having the idea of his undutiful behaviour ſtrongly impreſſed on his mind, he was ſenſible that he had no title to be treated at home as a ſon; at the ſame time he knew, that it would never be well with him till he was in his father's family again; ſo with joy he entertained the thought of occupying the meaneſt ſtation in it;—Make me, or treat me, as one of thy hired ſervants; which he mentions, not becauſe ſuch ſervants fared worſe than ſlaves, but becauſe himſelf was an hired ſervant; and therefore he naturally compared his own condition with thoſe of that rank in his father's family.—Thus, while the liberality of the great Parent of men makes them wantonly run away from his family, the miſeries in which they involve themſelves often conſtrain them to return. By the natural conſequences of ſin, God ſometimes makes ſinners feel that there is no felicity to be found any where but in himſelf." See Goodman's Penitent pardoned, p. 207.

Ver. 20. When he was yet a great way off] But he keeping yet at a diſtance. When he came within ſight of home, his nakedneſs, and the conſciouſneſs of his folly, made him aſhamed to go in; he ſkulked about therefore, keeping at a diſtance, till his father happened to ſpy him, and ſhewed the moſt affecting paternal kindneſs towards him. But ſee on ver. 24.

Ver. 22. Bring forth the beſt robe] It is obſerved by Ferrarius, that the στολὴ, or long robe, was a garment which ſervants never wore; ſo that his father's ordering any ſuch garment, and eſpecially the beſt to be brought, was declaring in the moſt moving manner that can be imagined, how far he was from intending to treat him like a ſervant. His mentioning the ſhoes and the ring (which were worn not only as ſigns of freedom, but of dignity and honour) ſpeaks the ſame language. See Gen. xli. 42. James vi. 2. Ferrarius de Re Veſt. lib. 3. and for a ſpiritual interpretation of theſe particulars, the latter part of my 10th diſcourſe on the Parables.

Ver. 23. Bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it] And ſacrifice it. Wat. and Elſner.

Ver. 24. This my ſon was dead, and is alive, &c.] It is by a very common and beautiful emblem that vicious perſons are repreſented as dead, both by ſacred and profane authors; (Comp. 1 Tim. v. 6. Epheſ. ii. 1. v. 14.) and the natural death of their children would certainly be leſs grievous to pious parents, than to ſee them abandoned to ſuch a courſe as this young ſinner took. "Nothing, ſays the writer quoted on ver. 13. ſo powerfully calls home the mind as diſtreſs; (ſee ver. 17.) the tenſe fibre then relaxes,—the ſoul retires to itſelf,—ſits penſive, and ſuſceptible of right impreſſions: If we have a friend, it is then we think of him; if a benefactor, at that moment all his kindneſſes preſs upon our mind.—Gracious and bountiful God! is it not for this, that they, who in their proſperity forget thee, do yet remember and return to thee in the hour of their ſorrow? When our heart is in heavineſs, upon whom can we think but thee?—who knoweſt our neceſſities afar off, putteſt all our tears in thy bottle, ſeeſt every careful thought, heareſt every ſigh and melancholy groan we utter.—Strange!—that we ſhould only begin to think of God with comfort, when with joy and comfort we can think of nothing elſe.—Man is ſurely a compound of riddles and contradictions: By the law of his nature he avoids pain; and yet, unleſs he ſuffers in the fleſh, he will not ceaſe from ſin, though it is ſure to bring pain and miſery upon his head for ever. Whilſt all went pleaſurably on with the prodigal, we hear not one word concerning his father; no pang of remorſe for the ſufferings in which he had left him, or reſolution of returning to make up the account of his folly: His firſt hour of diſtreſs ſeemed to be his firſt hour of wiſdom: When he came to himſelf, he ſaid, How many hired ſervants of my father have bread enough, and to ſpare, whilſt I periſh! Of all the terrors of nature, that of dying by hunger ſurely is the greateſt; and it is wiſely woven into our frame, to awaken men to induſtry, and call forth their talents.—It had this effect with the prodigal: He aroſe, to go unto his father.—Alas! how ſhall he tell his ſtory?—Ye who have trod this round, tell me in what words he ſhall give in to his father the items of his extravagance and folly?—Yet leave the ſtory; it will be told more conciſely: When he was yet afar off (ver. 20.) his father ſaw him.—Compaſſion told it in three words:—He fell upon his neck, and kiſſed him.—Caſuiſts may ſettle the point as they will: But what could a parent ſee more in the account, than the natural one of an ingenuous heart, too open for the world, ſmitten with ſtrong ſenſations of pleaſure, and ſuffered to ſally forth unarmed into the midſt of enemies ſtronger than himſelf?—The idea of a ſon ſo ruined, would double the father's careſſes; every effuſion of his tenderneſs would add bitterneſs to his ſon's remorſe,—"Gracious heaven! what a father have I rendered miſerable!" Ver. 21. And he ſaid, I have ſinned,—and am no more worthy to be called thy ſon.—But the father ſaid,—Bring hither the beſt robe.—O ye affections! how fondly do you play at croſs-purpoſes with each other?—It is the natural dialogue of true tranſport; joy is not methodical; and when an offender—beloved—overcharges himſelf in the offence, words are too cold, and a conciliated heart replies by tokens of eſteem. And he ſaid,—Bring forth the beſt robe, &c.—and let us eat, and drink, and be merry.—When the affections ſo kindly break looſe, joy is another name for religion. We look up as we taſte it. The cold ſtoick without may aſk ſullenly, (with the elder brother, ver. 26, 28.) "what it means," and refuſe to enter; but the humane and compaſſionate fly impetuouſly to the banquet, given for a ſon who was dead, and is alive again; who was loſt, and is found. Was it not for this that God gave man muſick to ſtrike upou the kindly paſſions; that nature taught the feet to dance to its movements; and as chief governeſs of the feaſt, poured forth wine into the goblet, to crown it with gladneſs?" See Sterne as above.

28 And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and intreated him.

29 And he anſwering, ſaid to his father, Lo, theſe many years do I ſerve thee, neither tranſgreſſed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gaveſt me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends.

30 But as ſoon as this thy ſon was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou haſt killed for him the fatted calf.

31 And he ſaid unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine.

32 It was meet that we ſhould make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was loſt, and is found.

Ver. 28. Therefore came his father out] This act of condeſcenſion gives a great heightening to the character of the father, and adds an inexpreſſible beauty and elegance to the parable; and when we conſider it as referring to the love and condeſcenſion of our Almighty Father, it muſt certainly diffuſe the higheſt conſolation through our ſouls.

Ver. 29. Lo, theſe many years do I ſerve thee] This is the young man's own teſtimony concerning his dutifulneſs; in which reſpect it fully repreſented the ſelf-righteous Phariſees. It is his teſtimony alſo concerning the returns which his father had made to him for his ſervices; nevertheleſs, his behaviour on this occaſion, as well as that of his father, ſeems to give him the lie in both particulars. "This branch of the parable, ſays Mr. Macknight, is finely contrived to expreſs the high opinion which the Phariſees (here repreſented by the elder brother) entertained of their own merit."

Ver. 31. Son, &c.] By calling him ſon, after the inſolent ſpeech he had made, the father inſinuated, that he acknowledged him likewiſe for his ſon; and that neither the undutifulneſs of the one or the other of his children could extinguiſh his affection, or cancel the relation ſubſiſting between them. The laſt clauſe contains a material intimation, and ſuggeſts a ſtrong reaſon againſt murmuring at the indulgence ſhewn to great ſinners: for as the joyful welcome which the father gave this younger ſon, did not incline him to diſinherit this elder brother; ſo neither will God, out of a partial fondneſs for remarkable penitents, raiſe them to a ſtate of glory ſuperior to that of thoſe who have on the whole made a greater progreſs in holineſs, and done him more conſtant and faithful ſervice.

Ver. 32. This thy brother] There is a lively oppoſition between this and the 30th verſe. The eldeſt ſon had there indecently ſaid, This thy ſon; the father, in his reply, tenderly ſays, This thy brother.—"Though he hath devoured my living with harlots, ſtill he is my brother, as well as thy ſon; wherefore thou ſhouldeſt not be angry becauſe he hath repented and is returned, after we thought him univerſally loſt." Thus the goodneſs with which the father bore the unſeemly peeviſhneſs of his elder ſon, was little inferior to the mercy ſhewed in the pardon which he granted to the younger: and we have herein a moving intimation, that the beſt of men ought to look on the moſt abandoned ſinners as in ſome reſpect their brethren ſtill, and ſhould eſpecially remember the relation, when there appears any inclination in ſuch ſinners to return.

Many commentators have conſidered this parable in a view of peculiar application to the Jews and Gentiles, and have obſerved that the murmurs of the Jews againſt the Apoſtles for preaching the Goſpel to the Gentiles (which was ſo common an objection at the beginning of Chriſtianity) are repreſented by the conduct of the elder brother. This ſeems manifeſtly to have been a caſe comprehended in our Lord's deſign: But undoubtedly he had ſomething more in his intention; he meant to ſhew, that had the Phariſees been as eminently good, as they themſelves pretended to be, yet it would have been very unworthy their character to take offence at the kind treatment which any ſincere penitent might receive. Thus does he here, and in many parallel texts, condemn their conduct on their own principles; though elſewhere, on proper occaſions, he ſhews the falſhood of thoſe principles, and plainly expoſes their hypocriſy and guilt. In the inimitable compoſition of this character, ſays Mr. Macknight, the amazing mercy of God is painted with captivating colours; and in all the three parables, the joys occaſioned among heavenly beings by the converſion of a ſingle ſinner, are repreſented; joys even of GOD himſelf, than which a nobler and ſweeter thought never entered into the mind of rational creatures.—Thus high do men ſtand in the eſtimation of God; for which cauſe they ſhould not caſt themſelves away in that trifling manner, wherein multitudes deſtroy themſelves; nor ſhould any think the ſalvation of others a ſmall matter, as ſome who are intruſted with their recovery ſeem to do. Had the Phariſees underſtood the parable, how criminal muſt they have appeared in their own eyes, when they ſaw themſelves truly deſcribed in the character of the elder ſon, angry that his brother had repented! How bitter muſt their remorſe have been, on finding themſelves not only repining at that which gave joy to GOD—the converſion of ſinners, but exceedingly diſpleaſed with the methods of his providence in this matter, and maliciouſly oppoſing them. If theſe parables had been omitted by St. Luke, as they have been by the other three hiſtorians, the world would certainly have ſuſtained a loſs unſpeakable.

REFLECTIONS ON THE PARABLE OF THE PRODIGAL SON. Ver. 11, &c.

The ſon in the parable, who made the raſh requeſt to his father, ver. 11. was young. Youth is a dangerous ſeaſon; but young perſons have ſeldom ſenſe enough to know their danger. Their reaſon is weak, and their paſſions ſtrong: they have great preſumption, but little capacity: they are too proud to be directed by others, and too ignorant to direct themſelves.

In this ſeaſon of folly, our young prodigal deſires his father to give him his portion. Give me (he ſaid) the portion of Goods that falleth to me. He was tired of ſubmitting to the order and regularity of his father's family: he longed to be maſter of himſelf, and live without control or ſubjection.

The prophet Jeremiah has pronounced, that it is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth; but few in their youth are ſenſible of that benefit. While they are kept in awe and under diſcipline, they are indeed often reſtrained from miſchief, and hindered from hurting themſelves; but that reſtraint is grievous to them; they repine at it, they ſtrive againſt it, and are eager for a ſtate of independance as their only happineſs, though it often prove their certain ruin.

While we blame this raſh youth for his imptience after liberty, only in order to abuſe it to licentiouſneſs, I muſt put the Reader in mind that this ſtory is but too juſt a repreſentation of our behaviour towards Almighty God, the common Father of us all. He has placed us here in the world as children in his family: he has allotted each perſon reſpectively his proper office and buſineſs: he has preſcribed moſt wiſe rules for our behaviour; and with a paternal authority and love requires that we ſubmit to his appointments, perform his commands, and do his will, as dutiful and obedient children; promiſing to requite our filial ſervice here, with an eternal inheritance in the heavens.

But we, like the headſtrong prodigal, affect an independent ſtate. The narrow bounds of duty we account an irkſome confinement. We would fulfil the devices and deſires of our own hearts, and without any regard to our eternal inheritance, we chooſe our portion in this world, that now in this our life-time we may receive our good things, wealth, and reputation, and pleaſure, and ſucceſs, and our own will in every thing: And when we have got this our portion, we think only how to enjoy it; we forget our father, we ſlight his love, and diſown his authority.

This our Lord repreſents to us in the ſtory of this fooliſh youth; who, when he had got his portion, would no longer depend upon his father, but went away into a far country: as we read at ver. 13.

It was doubtleſs very grievous to his aged father, thus to be deſerted by a ſon he loved ſo tenderly; a ſon he had ſo lately and ſignally obliged, by giving him his eſtate in his life-time; a ſon, from whom he had probably promiſed himſelf, (as parents are too apt to promiſe themſelves) great comfort, ſupport, and ſatisfaction in his declining years: But the unnatural youth had no regard to his father's grief, no compaſſion for his grey hairs, which, for aught he knew, his undutifulneſs might bring with ſorrow to the grave. He had received life from him; he had ever ſince been maintained by him, and had now got an eſtate from him: What farther need of a father? His father had now nothing more to give him but advice; a gift he was too proud to accept. He apprehended that even his father's preſence might be a ſilent reproach to his extravagance; and therefore, getting over all ſenſe of gratitude, all obligations of duty, and all ties of natural affection, away he went into a far country.

All men muſt blame and deteſt this wicked diſobedience of the prodigal ſon; yet moſt men, in proſperity, behave after the ſame manner towards our heavenly Father. When they are at eaſe in the free enjoyment of the good things he has beſtowed on them, they forget that God is their benefactor, from whom they received them; and their Lord, to whom they are accountable for the uſe they make of them. They neither love God, nor fear him: They retain no ſenſe of his goodneſs, no apprehenſion of his power. Such is the twofold ſtupidity of the ſinner; neither hopes nor fears affect him. His caſe is exceeding dangerous. There ſeems but one mean left to reclaim him, and that is affliction, which will incline him to own God for a Benefactor, when he finds what it is to want his goodneſs; and to own God for his Maſter, when he finds that he cannot eſcape his power.

For a lively illuſtration of this, let us follow our prodigal into that far country, that country far from God, where virtue and honour were ſtrangers. See him roving from one vanity to another, as appetite, or paſſion, or capricious fancy led him. He forgot his father and his father's houſe: he confided in his wealth, as an inexhauſtible fund for pleaſure and entertainment: and while that fund laſted, his indifference for his father laſted, and would have laſted for ever, could it have been ſo ſupported. He never thought of his native home, but with joy and complacence in his deliverance from it: with cenſure or ridicule of his father's cares and auſterities, and with pity or ſcoffing of his elder brother's domeſtic regularity and confinement.

Thus this rebellious ſon, having caſt off the yoke of paternal au-

CHAP. XVI.

The parable of the unjuſt ſteward. Chriſt reproveth the hypocriſy of the covetous Phariſees. The rich glutton, and Lazarus the beggar.

AND he ſaid alſo unto his diſciples, There was a certain rich man which had a ſteward; and the ſame was accuſed unto him that he had waſted his goods.

2 And he called him, and ſaid unto him, How is it that I hear this of thee? give an account of thy ſtewardſhip; for thou mayeſt be no longer ſteward.

3 Then the ſteward ſaid within himſelf, What ſhall I do? for my lord taketh away thority, became, as the prophet expreſſes it, like a wild aſs traverſing the wilderneſs, that ſnuffeth up the wind at her pleaſure; in her occaſion who can turn her away? Wild and wanton, ſtubborn and violent, wilful and untractable as that aſs of the wilderneſs, he gave a full ſcope to all his appetites and paſſions, indulged every luſt, fulfilled every deſire, and in a word, became a perfect libertine; or, in Scripture language, a ſon of Belial:—For Belial ſignifies without yoke, and is one of the names of the devil, uſed to expreſs the impiety of that arch-rebel, in renouncing his dependance upon his Almighty God: and they are called ſons of Belial, who live like him, without any dependance upon God, in an open violation of his laws, and a profane contempt of his authority.

How many ſuch ſons of Belial are there now among us, who live whole years, yea many years, in an open and almoſt profeſſed defiance of the laws of God? Who never think of him, or mention his name, but to profane or blaſpheme it; who deſpiſe his revelations, ridicule his ſervants, and give themſelves up to work all manner of uncleanneſs with greedineſs? What way is there to reclaim theſe unhappy men, theſe thoughtleſs wretches? To admoniſh them of their duty, and expoſe to them the great truths of religion, is to caſt pearls before ſwine, who will trample them under foot, and turn again, and rend you. Is their caſe then quite deſperate? Is there no mean left to reclaim them? Yes, affliction; which ſeems the laſt reſort of divine mercy to reduce theſe wanton prodigals. For I have obſerved of many of them, (I mean chiefly young perſons of plentiful fortunes,) that they are intoxicated with ſuch a redundancy of animal ſpirits, ariſing from a good conſtitution, high diet, and little labour, as renders them incapable of reaſon: their life is a continual phrenſy, like that of a fever or drunkenneſs; and there muſt be ſome great change wrought in it, before they can be capable of good advice. Mortifications ſeem abſolutely neceſſary to bring them to, and keep them in their right ſenſes. While their proſperity continues, their vice will continue, and exclude all poſſibility of amendment.—Strike then, O Lord, in thy mercy, and make them ſenſible of their folly by their puniſhment. Make them know experimentally that it is an evil thing and bitter, that they have forſaken thee their God. Thy goodneſs has provided this remedy by natural means, even in the ordinary courſe of things. Vice ſoon waſtes the ſtock of mercies beſtowed on them; their wealth, health, eaſe, and chearfulneſs of ſpirits, are ſoon exhauſted by extravagance, lewdneſs, and riot.

So fared it with this rambling prodigal, as we read at ver. 12. Thus does the providence of God often ſtrike in to heighten the miſchievous conſequences of a vicious courſe. His expenſive riotous living did naturally, and of itſelf bring him to want: but the providence of God likewiſe concurred to make him miſerable. At the ſame time there aroſe a mighty famine in that land; ſo that he not only wanted wherewithal to ſupply himſelf, but was alſo cut off from all hopes of being relieved by the ſuperfluity of others.

What ſhould he now do in his diſtreſs? Whither betake himſelf in his ſad condition? Why, immediately return to his father, beg his forgiveneſs, and humble himſelf before him. The ſhorteſt follies are the beſt. Repentance is never too ſoon; the earlieſt is ever the moſt ſeaſonable. But pride forbids, and ſhame to acknowledge his offences. Accurſed ſhame!—he was not aſhamed when he left his father: he was not aſhamed of his lewdneſs, riot, and extravagance; but to own them he is aſhamed: and therefore chooſes rather to continue in his errors, than confeſs them. He prefers the vileſt office in life to the painful confuſion of ſeeing his father's face. See ver. 15, 16.

He was diſtreſſed to a ſtrange degree. Where poverty is not our own fault, it is no diſgrace to be poor. Honeſt poverty is a commendable, and perhaps, to an abſtracted virtue, the moſt eligible ſtate. But poverty, the fruit of vice,— poverty, the effect of waſteful riot and intemperance, is truly vile and contemptible. This our prodigal had now brought upon himſelf. He had no body to blame but himſelf, it was his own doing, the natural effect of his extravagance, as well as the juſt puniſhment of his diſobedience.

This poverty pinched him ſorely;—for he had known the luſcious ſweets of plenty, he had been uſed to ſuperfluity and exceſs. How does he now regret them! How does he now repent of every laviſh expence, every little ſum, which in the inſolence of his wealth he had ſquandered!

His buſineſs of tending ſwine in the field gave him leiſure enough for ſuch reflections. Here he was left a prey to his own thoughts, which were continually at work in making grating compariſons between his paſt and preſent circumſtances. Though he was not yet converted, he was fully convinced of many truths, which in his proſperity he had diſbelieved or derided. He had made great improvements in that coſtly, dangerous ſcience, the knowledge of the world. He had found experimentally that its enjoyments were vanity, and the end of them vexation of ſpirit. Riot and debauchery now appear to him ſtripped of their pleaſures, and retaining only their guilt. He knew it was folly all.

The heat and ardour of youth now no longer animated his courage, and inflamed his paſſions;— that genial fire had been made burn too violently to laſt long. It had been waſted in voluptuouſneſs, and the poor remains were now quite extinguiſhed by the damps of chilling poverty. It is now no longer the gay, the bold and ſprightly adventurer, full of hopes, and confiding in his abundance: no longer that ſelf-willed, opinionative fool, who preferred his own conceits to the ſolid counſels of age and experience. He is no longer that unnatural ſon, who deſpiſed his father, who thought him uſeleſs or troubleſome: nor the heedleſs rover, who preferred the fatigues of a long journey, and inconveniences of a foreign land, to the odious preſence of his parent. He now regrets the diſtance from him; for he was without friends, an alien, a poor, hungry, naked vagabond.

At length,— ſo inſtructive is miſery,— he came to himſelf, ſaith the Scripture. He became compos mentis,— of a right mind; he thought reaſonably: for before he was mad, as wild and mad as great plenty, high health, and unbounded liberty could make him: which, as I obſerved, are very apt to turn young heads; but pain and hunger tame the wildeſt natures, and that effect they ſoon had upon our young Swineherd. They brought him to himſelf, and to a ſober ſenſe of things; as we read, ver. 17, 18, 19.

His ſerious thoughts began, you ſee, with comparing his preſent troubles with the happineſs of a regular life. This reflection is common, as it is natural; and I am perſuaded, that there are few old offenders, who have not often made it, who have not often compared the ſlavery of ſin, its meanneſs, its drudgery, its maladies, with the peace and joy of innocence. But the misfortune is, they do not purſue theſe thoughts to a conſequence. They rail at the world, but do not renounce it; they cenſure its vanities, but they do not forſake them. They ſee nothing, they ſay, in this world to be fond of; they are weary of it, and heartily diſguſted with the bad uſage they have met there.—It is very true, that the world gives occaſion enough for ſuch complaints: but thoſe who make them moſt, are often very worldly-minded men. They rail at the world, only becauſe they cannot enjoy it. Their condemning it is the voice of diſappointed luſt, of baffled concupiſcence, and not of aſpiring charity. Thoſe who exult in the poſſeſſion of riches, or repine for want of them, are both alike covetous. Thoſe who love the world, becauſe they enjoy it; and thoſe who hate the world, becauſe they want it, are equally ſlaves to it. Theſe latter ſometimes talk the language of morality, and ſay, as they have cauſe enough, how vain and vexatious they have found it; but they will not do themſelves the violence neceſſary for a hearty and effectual renouncing it. They will not riſe from the mire of ſloth and ſenſuality, they will not burſt the bands of evil habits, and break through the ſnares in which they have involved themſelves; but after ſome feeble ſtruggles ſink down again;— their good purpoſes vaniſh, and all their converſions end in wiſhing they were converted. v. 20.

Not ſo our exemplary penitent. He aroſe, he went to his father, though the journey was long, and tedious, and painful, as poverty, nakedneſs, and famine could make it. But it was better to ſuffer in penance than ſinning, in returning than ſtaying away. So he aroſe and went to his father. ver. 20.

We have before conſidered the ſequel of the ſtory, which is full of comfort and encouragement for all repentant prodigals, as it gives them the moſt convincing aſſurances of a kind reception, when they return to their heavenly Father, and of an abſolute remiſſion of their former extravagance,—if they have but learnt, from the miſery it has brought on them, to be more dutiful for the future. But I inſiſt no farther, and recommend it to your private meditation; beſeeching Almighty God that all we, who have gone aſtray like this prodigal, may like him return penitent to our heavenly Father, in a full aſſurance of forgiveneſs and favour, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

Chap. XVI. Ver. 1. And he ſaid alſo unto his diſciples] The maliciousneſs of the Phariſees, and the obſtinacy with which they oppoſed every thing that was good, had by this time made a deep impreſſion upon our Lord's ſpirit. Wherefore, he did not content himſelf barely with juſtifying his receiving ſinners, in order to reform them, but while the ſcribes and Phariſees were preſent, he turned to his diſciples, and ſpake the parable of the crafty ſteward, whom he propoſed as an example of the dexterous improvement which worldly men make of ſuch opportunities and advantages, as fall in their way for advancing their intereſt. By this parable Jeſus deſigned to excite his diſciples to improve in like manner the advantages they might enjoy, for advancing their own ſpiritual welfare; and particularly, to ſpend both their time and their money in promoting the converſion of ſinners; which, of all the offices in their power, was the moſt acceptable to God, and the moſt beneficial to man. See Macknight.

Ver. 3. I cannot dig] Commentators have ſhewn that the word

from me the ſtewardſhip: I cannot dig, to beg I am aſhamed.

4 I am reſolved what to do, that when I am put out of the ſtewardſhip, they may receive me into their houſes.

5 So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and ſaid unto the firſt, How much oweſt thou unto my lord?

6 And he ſaid, An hundred meaſures of oil. And he ſaid unto him, Take thy bill and ſit down quickly, and write fifty.

7 Then ſaid he to another, And how much oweſt thou? And he ſaid, An hundred meaſures of wheat. And he ſaid unto him, Take thy bill, and write fourſcore.

8 And the lord commended the unjuſt ſteward, becauſe he had done wiſely: for the children of this world are in their generation wiſer than the children of light.

9 And I ſay unto you, Make to yourſelves friends of the mammon of unrighteouſneſs; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlaſting habitations.

10 He that is faithful in that which is leaſt, is faithful alſo in much: and he that is unjuſt in the leaſt, is unjuſt alſo in much.

Ver. 6. The word Batus in the original, ſignifies a meaſure containing nine gallons three quarts: See Ezek. xlv. 10, 11, 14.—V. 7. The word here interpreted a meaſure, in the original ſignifies a meauſure containing about fourteen buſhels and a pottle.—V. 8. John xii. 36. Epheſ. v. 8. 1 Theſſ. v. 5.—V. 9. Dan. iv. 27. σκάπτειν, which we render to dig, ſignifies in general to cultivate the land, and eſpecially to prepare it for ſeed, which was one of the moſt laborious parts of the huſbandman's work in which day-labourers were employed; and conſequently moſt fit to be mentioned by this ſteward, who, having been uſed to a delicate and luxurious way of living, would naturally think of ſuch a change of life in the moſt diſcouraging view. The expreſſion ὀυκ ἰσχύω, I am not able, or ſtrong enough to do it, has alſo a peculiar beauty in this view, which is loſt in our tranſlation, and in moſt others. See Raphelius, Elſner, and Mintert.

Ver. 4. I am reſolved] Anciently, ſtewards, beſides taking care of their maſter's domeſtic affairs, gave leaſes of their lands, and ſettled the rent which each tenant was to pay. Accordingly, the ſteward in the parable made uſe of this branch of his power, to purchaſe the good will of his Lord's tenants. Having racked their rents in the leaſes which he had lately given, he now determined that they ſhould have their poſſeſſions on the ſame terms as formerly. This interpretation of the parable may be gathered not only from the nature of the thing, but from the proper ſenſe of the words χρεωφειλετης and γράμμα, the one ſignifying any kind of debtor, and amongſt the reſt a tenant; and the other, any kind of obligatory writing, and amongſt the reſt a leaſe: Beſides, in this light, the favour which was done to the tenants was ſubſtantial, and laid them under laſting obligations: Whereas, according to the common interpretation, the ſteward could not propoſe to reap as much benefit from any requital the debtors would make him for the ſums forgiven them, as theſe ſums were worth to himſelf; and therefore he might rather have exacted them, and put them in his own pocket. See Macknight, and my 12th ſermon on the parables.

Ver. 5, 6. So he called—his lord's debtors] Calling the tenants, he intimated his purpoſe to them; and whereas one by his bargain had bound himſelf to pay yearly an hundred βάτȣς, [from the Hebrew בתים, betim] baths of oil, each bath equal to ſeven gallons, four points, and an half, Engliſh meaſure,—he let them have it for fifty: and whereas another was to pay an hundred κόρȣς, ver. 7. [from the Hebrew כור Kur] homers of wheat, yearly, each homer being equal to eight buſhels and an half, Wincheſter meaſure,—he gave him his leaſe at eighty, and altered the obligatory writings accordingly. As this homer contained ten ephahs, or baths, (Ezek. xlv. 11, 14.) and each of theſe latter ten omers (Exod. xvi. 36.)—twenty homers, which the ſteward allowed the tenant to deduct, would on this computation contain a hundred and ſeventy buſhels of wheat, and might be as valuable as fifty baths, or about three hundred and ſeventy-eight gallons of oil; ſo that the obligation conferred on both theſe debtors might be equal. Dr. Doddridge is of opinion, that the bill here mentioned was ſomething equivalent to a note of hand, acknowledging the receipt of ſo much oil, and promiſing payment of it; the alteration of which plainly ſhews how much they are miſtaken, who ſuppoſe that the ſteward did no wrong to his maſter in this affair, but only gave the debtors the value of what he ſet off out of his own ſtock: for, not to ſay how improbable it is that this bankrupt ſhould be able or willing to make ſuch a conſiderable preſent, it is plain that if he had intended it, he would have let the account remain unaltered; but by the exchange of bills, he craftily made each of the debtors an accomplice with him in defrauding his lord, and thereby provided againſt a diſcovery. See Dr. Clarke's Sermons, vol. 3.

Ver. 8. And the Lord] Supply αυτȣ, his lord; for it is Jeſus, and not the Evangeliſt, which ſpeaks this, as is plain both from the ſtructure of the parable itſelf, and from the application which Jeſus makes of it in the next verſe. By mentioning the commendation which the rich man beſtowed upon his ſteward, our Lord does not mean to approve of the man's knavery, which is ſufficiently branded by the epithet of unjuſt here given him by Jeſus himſelf; neither was it deſigned to give countenance to the fraud of any perſon on any account whatſoever; nor to the conduct of thoſe who are liberal out of other perſons goods. The wiſdom of the ſteward in making himſelf friends, is that alone which is commended by his lord, and propoſed by Jeſus as worthy the imitation of his diſciples,—not the method by which he made them: or, if that is commended, it is commended only as wiſe, in relation to the plan he had laid down; there being nothing more common among men than to commend the ingenuity ſhewn in a fraud, while they condemn the fraud itſelf. Sir D. D. obſerves, that "theſe debtors ſeem to have been coloni partiarii, who paid a portion of the fruits of the ground to the maſter. By leſſening the charge of this proportion of fruits, the debtors were relieved. Or we may ſuppoſe, that the ſteward diſcharged the tenants of one half of the rent, without receiving payment, and of conſequence charged himſelf with it. Being bankrupt himſelf, he might be indifferent what charge was againſt him; while by diſcharging the tenants, he did a good office to them. There is no reaſon for ſuppoſing that the maſter diſcovered this fraud; becauſe the phraſe he acted wiſely, or prudently may ſignify "becauſe he accounted well;" or that the maſter commended his accounts, becauſe he had acted cautiouſly, ſo as to conceal his frauds." Upon the whole, the calumnies which Julian and Porphyry have thrown out againſt our Lord on account of this parable, are altogether groundleſs; its true ſcope being to teach thoſe who have their views extended to eternity, to be as active and prudent in their ſchemes for the life to come, as the children of this world are for the preſent; and particularly to do all the good offices to others in their power: A duty highly incumbent on thoſe whoſe buſineſs it is to reclaim ſinners, not only becauſe ſinners are in themſelves fit objects of charity as well as ſaints, but becauſe charitable offices done to them, may have a happy tendency to promote their converſion.—That this was the leſſon which Jeſus intended to inculcate by the parable, is evident from his application of it: In their generation, means "in their temporal affairs." See Gen. vi. 9. xxxvii. 2.

Ver. 9. And I ſay unto you, &c.] Our Lord's advice is worthy of the moſt ſerious attention; the beſt uſe we can make of our riches being to employ them in promoting the ſalvation of others. For, if we uſe our abillities and intereſt in bringing ſinners to God, if we ſpend our money in this excellent ſervice, we ſhall conciliate the good-will of all heavenly beings, who greatly rejoice at the converſion of ſinners,—as was repreſented in the preceding parables;—ſo that with open arms they will receive us into the manſions of felicity. And therefore, while ſelf-ſeekers ſhall have their poſſeſſions, and honours, and eſtates, torn from them with the utmoſt reluctancy at death, they who have devoted themſelves, and all that they had, to the ſervice of God, ſhall find their conſumed eſtates to be greatly increaſed, and their neglected honours abundantly repaired, in the love and friendſhip of the inhabitants of heaven, and in the happineſs of the world to come; and ſhall rejoice in having diſpoſed of their wealth to ſuch an advantage. Dr. Heylin, inſtead of the mammon of unrighteouſneſs, reads the falſe mammon; and ſo in ver. 11. And he obſerves, that it is literally mammon of injuſtice. So, in the preceding verſe, the ſteward of injuſtice; and in ch. xviii. 6. judge of injuſtice; all which may be rightly rendered, the unjuſt, or falſe judge, falſe ſteward, and falſe mammon; for truth and juſtice, with their derivatives, are often convertable terms in Scripture, and ſometimes in modern language. That our Lord does not mean unrighteous, or ill-gotten, but falſe and uncertain riches, is plain from ver. 11. where unrighteous mammon is not oppoſed to righteous, but to true. Nothing can be more contrary to the whole genius of the Chriſtian religion, than to imagine that our Lord would exhort men to lay out their ill-gotten goods in works of charity, when juſtice ſo evidently required they ſhould make reſtitution to the utmoſt of their abilities. When ye fail, means, when ye die; and it is with apparent propriety that our Lord ſuggeſts the thought of death as an antidote againſt covetouſneſs. Strange it is that ſo many, on the very borders of the grave, ſhould be ſo wretchedly enſlaved to that unreaſonable paſſion! Mr. Henry obſerves on that expreſſion, Make to yourſelves friends, that parables muſt not be forced beyond their primary intention; and therefore we muſt not hence infer, that any one can befriend us, if we lie under the diſpleaſure of our Lord. But that in the general, we muſt ſo lay out what we have in works of piety and charity, as that we may meet it again with comfort on the other ſide of the grave. Inſtead of that they may receive you, Dr. Waterland reads, that they may make you be received.

Ver. 10. He that is faithful, &c.] "If you make that uſe of your riches which I have been recommending, you ſhall be received into thoſe everlaſting habitations, where all the friends of goodneſs dwell;

11 If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your truſt the true riches?

Whereas, if you do not uſe your riches or temporal advantages for the glory of God, and the good of men, you ſhall be baniſhed for ever from the abodes of the bleſſed; becauſe, by behaving unfaithfully in the ſmall truſt committed to you, you render yourſelves both unworthy and incapable of a ſhare in the everlaſting inheritance." See Macknight.

Ver. 11. The true riches] The word riches is ſubſtituted by our tranſlators inſtead of mammon, which was the word Chriſt intended, and which, for that reaſon, ſhould find its place in the tranſlation of this verſe. Dr. Heylin rendered it, If you have not been faithful in the falſe mammon, who will truſt you with the true? See on Matth. vi. 24.

Ver. 12. That which is another man's] Here, as in many of our Lord's diſcourſes, the expreſſion is ſo ſimple, and the ſenſe ſo profound, that we need not wonder at its being overlooked. Our tranſlation has ſupplied the word man without reaſon; for it is not man, but God, who is intended; to whom the riches and other advantages in our poſſeſſion do properly belong; who has committed them to us only as ſtewards, to be laid out for the good of his family, and who may every moment call us to give an account of our management. The words that which is you own, do not ſignify that which is already our own, (as Dr. Clarke obſerves,) but that which is to be ſo: that, which when it is conferred upon us, ſhall be wholly in our power, and perpetually in our poſſeſſion,—ſhall be ſo fully our own, that we ſhall never be called to account for the management of it. Our Lord's meaning therefore is, "If you have dared to be unfaithful in that which was only a truſt committed to you by God for a ſhort time, and of which you know you were to give him an account, it is evident, that you are not fit to be intruſted by him with the riches of heaven. Theſe being treaſures which, if he beſtowed them on you, would be ſo fully your own, that you would have them perpetually in your poſſeſſion, and never be called to an account for your management of them. See Clarke's Serm. xvi. vol. 11. This verſe is well expreſſed, though not exactly rendered in the verſion of 1729. If you have embezzled what another gave you in truſt, how can he give you an eſtate in perpetuity? Probably our Lord may allude to a cuſtom of rewarding faithful ſtewards by giving them ſome part of the eſtates which they have managed.

Ver. 13. No ſervant can ſerve, &c.] "Beware of indulging even the leaſt degree of covetouſneſs, for it is abſolutely inconſiſtent with piety; inſomuch that a man may as well undertake, at one and the ſame time, to ſerve two maſters of contrary diſpoſitions, and oppoſite intereſts, as pretend to pleaſe God, whilſt he is anxiouſly purſuing the world for its own ſake. See on Matth. vi. 24.

In this manner did Jeſus recommend the true uſe of riches, power, knowledge, and the other advantages of the preſent life, from the conſideration that they are not our own, but God's; that they are only committed to us, as ſtewards, to be employed for the honour of God, and the good of men; that we are accountable to the proprietor for the uſe we make of them, who will reward or puniſh us accordingly; and that every degree of covetouſneſs is ſuch a ſerving of mammon, as is really idolatry, and altogether inconſiſtent with the duty we owe to God.

Ver. 14. And they derided him] The original word is very emphatical;—ἐξεμυκτήριζον: "They mocked him by a ſcornful motion of the mouth and noſe,"—as well as by what they ſpeak to him. The word might be rendered they ſneered. There was a gravity and dignity in our Lord's diſcourſe, which, inſolent as they were, would not permit them to laugh out; but by ſome ſcornful air they hinted to each other their mutual contempt. See Doddridge, and my 13th ſermon on the Parables.

Ver. 16—18. The law and the prophets were until John] Our Lord having, in the preceding verſe, developed the ſpecious and hypocritical pretences of the Phariſees, obſerves to them, with reſpect to his conduct which they blamed ſo much, that the law and the prophets, the diſpenſation which made a diſtinction between men, accounting ſome clean and others unclean, continued till John came; and that from the commencement of his miniſtry, the kingdom of heaven, or Goſpel diſpenſation, was preached, which admitted all perſons, upon repentance, without diſtinction;—every man preſſeth into it, harlots, publicans, and ſinners. Yet, leſt they might have imagined that in ſpeaking thus he leſſened the authority of the law, (by which the diſtinction between clean and unclean things had been eſtabliſhed) he added, ver. 17. It is eaſier for heaven and earth to paſs, than for one tittle of the law to fail. "The ceremonial and typical muſt be fulfilled in me; the moral, in the righteouſneſs of my followers; (Matth. v. 17.) and to ſhew how far I am from allowing the leaſt breach of the law, countenancing impurity of life in my followers, I do abſolutely condemn a practical tenet very common among you, and teach in contradiction to it, that whoever putteth away his wife, &c." ver. 18. Theſe hypocrites, while they feigned an high veneration for the law by their exact obſervation of leſſer duties, violated on many occaſions its greateſt and moſt ſacred precepts. For example, they defiled themſelves with the pollutions of luſt, though they were ſo ſcrupulous of touching things unclean, that they would not go into the company of publicans, leſt they might have been polluted by them. Nor was this an accuſation without grounds; for their luſt diſcovered itſelf by their frequent divorces. They put away their wives as often as they took any diſguſt at them, or liked other women better. Dr. Clarke explains theſe words, every man preſſeth into it, thus: "The Gentiles as well as Jews are diligent to underſtand and receive the Goſpel." But ſee the note on Matth. xi. 12.

Ver. 19. There was a certain rich man] The reaſoning made uſe of by our Lord in the preceding verſes was clear and unanſwerable; but the Phariſees, ſtupified with the intoxication of ſenſual pleaſures, were deaf to every argument, how cogent ſoever, if it was levelled againſt their luſts. As an illuſtration therefore and confirmation of his aſſertion, and that he might rouſe them out of their lethargy, he made the thunder of the divine judgements to ſound in their ears, by this very ſtrong and affecting parable of the rich man and the beggar; very ſimilar whereto is a parable, which the Jews have in their Gemara. The original, which we render fared ſumptuouſly every day, is very expreſſive. "He delighted himſelf, and cheared his heart with ſumptuous ſplendor and luxury every day."—It is remarked by archbiſhop Tillotſon on this parable, that our Saviour calls the poor man by his proper name, but only ſpeaks of the rich man under a general appellation:—"I cannot but take notice, ſays he, of the decorum which our Saviour uſes. He would not name any rich man, becauſe that was invidious: he endeavours to make all men ſenſible of their duty, but he would provoke none by any peeviſh reflection; for nothing is more improper than to provoke thoſe whom we intend to perſuade. While a man's reaſon is calm and undiſturbed, it is capable of truth fairly propounded; but if once we ſtir up mens paſſions, it is like muddying of the water; they can diſcern nothing clearly afterwards." See his 126th ſermon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 20, 21. A beggar, named Lazarus] An exceeding proper name; for it ſeems to be derived from לא עזר Laozer, which ſignifies an helpleſs perſon. Some have imagined, from the name of Lazarus, and the particular detail of circumſtances, that this was an hiſtory; but this muſt be a groundleſs ſuppoſition, as the incidents are plainly parabolical; and ſome ancient MSS. particularly that of Beza at Cambridge, have at the beginning,—and he ſpake unto them another parable. Some verſions, after the words from the rich man's table, add, and no man gave unto him; which Grotius thinks is intimated in 21 And deſiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover, the dogs came and licked his ſores.

22 And it came to paſs that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's boſom: the rich man alſo died, and was buried.

23 And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and ſeeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his boſom.

24 And he cried, and ſaid, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and ſend Lazarus that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame.

25 But Abraham ſaid, Son, remember that thou in thy life-time receivedſt thy good things, and likewiſe Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented.

26 And beſides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: ſo that they which would paſs from hence to you, cannot; neither can they paſs to us, that would come from thence.

27 Then he ſaid, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldeſt ſend him to my father's houſe:

28 For I have five brethren; that he may teſtify unto them, leſt they alſo come into this place of torment.

29 Abraham ſaith unto him, They have Moſes and the prophets; let them hear them.

30 And he ſaid, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent.

31 And he ſaid unto him, If they hear not Moſes and the prophets, neither will they be perſuaded, though one roſe from the dead.

his wiſhing to be fed from the crumbs which the dogs uſed to gather. If ſo, it was with ſingular propriety that he who denied a crumb is repreſented as unable to obtain a drop!—But I ſhould rather think that this gloſs is ill placed, ſince it appears more probable that the beggar uſed to lie at the rich man's door, as receiving alms from thence; and certain it is, that the mere giving of alms will be no ſecurity to thoſe who live a ſenſual and abandoned life. The word moreover, at the end of ver. 21. ſhould rather be rendered yea; for it is undoubtedly mentioned as an aggravating circumſtance of the poor man's diſtreſs. "He lay at the rich man's gate, ſays St. Chryſoſtome, that he might have no excuſe, ſaying, "I ſaw him not." He was full of ſores, that he might be to the rich man a ſpectacle of his own mortality; ſeeing, in the body of Lazarus, to what he himſelf was ſubject; and he is ſet forth as requeſting food, not as complaining of his ſores,—to ſhew the greatneſs of that poverty which ſo exceedingly preſſed him, that he forgot his bodily pains." See his Homily on the Parable.

Ver. 22. Carried by angels into Abraham's boſom] The Jews aſſigned this office to angels, and no doubt with the utmoſt propriety, conſidering how ſuitable it is to their benevolent nature, and to the circumſtances of a departed ſpirit. The Greeks aſſigned guides to the ſouls of the dead, to conduct them to their reſpective ſeats. The expreſſion Abraham's boſom alludes to the way of repreſenting the entertainments of heaven, by ſharing a magnificent banquet with Abraham and the other patriarchs. Comp. ch. xxii. 30. and Matth. viii. 11. Nothing can better deſcribe the honour and happineſs of Lazarus, who had been in ſo wretched a condition before at the rich man's gate, than telling us, that he was placed next to Abraham, the friend and favourite of God, and ſo lay in his boſom. See John xiii. 23. and the note on ver. 26.

Ver. 23. In hell, &c.] In the unſeen world, as we have frequently obſerved is the meaning of the Greek word ἅδης. Both the rich man and Lazarus were in hades, though in different regions of it. See Grotius, and Peters on Job, p. 326.

Ver. 24. Dip the tip of his finger, &c.] The Hebrews drank their wine mingled with water; and large quantities of water, on one occaſion or other, were uſed at their feaſts. See John ii. 6. There ſeems therefore, in this petition, a proper alluſion to that archbiſhop Tillotſon obſerves with his uſual vivacity, that this is the only inſtance we meet with in Scripture of any thing that looks like a prayer to a glorified ſaint; and even here the application was in vain, the ſaint being incapable of giving him relief. It is obſervable, the rich man ſpeaks as knowing Lazarus, as ſuppoſing, ver. 28. that his brethren alſo might know him, on his appearing to them.—And ſhall not Abraham's children, when they are in Paradiſe, know each other?—See Archbp. Tillotſon's 126th ſermon, and my ſermon on "Mutual Knowledge in a future State."

Ver. 25. Son, remember that thou, &c.] Is it not worthy of obſervation, that Abraham will not revile even a damned ſoul?—ſhall then living men revile one another?—He tells the rich man, that in his lifetime he received his good things, &c. Now fully to underſtand this, we ſhould conſider, that our Saviour's principal view in this diſcourſe evidently was, to warn men of the danger of that worldly-mindedneſs, neglect of religion, and intenſeneſs upon pleaſure and profit, which is not ſo much any one vice, as it is the foundation of all vices. It is that which makes men regardleſs of futurity, and not to have God in their thoughts. It is that deceitfulneſs of riches, ambition, and voluptuouſneſs, and the care of things temporal, which ſtifle all notions of religion, choke the word, and render it unfruitful. It is that temper which expoſes a man to every temptation, and makes him ready to ſacrifice the intereſts of truth and virtue, whenever they come in competition with the good things of this life, on which his heart is intirely ſet. But ſee this matter fully ſet forth in the Reflections at the end of chap. xii. See alſo Sterne's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 90. and vol. iv. ſerm. 8.

Ver. 26. Between us and you there is a great gulf, &c.] Becauſe the opinions as well as the language of the Greeks had by this time made their way into Judea, ſome imagine that our Lord had their fictions about the abodes of departed ſouls in his eye, when he formed this parable: but the argument is not concluſive. At the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged, that his deſcriptions of theſe things are not drawn from the writings of the Old Teſtament; but have a remarkable affinity to the deſcriptions which the Grecian poets have given of them. They, as well as our Lord, repreſent the abodes of the bleſſed as lying contiguous to the regions of the damned, and ſeparated only by a great unpaſſable river, or deep gulf, in ſuch a manner, that the ghoſts could talk with one another from its oppoſite banks. In the parable, ſouls whoſe bodies were buried know each other, and converſe together, as if they had been embodied. In like manner the pagans introduce departed ſouls talking together, and repreſent them as having pains and pleaſures analogous to what we feel in this life: It ſeems they thought the ſhades of the dead had an exact reſemblance to their bodies. The parable ſays, the ſouls of wicked men are tormented in flames; the Grecian mythologiſts tell us, that they lie in Pyriphlegethon, which is a river of fire, where they ſuffer the ſame torments they would have ſuffered while alive, had their bodies been burned. If from theſe reſemblances it is thought that the parable is formed on the Grecian mythology, it will not at all follow that our Lord approved of what the common people thought or ſpake concerning thoſe matters, agreeably to the notions and language of the Greeks. In parabolical diſcourſes, provided the doctrines inculcated are ſtrictly true, the terms in which they are inculcated may be ſuch as are moſt familiar to the ears of the vulgar, and the images made uſe of, ſuch as they are beſt acquainted with.

Ver. 30, 31. But if one went unto them, &c.] It is uncertain, whether the rich man by "one from the dead," meant an apparition or reſurrection. His words are capable of either ſenſe; yet the quality of the perſons to whom this meſſage was to be ſent, makes it more probable that he meant an apparition; for, without doubt, the character which Joſephus gives us of the Jews in high life, namely, that they were generally Sadducees, was applicable to thoſe brethren: So that diſbelieving the exiſtence of ſouls in a ſeparate ſtate, nothing more was neceſſary, in the opinion of their brother, to convince them, than that they ſhould ſee an apparition, or ſpirit, from the inviſible world. But Abraham tells the rich man, that if they hearkened not to Moſes and the prophets, neither would they be perſuaded to a thorough repentance and reformation, though one ſhould ariſe from the dead to viſit them; that is, (according to Dr. Clarke's Expoſition, ſerm. vii. vol. 8.) "If they be ſo immerſed in vice, as to be careleſs of a future ſtate, and inattentive to the evidences of it, which God hath already afforded them by the miniſtration of Moſes and the prophets, they would for the ſame reaſon reject all other means whatſoever, which God ſhould make uſe of, for their conviction and reformation; even though he ſhould ſend one from the dead to preach to them." Bp. Atterbury and Bp. Sherlocke have fully, and excellently ſhewn, the juſtice of Abraham's aſſertion here, in their incomparable diſcourſes on this text, which well deſerve the moſt attentive peruſal, and to which we refer our readers with great pleaſure. REFLECTIONS ON THE PARABLE OF THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS, Ver. 19—31.

From this parable we are taught ſeveral important leſſons; as, 1. That one may be great and renowned, and highly eſteemed amongſt men, who is entirely obſcure and vulgar in the ſight of God, nay, and an abomination unto him, (ſee ver. 15.) For what can be greater or better in the eyes of men, than to live adorned with all the ſplendor of wealth, luxury, and honours;—and more diſgraceful in the ſight of men, than to be polluted with ſin, and fit only for the flames of hell? On the other hand, the parable teaches, that ſome who appear mean and deſpicable to the eyes of their fellows, are men of great worth, and highly beloved of God. Wealth, therefore, and power, and grandeur, are not to be coveted, neither is poverty to be dreaded; ſince that honour, which is the chief charm of the one, and that reproach, which is the bittereſt ſting of the other, are altogether without foundation.

2. We are taught, ſecondly, from this parable, that the ſouls of men are immortal; that they ſubſiſt in a ſeparate ſtate after the diſſolution of the body, and that they are rewarded or puniſhed, according to their actions in this life;—doctrines very neceſſary to be aſſerted in thoſe days, when it was faſhionable to believe the mortality of the ſoul, and to argue in defence of that pernicious error. It farther teaches, that the miſeries of the poor, who have lived righteouſly, and the happineſs of the rich, who have lived wickedly, end with this life; that the ſeveral ſtations in which they have lived, together with the paſt occurrences and actions of their lives, are diſtinctly remembered and reflected on by them; (ver. 25.) that the remembrance of paſt pains and pleaſures will not leſſon, but rather increaſe the joys of the one, and the ſorrows of the other; and conſequently, that we make a very falſe judgement of each other's condition, when we think any man happy becauſe he is rich, or miſerable becauſe he is poor.

3. We are alſo informed, that men ſhall be puniſhed hereafter for entertaining principles inconſiſtent with morality and religion; for their worldly-mindedneſs, and heedleſſneſs with reſpect to religious matters; for being immerſed in pleaſures, and for not uſing their riches aright, as well as for crimes of a groſſer nature. In which view, it affords a fit caution to all the great and rich, to beware of the rocks on which they are moſt apt to ſplit. This great man who fell into the flames of hell, is not charged with murder, adultery, injuſtice, oppreſſion, or lying; he is not even charged with being remarkably uncharitable: Lazarus lay commonly at his gate, and got his maintenance there, ſuch as it was, or he would not have been laid there daily, nor would the rich man have deſired Abraham to ſend him with a drop of water to cool his tongue, (ver. 24.) had he not imagined that gratitude would prompt him to undertake the office with cheerfulneſs. The rich man's ſin, therefore, was his living in luxury and pleaſure; which made him, on the one hand, neglect religion, for the cultivating which he had the beſt opportunities; and on the other, cheriſh atheiſtical principles, particularly ſuch as flow from believing the mortality of the ſoul. If ſo, all who reſemble this perſon in his character, ſhould take warning by his puniſhment, nor delude themſelves with the thought, that becauſe they live free from the more ſcandalous vices, they ſhall eſcape damnation.

But in particular, all who make it their chief buſineſs to procure the pleaſures of ſenſe, neglecting to form their minds into a reliſh of ſpiritual and divine pleaſures, may in this parable ſee their ſad, but certain end. They ſhall be excluded for ever from the preſence of God, as incapable of his joys, although they may have purſued their pleaſures with no viſible injury to any perſon. But if men not accuſed of injuſtice in getting riches, are thus puniſhed for the bad uſe of they have made of them, what muſt be their miſery who both acquire them unjuſtly, and uſe them ſinfully!—And as this parable admoniſhes the rich, ſo is it profitable for the inſtruction and comfort of the poor; for it teaches them the proper method of bringing their afflictions to a happy iſſue, and ſhews them that God will diſtribute the rewards and puniſhments of the life to come impartially, and without reſpect of perſons.

4. This parable teaches us the greatneſs of the puniſhment of the damned, ver. 23. And in hell he lifted up his eyes, &c. We cannot from this repreſentation infer, that burning with material fire ſhall be any part of the puniſhment of the damned. The never-dying worm, which is ſometimes joined with the fire of hell, is generally confeſſed to be metaphorical, and therefore the fire may be ſo likewiſe. Yet no man can be abſolutely certain that the wicked ſhall not be burned with flames, ſeeing the reſurrection of their bodies, and the union of them with their ſouls, make the thing poſſible. Be this as it may, the expreſſions here, and in other paſſages of Scripture, taken in their loweſt ſenſe, intimate that the pains of hell will be very great. For if wicked men retain the paſſions, appetites, and deſires, which were predominant in them upon earth, as it is highly probable they will, (ſee Gal. vi. 7.)—theſe deſires, being for ever deprived of their object, it muſt occaſion a miſery, which they only can conceive, who have felt what it is to loſe, without hope of recovery, that which they are moſt paſſionately fond of, and to be racked with the violence of deſires, which, they are ſenſible, can never be gratified. Or, although the paſſions themſelves ſhould periſh with their objects, a direful, eternal melancholy muſt neceſſarily enſue from the want of all deſire and enjoyment, the miſery of which is not to be conceived. In ſuch a ſtate, the bitter reflections which the damned will make on the happineſs they have loſt, muſt raiſe in them a dreadful ſtorm of ſelf-condemnation, envy, and deſpair. Beſides, their conſciences, provoked by the evil actions of their lives, and now, as it were, let looſe upon them, will prove more inexorable than ravening wolves, and the torment which they ſhall occaſion, will, in reſpect of its perpetuity, be as if a never-dying worm was always conſuming them. This is the fire of hell, and thoſe the everlaſting burnings, threatened with ſuch terror in the word of God, where they are repreſented, perhaps, by material flames to ſtrike the dull and groſs apprehenſions of mankind; but they are far more terrible than the other; for the miſery ariſing from thoſe agoniſing reflections muſt be of the moſt intenſe kind: And as there is not any thing in that ſtate to divert the thoughts of the damned from them, they muſt be uninterrupted alſo, not admitting of the leaſt alleviation or refreſhment!

5. It appears likewiſe, from the parable before us, that men's ſtates are unalterably fixed after death, ſo that it is in vain to hope for any end of their miſery who are miſerable, and unreaſonable to fear any change of their proſperity who are happy, (ver. 26.) With reſpect to the latter, there can be little doubt; for,—as one has obſerved,—in a ſtate where men are perfectly good, and can have no temptation to be otherwiſe, it is not imaginable that they ſhould fall from that ſtate. And as for the damned, it is certain that they muſt be reclaimed to virtue, before they can be made happy. But in the virtue of a creature, at leaſt, it is eſſential that there be both freedom of will and of action; virtue being not only the voluntary obedience of ſuch as can diſobey, but an obedience from conviction and love, in caſes where it is poſſible for them to act contrary to both;—conſequently, an obedience from choice, and not from a neceſſity of nature.

Upon theſe principles it may be queſtioned, whether the damned are capable of virtue: For while a man is actually lying under the immediate and complete puniſhment of his ſin, while he is loaded with ſufferings, whoſe nature is ſuch as neceſſarily fixes his attention to his ſins, as the cauſe of them, he cannot but be ſenſible of the evil of ſin, becauſe he feels it, and cannot but hate it, becauſe it makes him miſerable. Hence it appears, that though the damned repent, that is, have the ſtrongeſt convictions of the evil of ſin, with the bittereſt grief and hatred of it, there is no virtue in all this, becauſe it is not in their power to do otherwiſe; and if there be no virtue in their repentance, we muſt acknowledge, that it can have no influence to make them happy. To object that this argument derogates from the worth of converſion, produced by the ſufferings of this life, is not to the purpoſe; for, as matters ſtand at preſent, a man may in the courſe of providence be laid under many heavy calamities, without ſeeing the evil of his ſin. The reaſon is, we are under no abſolute neceſſity of conſidering theſe calamities as the puniſhment of our ſin. And in fact many ſuffer, without ever thinking upon their ſin, as the cauſe of their ſuffering. Since therefore, in our preſent repentance, we are not neceſſitated, this character ſufficiently diſtinguiſhes the ſufferings and repentance of this life, from thoſe of the life to come.

Laſtly, we may obſerve from this parable, that if the evidences of a future ſtate already propoſed do not perſuade men, they will not be perſuaded by any extraordinary evidences which can be offered, conſiſtently with the freedom requiſite to render them accountable for their actions, (ver. 31.) The truth is, we do not call the reality of a future ſtate in queſtion, either becauſe it is not demonſtrated by ſufficient arguments, or becauſe we are not able to comprehend them. Every man has within his own breaſt that which leadeth him to the acknowledgement of this grand, this fundamental ſupport of religion;—a certain foreboding of immortality, which it is not in his power ever to baniſh. But, being addicted to ſin, on account of the preſent pleaſures attending it, we vehemently wiſh that there were no future ſtate; and in conſequence of theſe wiſhes, we will not allow ourſelves to weigh the arguments offered on its behalf, and ſo at length come to work ourſelves into an actual diſbelief of it. Or, if the truth, proving too hard for us, ſhould conſtrain our aſſent, the habit of yielding to our paſſions which we labour under, has influence ſufficient to make us act contrary to our convictions. Wherefore, though the evidence of a future ſtate was more clear and forcible than it is, men might hinder themſelves from ſeeing it, juſt as they hinder themſelves from ſeeing the evidence by which it is at preſent ſupported. In a word, the proofs of the ſoul's immortality have always been ſufficient to perſuade thoſe who have any candour or love of goodneſs; and to demand more is unreaſonable; becauſe, though it were given, it might prove ineffectual. If they hear not Moſes and the prophets, neither will they be perſuaded, though one roſe from the dead. Accordingly, Abraham's aſſertion is verified by daily experience; for they who look on all that the eternal Son of God—(who actually roſe from the dead)—has ſaid concerning the puniſhments of the damned, as ſo many idle tales, would pay little regard to any thing that could be told them, even by a perſon riſen from the dead.

Chap. XVII. Ver. 1. Then ſaid he unto the diſciples] Having been derided by the Phariſees as a viſionary, and affronted on account of his doctrine concerning the pernicious influence of the love of money, our Lord took occaſion to ſpeak of affronts and offences,—Σκανδαλα, ſtumbling-blocks,—provocations to ſin; and though he repreſented ſuch things as neceſſary, in reſpect of the exerciſe and improvement which they afford to virtue, and unavoidable by reaſon of the pride, anger, revenge, malice, and other jarring paſſions of men, he did not fail to ſet forth their evil nature, in their dreadful puniſhment. To underſtand our Lord in the paſſage before us, it is neceſſary that we attend to an obvious diſtinction. All offences or temptations are not of the ſame nature; ſome of them are things in themſelves ſinful; others of them are things innocent: Jeſus ſpeaks of the firſt ſort; nor has he denounced againſt the authors of them a greater puniſhment than they deſerve; becauſe, to their own intrinſic malignity, ſuch things have this added, that they prove ſtumbling-blocks to others; and ſo are of the moſt atrocious nature. When the other ſort of offences happen to be mentioned, they are ſpoken of in milder terms; if the offence is given to a fellow Chriſtian, the perſon guilty of it is blamed only for wanting that high degree of charity towards his brother, which the Chriſtian religion enjoins. If it is given to an heathen, he is charged with being deficient in due concern for the glory of God; in the mean time it muſt be obſerved on this head, that though the weakneſs of well-meaning perſons,—who, by relying on our example, may be led to imitate us, in things which they think ſinful,—is a ſtrong reaſon, in point of charity, why we ſhould forbear thoſe actions, however innocent, (unleſs we are under the greateſt neceſſity of doing them) yet the perverſeneſs of malicious minds, who are apt to miſrepreſent things, does by no means lay any obligations on a good man to forbear what he finds convenient for him, provided he himſelf knows it to be innocent; for the difference of the perſons, who are apt to be affected by our example, greatly alters the caſe of offences, and our behaviour with relation to them. See Macknight, Clarke's ſerm. xviii. vol. 6. and the note on Matth. xviii. 5, 6.

Ver. 3, 4. Take heed to yourſelves] Our Lord ſpeaks here concerning a quarrelſome temper in his ſervants, but eſpecially in the miniſters and teachers of religion; inſinuating, that many grievous temptations to ſin ariſe from thence; temptations both to the perſons who are injured by that temper, becauſe injuries beget injuries, and to thoſe who are witneſſes of the injury, encouraging them to venture on the like evils: But he preſcribes a ſeaſonable and prudent reprehenſion of the fault, accompanied with forgiveneſs on the part of the perſon injured, as the beſt means of diſarming the temptations which may ariſe from ſuch a diſpoſition. Sentiments of this kind, delivered immediately after our Lord had been affronted, by the falſeſt teachers, for inculcating the pureſt doctrine, proved how truly he forgave them all the perſonal injuries they committed againſt him, throws a beautiful light on the few ſevere things he ſaid of them in the courſe of his miniſtry, and are powerful recommendations of that amiable virtue, the forgiveneſs of injuries. See the note on Matth. v. 44.

Ver. 5. The apoſtles ſaid, Lord, increaſe our faith] Our Lord's diſcourſe in the preceding verſes being very oppoſite to the common notions concerning the Meſſiah and his followers, ſeems to have ſtaggered the faith of the diſciples a little. They began to fear, that Jeſus, who talked in ſuch a manner, was not the perſon they had hitherto taken him for. They prayed him therefore to increaſe their faith; meaning, perhaps, that he ſhould put an end to their doubts, by erecting his kingdom ſpeedily, and diſtributing the rewards they were expecting for their ſervices. Or we may take the word faith, in its ordinary ſenſe, for the true principle of virtue, which the diſciples deſired their Maſter to ſtrengthen in them, becauſe the duty he had recommended was extremely difficult. Wontzogenius himſelf acknowledges, that the diſciples applying to Chriſt to ſtrengthen their faith, ſhews that they believed he had a divine influence over the ſpirits of men. See Whitby on the place

Ver. 6. You might ſay unto this ſycamine-tree, &c.] "If you had the ſmalleſt degree of true faith, it would overcome all temptations; even thoſe, the conquering of which may be compared to the plucking up of trees, and planting them in the ocean; i. e. compared to things ſeemingly impoſſible. Some, taking this example, by which the efficacy of faith is illuſtrated, in a literal ſenſe, have ſuppoſed, that the Apoſtles deſired Jeſus to increaſe their faith of working miracles; but the expreſſion is proverbial, ſignifying not the working of miracles, but the doing of things extremely difficult. See another proverb of the ſame kind, Matth. xvii. 20.

Ver. 7. Go, and ſit down] Come in, and ſit down. See Raphelius, and ch. xii. 37. Acts xxiv. 7. Our Lord here returns to his ſubject, telling the Apoſtles, that after they had done their utmoſt to diſcharge the whole duty incumbent on them, as God's ſervants ſent forth to ſeek and ſave loſt ſouls, they were not to imagine that they merited any thing thereby; and to make them ſenſible of the juſtneſs of his doctrine, he bade them conſider in what manner they received the ſervices of their own dependants. They reckoned themſelves under no obligation to a ſervant, for doing the duty which his ſtation bound him to perform. In like manner he, their Maſter, did not reckon himſelf indebted to them for their ſervices; and therefore, inſtead of valuing themſelves upon what they had done, and expecting great rewards for it, it became them, after having performed all that was commanded them, to acknowledge, that they had done nothing but their duty, ver. 10. Our Lord in this manner concluded his diſcourſe concerning the true uſe of riches, and the right manner of diſcharging their duty as God's ſervants ſent forth to ſeek and ſave loſt ſinners, knowing the frame of mind his diſciples were in. He ſaw their faith begin to ſtagger, becauſe the expected rewards were deferred, and little encouragement was given them to think that they would ever be beſtowed. Perhaps likewiſe he knew that they were ſomewhat infected with the leaven of the Phariſees, who having an high opinion of their own righteouſneſs, zealouſly maintained the doctrine of the merit of good works, together with the poſſibility of a man's performing more than was commanded him; that is, the poſſibility of performing works of ſupererogation. Or, though the diſciples were free from theſe errors, Jeſus, on this occaſion, might ſee fit to condemn them, becauſe he foreſaw that in his own church they would creep in, ſpread widely, and be productive of many hurtful conſequences. See on ver. 10. and my 19th ſermon on the Parables.

Ver. 8. Gird thyſelf] Servants uſed to be girded while waiting on their maſters. See ch. xii. 37. and Elſner.

Ver. 10. Unprofitable ſervants] Ἀχρεῖοι, mean, and inconſiderable, who cannot pretend to have merit in any thing. It deſerves remarking, that our Saviour applies this not to his ſervants in the parable, but to his diſciples—to all men; for it cannot, I conceive, in ſtrictneſs be ſaid that he is an unprofitable ſervant who does all things whatſoever his maſter commands; but of men as the ſervants of God, it may very juſtly be ſaid. The Hebrew word שפל ſhepel, which the LXX render by ἀχρεῖος, 2 Sam. vi 22. ſeems truly to expreſs the meaning in this place;—baſe, vile, inconſiderable, humble. "We are but unprofitable ſervants, ſaith venerable Bede; ſervants, becauſe bought with a price; unprofitable, becauſe our ſervice cannot profit the Lord, or becauſe 11 And it came to paſs, as he went to Jeruſalem, that he paſſed through the midſt of Samaria and Galilee.

12 And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, which ſtood afar off:

13 And they lifted up their voices, and ſaid, Jeſus, Maſter, have mercy on us.

14 And when he ſaw them, he ſaid unto them, Go ſhew yourſelves unto the prieſts. And it came to paſs, that as they went, they were cleanſed.

15 And one of them, when he ſaw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God.

16 And fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks: and he was a Samaritan.

17 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid, Were there not ten cleanſed? but where are the nine?

18 There are not found that returned to give glory to God, ſave this ſtranger.

19 And he ſaid unto him, Ariſe, go thy way: thy faith hath made thee whole.

20 And when he was demanded of the Phariſees, when the kingdom of God ſhould come, he anſwered them and ſaid, The kingdom of God cometh not with obſervation:

21 Neither ſhall they ſay, Lo here; or lo there: for behold, the kingdom of God is within you.

22 And he ſaid unto the diſciples, The days will come when ye ſhall deſire to ſee one of the days of the Son of man, and ye ſhall not ſee it.

23 And they ſhall ſay to you, See here; or, ſee there: go not after them, nor follow them.

24 For as the lightning that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, ſhineth unto the other part under heaven; ſo ſhall alſo the Son of man be in his day.

25 But firſt muſt he ſuffer many things, and be rejected of this generation.

26 And as it was in the days of Noe, ſo ſhall it be alſo in the days of the Son of man.

27 They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark; and the flood came, and deſtroyed them all.

28 Likewiſe alſo as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they ſold, they planted, they builded;

29 But the ſame day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimſtone from heaven and deſtroyed them all.

we are not worthy of the future glory: therefore this is the perfection of faith in men, if, all precepts being fulfilled to the utmoſt of their power, they acknowledge themſelves imperfect." Dr. Waterland, in a ſermon on the ſubject, explaining the phraſe, obſerves, that, upon the whole, when any, even the beſt of fallen men, profeſs themſelves to be unprofitable ſervants of God, they may reaſonably be ſuppoſed to mean, that they are creatures who can make no beneficial returns, no proper requitals to their Creator; that they are creatures of a low order, comparatively;—human, mortal creatures; who neither can nor will do any thing without the aids of divine grace: and further, that they are alſo ſinners, who, inſtead of meriting a reward, or claiming it as a debt, cannot ſo much as claim impunity or glory in God's ſight, but muſt be content to ſue to him in the humble petitionary form, for reward, for grace, and even for impunity; referring all to God's mercy and goodneſs, and that alſo purchaſed for them by the alone merits of Jeſus Chriſt. See his Sermons, vol. ii. p. 45. and Whitby and Grotius on the place.

Ver. 12. There met him ten men] As lepers were baniſhed from the towns, hey were likewiſe obliged to keep at a diſtance from the roads which led to them. Curioſity, however, to ſee the travellers who paſſed, or it may be an inclination to beg, having brought theſe ten as nigh to the public road as they could, they eſpied Jeſus, and cried to him, beſeeching him to take pity on them, and cure them. It ſeems they knew him perſonally, having ſeen him before, or gueſſed that it might be he from the crowds which followed him. If it be aſked how ſo many lepers came together, the anſwer is, that being ſecluded from the ſociety of other men on account of their diſeaſe, they ſought the comforts of ſociety in the company of each other. See Stanhope's Epiſtles and Goſpels, vol. 3.

Ver. 17. But where are the nine?] The ingratitude of the Jews will appear monſtrous, if we conſider that leproſy, the malady from which they were delivered, is itſelf one of the moſt loathſome diſeaſes incident to human nature, and a diſeaſe which by the law of Moſes ſubjected them to greater hardſhips than any diſtemper whatſoever. But though the cure of this dreadful diſorder was produced without the ſmalleſt pain, or even trouble to the lepers, and ſo ſpeedily, that it was compleated by the time they had got at a ſmall diſtance from him (as appears by the Samaritan's finding Jeſus where they left him) the Jews would not give themſelves the trouble of returning to glorify God, by making the miracle public, nor to honour Jeſus by acknowledging the favour. Such were the people who gloried in their being holy, and who inſolently called the men of all other nations dogs: But their hypocriſy and preſumption received a ſevere reprimand on this occaſion; for our Lord, in his obſervation on their behaviour, plainly declared, that the outward profeſſion of any religion, however true and excellent that religion may be in itſelf, is of no value before God, in compariſon of piety and inward holy diſpoſitions;—and in this view we ſhould not be too forward to condemn the Jews;—for have we not too much reaſon to doubt whether, of the multitudes who are indebted to the divine goodneſs, one in ten has a becoming ſenſe of it. We ſhould labour to impreſs our hearts deeply with ſuch a ſenſe, always remembering what it is that God expects of us, and conſidering that as the exerciſe of gratitude towards ſuch a benefactor is moſt reaſonable, ſo it is alſo proportionably delightful to the ſoul. It is indeed like the incenſe of the Jewiſh prieſts, which, while it did an honour to God, did likewiſe regale with its own fragrancy the perſon by whom it was offered. See Doddridge and Henry.

Ver. 18. There are not, &c.] Have there none been obſerved returning to give glory to God, except this ſtranger? Heylin and Wat.—Wynne, inſtead of the word ſtranger, reads alien, αλλογενης,—alien to the commonwealth of Iſrael; for as Jeſus was now in Samaria, this man could not properly be called a ſtranger.

Ver. 20, 21. The kingdom of God cometh not, &c.] While Jeſus was in Ephraim, (John xi. 54.) the Phariſees aſked him, when the kingdom of God, by which they meant the Meſſiah's kingdom, was to commence? They had very grand notions of the extent of the Meſſiah's kingdom, the number of his ſubjects, the ſtrength of his armies, the pomp and eclat of his court, and were eager to have that glorious empire ſpeedily erected; or being inveterate enemies of our Lord, they might aſk the queſtion in deriſion, becauſe every thing about Jeſus was ſo unlike to the Meſſiah whom they expected. To correct their miſtaken notions, our Lord told them, that the Meſſiah's kingdom does not conſiſt in any pompous outward form of government, to be erected in this or that particular country, with the terror of arms, and the confuſion of war; but that it conſiſts in the ſubjection of mens wills, and in the conformity of their minds to the law of God, to be effected by a new diſpenſation of religion, which was already begun: Accordingly they were not to ſeek for it in this or that place, ſaying, Lo here! or Lo there! for the kingdom of God, the new diſpenſation of religion, productive of the dominion of righteouſneſs in mens minds, was already begun among them, being preached by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and confirmed by innumerable miracles. The phraſe ἐντὸς ὑμῶν, ſignifies more properly among you, than within you, as we render it; for it is certain, that our Lord could not properly ſay, that the kingdom of God was in the Phariſees, to whom he ſpoke, whoſe temper was intirely alienated from the nature and deſign of it. See Raphelius and Beza on the text.

Ver. 23. And they ſhall ſay to you, &c.] "They, that is, the Jews, who, after having rejected me, ſhall long for the appearance of the Meſſiah, (ver. 22.) and eagerly liſten to every pretender who ſhall aſſume that character."

30 Even thus ſhall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed.

31 In that day, he which ſhall be upon the houſe-top, and his ſtuff in the houſe, let him not come down to take it away: and he that is in the field, let him likewiſe not return back.

32 Remember Lot's wife.

33 Whoſoever ſhall ſeek to ſave his life, ſhall loſe it; and whoſoever ſhall loſe his life, ſhall preſerve it.

34 I tell you, in that night there ſhall be two men in one bed; the one ſhall be taken, and the other ſhall be left.

35 Two women ſhall be grinding together; the one ſhall be taken, and the other left.

36 Two men ſhall be in the field; the one ſhall be taken, and the other left.

37 And they anſwered and ſaid unto him, Where, Lord? And he ſaid unto them, Whereſoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together.

Ver. 32. Remember Lot's wife.] This unfortunate woman had been informed by angels of the deſtruction of Sodom, and promiſed deliverance; but was expreſly forbidden to look back on any account in the time of her flight, becauſe it was proper they ſhould flee ſpeedily; in the faith of this divine declaration, and perfectly contented, or at leaſt endeavouring to be ſo, that they had eſcaped with their lives. Neverthel eſs ſhe preſumed to entertain doubts concerning the deſtruction of her wicked acquaintance, perhaps becauſe ſhe did not fully believe the angel's meſſage, or becauſe ſhe thought that God might repent himſelf of the evil he had threatened. Moreover, being inwardly ſorry for the loſs of her relations and goods, and at the ſame time not ſufficiently valuing the kindneſs of God, who had ſent his angels to preſerve her, ſhe lingered behind her huſband, diſcontented and vexed, allowing him and his two daughters to enter into Zoar before her, and thereby laying a temptation in Lot's way to look back upon her, on account of the danger to which ſhe was expoſing herſelf. But no ſooner had the good man, with his believing children, entered the place of their refuge, than God poured out the fulneſs of his wrath upon the offending cities. The thunder, the ſhrieking of the inhabitants, the craſhing of the houſes falling, were heard at a diſtance. Lot's wife, not yet in Zoar, was at length convinced that all was loſt, and being exceedingly diſpleaſed, ſhe deſpiſed the gift of her life; for in contradiction to the angel's command, ſhe turned about, and looked round at the dreadful devaſtation; probably alſo bewailed her periſhing kindred and wealth (Gen. xix. 14.): But her infidelity, her diſobedience, her ingratitude, and her love of the world received a juſt, though ſevere rebuke. In an inſtant ſhe was turned into a pillar of ſalt, being burned up by the flames, out of whoſe reach ſhe could not fly, and ſo was made a perpetual monument of God's diſpleaſure to all poſterity. Her looking back, though in itſelf a thing indifferent, yet as it was done contrary to the divine prohibition, and expreſſed ſuch a complication of evil diſpoſitions, was ſo far from being a ſmall ſin, that it fully deſerved the puniſhment inflicted on it. And this puniſhment was the more neceſſary, as it ſhewed all the inhabitants of Canaan, that the deliverance of Lot and his family from the vengeance which overwhelmed Sodom, was wrought in honour of their righteouſneſs; a ſignal inſtance of which they gave on this occaſion, in their leaving Sodom, together with their neareſt relations, and all their ſubſtance, at God's command. Moreover, the manifeſtation that was now made of their faith and piety was rendered ſtill more conſpicuous by the judgement inflicted on the faulty member of the family, who was cut off for her impiety. The interpoſition of Providence therefore in behalf of Lot and his children, was a proper contraſt to the deſtruction of Sodom, and accompanied it with ſingular propriety; the one ſhewing the great regard which God hath for good men, while the other teſtified his extreme diſpleaſure with ſinners. See Macknight, and on Gen. xix. 26.

Ver. 33. Whoſoever ſhall ſeek to ſave his life, &c.] As in the whole of his diſcourſe our Lord is ſpeaking of the temporal calamities which were to befal the Jewiſh nation, his words in this verſe muſt be interpreted accordingly: "Whoſoever, in order to ſave his life, ſhall flee into the city, becauſe it is ſtrongly fortified and garriſoned, ſhall meet with the deſtruction from which he is flying; whereas they ſhall be ſafe who flee into the open towns, and defenceleſs villages, which, in the opinion of many, may be thought equal to throwing away their lives."

Ver. 35, 36. Left] Diſmiſſed. MS. Elſner, and Doddridge.

Ver. 37. Whereſoever the body is, &c.] "As eagles find out, and gather round a carcaſe, ſo wherever wicked men are, the judgements of God will purſue them; and particularly in whatever part of the land any number of the unbelieving Jews are, there will the Romans, the executioners of the divine vengeance upon this nation, be gathered together to deſtroy them." The expreſſion is proverbial, and will appear to have been beautifully applied, when it is remembered that the Romans bore in their ſtandards the figure of an eagle, and that a certain kind of eagle mentioned by Ariſtotle is found to feed on carcaſes. Dr. Clarke explains our Lord's anſwer thus: "Your queſtion is of no moment; no matter where or when the ſame thing comes to paſs; wherever the caſe and circumſtances are alike, there alſo will the event be proportionably the ſame; as whereſoever the prey is, thither will the birds of prey reſort: So wherever the doctrine of Chriſt is received, there is the kingdom of Chriſt; and wherever the perſons to be judged ſhall be found endued with the like diverſity of qualifications, there alſo ſhall the impartial judgement of God, the ſearcher of hearts, diſtinguiſh them with the like diſtinctions." Serm. xvii. vol. 11.

REFLECTIONS ON THE TEN LEPERS. Ver. 11—19.

The Jews and Samaritans could not abide each other; yet here, in leproſy, they became ſocial: Here was one Samaritan leper with the Jewiſh; community of paſſion had made them friends, whom even religion disjoined. What virtue there is in miſery, that can unite even the moſt eſtranged hearts.

Theſe ten are met together, and they meet Chriſt; not caſually, but upon due deliberation: no marvel, if they thought no attendance too long to be delivered from ſo loathſome, ſo miſerable a diſeaſe. We are all ſenſible enough of our bodily infirmities; O that we could be equally weary of our ſpiritual maladies and deformities, which are no leſs mortal, if they be not healed; and they cannot be healed by any human means. Theſe men had died lepers, if they had not met with Chriſt. O Saviour, give us grace to ſeek, patience to wait for thee, and then we know thou wilt find us, and we ſhall find remedy.

Though theſe men came to ſeek Chriſt, yet, finding him, they ſtand afar off, whether for reverence, or for ſecurity. God had enacted this diſtance: it was their charge, if they had occaſion to paſs through the ſtreets, to cry out, I am unclean; it was no leſs than duty to proclaim their own infectiouſneſs; there was not danger only, but ſin in their approach; and yet theſe lepers, though far off in the diſtance of place, are near in reſpect of the acceptance of their prayer. The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him in truth. O Saviour, whilſt we are far off from thee, thou art near to us; never doſt thou come ſo cloſe to us, as when in an holy baſhfulneſs we ſtand furtheſt off from thy awful preſence.

He that ſtands near, may whiſper; he that is afar off, muſt cry aloud: So did theſe lepers, (ver. 13.) yet did not ſomuch the diſtance as paſſion ſtrain their throats; that which can give voice to the dumb, can much more give loudneſs to the vocal.

All cried together, uniting their ten voices in one ſound, that their conjoined forces might beſiege that gracious ear. All affected with one common diſeaſe, all lift up their voices together; and Jews and Samaritan agree in joint ſupplication. When we would obtain univerſal favours, we may not content ourſelves with ſolitary devotions, but join our ſpiritual forces together, and ſupplicate the Almighty in full aſſembly. Two are better than one, becauſe they have a good reward for their labour. O holy, happy violence, that is thus offered to heaven, how can we want bleſſings, when ſo many cords draw them down upon our heads!

Too much like theſe lepers in our condition, why do we not imitate them in their conduct? Whither ſhould we ſeek, but to our Jeſus? How ſhould we ſtand aloof in regard to our own wretchedneſs! How ſhould we alſo lift up with them the voice of ſupplication, and ſue for favour in thoſe well-adapted terms, Jeſus, Maſter, have mercy on us!

What a gracious prevention of mercy is here! both had and given ere it can be aſked. Jeſus, when he ſaw them, ſaid, Go, ſhew yourſelves unto the prieſts: (ver. 14.) The diſeaſe is cured ere it can be complained of; for their ſhewing to the prieſt preſuppoſes them to be whole.

The original command in this caſe runs, "either to Aaron, or to one of his ſons." But why to them? Leproſy was a bodily ſickneſs; what is this to ſpiritual perſons?—But this affection of the body is joined with a legal uncleanneſs, and it muſt come under their cognizance, not as a ſickneſs, but as an impurity. Nor was it only the peculiar judgement of the prieſt that was here intended, but the thankfulneſs of the patient too; that by the ſacrifice which he ſhould bring with him, he might render to God the glory of his cure. O God, whomſoever thou cureſt of their ſpiritual leproſy are bound to preſent thee with the true evangelical ſacrifices, not of their praiſes only, but of themſelves, which is their reaſonable ſervice.

The lepers did not, would not go of themſelves, but are ſent by Chriſt; (ver. 14.) Chriſt, who was above the law, would not tranſgreſs it: he knew this was his charge by Moſes. Juſtly might he have

AND he ſpake a parable unto them, to this end, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint;

2 Saying, There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man:

3 And there was a widow in that city; and ſhe came unto him, ſaying, Avenge me of mine adverſary.

4 And he would not for a while: but afterward he ſaid within himſelf, Though I fear not God, nor regard man;

5 Yet becauſe this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, leſt by her continual coming, ſhe weary me.

have diſpenſed with his own injunction; but he would not: Though the law doth not bind the maker, yet will he voluntarily bind himſelf. This was but a branch of the ceremonial, yet would he not ſlight it, but in his own perſon ſets the example of a ſtudious obſervance. How carefully ſhould we ſubmit ourſelves to the royal laws of our Creator,—to the wholeſome laws of our ſuperiors, when the Son of God would not omit this punctuality in a ceremony!

Had this duty been neglected, what clamours had been raiſed by his envious adverſaries! what ſcandals diffuſed!—though the fault had been that of the patients, not of the phyſician. They that watched Chriſt ſo narrowly, and were apt to take ſuch poor exceptions at his ſabbath-cures, at his diſciples unwaſhen hands,—how much more would they have calumniated him, if by his neglect the law of leproſy had been palpably tranſgreſſed! Not only evil muſt be avoided, but offence alſo; (ſee ver. 1.) and that not on our parts, but on others: That offence is ours which we did not, when we might have remedied.

What a noble, what an irrefragible teſtimony was this to the power and truth of the Meſſiah. How can this Jewiſh nation but believe, or be made inexcuſable in not believing? When they ſhall ſee ſo many lepers, come at once to the temple, all cured by a ſecret volition, without word or touch; how can they chooſe but ſay, "This work is ſupernatural; no limited power could do this; how is he not God, if his power be infinite?"—Their own eyes ſhall be witneſſes and judges of their own conviction.

This Act of ſhewing to the prieſt was not more required by the law, than pre-required of theſe lepers by our Saviour, for the trial of their obedience. It hath ever been God's cuſtom, by ſmall precepts, to prove men's diſpoſitions; obedience is as well tried in a trifle, as in the moſt important charge; yea, ſo much the more, as the thing required is leſs. What command ſoever we receive from God, or our human ſuperiors, let us not ſcan the weight of the injunction, but the authority of the enjoiner; difficulty or ſlightneſs are equally vain pretences for diſobedience.

Theſe lepers are wiſer, they obeyed and went. What was the iſſue? As they went they were healed. (ver. 14.) Lo! had they ſtood ſtill, they had ſtill been lepers; now they went, they are whole.—What haſte the bleſſing makes to overtake their ready obedience.

Yet beſides this recompence, O Saviour, thou would herein have reſpect to thine own juſt glory. Had not theſe lepers been cured in the way, but in the end of their walk, upon their ſhewing themſelves to the prieſts, how much light had the miracle loſt! Perhaps the prieſts would have challenged it to themſelves, and attributed it to their prayers; perhaps the lepers might have thought it was thy purpoſe to honour the prieſts as the inſtruments of their marvellous cure. As it is, there can be no colour of any other's participation: As thy power, ſo thy praiſe admits of no partners.

And now, methinks, I ſee what an amazed joy revels amongſt theſe lepers, as they perceive this inſtantaneous cure. Each tells the other what a change he feels; each comforts the other with the aſſurance of his outward cleanneſs; each congratulates the other's happineſs, and thinks and ſays, how joyful this news will be to their friends, to their families! Their ſociety now ſerves them well to applaud, and to heighten their new felicity.

The miracle wrought indifferently upon all, is differently received. All were obedient, one only was thankful; (ver. 15.) What could make the difference, but grace? And who could make the difference of grace, but he who gave it? The ſame motives are not equally powerful in all. Where the ox finds graſs, the viper ſucks in poiſon. O my God! if we look not up to thee, we may come, and not be healed; we may be healed, and not thankful.

This one man breaks away from his fellows to ſeek Chriſt, and pour forth the fulneſs of a grateful heart. It is a baſe and unworthy thing for a man ſo to ſubject himſelf to the example of others, as not ſometimes to reſolve to be an example to others. When either evil is to be done, or good neglected, how much better is it to retire, and go the right way alone, than to err in company!

O noble pattern of thankfulneſs! What diligent officiouſneſs is here! What a hearty recognition of the bleſſing! What an humble reverence of his benefactor! He falls down at his feet, giving him thanks; as acknowledging at once Chriſt's beneficence and his own unworthineſs. Happy were it for all Iſrael, if they would but learn of this Samaritan.

It is not for nothing that note is taken of the country of this thankful leper;—He was a Samaritan. The place is known, and branded with the infamy of paganiſm: Outward diſadvantage of place or parentage cannot block up the way of God's grace and free election; as on the other hand, the privileges of birth and nature avail us nothing on ſpiritual occaſions.

How ſenſible wert thou, O Saviour, of thine own beneficence; (ver. 17.) were there not ten cleanſed, but where are the nine? The favours of God are univerſal; not a creature but taſtes of his bounty: His ſun and rain are for others beſides his friends. But none of his gracious dealings eſcapes either his knowledge or record. Why ſhould not we, O God, keep a book of our receipts from thee, which agreeing with thine, may at once declare thee bounteous, and us grateful?

Our Saviour did not aſk this by way of doubt, but of exprobation. Full well did he count the ſteps of thoſe abſent lepers; but he upbraids their ingratitude, that they were not where they ſhould have been. There are not found that return to give glory to God, ſave this ſtranger. Had they been all Samaritans, this had been criminal; but now that they were Iſraelites, their ingratitude was more foul than their leproſy: The more we are bound to God, the more ſhameful is our unthankfulneſs. There is ſcarce one in ten that is careful to give God his own; this neglect is not more general than diſpleaſing; and Chriſt had never miſſed their preſence, had not their abſence been hateful and injurious.

Chap. XVIII. Ver. 1. And he ſpake a parable, &c.] But [δὲ] he taught them by a parable, that men ought to perſevere in prayer, and not be diſcouraged. Heylin. The particle δὲ, but, plainly implies, that this parable has a relation to the diſcourſe in the preceding chapter, and was delivered at the ſame time. The Evangeliſt ſays it was deſigned to ſhew, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint; that is, ought frequently to pray; for ſo the word πάντοτε ſignifies, John xviii. 20. The figure is carried ſtill higher in the epithet given to the morning and evening ſacrifices; which, becauſe of their frequency, are called, a continual burnt-offering: And, in alluſion to this, men are directed to pray without ceaſing, 1 Theſſ. v. 17. See on Luke ii. 37. It is plain, therefore, that the parable was ſpoken to recommend continual praying, in the ſtrict ſenſe of the words, but frequency, earneſtneſs, and perſeverance in the duty, eſpecially when the ſubject of our prayers is a matter of a public nature, tending evidently to the glory of God, and the good eſtate of his church on earth; and being delivered on this occaſion, it was deſigned to inſpire the diſciples with earneſtneſs and perſeverance in their prayers, particularly for the coming of the Son of man, to put an end to the Jewiſh polity, notwithſtanding God ſhould long defer the accompliſhment of their deſires. The coming of Chriſt to deſtroy the Jewiſh nation, is in this and other paſſages of Scripture, ſpoken of as a thing exceedingly to be wiſhed for by the diſciples in thoſe days; the reaſon was, the Jews in every country, being their bittereſt perſecutors, were the chief oppoſers of the Chriſtian religion. Our Lord often in the courſe of his miniſtry recommended frequency, earneſtneſs, and perſeverance in prayer; not becauſe the Divine Being is tired out by our importunity, but becauſe it is both an expreſſion and exerciſe of our firm belief and confidence in his goodneſs, without which, it would not be fit for God to beſtow his bleſſings upon us, nor ſhould we be capable of receiving and uſing them. See Matth. vii. 11. Luke xl. 8. The word ἐκκακεῖν, rendered to faint, is expreſſive, and ſignifies, "to faint under preſſures and perſecutions—to yield to evils, and deſpond under them,—to be ſo wholly wearied out with them, as to give place to them,—and to ceaſe from prayer as unavailing to procure relief." See Epheſ. iii. 13. 2 Theſ. iii. 13. Heb. xii. 3. and my 7th ſermon on the Parables.

Ver. 3. Avenge me, &c.] Do me juſtice upon my adverſary. Heylin, Doddridge, MS. &c. This is the undoubted import of the original phraſe; and care ſhould be taken in every verſion of it, to expreſs it ſo, as not to ſuggeſt the idea of revenge.

Ver. 5. She weary me.] Ὑπωπιάζῃ με, the word properly ſignifies to beat on the face, and particularly under the eye; ſo as to make the parts black and blue. Hence it ſignifies to beat in general, 1 Cor. ix. 27. In the preſent paſſage it has a metaphorical meaning, as all the tranſlators acknowledge, though they ſeem to have miſſed the exact propriety of the metaphor; for Ὑπωπιάζειν here ſignifies to give great pain, 6 And the Lord ſaid, Hear what the unjuſt judge ſaith.

7 And ſhall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them?

8 I tell you that he will avenge them ſpeedily. Nevertheleſs, when the Son of man cometh, ſhall he find faith on the earth?

9 And he ſpake this parable unto certain which truſted in themſelves that they were righteous, and deſpiſed others:

10 Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Phariſee, and the other a publican.

11 The Phariſee ſtood and prayed thus with himſelf, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjuſt, adulterers, or even as this publican.

12 I faſt twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I poſſeſs.

13 And the publican ſtanding afar off, would not lift up ſo much as his eyes unto heaven, but ſmote upon his breaſt, ſaying, God be merciful to me a ſinner.

14 I tell you, This man went down to his houſe juſtified rather than the other: for every one that exalteth himſelf ſhall be abaſed; and he that humbleth himſelf ſhall be exalted.

Ver. 7. Rev. vi. 10.—V. 8. Hebr. x. 37. 2 Pet. iii. 8, 9.—V. 9. Or, as being righteous.—V. 11. Pſ. cxxxv. 2. Iſa. i. 15. lviii. 2. Rev. iii. 17.—V. 14. Job xxii. 29. Matth. xxiii. 12. Ch. xiv. 11. Jam. iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 5, 6.

pain, ſuch as ariſes from a ſevere beating. The meaning therefore is, that the uneaſy feelings which this widow raiſed in the judge's breaſt by the moving repreſentations which ſhe gave him of her diſtreſs, affected him to ſuch a degree, that he could not bear it: and therefore, to be rid of thoſe feelings, he reſolved to do her juſtice. The paſſage, underſtood in this ſenſe, has a peculiar advantage, as it throws a beautiful light on our Lord's argument, (ver. 6, 7.) and lays a proper foundation for the concluſion which it contains. See Macknight and Mintert.

Ver. 7. Though he bear long with them.] "Though he ſeem to refrain himſelf for a while, to hold his peace, and afflict them very ſore." Iſa. iv. 11. See Eccluſ. xxxv. 18, &c. 2 Maccab. vi. 13—16. Elſner would render this, Shall he not avenge his own elect, who cry to him, and wait patiently for it? that is, for his appearance in their favour. Some underſtand this as referring the wicked; "though God bear long with the wicked who oppreſs his elect, and ſeem deaf to the cries which they ſend up to his throne, the juſt view which he hath of their afflictions, will in due time move him to puniſh ſeverely their enemies." The ſentiment painted in this parable is very beautiful; namely, that "if the repeated importunate cries of the afflicted, at length make an impreſſion on the hearts even of men ſo wicked, as to glory in their impiety, injuſtice, and barbarity, they will much more be required by God moſt gracious, who is ever ready to beſtow his choiceſt bleſſings, when he ſees his creatures fit to receive them." Arguments of this kind, taken from the feeble goodneſs, or even from the imperfections of men, to illuſtrate the ſuperior and infinite perfections of God, were often made uſe of by Jeſus, and with great ſucceſs, in working the convictions deſigned. Such appeals force their way directly to men's hearts, bear down all oppoſition, and make a laſting impreſſion. The MS. reads the laſt clauſe of the verſe—and is he ſlack towards them.

Ver. 8. He will avenge them ſpeedily] Rather, ſuddenly; for ſo the original ἐν τάχει, may ſignify. Beſides, Scripture and experience teach, that in moſt caſes puniſhment is not ſpeedily executed againſt the evil works of evil men; but that when the divine patience ends, oftentimes deſtruction overtaketh the wicked as a whirlwind; Pſ. lxxiii. 18—20. and by its ſuddenneſs becomes the more heavy. Farther, the correction of the tranſlation propoſed, removes the ſeeming oppoſition between this clauſe and the end of the preceding verſe; the reconciling of which has given riſe to ſeveral ſtrange criticiſms, not to mention that it agrees exactly with the ſubject in hand, the deſtruction of the Jewiſh nation having been repreſented by our Lord in this very diſcourſe, as what would be exceedingly ſudden and heavy. See chap. xvii. 24. The queſtion at the end of the verſe implies, that at the coming of Chriſt to avenge and deliver God's elect, the faith of his coming ſhould in a great meaſure be loſt; accordingly it appears, from 2 Pet. iii. 4. that many infidels and apoſtates ſcoffed at the expectation of Chriſt's coming, which the godly in thoſe days cheriſhed. Inſtead of on the earth, the Greek would be more properly rendered in the land; for ſo γῆ very frequently ſignifies in the New Teſtament. See on Matth. iv. 8. and Acts vii. 3, 4, 11. Dr. Waterland reads this and the foregoing verſe thus; which cry day and night unto him? Though he may be ſlack towards them. Ver. 8. I tell you, he will avenge them preſently. But when, &c.

Ver. 9. Who truſted in themſelves] Who were perſuaded of themſelves. MS.

Ver. 11. The Phariſee ſtood and prayed thus] The Phariſee having a very high opinion of his own ſanctity, would not mingle with the crowd of worſhippers in the temple, leſt he ſhould have been defiled by them. See Iſa. lxv. 5. But he ſtood on a place by himſelf alone; this is plainly expreſſed in the Greek, which ſhould be rendered, the Phariſee, ſtanding by himſelf, prayed theſe things. He ſpoke them aloud in the hearing of thoſe who were in the temple at their devotions. He ſhewed his pride and ſelf-conceit by ſtanding as near the ſanctuary, the place of the divine habitation, as he could, that the prieſts might hear him alſo, and that he might be at as great a diſtance as poſſible from the profane publican, who, he obſerved, was praying at the ſame time with himſelf. This circumſtance of his ſtanding near the ſanctuary, is not indeed directly mentioned; but it is implied in that which is told of the publican, (ver. 13.) namely, that he ſtood afar off. Here therefore the phariſee prayed, giving God the honour of his ſuppoſed righteouſneſs, in which he would have acted ſo far well had he really been poſſeſſed of any; but this thankſgiving ſavoured of the rankeſt pride, being a praiſing of himſelf rather than of God, and ſuch a praiſing of himſelf as implied the higheſt contempt of others, and particularly of his fellow worſhipper: for he did not ſimply thank God that he was poſſeſſed of this or that virtue, but truly that he was not like other men, and particularly like the publican, who was then addreſſing God. Moreover, he took care to do himſelf all manner of honour, by an exact detail of the ſins to which other men, particularly the publicans were prone, from which, in his own opinion, he was perfectly free; and of the duties, which they neglected, but which he failed not to perform. See the next verſe. Or even as this publican, expreſſes a kind of contemptuous pointing at him as it were with the finger.

Ver. 12. I faſt twice, &c.] The ſins which the Phariſee mentioned, being ſuch as were ſeverally charged on publicans, and the duties ſuch as that ſort of men were ſuppoſed to neglect; it ſhewed to what an intolerable pitch his vanity was grown, ſince it led him, even in his devotions directly to inſult his brethren, and proved that he poſſeſſed none of thoſe virtues, for which he ſo vainly returned God this ſolemn thankſgiving. Beſides, his faſting twice a week was a duty not preſcribed by the law, no more than his paying tythes of all, according to the opinion of moſt caſuiſts at that time, if, as is probable, he meant tythes of mint, aniſe, and cummin, a preciſeneſs by which men of his ſect made themſelves remarkable. See ch. xi. 42. Wherefore the language of this part of his prayer was, "I not only far excel other men in point of holineſs, but I am even more righteous than the law requires." Thus did the proud Phariſee arrogantly inſinuate, that he had laid God as it were under an obligation to him. It has been obſerved by moſt commentators, that the Jews, eſpecially the Phariſees, uſed generally to keep private faſts on Mondays and Thurſdays, as the primitive Chriſtians did on Wedneſdays and Fridays; and our Lord had formally removed their oſtentatious manner of doing it. See Matth. vi. 16. and Druſius on the place.

Ver. 13. And the publican ſtanding afar off] Impreſſed with a deep ſenſe of his ſins, the publican appeared ſo vile in his own ſight, that he would not go up among the people of God, but ſtood afar off, in the court of the Gentiles, perhaps without the ſtone-wall, called by the Apoſtle the middle wall of partition, which Gentiles and unclean Iſraelites were not permitted to paſs. Here, with eyes fixed on the ground, ſmiting upon his breaſt, he by that action made a public acknowledgment of his great tranſgreſſions before all who were in ſight of him, and in the bitterneſs of his ſoul, bitterly cried for mercy. He too, as well as the Phariſee, pronounced his devotions aloud; but in regard his prayer was a confeſſion of his ſin, his ſpeaking it aloud proceeded not from vanity, but from the anguiſh of his ſoul: for inſtead of doing him honour, this prayer tended to abaſe him greatly, as he called no mixture of good to palliate the many evils of his paſt life; but openly acknowledged that he was a ſinner, and ſought refuge in the mercy of God, the alone foundation of his hope. And that he did not act the hypocrite, was evident from the place which he choſe for his devotions, where there were few to behold him, from the melancholy of his countenance, and from his whole deportment. The word ἁμαρτωλὸς, as here, often ſignifies an abandoned profligate, a grievous ſinner; and not merely one who has in ſome inſtances violated the divine law, which, alas! has been, and is the caſe with the beſt of men. See Matth. ix. 10, 11. xxvii. 45. Luke vi. 32, 33, &c.

Ver. 14. Juſtified rather than the other] Juſtified, and not the other. Heylin. The original δεδικαιωμένος ἢ ἐκεῖνος is a peculiar idiom of the Greek language, and will not admit of a literal conſtruction in Engliſh. The following paſſage will ſerve to ſhew, that its true import is 15 And they brought unto him alſo infants, that he ſhould touch them: but when his diſciples ſaw it, they rebuked them.

16 But Jeſus called them unto him, and ſaid, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of ſuch is the kingdom of God.

17 Verily I ſay unto you, Whoſoever ſhall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, ſhall in no wiſe enter therein.

18 And a certain ruler aſked him, ſaying, Good Maſter, what ſhall I do to inherit eternal life?

19 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Why calleſt thou me good? none is good, ſave one, that is God.

20 Thou knoweſt the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not ſteal, Do not bear falſe witneſs, Honour thy father and thy mother.

21 And he ſaid, All theſe have I kept from my youth up.

22 Now when Jeſus heard theſe things, he ſaid unto him, Yet lackeſt thou one thing: ſell all that thou haſt, and diſtribute unto the poor, and thou ſhalt have treaſure in heaven: and come, follow me.

23 And when he heard this, he was very ſorrowful: for he was very rich.

24 And when Jeſus ſaw that he was very ſorrowful, he ſaid, How hardly ſhall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!

25 For it is eaſier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

26 And they that heard it, ſaid, Who then can be ſaved?

27 And he ſaid, The things which are impoſſible with men, are poſſible with God.

28 Then Peter ſaid, Lo, we have left all, and followed thee.

29 And he ſaid unto them, Verily I ſay unto you, there is no man that hath left houſe, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's ſake,

30 Who ſhall not receive manifold more in this preſent time, and in the world to come life everlaſting.

31 Then he took unto him the twelve, and ſaid unto them, Behold, we go up to Jeruſalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man ſhall be accompliſhed.

32 For he ſhall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and ſhall be mocked, and ſpitefully entreated, and ſpitted on.

33 And they ſhall ſcourge him, and put him to death: and the third day he ſhall riſe again.

34 And they underſtood none of theſe things: and this ſaying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were ſpoken.

35 And it came to paſs, that as he was come nigh unto Jericho, a certain blind man ſat by the way-ſide begging:

36 And hearing the multitude paſs by, he aſked what it meant.

37 And they told him, that Jeſus of Nazareth paſſeth by.

38 And he cried, ſaying, Jeſus, thou ſon of David, have mercy on me!

39 And they which went before, rebuked him, that he ſhould hold his peace: but he cried ſo much the more, Thou ſon of David, have mercy on me!

40 And Jeſus ſtood and commanded him to be brought unto him: and when he was come near, he aſked him, 41 Saying, What wilt thou that I ſhall do unto thee? And he ſaid, Lord, that I may receive my ſight.

42 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Receive thy ſight: thy faith hath ſaved thee.

is as above given. In John xiii. 10. our Saviour ſays, He that is waſhed, need not to waſh, ſave his feet;—ȣ χρειαν εχει ἢ τȣς πȣδας νιψασθαι, where the phraſe is exactly the ſame as here, and excludes all waſhing but that of the feet. The learned Grotius has fallen into the error of ſuppoſing the Phariſee juſtified in ſome degree, by underſtanding the paſſage comparatively, as the Bible has it; And Dr. Waterland, treading in his ſteps, obſerves, in a ſermon on the ſubject, "Our Lord does not ſay abſolutely that either of the two was juſtified; but he ſpeaks comparatively, that one was ſo rather than the other." The reader will obſerve, that there is nothing for rather in the original, and therefore it is printed in Italics in our Bibles. Beſides, it is manifeſt to the leaſt obſervation, that the Phariſee could not be at all acceptable in the ſight of Him, who has declared, that he abaſeth all who exalt themſelves. This appears to have been a very favourite maxim with our Lord. See on Matth. xxiii. 12.

From the preſent parable we learn ſeveral important leſſons; as,—that the generality of men are great ſtrangers to themſelves, and ignorant of their own characters;—that they often-times thank God in words for his benefits, while their hearts are by no means penetrated with any juſt ſenſe of them;—that it is difficult to think of the ſins we ourſelves are free from, without cenſuring the perſons who in our opinion are guilty of them;—that a man may be very ready to cenſure others, without a ſingle thought of reforming himſelf;—and that, in a certain ſenſe, we may be clear of open and ſcandalous ſins, while we are full of inward ſpiritual wickedneſs, pride, envy, malice, hypocriſy, and voluptuouſneſs. We may farther obſerve, that by propounding this parable immediately after that of the importunate widow, our Lord hath taught us, that although our prayers muſt be very earneſt and frequent, they ſhould always be accompanied with the deepeſt humility; becauſe no diſpoſition of mind is more proper for ſuch weak and frail beings as men to appear with before the great God, than an abſolute ſelf-abaſement. See Macknight, Waterland's ſermons, vol. i. p. 393. my 8th diſcourſe on the Parables, and the Reflections.

Ver. 22. Yet lackeſt thou one thing] Namely, to love God more than mammon. Our Saviour knew his heart, and preſently put him upon a trial, which laid it open to the ruler himſelf; and to cure his love of the world, which could not in him be cured otherwiſe, Chriſt commanded him to ſell all that he had. But he does not command us to do this; but to uſe all to the glory of God. See on Mark x. 20. For the remainder of this chapter we refer the reader to the parallel paſſages.

43 And immediately he received his ſight, and followed him, glorifying God: and all the people, when they ſaw it, gave praiſe unto God.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Zaccheus a publican. The ten pieces of money. Chriſt rideth into Jeruſalem with triumph: weepeth over it: driveth the buyers and ſellers out of the temple, and teacheth daily in it. The rulers would have deſtroyed him, but for fear of the people.

AND Jeſus entered and paſſed through Jericho.

REFLECTIONS ON THE PHARISEE AND PUBLICAN.

Ver. 9—14.

There are ſo few who make any pretenſions to religion, that it is great pity any of thoſe pretenſions ſhould be falſe and groundleſs. The generality of the world we ſee quite neglect it. They neither have it, nor ſeem to have it, nor deſire to be thought to have it: and of the remainder who concern themſelves about it, many miſtake its nature, and having diſcharged its facile offices, they pride themſelves in their vain performances, and treat the reſt of the world with contempt and averſion. ver. 9. They chriſten their ill-nature by the name of zeal; and whoever attempts to undeceive them, is likely to incur the worſt effects of it. This our Lord found by ſad experience from the Phariſees, who, upon this account, long perſecuted, and at laſt deſtroyed him.

So pernicious a principle is this phariſaical righteouſneſs: Such reaſon have we all to guard againſt it: which every reader will be better enabled to do, who conſiders its nature as repreſented in the above parable, with the beautiful illuſtration of it by the oppoſite character of the humble publican.

We are told, that the Phariſee ſtood, and prayed thus within himſelf, God, I thank thee, &c. ver. 11, 12. It may be aſked, "What is the fault of this prayer? If the Phariſee did mention his own good qualities, yet he ſeemed to do it with thankfulneſs, as aſcribing them and the glory of them to God; thankfulneſs, which implies an humble confeſſion of our own inabilities, and a grateful acknowledgment of the divine favour."

But, ſee the deceitfulneſs of the heart of man! this Phariſee's giving God thanks was but a pretence, a mere artifice to introduce his own praiſe; to authorize, and as it were ſanctify his vain-glorious boaſting. It was a kind of ſacrilege thus to abuſe the name of God to ſcreen his pride, and to ſerve only as a plauſible introduction to his arrogant commendations of himſelf, and his uncharitable cenſures and inſolent contempt of others. God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men, &c.—or even as this publican. See how he ſeaſons his private panegyric with public ſatire; and tramples upon the reſt of the world, to extol his own merit, as it were upon their ruin. All inordinate ſelf-love is neceſſarily attended with a proportionable want of charity; ſo that pride and ill nature are inſeparable. But what alliance have they with religion? What fellowſhip have light and darkneſs? What connection is there between calumny and devotion?

And yet, many men pretendedly religious, have been ſo remarkable for theſe two diabolical qualities of pride and ill-nature; have been ſo notoriouſly arrogant, ſupercilious and moroſe, ſo full of malicious cenſoriouſneſs, and contempt of the reſt of the world, and all this with ſuch hypocritical pretences of zeal for virtue and religion; that they have given a handle to wicked men to charge religion itſelf, as acceſſary to ſuch criminal affections, though the tenour of all its precepts tends to their utter extirpation.

How ill this phariſee performed theſe duties is not here ſpecified, but we may make a juſt eſtimate of them from his devotion, which is repreſented to us as exceedingly corrupt and prophane. It is ſaid, He went up to the temple to pray, ver. 10. but when he came to the Temple, he did no ſuch thing. He indulged his pride, he vented his malice; he boaſted, he railed, but he did not offer up one petition. No; he was ſo full of his own praiſes, that he forgot his prayers.

This wicked practice of concealing the true purpoſe of the heart under more ſpecious pretences, is very common: men are intimately conſcious that pride is an odious quality, odious to God and man; and therefore they diſguiſe it with falſe colours.

Whoever has kept a due watch over his own heart, muſt have often obſerved theſe mean contrivances. Sometimes we pretend to blame ourſelves for ſomewhat we are leſs careful to excel in, that we may make ourſelves amends in aſſuming ſome other qualities which we have more at heart. Sometimes, we will cover our pride with an affected humility, and diſcommend ourſelves, in hopes to be kindly contradicted, and that our talents may be diſplayed with greater luſtre, when we ſeem leſs conſcious of them. Sometimes we take occaſion to commend others for ſome excellence, which we account conſpicuous in our own character; hoping thereby to make our own be taken notice of; and at other times, with the ſame baſe deſign, but by a more ungenerous method, we inveigh againſt ſuch faults in others, as we judge ourſelves moſt exempt from, that our innocence may be the more advantageouſly remarked, with the benefit of ſuch foils. But, not to mention any more of theſe vile diſguiſes of vanity, this before us, of the Phariſee giving God thanks, is a very common and a very baſe one; and our Lord has ſingled it out for rebuke, that he might cure us, if poſſible, of a ſimilar conduct.

So fallacious, and of ſuch dangerous conſequence, is the ſophiſtry of pride! He was in the preſence of his all-ſeeing Judge;—and yet, ſo far was he from owning his guilt, and imploring mercy, that he affronted the divine omniſcience with lying boaſts of his innocence. Or, to ſet this abſurdity in the light wherein St. Auguſtin has very elegantly placed it "He was before his phyſician, and boaſted of "his health, inſtead of diſcovering his diſtemper."

But let us ſee, if he was not miſtaken even in what he took for the ſound part, that needed no phyſician,—in his boaſted virtues, for which he pretended ſuch devout thankfulneſs. God I thank thee, &c. there was no ground perhaps for his thankſgiving. He might be a very bad man, though he was not as other men were. Singularity is often a vice, but can rarely be a virtue. Error is various, ſin is of all modes and profeſſions; but is then moſt abominable, when it is moſt concealed, and wears the maſk of virtue. So that the Phariſee might be not as other men were, to his greater condemnation. But, ſuppoſing his ſenſe of the words,—that many were worſe than himſelf; yet Hell, as well as Heaven, has diverſe manſions, and not to deſerve the loweſt place in it, is ſmall matter of praiſe or conſolation.

This general expreſſion of his own goodneſs being thus conſidered, let us now view the particulars which he choſe to ſpecify. From ver. 11, 12. we read that he was not an extortioner &c.—but that he faſted twice a week, and gave tythes of all that he poſſeſſed.

Here he commends himſelf both negatively and poſitively; for his merits lying in a narrow compaſs, he was glad to make the moſt of them. Such negative commendations as he urges, are but a wretched kind of praiſe; yet we ſee vanity often have recourſe to them. You ſhall hear an extravagant ſpendthrift boaſting that he is not covetous, and a covetous extortioner glorying that he is not extravagant; all the moral virtues ſtand between two vicious extreams, and the man who is far gone in one, is generally exempt from the other. Our Phariſee, was no extortioner, nor adulterer, nor unjuſt, as he ſays; but he was proud, and hypocritical, and malicious, and cenſorious to an heinous degree. Witneſs his inſolent mention of the humble penitent beſide him—nor even as this publican!—But He that ſaw the hearts of both, hath told us the difference, and that he was not indeed as that publican, in a contrary ſenſe to that which he intended.

Thus much for his negative, ſpeak we now of his poſitive merits,—his faſting and alms-giving. Theſe are two externals of religion very edifying, when animated by the proper inward diſpoſition of the heart. Faſting is a means, which, under the influence of divine grace, much conduces to mortify the appetites and paſſions; and when we faſt with this intention, we grow in virtue, and promote the great work of ſalvation. But there are ſome who, as Iſaiah ſpeaks, (ch. lviii. 3, 4.) faſt through ſelf-will, for ſtrife and debate, and grow thereby more wilful, peeviſh, and contentious. This man gave, as he ſays himſelf, the tenth part of his ſubſtance; but, according to St. Paul, he might have given all his goods to feed the poor, yea, and his own body to be burned,—yet have wanted charity; and then his alms and his martyrdom ſhould have profited him nothing.

But enough of this Phariſee: Look now, on the other hand, and behold the reverſe of his character in the poor publican! No doubt this man had been guilty of thoſe crimes which were incident to his profeſſion. He had no merits to plead, no faſting, no alms, or other good works, wherewith to juſtify himſelf: He was a ſinner, indeed, probably a great ſinner, but he knew it, and was aſhamed; he was ſorry for it, and confeſſed it. The Phariſee had deſpiſed him; but he deſpiſed none but himſelf. He ſtood afar off, (ver. 13.) far from the ſanctuary, in the entrance, perhaps, of the temple; as it were excommunicated by his own voice, and fully conſcious of his own unworthineſs to appear there. He would not ſo much as lift up his eyes to heaven, but ſmote upon his breaſt, filled with a pious indignation againſt himſelf, and ſaid, God be merciful to me, a ſinner!"

And yet our Lord has declared, in this ſinner's favour, (ver. 14.) that he returned juſtified more than the other. And the only reaſon was, "becauſe he did not juſtify himſelf:" He adds, For every one that exalteth himſelf ſhall be abaſed, and he that humbleth himſelf ſhall be exalted. Such is the moral wherewith our Lord concludes this moſt beautiful parable: And what better influence or application can we make or derive from his divine remark, than by repeating and recommending it to the ſerious meditation of all his ſincere diſciples? Every one that exalteth himſelf ſhall be abaſed, and he that humbleth himſelf ſhall be exalted.

Chap. XIX. Ver. 1—4. And Jeſus entered] After conferring ſight on the beggars, (ſee Matth. ix. 27.) Jeſus entered Jericho attended by them, by his diſciples, and by the multitude: He made no ſtay however in that town, becauſe he haſtened to be at Jeruſalem eight or ten days before the paſſover, intending to preach and work miracles in the moſt public manner, under the eye of all the people, and of the grandees; whoſe reſentment he was no longer afraid of, becauſe his miniſtry had continued the determined time, and he was reſolved to die at this paſſover. A man of this town, one of the principal tax-gatherers, having heard of our Lord's miracles, had a great curioſity to ſee what ſort of a perſon he was; but he could not for the crowd; for, the paſſover being at hand, the roads to Jeruſalem were full of people, and many of them happening to meet with our Lord, choſe to travel in his company, that they might behold his miracles. Zaccheus, therefore, ran before, and climbed up into a ſycamore-

2 And behold, there was a man named Zaccheus, which was the chief among the publicans, and he was rich.

3 And he ſought to ſee Jeſus who he was; and could not for the preſs, becauſe he was little of ſtature.

4 And he ran before, and climbed up into a ſycomore-tree to ſee him; for he was to paſs that way.

5 And when Jeſus came to the place, he looked up and ſaw him, and ſaid unto him, Zaccheus make haſte, and come down; for to-day I muſt abide at thy houſe.

6 And he made haſte, and came down, and received him joyfully.

7 And when they ſaw it, they all murmured, ſaying, That he was gone to be gueſt with a man that is a ſinner.

8 And Zaccheus ſtood, and ſaid unto the Lord; Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by falſe accuſation, I reſtore him four-fold.

9 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, This day is ſalvation come to this houſe, forſomuch as he alſo is a ſon of Abraham.

10 For the Son of man is come to ſeek and to ſave that which was loſt.

11 And as they heard theſe things, he added, and ſpake a parable, becauſe he was nigh to Jeruſalem, and becauſe they thought that the kingdom of God ſhould immediately appear.

12 He ſaid therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country, to receive for himſelf a kingdom, and to return.

13 And he called his ten ſervants, and delivered them ten pounds, and ſaid unto them, Occupy till I come.

camore-tree to ſee him. It ſeems he was in Jericho when Jeſus paſſed through: This accounts for his running before the multitude on this occaſion, for by the 5th verſe it appears that his houſe was further on, in the way to Jeruſalem. His deſire to ſee Jeſus was increaſed, no doubt, by the account which he had received in Jericho, of the miracle performed on the blind beggars; for the news of ſo extraordinary a tranſaction would be quickly ſpread abroad. The words, and he was rich, at the end of ver. 2. ſeem to refer to the diſcourſe in the laſt chapter, ver. 24, &c. particularly to ver. 27. Zaccheus is a proof that it is poſſible for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. See Bengelius.

Ver. 5. Zaccheus, make haſte] Jeſus had never ſeen him before; yet he called him by his name, and by what he ſaid inſinuated, that he knew his houſe was further on the road. What a ſtrange mixture of paſſions muſt Zaccheus have now felt, upon hearing one ſpeak, as knowing both his heart and life!

Ver. 7. Gone to be a gueſt with a man] To a man. Wat. and MS. The phraſe καταλυσαι παρα τινι, properly ſignifies, "to bait at a perſon's houſe on a journey;" referring to the laying down their own burdens, or looſening them from their beaſts, at ſuch times and places. See Wolfius, vol. i. p. 733.

Ver. 8. And Zaccheus ſtood] Stood forth;—in order to make the noble declaration following. By the half of his goods, he probably meant his income. Εσυκοφαντησα, which we render taken by falſe accuſation, properly ſignifies any kind of oppreſſion, eſpecially under any pretence of law; and therefore would be more properly rendered, "If I have taken any thing wrongfully, by injurious charge, or oppreſſive claims in my office." Dr. Waterland and the MS. read, If I have wronged any man. See Eccleſ. iv. 1. v. 8. LXX. One great reaſon of the odium which followed the occupation of a publican was the injuſtice which ſuch perſons practiſed in the exerciſe of their office: Wherefore, the declaration which Zaccheus now made, was a fit vindication of his own character, and ſhewed how unreaſonable the prejudices were, which the multitude entertained againſt him on account of his profeſſion. This verſe may be either conſidered as a declaration of what Zaccheus had been accuſtomed to do, agreeably to the force of his expreſſions, which run in the preſent tenſe, I give, I reſtore, not in the future, I will give, I will reſtore; and likewiſe agreeably to the teſtimony with which Jeſus honoured Zaccheus, that he was a ſon of Abraham;—Or, we may take it as a declaration of his reſolution, with reſpect to his future conduct, dating his converſion from this period; for, even in this light, the declaration clears his character from the aſperſion which the multitude charged him with, on account of his occupation, and ſhews the unreaſonableneſs of their murmuring againſt Jeſus, becauſe he went into the houſe of a tax-gatherer, ver. 7. The reaſon is plain: He who, after giving the half of his goods to feed the poor, and making a four-fold reſtitution for all the injuries he committed, had a competency wherewith to ſupport himſelf and his family, muſt not have been guilty of many deliberate acts of injuſtice. The evils of this kind he was chargeable with in the proſecution of his buſineſs, muſt have been the effects of ignorance and human frailty, rather than of a ſettled wicked diſpoſition; and therefore he muſt have been a perſon of great probity and worth. Accordingly, Jeſus confirmed the account which Zaccheus gave of himſelf, by declaring that he was a ſon of Abraham, not in reſpect of his deſcent only, but in reſpect of his faith and holineſs, ver. 9. That Zaccheus was a Jew, appears from his name, which is the ſame with Zaccai, Ezra ii. 9. Four-fold was the utmoſt which the Jewiſh law required, even in caſes of a fraudulent concealment and conviction; (unleſs where an ox had been killed or ſold, and ſo its labour loſt to the owner, and its diſcovery rendered more difficult, Exod. xxii. 1.) for the phraſe of reſtoring ſevenfold, Prov. vi. 31. ſeems only proverbial, to expreſs making abundant ſatisfaction: But if a man not legally convicted or accuſed, voluntarily diſcovered the fraud he had committed, beſides his treſpaſs-offering he was to add to the principal only a fifth part, Lev. vi. 5. Zaccheus therefore ſhews the ſincerity of his repentance by ſuch an offer. Some commentators have remarked, that oppreſſive publicans were by the Roman law required to reſtore four-fold; but this was only after judgement obtained, where they had been guilty of extorting by force; whereas, before conviction, it was enough to make reſtitution of what had been taken; and even after it, in common caſes, all that the law required was reſtoring twice as much. Archbp. Tillotſon juſtly obſerves, that "had more than an eighth part of Zaccheus's poſſeſſions been unjuſtly gotten, he could not have been able to make ſuch reſtitution, after having given away half of what he now had to the poor, even though he had ſtripped himſelf of all." See his works, vol. iii. p. 86. Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. and Salmaſius de Fœner. p. 386.

Ver. 9. And Jeſus ſaid unto him] And Jeſus ſpake concerning him, that is, to the gueſts; as is evident from the ſpeech itſelf. The prepoſition προς is uſed in this ſenſe, ch. xx. 19. Heb. i. 7. iv. 13. The MS. for houſe, reads family.

Ver. 10. For the Son of man is come to ſeek and to ſave, &c.] Farther to convince the people that our Lord acted agreeably to his character, in keeping company with publicans and ſinners, He told them, that the great deſign of his coming into the world was to ſave ſuch; alluding to the parables of the loſt ſheep, loſt money, and loſt ſon, which he had lately delivered, to prove how agreeable it was to reaſon, to the duties of his miſſion, and to the will of God, that he ſhould keep company with the worſt of ſinners, in order to recover them unto God their rightful owner. And therefore, though Zaccheus had been as bad a man as the multitude ſuppoſed him, and his vocation beſpake him to be, Jeſus was in the exerciſe of his duty when he went to his houſe. See Macknight.

Ver. 11. He—ſpake a parable, &c.] Becauſe his followers were accompanying him to the royal city, in expectation that the kingdom of God would immediately appear, and with a reſolution to aſſiſt him in erecting it; he ſpake a parable, wherein he ſhewed them their duty, deſcribed the true nature of the kingdom of God, and taught them that it was not immediately to appear: Conſidered in this view, as ſuited to the circumſtance of time, and to the caſe of thoſe to whom it was delivered, this parable will appear a moſt wiſe and ſeaſonable admonition; and by neglecting the inſtruction it was deſigned to give them, the Jews deſervedly brought ruin on themſelves. The Evangeliſt ſays, that as they heard theſe things, namely, that ſalvation was come to Zaccheus's family, he added, and ſpake a parable; from whence we gather that he ſpake the parable in Zaccheus's houſe.

Ver. 12. A certain nobleman] A certain king's ſon, in order to be confirmed in his father's kingdom, went into a far country, to do homage unto a more powerful potentate, of whom he held it as a vaſſal. The alluſion here is to a cuſtom which prevailed greatly in our Lord's time among the princes of the eaſt: Before they ventured to aſcend the throne, they went to Rome, and ſolicited the emperor's permiſſion, who diſpoſed of all the tributary kingdoms as he thought fit. The meaning of this part of the parable is, that before Jeſus ſet up his kingdom, he was to die, and to aſcend into heaven. See on Matth. xxv. 14.

Ver. 13. And he called his ten ſervants] Before he departed, he called his ten houſhold ſlaves, Δȣλȣς εαυτȣ; and gave each of them a ſum of money, to be employed in trade till he ſhould return. By the ten houſhold ſlaves, we are to underſtand the Apoſtles and firſt preachers

14 But his citizens hated him, and ſent a meſſage after him, ſaying, We will not have this man to reign over us.

15 And it came to paſs, that when he was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded theſe ſervants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading.

16 Then came the firſt, ſaying, Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds.

17 And he ſaid unto him, Well, thou good ſervant: becauſe thou haſt been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities.

18 And the ſecond came, ſaying, Lord, thy pound hath gained five pounds.

19 And he ſaid likewiſe to him, Be thou alſo over five cities.

20 And another came, ſaying, Lord, behold, here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a napkin:

21 For I feared thee, becauſe thou art an auſtere man: thou takeſt up that thou layedſt not down, and reapeſt that thou didſt not ſow.

22 And he ſaith unto him, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked ſervant. Thou kneweſt that I was an auſtere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not ſow:

23 Wherefore then gaveſt not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with uſury?

24 And he ſaid unto them that ſtood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds.

25 (And they ſaid unto him, Lord, he hath ten pounds.)

26 For I ſay unto you, That unto every one which hath, ſhall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath ſhall be taken away from him.

27 But thoſe mine enemies, which would not that I ſhould reign over them, bring hither, and ſlay them before me.

Ver. 15. Gr. ſilver, and ſo ver. 23.—V. 17. Ch. xvi. 10.—V. 22. 2 Sam. i. 16. Matth. xii. 37.—V. 26. Matth. xiii. 12. xxv. 29. Mark iv. 25. Ch. viii. 18.

of the Goſpel; to whom Jeſus gave endowments, fitting them for their work, and from whom he expected a due improvement of thoſe endowments, in the propagation of the Goſpel. This was their particular duty in the erection of the kingdom of God, about which they were now ſo ſolicitous. Inſtead of occupy, Dr. Waterland, the MS. and Doddridge, read trade.

Ver. 14. But his citizens hated him] His natural ſubjects hated him without a cauſe, as appears from the meſſage or embaſſy which they ſent after him to the potentate, from whom he ſought, what in later times has been called inveſtiture. For, in that meſſage they alledged no crime againſt him, but only expreſſed their ill-will towards him by declaring, that they would not have him to reign over them. This is a fit repreſentation of the cauſeleſs oppoſition which the Jewiſh great men made to Jeſus. But the embaſſy had no effect; the prince received the kingdom, and returned with full authority, which he exerciſed in calling his ſervants to account, and in puniſhing his rebellious ſubjects. So the oppoſition which the Jews made to our Lord's ſpiritual kingdom proved ineffectual: Having all power in heaven and earth given unto him after his death, he will return to reckon with his Apoſtles, and miniſters, and rebellious ſubjects; nay, he has returned already, and puniſhed the Jews with a moſt exemplary puniſhment, for reſiſting his government. See ver. 15.

Ver. 16. Thy pound hath gained ten pounds] The modeſty of theſe ſervants is remarkable: They do not ſay, that they themſelves have gained the ten, or the five pounds, but Thy pound hath gained, &c. attributing their ſucceſs, not to themſelves, but to the gifts of his grace. It is obſervable, that in Matt. xxv. 20, &c. where the ſervants are repreſented as doubling the different ſums entruſted to each, the reward is ſpoken of as the ſame: but here, the ſums intruſted being the ſame, and the improvement deſcribed as different, there is a proportionable difference in the reward; which, as it is a beautiful circumſtance, was, no doubt, intended for our inſtruction. See ver. 20. 21.

Ver. 20, 21. Lord, behold, here is thy pound] We have in theſe verſes a proverbial deſcription of an unjuſt rigorous character. The ſlothful ſervant, by applying it to his lord, aggravated his crime not a little: he imprudently told him, that knowing his ſevere and griping diſpoſition, he thought it prudent not to riſk his money in trade, for fear he ſhould have loſt it: that he had hid it in a napkin, in order to deliver it to him ſafe at his return; and that this was the true reaſon why he had not increaſed his talent, as the others had done theirs. Thus ſlothful miniſters of religion, and pretended ſervants of Chriſt, will be ever ready to throw the blame of their unfaithfulneſs on God himſelf. See on Matth. xxv. 24. "This negligent and ſlothful ſervant, ſays Queſnelle, ought to make all paſtors and clergymen tremble; who imagine that they lead an innocent life, if they do but avoid the groſſer ſins, and only lead an eaſy and quiet life, in idleneſs and indolence: In a prieſt it is a great evil, not to do any good; not to uſe the gifts of God, is to abuſe them: he loſes them, who does not make them ſerviceable to the church. Reſt is a crime in one who is called to a laborious life; and we cannot live to ourſelves alone, when we belong to the church of Chriſt." See Bp. Burnet's Paſtoral Care.

Ver. 22, 23. Thou kneweſt that I was an auſtere man] Didſt thou know, &c.? "Thou haſt been ſlothful in the higheſt degree;—for, to argue with thee upon thy own baſe principles,—if thou really hadſt believed me to be the rigorous perſon thou ſayeſt I am, thou wouldſt certainly have been at the pains to lend out my money;—a method of improving thy talent which would have occaſioned thee no trouble at all. Thy excuſe therefore is a mere pretence." In like manner, all the excuſes which wicked miniſters offer in their own behalf, will ſtand them in no ſtead at the bar of God; whether they be drawn from the character which they affix to God, or from his decrees, or from their own inability, or from the difficulty of his ſervice, or from any other conſideration whatſoever.

Ver. 25. Lord, he hath ten pounds] So far as this ſeems to expreſs any thing of envy in the fellow-ſervants, it is not to be regarded as a ſignificant circumſtance, but only as an incidental one, to intimate to us, that his lord gave to the diligent ſervant what he had gained, for himſelf.

Ver. 26. I ſay unto you] I aſſure you; as much as to ſay, "You may take it on my authority."

Ver. 27. But thoſe mine enemies] "Thoſe who were guilty of rebellion againſt me, by doing all in their power to hinder my obtaining the kingdom, bring hither, and put them to death this inſtant." Κατασφάξατε, is literally, ſlay them with the ſword; and it properly expreſſes the dreadful ſlaughter of the impenitent Jews, by the ſword of each other, and of the Romans. That does not ſeem however, the only deſign of the paſſage; for it plainly relates to the far more terrible execution which ſhall be done on all impenitent ſinners in the great day, when the faithful ſervants of Chriſt ſhall be rewarded.

Thus Jeſus taught his diſciples, that though they might imagine his kingdom was ſpeedily to be erected, and that they were ſoon to partake of its joys; yet he was to go away, or die, before he obtained it; and that they were to perform a long courſe of laborious ſervices before they received their reward. That, having obtained the kingdom at his reſurrection, he would return, and reckon with his ſervants; to whom he had given ability and opportunity for his work, and would treat them according to the fidelity they ſhewed in the truſt committed unto them. Particularly, that he would execute vengeance on thoſe, who, for his converſing familiarly with ſinners, or for the difficulty or diſagreeableneſs of his laws, or any other cauſe whatever, had refuſed to let him reign over them, or hindered the erection of his kingdom among others. This Jeſus did, in ſome meaſure, when he deſtroyed the Jewiſh nation by the Roman armies; and ſtill continues to do, by the extraordinary judgments with which he ſometimes viſits mankind: but he will do it more eminently at the end of the world, when he ſhall come with millions of angels, finally to reward his faithful ſervants, and to puniſh his enemies. The kingdom of Chriſt, ſpoken of in this parable, is his mediatorial kingdom; in which he rules men by his word and ſpirit, and exerciſes the higheſt acts of kingly power; calls all his ſubjects without diſtinction to his tribunal, judges them, and rewards or puniſhes them according as he knows they deſerve. They who affix a more general meaning to the parable, ſuppoſe that the character and end of three ſorts of perſons are deſcribed in it. 1. The character of thoſe who profeſs themſelves the ſervants of Chriſt, and who act in a manner ſuitable to their profeſſion. 2. The character of thoſe who take upon them the title, but do not act up to it. 3. The character of thoſe, who, though they be Chriſt's natural ſubjects, neither profeſs themſelves

28 And when he had thus ſpoken, he went before, aſcending up to Jeruſalem.

29 And it came to paſs when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount called the mount of Olives, he ſent two of his diſciples, 30 Saying, Go ye into the village over againſt you; in the which at your entering ye ſhall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man ſat: looſe him, and bring him hither.

31 And if any man aſk you, Why do ye looſe him? thus ſhall ye ſay unto him, Becauſe the Lord hath need of him.

32 And they that were ſent, went their way, and found even as he had ſaid unto them.

33 And as they were looſing the colt, the owners thereof ſaid unto them, Why looſe ye the colt?

34 And they ſaid, The Lord hath need of him.

35 And they brought him to Jeſus: and they caſt their garments upon the colt, and they ſet Jeſus thereon.

36 And as he went, they ſpread their clothes in the way.

37 And when he was come nigh, even now at the deſcent of the mount of Olives, the whole multitude of the diſciples began to rejoice, and praiſe God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works that they had ſeen;

38 Saying, Bleſſed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord: Peace in heaven, and glory in the higheſt!

39 And ſome of the Phariſees from among the multitude, ſaid unto him, Maſter, rebuke thy diſciples.

40 And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, I tell you, that if theſe ſhould hold their peace, the ſtones would immediately cry out.

41 And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it,

42 Saying, If thou hadſt known, even thou, at leaſt in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes.

43 For the days ſhall come upon thee, that thine enemies ſhall caſt a trench about thee, and compaſs thee round, and keep thee in on every ſide, ſelves his ſervants, nor yield him obedience; but endeavour to ſhake off his yoke, and oppoſe him with all their might. The firſt ſort are the true diſciples of Chriſt. The ſecond ſort are hypocrites. The third are the openly profane. The judgement which the ſervants in the parable met with from their lord, repreſents the judgement and end of the different ſorts of chriſtians juſt now mentioned: True diſciples ſhall be munificently rewarded with the honours and pleaſures of immortality; hypocrites ſhall be ſpoiled of all the advantages on which they relied, and ſtripped of thoſe falſe virtues for which they valued themſelves; ſo that, being ſhewed to all the world, in their proper colours, their pride ſhall be utterly mortified, and they themſelves loaded with eternal infamy. Laſtly, the detection and puniſhment of hypocrites ſhall add to the honours of the truly virtuous, whoſe merit ſhall thus ſhine more conſpicuouſly: for, as the houſes and lands which our Lord promiſed to thoſe who followed him in the regeneration, Mark x. 30. ſignify not the things themſelves, but the ſatisfaction ariſing from them; ſo the pound in the parable, given to him that had the ten pounds, ſignifies, that virtuous perſons in heaven ſhall have ſatisfactions as great as thoſe which hypocrites enjoy in their advantages, and ſuppoſed virtues, but upon a much more ſolid foundation; namely, the conſciouſneſs of real virtues, and the continual increaſe of grace. Thus ſhall the men who poſſeſs true goodneſs be rewarded; having in their own eyes always appeared as nothing, they ſhall be raiſed, by the approbation of God, to a becoming ſenſe of the excellent qualities with which they are adorned; and having been ſorely diſtreſſed with the motions of ſin, while they continually ſtruggled againſt them, they ſhall now be made more than conquerors, and have infinite ſatisfaction in the victory. And as for the open enemies of Jeſus, they ſhall be puniſhed with exemplary puniſhment, ſevere in proportion to the degrees of their guilt. See Macknight, and my 17th ſermon on the parables.

44 And ſhall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they ſhall not leave in thee one ſtone upon another: becauſe thou kneweſt not the time of thy viſitation.

Ver. 28. When he had thus ſpoken, he went before] He went forward. MS. Having finiſhed the parable, our Lord left the houſe of Zaccheus, and proceeded onward to Jeruſalem, ſhewing by his alacrity in the journey how willing he was to undergo thoſe heavy ſufferings, which he knew were to befal him in Jeruſalem. See on Mark x. 32.

Ver. 33. The owners thereof ſaid] Perhaps, had not the owners of the beaſts happened to be by, and had not St. Luke expreſly mentioned them, The malice of ancient or modern infidels would have found ſome occaſion for raiſing an outcry on the ambiguity of the words, The Lord hath need of him. Its being a weak and contemptible cavil would not have prevented their uſe of it, as we learn from abundant experience. If the people here ſpoken of were not, as they poſſibly might be, the acquaintances of Chriſt, they might eaſily meet with him at Jeruſalem, if they had a mind to enquire after the aſs and colt. Or, they might be left, agreeably to the owners direction, at ſome houſe in the city, or be ſent back by ſome of our Lord's attendants, though the Evangeliſts do not deſcend to ſuch minute particulars. See Doddridge.

Ver. 40. The ſtones would immediately cry out] This may ſignify either that God would by miracle raiſe up others to glorify his name, rather than ſilence ſhould be kept on this occaſion,—as Dr. Clarke explains it; or, that it was a thing altogether impoſſible to make the multitude hold their peace. See on Matth. iii. 9.

Ver. 42. If thou hadſt known] O that thou hadſt known. See on ch. xii. 50. It is certain, as we have before obſerved, that the particle ει is ſometimes uſed to expreſs an ardent wiſh; and the connection here will very well bear it. But if our tranſlation be retained, it muſt be acknowledged that the broken manner of ſpeaking is very emphatical: Our Lord will then ſeem to pauſe, in a ſilent reflection on the happy conſequences which would have attended their obedient regard to his invitations and addreſſes. See on ver. 44.

Ver. 43. Shall caſt a trench about thee] Jeſus here foretold particularly the principal circumſtances of the ſiege of Jeruſalem, and to his prophecy the event correſponded moſt exactly; for when Titus attacked the city, the Jews defended themſelves ſo obſtinately, that he found there was no way to gain his purpoſe, but to encompaſs the city with a fence and a mound. By this means he kept the beſieged in on every ſide, cut off from them all hope of ſafety by flight, and conſumed them by famine. The work which he undertook was indeed a matter of extreme difficulty; for the wall meaſured thirty-nine furlongs, or almoſt five miles, and the towers were thirteen in number, every one of them ten furlongs in compaſs; nevertheleſs, the whole was finiſhed in three days; for, to uſe the expreſſion of Joſephus, "the ſoldiers in performing this work were animated by a divine impulſe." See his Jewiſh War, book vi. chap. 13. and for the other circumſtances, the notes on Matth. xxiv.

Ver. 44. Becauſe thou kneweſt not the time, &c.] Our Lord here aſſigns the cauſe of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and her children; it was becauſe that when God viſited them by his Son,—the ſeed of Abraham and David,—the Meſſiah,—they did not know it, but rejected and crucified him. The deſtruction of the city, and of her inhabitants, clearly foreſeen by our Lord in all its circumſtances, was a ſcene ſo affecting, that it moved his tender ſoul, and made him weep. It ſeems, the miſeries of his bittereſt enemies had more influence to afflict and melt his ſoul, than the admiration, the acclamations, and hoſannas of his friends, to elate him with joy. His weeping was a wonderful inſtance of his humanity, and is ſo far from leſſening the dignity of his character, that it exalts it infinitely. Were it worth while, the reader might be put in mind that the hiſtorians of Greece and Rome, to aggrandize their heroes, have been at pains to relate occurrences at which they ſhed tears;—but this would be to fall egregiouſly below the greatneſs of the ſubject. Is it poſſible to have the leaſt reliſh for goodneſs, and not be raviſhed with the man, who has ſuch a quick feeling of the miſeries of others, as to weep for their misfortunes in the height of his own proſperity?—eſpecially if the objects moving his compaſſion are enemies, and his courage is ſuch, as to enable him to look without perturbation on the greateſt diſaſters ready to fall on himſelf? See Matth. xx. 18, 19. Let wondering mortals then behold in this an example of compaſſion and generoſity, infinitely ſuperior to any thing that the heathen world can furniſh;—an example highly worthy of their admiration and imitation.

Ver. 48. All the people were very attentive to hear him] They hung as it were on his lips while he ſpake, is the literal import of the original.

REFLECTIONS ON THE STORY OF ZACCHEUS.

In this pleaſing narrative Zaccheus the publican ſets an example particularly of the two great and important Chriſtian duties, namely Reſtitution, and Alms-giving; which calls upon us to conſider how far we are obliged to follow it.

As to the firſt we may obſerve, that Zaccheus, by a ſupererogating juſtice, made what was preſcribed by the Levitical law in one particular caſe, (Exod. xxii. 1.) the general rule of his practice.—We need not however propoſe the ample reparation he made, as a ſtandard which we are ſtrictly bound to come up to. It will be ſufficient to ſhew what we are indiſpenſably obliged to, and to inſiſt barely on the uſual and ſingle reſtitution, only that when we have wronged any perſon, we return him ſtrictly as much as we have wronged him of, and fully repair the damage he has ſuſtained: We may only except the caſe of an abſolute incapacity, which is indeed an univerſal diſpenſation; but, with this one reſerve, in all other caſes, we are indiſpenſably obliged to make an equivalent reparation for the injuries we have done.

Now, as God is the author, ſo he is the guardian of human ſociety, and has taken the properties of men under his protection. To ſecure theſe, and preſerve the world in peaceable order, he fences the poſſeſſions of every man with a ſtrict command to the reſt, not to covet or deſire them. When that fundamental law is violated, and inordinate deſires break looſe, then, to prevent our putting them in execution, other commands are oppoſed, to ſecure property in its ſeveral branches. When we tranſgreſs theſe commandments too, and actually invade the rights of our neighbour, then the ſin is compleated, and woeful is our condition. Yet God, whoſe mercy is over all his works, as a ſupplement to the former laws, has added this now under conſideration,—viz. That after we have wickedly coveted, after we have unjuſtly taken the goods of our neighbour, we ſhould reſtore them to him again, and re-eſtabliſh the order we had violated. There is no room for farther precepts on this head: If we continue to tranſgreſs this laſt, this merciful commandment, no ſhadow of excuſe remains; we ſhall die in our ſins. The Almighty Legiſlator will proceed to judgement, and ſad will be his ſentence againſt the tranſgreſſors; ſee 1 Theſſ. iv. 1, 2, 6. where St. Paul expreſly declares, that the Lord is the avenger of all ſuch, as defraud or oppreſs their brother in any matter.

But although no inſpired writer had thus forewarned us; yet the mere light of nature has ſufficiently revealed this truth to mankind. Who can deny, or doubt, that we are obliged to be juſt, that we are obliged not to do wrong? If we ought not wrongfully to take the goods of our neighbours, then certainly we ought not to keep them. The theft or fraud was a tranſient act, a ſin indeed—yet ſins will be forgiven upon repentance; but the deliberate keeping the unjuſt gain, is a permanent habit of injuſtice; and, as long as that laſts, we can have no reaſonable hopes of God's mercy; we render ourſelves incapable of it.

All ſins, as we obſerved, will be forgiven on repentance. But, without reſtitution, where that is poſſible, there can be no true repentance. An effectual repentance ever includes theſe two neceſſary parts;—a ſorrow for ſin, and a determined reſolution to forſake it; and both theſe neceſſarily imply reſtitution, as will appear when we conſider them ſeverally.

Sorrow for Sin, where it is ſincere, muſt beget earneſt wiſhes that we had not committed it. Lamenting the paſt folly with contrite pangs, we wiſh we had never done it. We would give the world to undo it, if that were poſſible. Now this is the immediate tendency of reſtitution; in ſome ſort it undoes the deed, and makes atonement to juſtice. He therefore who does not endeavour to make reſtitution, has no real contrition. For, if he is truly grieved that he has gotten another man's goods; why does he keep them? if he wiſhes he had not done ſo, why does he perſiſt in it? Theſe things are inconſiſtent, and deſtroy each other.

The ſecond material of repentance is a reſolution not to repeat the crime. As long as we wilfully detain what belongs to another, we repeat the crime, or what is equivalent, we continue and perſevere in it. Now, is it reaſonable to hope that God will forgive a ſin which we obſtinately perſiſt in? If we die without making reſtitution, do we not die in our ſin? And can we then have any hopes of mercy?—the holy ſcriptures aſſure us, we cannot.

In the warning given for the celebration of the Lord's ſupper, it is obſervable, our church has been particularly careful to remind all her members of this, among other conditions requiſite in a worthy communicant. "My duty (ſaith the miniſter) is to exhort you, &c.—that ye may come holy and clean to ſuch an heavenly feaſt.—The way and means thereto is, firſt, to examine your lives and converſations by the rule of God's commandments,—and if ye ſhall perceive your offences to be ſuch, as are not only againſt God, but alſo againſt your neighbours, then you ſhall reconcile yourſelves to them, being ready to make reſtitution and ſatisfaction according to the uttermoſt of your powers, for all injuries and wrongs done by you to any other:—for, otherwiſe the receiving of the holy communion doth nothing elſe but increaſe your damnation." And then follows a charge to all ſuch, that at their peril they come not to the holy table.

The ſame injunction is implied in thoſe words of our Lord, Matth. v. 23. If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there remember that thy brother hath aught againſt thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; firſt be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Without this, our oblations will be ineffectual, and our prayers rejected; our brother muſt firſt be reconciled by doing him juſtice; for juſtice muſt be ſatisfied, before there is room for charity. God will not accept the one for the other; and indeed it ſeems impious to think that he ſhould. In all other caſes, the ſatisfaction is made to the perſon wronged; how elſe indeed is it ſatisfaction? In the example of Zaccheus, you ſee, that notwithſtanding he gave half his ſubſtance to the poor, yet he was ready to make four-fold ſatisfaction for the damages he might have done. He was not liberal at the expence of others; he did not confound charity with reſtitution, his alms with his debts; but he diſcharged each obligation ſeparately: and therefore his example too is propoſed in the end of the communion ſervice, not only to excite our bounty towards the poor, but alſo to remind us of the indiſpenſable obligation to reſtitution, without which we cannot be worthy partakers of the Lord's ſupper.

We ſhall not be anſwerable for the injuſtice we ſuffer, but for that which we do; it concerns us much more not to cheat, than not to be cheated. This therefore ſhould be our principal care; here lies our greateſt danger, and all degrees of men are liable to them. Almoſt every ſtate in life has its peculiar temptations to fraud and oppreſſion; and to be aware of them is one neceſſary ſtep towards eſcaping them.

In all caſes where we have committed injury, reſtitution muſt be made, as far as poſſible, or there can be no remiſſion of ſin. This thought therefore ſhould be a perpetual check upon us, to reſtrain all acts of fraud or violence, becauſe it repreſents the unprofitableneſs of them, and takes away the force of temptation, which conſiſts only in the ſuppoſed advantage they may bring. All unjuſt gain is a bait, a ſpecious bait, covering a cruel hook; which, when ſwallowed, muſt be painfully diſgorged; or if retained, will drag us to ſure perdition. To this purpoſe may well be applied thoſe words in the book of Job, (xx. 15.) He hath ſwallowed down riches, and he ſhall vomit them up again.—A painful operation!—but there is no other remedy.

With reſpect to Alms-giving, the ſecond ſubject of our preſent reflection, the example of Zaccheus is highly inſtructive. The firſt thing to be remarked in it, is, that he ſet aſide a certain portion of his income for charitable uſes; and this every man ſhould do, who is in a condition to give alms. He who never thinks of giving alms, but when ſome preſſing occaſion calls upon him,—is in danger of loſing the heavenly reward in the worldly motives which ſolicit, and perhaps extort his contributions. A regard to the opinion of men, fear of cenſure, or deſire of applauſe, may have a great ſhare in ſuch unpremeditated accidental bounties. But when in religious privacy, with an heart raiſed in devotion, we have prepared our offering to the Lord, the future diſtribution of it upon proper occaſions will be purer, and more available to our ſalvation.

In this therefore we ought to follow the example of Zaccheus, and conſecrate ſome certain proportion of our gains, or annual income: But what that proportion is, is no where determined. We can only ſay in general, that all who are not poor themſelves, muſt give ſome part of their ſubſtance to the poor: the proportion is and muſt be left to their own determination.

If it be aſked, what other men have done? it may be replied, "Many have been known to give all that they had; others, as Zaccheus, have given half their goods; but the common proportion, whereof

CHAP. XX.

Chriſt voucheth his authority, by a queſtion concerning John's baptiſm. The parable of the vineyard. Of giving tribute to Cæſar. He convinceth the Sadducees who denied the reſurrection. How Chriſt is the ſon of David: he warneth his diſciples to beware of the ſcribes.

AND it came to paſs, that on one of thoſe days, as he taught the people in the temple, and preached the goſpel, the chief prieſts and the ſcribes came upon him, with the elders.

2 And ſpake unto him, ſaying, Tell us, By what authority doeſt thou theſe things? or who is he that gave thee this authority?

3 And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, I will alſo aſk you one thing; and anſwer me:

4 The baptiſm of John, was it from heaven, or of men?

5 And they reaſoned with themſelves, ſaying, If we ſhall ſay, From heaven; he will ſay, Why then believed ye him not?

6 But and if we ſay, Of men; all the people will ſtone us: for they be perſuaded that John was a prophet.

7 And they anſwered, that they could not tell whence it was.

8 And Jeſus ſaid unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do theſe things.

9 Then began he to ſpeak to the people this parable; A certain man planted a vineyard, and let it forth to huſbandmen, and went into a far country for a long time.

10 And at the ſeaſon, he ſent a ſervant to the huſbandmen, that they ſhould give him of the fruit of the vineyard: but the huſbandmen beat him, and ſent him away empty.

11 And again he ſent another ſervant: and they beat him alſo, and entreated him ſhamefully, and ſent him away empty.

12 And again he ſent a third: and they wounded him alſo, and caſt him out.

13 Then ſaid the lord of the vineyard, What ſhall I do? I will ſend my beloved ſon: it may be they will reverence him when they ſee him.

14 But when the huſbandmen ſaw him, they reaſoned among themſelves, ſaying, This is the heir: come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be our's.

15 So they caſt him out of the vineyard, and killed him. What therefore ſhall the lord of the vineyard do unto them?

16 He ſhall come and deſtroy theſe huſbandmen, and ſhall give the vineyard to others. And when they heard it, they ſaid, God forbid!

17 And he beheld them, and ſaid, What is this then that is written, The ſtone which the builders rejected, the ſame is become the head of the corner?

18 Whoſoever ſhall fall upon that ſtone, ſhall be broken; but on whomſoever it ſhall fall, it will grind him to powder.

19 And the chief prieſts and the ſcribes the ſame hour ſought to lay hands on him; and they feared the people: for they perceived that he had ſpoken this parable againſt them.

20 And they watched him, and ſent forth ſpies, which ſhould feign themſelves juſt men, that they might take hold of his words that ſo they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor.

21 And they aſked him, ſaying, Maſter, we know that thou ſayeſt and teacheſt rightly, neither accepteſt thou the perſon of any, but teacheſt the way of God truly:

22 Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæſar, or no?

23 But he perceived their craftineſs, and ſaid unto them, Why tempt ye me?

24 Shew me a penny. Whoſe image and ſuperſcription hath it? They anſwered and ſaid, Cæſar's.

whereof we have many inſtances in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, is the tenth part. The beſt rule, however, ſeems to be that laid down by the apoſtle, and of which we deſire to admoniſh every reader: he who ſoweth little, ſhall reap little, and he that ſoweth plenteouſly, ſhall reap plenteouſly. Let every man do according as he is diſpoſed in his heart; not grudgingly, or of neceſſity, for God loveth a chearful giver. And when ſuch a fund for charity is once ſettled, it will be very eaſy to make a right diſtribution of it.

Chap. XX. Ver. 3—8. And he anſwered] The great Sanhedrim ſeems to have been eſtabliſhed after the failure of prophecy, and concerning the members of this body the rabbies tell us there was a tradition, that they were bound to be ſkilled in the ſciences. So far is certain, that they extended their juriſdiction to the judging of doctrines and opinions, (See on Matth. xxi. 23.) as appears by their deputation to Jeſus, to know by what authority he did his works. We are not to ſuppoſe the anſwer of Chriſt to this deputation, to be a captious evaſion of the queſtion made by thoſe whoſe authority he did not acknowledge; on the contrary, it was a direct reply to an acknowledged inſtitution, (as Jeſus was obedient to all the inſtitutions of his country,) convincing them, that the queſtion needed not any preciſe anſwer, even on the principles of that juriſdiction. They ſent to him to know his authority: he aſked them, whether they had yet determined of John's? they acknowledged that they had not. "Then, replies Jeſus, I need not tell you my authority, ſince the ſanhedrim's not having determined of John's, ſhews ſuch a determination unneceſſary; or at leaſt, ſince both by John's account and mine he is repreſented as the forerunner of my miſſion, it is fit to begin with his pretenſions firſt." The addreſs and reaſon of this reply are truly divine. See Divine Legation, vol. 3. and Bell's Miſſions, &c.

Ver. 13. It may be they will] Numberleſs predictions in the Old and New Teſtament plainly ſhew, that God foreſaw Chriſt's death as a certain event: This therefore, like many others, is merely an ornamental circumſtance, which cannot, without abſurdity, be applied in the interpretation of the parable. Dr. Waterland, inſtead of it may be, reads certainly; though the original ἴσως ſeems by no means to countenance ſuch a tranſlation. The reader will refer to Matth. xxi. 33, &c. for the explanation of this parable.

Ver. 16. He ſhall come] He will come. Wat.

Ver. 20. Which ſhould feign themſelves juſt men] See the note on Matth. xxii. 16.

25 And he ſaid unto them, Render therefore unto Cæſar the things which be Cæſar's, and unto God the things which be God's.

26 And they could not take hold of his words before the people: and they marvelled at his anſwer, and held their peace.

27 Then came to him certain of the Sadducees (which deny that there is any reſurrection,) and they aſked him,

28 Saying, Maſter, Moſes wrote unto us, If any man's brother die, having a wife, and he die without children, that his brother ſhould take his wife, and raiſe up ſeed unto his brother.

29 There were therefore ſeven brethren: and the firſt took a wife, and died without children.

30 And the ſecond took her to wife, and he died childleſs.

31 And the third took her; and in like manner the ſeven alſo: and they left no children, and died.

32 Laſt of all the woman died alſo.

33 Therefore, in the reſurrection, whoſe wife of them is ſhe? for ſeven had her to wife.

34 And Jeſus anſwering ſaid unto them, The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage:

35 But they which ſhall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the reſurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage:

36 Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the reſurrection.

37 Now, that the dead are raiſed, even Moſes ſhewed at the buſh, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob.

38 For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him.

39 Then certain of the ſcribes anſwering, ſaid, Maſter, thou haſt well ſaid.

40 And after that, they durſt not aſk him any queſtion at all.

41 And he ſaid unto them, How ſay they that Chriſt is David's ſon?

42 And David himſelf ſaith in the book of Pſalms, The LORD ſaid unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, 43 Till I make thine enemies thy footſtool.

44 David therefore calleth him Lord; how is he then his ſon?

45 Then in the audience of all the people, he ſaid unto his diſciples,

46 Beware of the ſcribes, which deſire to walk in long robes, and love greetings in the markets, and the higheſt ſeats in the ſynagogues, and the chief rooms at feaſts;

47 Which devour widows houſes, and for a ſhew make long prayers: the ſame ſhall receive greater damnation.

Ver. 36. They are equal unto the angels] St. Matthew and St. Mark ſay only, that they are as the angels; and though St. Luke expreſſes it by a ſtronger word, ισαγγελοι, equal to the angels, yet all arguments drawn from hence, as proving an intire equality of glorified ſaints with angels in all reſpects, muſt be apparently weak and inconcluſive. It is indeed the glorious ſcheme of redeeming love, to incorporate angels and ſaints into one happy ſociety under Chriſt, as their common head. Epheſ. i. 10. But there are ſubordinations in united ſocieties; and if the fall of the apoſtate ſpirits occaſioned any thing like a vacancy in the celeſtial hierarchy, it would ſeem moſt probable that it might be filled up from heavenly ſpirits of an inferior order, who might be preferred to the rank loſt by their degenerate brethren, as a reward for their approved fidelity to God. From the laſt clauſe of this verſe it is plain, that our Lord is here ſpeaking of the reſurrection of the juſt, who are called God's children, on account of the inheritance beſtowed on them at the reſurrection, and particularly on account of their being dignified with immortality. See Rom. viii. 17, 29. Gal. iv. 7. 1 John iii. 2. and the "Eſſay on Divine Diſpenſations." p. 9.

Ver. 37. Moſes ſhewed at the buſh] Moſes ſhewed, where he ſpeaks of the Lord in the buſh being the God of Abraham, &c. Wat.

Ver. 38. For all live unto him] It is evident, that γαρ, for, muſt here have the force of an illative particle, and may be rendered therefore, or ſo that; for what it introduces is plainly the main propoſition to be proved, and not an argument for what immediately went before. In this connection the conſequence is apparently juſt: for, as all the faithful are the children of Abraham, and the divine promiſe of being a God to him and his ſeed is entailed upon them, it would prove their continued exiſtence and happineſs in a future ſtate, as much as Abraham's: and as the body as well as the ſoul makes an eſſential part of man, it will prove both his reſurrection and theirs, and intirely overthrow the whole Sadducean doctrine on this head. See Doddridge, and the note on Matth. xxii. 31. Some would read the clauſe, For all live who are his; whereby the argument is rendered more clear;—and which has of late been further ſtrengthened by obſerving, that Elohim, Exod. iii. 6. denotes the covenanter, from אלה alé, juravit. Under that character God ſtipulated firſt, that Abraham's ſeed ſhould inherit the land of Canaan; and ſecondly, that in him all nations ſhould be bleſſed. In this latter reſpect, he is not the God of the dead, but of them who muſt be virtually alive in him, ſince they are to live and to be bleſſed hereafter. See "Parry's Defence of the Bp. of London, &c." p. 74. and Peters on Job, p. 271, and 383.

Ver. 40. They durſt not aſk him] It is plain that this is meant of the Sadducees, and muſt be underſtood as limited to them, becauſe in Matth. xxii. 35. we read of a queſtion which one of the Phariſaic Scribes put to him.

Ver. 44. David therefore calleth him Lord, &c.] This implies both the exiſtence of David in a future ſtate, and the authority of the Meſſiah over that inviſible world, into which that prince was removed by death. Elſe, how great a monarch ſoever the Meſſiah might have been, he could not have been properly called David's Lord, any more than Julius Cæſar could have been called the Lord of Romulus, becauſe he reigned in Rome 700 years after his death, and vaſtly extended the bounds of that empire which Romulus founded. See Doddridge, Munſter, and on Matth. xxii. 42.

REFLECTIONS ON THE PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD AND HUSBANDMEN, Ver. 9—18.

When we read the parable before us, and conſider it as levelled at the Jews, we applaud the righteous judgement of God, in revenging ſo ſeverely upon them the quarrel of his covenant, and the blood of his ſon. But let us take heed to ourſelves, leſt we alſo fall, after the ſame example of unbelief.

We learn from this parable,—and what part of the bleſſed Scripture, nay, what part of univerſal nature doth not bear witneſs to the ſame delightful truth?—That our God is a God of love, of forbearance, and long-ſuffering kindneſs; like a father pitying his own children; like a benevolent maſter willing and wiſhing the welfare of all his ſervants. Had any tenants of ours uſed the meſſengers we ſent, as theſe huſbandmen uſed the meſſengers of our God, which of us ſhould not have been moved in ſuch a caſe? Which of us ſhould have proceeded to ſuch lengths of loving-kindneſs, as to ſend our only and beloved ſon, to reclaim and bring them to a better mind. Alas! a very ſmall indignity preſently ſwells us with angry reſentments,—poor, imperfect, ſinful mortals! and were our God like us, extreme to mark what is done amiſs, who of us could

CHAP. XXI.

Chriſt commendeth the poor widow: he foretelleth the deſtruction of the temple, and of the city of Jeruſalem: the ſigns alſo which ſhall be before the laſt day: he exhorteth them to be watchful.

AND he looked up, and ſaw the rich men caſting their gifts into the treaſury.

2 And he ſaw alſo a certain poor widow, caſting in thither two mites.

3 And he ſaid, Of a truth I ſay unto you, That this poor widow hath caſt in more than they all:

4 For all theſe have of their abundance caſt in unto the offerings of God: but ſhe of her penury hath caſt in all the living that ſhe had.

5 And as ſome ſpake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly ſtones, and gifts, he ſaid,

6 As for theſe things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which there ſhall not be left one ſtone upon another, that ſhall not be thrown down.

7 And they aſked him, ſaying, Maſter, but when ſhall theſe things be? and what ſign will there be when theſe things ſhall come to paſs?

8 And he ſaid, Take heed that ye be not deceived: for many ſhall come in my name, ſaying, I am Chriſt; and the time draweth near: go ye not therefore after them.

9 But when ye ſhall hear of wars, and commotions, be not terrified: for theſe things muſt firſt come to paſs; but the end is not by and by.

10 Then ſaid he unto them, Nation ſhall riſe againſt nation, and kingdom againſt kingdom:

11 And great earthquake ſhall be in divers places, and famines, and peſtilences; and fearful ſights, and great ſigns ſhall there be from heaven.

could ſtand one moment before him? But St. John tells us, that he is love; not merely loving, but perfect love itſelf: an unbiaſſed will to benevolence, and the happineſs of his creatures.

Nothing can magnify his love ſo much, (would to God we were ſo wiſe duly to conſider it!) as the ſending his only beloved ſon, in the likeneſs of our ſinful fleſh, to live and die afflicted and deſpiſed; we do not enough contemplate this aſtoniſhing inſtance of the divine philanthropy. We ſhould doubtleſs be very ſenſibly affected, were but any thing of the like nature with this parable to happen in our ſight,—even though a father ſhould ſend a ſon ſolely for his own intereſt; and yet we are but too inſenſible as to that which faith teacheth us, concerning the only Son of God, ſent into the world and humbled by his father, purely for our ſalvation. This ought to convince us, that our faith is very weak, and that our ſalvation is but little regarded by us: would we increaſe the one, and be happy in a greater anxiety for the other, we can fix our thoughts on nothing ſo likely to attain that end, as the great object of divine love, the Son ſent into the world, and humbled by his father for our ſalvation.

Which of our hearts feels not a juſt indignation againſt theſe wicked huſbandmen, who, after their lord had favoured them with ſo choice a vineyard, yet ungratefully refuſed him the fruits; and not only ſo, but abuſed and killed his ſervants, and adding iniquity to iniquity, at length roſe up againſt the ſon, and heir himſelf, ſlew him, and caſt him out of the vineyard?—Let us aſk our own hearts, could any of us have acted thus baſely, thus cruelly? or, to ſpeak of the facts which this parable preſents, could any of us have had a a hand in ſhedding the innocent blood of the prophets? or have joined the horrid cry at Jeruſalem, Crucify him! crucify him!—his blood be upon us, and our children!—I doubt not, but every reader ſhudders at the thought, and trembles even at the moſt diſtant apprehenſion of being an acceſſory in ſuch atrocious deeds.

Take we heed, therefore, that while we condemn the Jews, we condemn not ourſelves. The vineyard is now with us; the church of Chriſt is taken from the Jews, and planted among us; fruits are required of us; the only acceptable fruits of repentance, faith and living works. The Sacred Scriptures are as the meſſengers demanding them, and the miniſters unfolding theſe Scriptures, are as the ſervants of God ſent to receive the fruits in their ſeaſon. If we deſpiſe and reject thoſe Scriptures, diſregard their holy inſtructions, and the rule of faith and life which they propoſe; if we neglect to hear the miniſters of our God, the ſervants of the heavenly king, demanding fruit in their maſter's name, and throw contempt upon the ſon by evil lives, then like theſe huſbandmen, do we prove ungrateful to our Supreme Benefactor, and ſhall be eſteemed in his ſight, but as thoſe wicked tenants who with-held the fruits, abuſed the ſervants, and murdered the heir. See Heb. x. 29—31.

Awed by the dread of theſe things, may we unite our utmoſt efforts to bring forth unto God the fruits of his holy love; and in obedience to his commands, do honour to his ſon, and ſtrictly conform to all the holy and pure precepts of his divine goſpel. This is the only way to ſecure our ſouls from that eternal deſtruction, which will certainly fall on the ungrateful and obſtinate ſinner, as was figured out by the deſtruction of the Jews, and this is the only way, as to ſecure our perſonal happineſs, ſo alſo to ſecure the happineſs of the ſtate, and to diſcharge our duty, not only to ourſelves, but to our country, on which, inevitable ruin muſt indiſputably fall, if the ſervants of the Lord of heaven, his meſſengers, and his word, be reviled, deſpiſed, and ſcorned; if his ſon himſelf be mocked, caſt-out and crucified afreſh.

And all deadly ſins are ſo many murders of Jeſus Chriſt: it ſeems as if ſinners had conſpired to kill him by innumerable deaths; the Jews killed him only while he was mortal, wicked Chriſtians crucify him afreſh, now that he is become immortal and all-glorious. Wicked Chriſtians kill and caſt him out of the vineyard, when they caſt him out of their hearts, or deny him an entrance into them. How many hearts are guilty of this murder in the ſight of God! How many which are at leaſt a priſon where Jeſus Chriſt is detained a captive, and if ſo great deſtruction overwhelmed the Jewiſh ſtate and nation for that one crime, what may we imagine will overwhelm thoſe perſons, and that place, who live in a continual omiſſion of their Saviour, by living in continual ſin! May the gracious Father of Mercy, give us all ſuch a due ſenſe of this important truth, and may we, who profeſs his faith and love, increaſe in our zeal towards him, as we find the preſumption of ſinners increaſe! May we, by their negligence, be ſtirred up to more watchfulneſs; by their contempt of the things of God, be more filled with thankfulneſs with regard to them, and by their reviling, be animated to more fervent prayers, that ere it be too late, they may know and purſue the things, which belong to their everlaſting peace!

Chap. XXI. Ver. 4. For all theſe] See the notes on Mark xii. 41, &c. Both the poor and rich may learn ſomething from this paſſage of the Goſpel; the poor, who ſeem to have the means of doing charitable offices in a great meaſure denied them, are encouraged by it to do what they can, becauſe, although it may be little, God, who looks into the heart, values it not according to what it is in itſelf, but according to the diſpoſition with which it is given. On the other hand, it ſhews the rich that it is not enough that they exceed the poor in the quantity of their charity; a little given, where a little is left behind, often appeareth in the eye of God a much nobler offering, and diſcovers a far greater ſtrength of good diſpoſitions, than ſums vaſtly larger beſtowed out of a plentiful abundance. See the Reflections at the end of Mark xii. The MS. reads the laſt clauſe of the verſe, But ſhe, out of what ſhe wants for herſelf hath caſt in all ſhe had to live upon.

Ver. 11. Fearful ſights, &c.] Joſephus, in his relation of the ſigns and prodigies which preceded the taking of Jeruſalem, mentions, that a ſtar hung over the city like a ſword, and a comet continued for a whole year; that the people being aſſembled to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread, at the ninth hour of the night, there ſhone ſo great a light about the altar and the temple, that it ſeemed to be bright day, and this continued for half an hour; that the eaſtern gate of the temple, which was of ſolid braſs, and was ſcarcely to be ſhut by twenty men, was ſeen, at the ſixth hour of the night, to open of its own accord, though faſtened by ſtrong bars and bolts, and could hardly be ſhut again; that, before the ſetting of the ſun, there were ſeen all over the country chariots and armies fighting in the clouds; and that at the feaſt of Pentecoſt, the prieſts perceived firſt a motion and noiſe, and then heard the voice as of a multitude ſaying, 12 But before all theſe they ſhall lay their hands on you, and perſecute you, delivering you up to the ſynagogues, and into priſons, being brought before kings and rulers for my name's ſake.

13 And it ſhall turn to you for a teſtimony.

14 Settle it therefore in your hearts, not to meditate before what ye ſhall anſwer:

15 For I will give you a mouth and wiſdom, which all your adverſaries ſhall not be able to gainſay, nor reſiſt.

16 And ye ſhall be betrayed both by parents, and brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends; and ſome of you ſhall they cauſe to be put to death.

17 And ye ſhall be hated of all men for my name's ſake.

18 But there ſhall not an hair of your head periſh.

19 In your patience poſſeſs ye your ſouls.

20 And when ye ſhall ſee Jeruſalem compaſſed with armies, then know that the deſolation thereof is nigh.

21 Then let them which are in Judea, flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midſt of it, depart out; and let not them that are in the countries, enter thereinto.

22 For theſe be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled.

23 But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give ſuck in thoſe days! for there ſhall be great diſtreſs in the land, and wrath upon this people.

24 And they ſhall fall by the edge of the ſword, and ſhall be led away captive into all nations: and Jeruſalem ſhall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.

ſaying, "Let us depart hence." It may add ſome weight to this relation of Joſephus, that Tacitus the Roman confirms every one of theſe particulars in his hiſtory. If Chriſt had not expreſly foretold this, many who give little heed to portents, and who know that hiſtorians have been too credulous in that point, would have ſuſpected that Joſephus exaggerated, and that Tacitus was miſinformed. But as the teſtimonies of Joſephus and Tacitus confirm the predictions of Chriſt, ſo the predictions of Chriſt confirm the wonders recorded by thoſe hiſtorians. Yet, even allowing all that incredulity can urge,—that in the great calamities of war, and famine, and peſtilence, the people always grow ſuperſtitious,—that they ſee nothing but prodigies and portents;—that ſome of theſe ſeem to be formed in imitation of the Greek and Roman hiſtorians; that armies fighting in the clouds are nothing more than meteors,—ſuch as the aurora borealis, or northern lights. In ſhort, allowing that ſome of theſe prodigies were feigned, and others were exaggerated, yet the prediction of them is not the leſs divine on that account. Whether they were ſupernatural, or fictions only of diſordered imagination; yet they were believed as realities, had all the effects of realities, and were equally worthy to be made the objects of prophecy. Fearful ſights and great ſigns from heaven they certainly were, as much as if they had been created on purpoſe to aſtoniſh the earth. We ſhould obſerve concerning this prophecy, which is expreſſed in terms ſo very plain and circumſtantial,—is recorded, that Matthew and Mark were inconteſtably dead before the event, as Luke alſo probably might be; and as for John, the only Evangeliſt who ſurvived it, it is remarkable that he mentions nothing of it, leſt any ſhould ſay that the prophecy was forged after the event happened. See Jortin's Remarks on Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, vol. 1. Bp. Newton on the Prophecies, vol. 2. Weſt on the Reſurrection, p. 393. and for a full explanation of the particulars of this chapter, the notes on Matth. xxiv.

Ver. 13. It ſhall turn, &c.] See the note on Matth. x. 18.

Ver. 15. Which all your adverſaries ſhall not, &c.] "I will ſuggeſt to you ſuch ſentiments, and enable you to deliver them with ſuch eloquence, that your defences ſhall be unanſwerable; and your adverſaries ſhall be ſtruck with them, eſpecially when they find by your manner that you have ſpoken them without premeditation." Of the completion of this promiſe we have evident examples in the defences made by the proto-martyr St. Stephen, and by St. Paul, eſpecially before king Agrippa, and the Roman governors. But there is no need to inſiſt upon particulars; the prevalency of the Goſpel, whereever it reached, demonſtrates beyond all doubt, that the defences made by the preachers thereof are unanſwerable. See on Matth. x. 19, 20.

Ver. 17. And ye ſhall be hated of all men] See on Matth. x. 22.—That not only the Apoſtles, but all the primitive Chriſtians were in general more hated and perſecuted than any other religious ſect, is moſt notorious to all who are acquainted with eccleſiaſtical hiſtory; a fact which might ſeem unaccountable, when we conſider how inoffenſive and benevolent their temper and conduct were, and how friendly an aſpect their tenets had on the ſecurity of any government under which they lived. The true reaſon of this oppoſition was, that while the different pagan religions, like the confederate demons honoured by them, ſociably agreed with each other, and were linked together by the principle of intercommunity, the Goſpel taught Chriſtians not only, like the Jews, to bear their teſtimony to the falſity of them, but alſo with the moſt fervent zeal to urge the renunciation of them as a point of abſolute neceſſity, requiring all men, on the moſt tremendous penalties, to embrace the Goſpel, to believe in Chriſt, and in all things to ſubmit themſelves to his authority; a demand which bore ſo hard, eſpecially on the pride and licentiouſneſs of the princes, and the ſecular intereſts of their prieſts, that there is no wonder it brought upon them the bloody ſtorms which followed, and occaſioned Chriſtians to be branded with the epithets of unſocial and incommunicable, and to be univerſally miſrepreſented by the heathens as having an hatred and averſion to all mankind. And as they preached that the law of Moſes was abrogated, this enraged the Jews alſo, who united with the heathens in their hatred of the Chriſtians, and ſtimulated them greatly to the perſecution of them. See Warburton's Div. Leg. vol. ii. 47.

Ver. 18. There ſhall not an hair of your head periſh] A proverbial expreſſion, denoting an abſolute ſafety. Our Lord had foretold but juſt before, ver. 16. that ſeveral of them ſhould be put to death; he muſt therefore here intend to aſſure them, that when they came on the whole to balance their accounts, they ſhould find they had not been looſers in any the leaſt inſtance; but that whatever damage they had ſuſtained, it ſhould be amply made up, and they at length placed in a ſtate of intire ſecurity. See 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 2 Sam. xiv. 11. 1 Kings i. 52. and Acts xxvii. 34.

Ver. 19. In your patience poſſeſs ye your ſouls] "Keep the government of your own ſpirits in theſe aweful ſcenes, which will bear down ſo many others, and you will ſecure the moſt valuable ſelf-enjoyment, as well as be able moſt prudently to guard againſt the dangers which will ſurround you." See Wright on Self-poſſeſſion, p. 4. and the Reflections at the end of this chapter.

Ver. 22. For theſe be the days of vengeance] "Theſe are the days of vengeance, wherein the calamities foretold by Moſes, Joel, Daniel, and other prophets, as well as thoſe predicted by our Saviour, ſhall meet in one common center, and be fulfilled with aggravated wrath on this nation." Theſe are the days of vengeance too in another ſenſe; as if God's vengeance had certain periods and revolutions, and the ſame days were fatal to the Jews, and deſtined to their deſtruction. For it is very memorable, and matter of juſt admiration, according to Joſephus, that the temple was burned by the Romans in the ſame month, and on the ſame day of the month, as it was before by the Babylonians. See Newton on the Prophecies, vol. 2. and Jackſon's Eternal Truth of the Scriptures, b. i. part 2. ſect. 3.

Ver. 24. And they ſhall fall by the edge of the ſword] There are three particulars denounced in this verſe, and all of them were remarkably fulfilled. I. That they ſhould fall by the edge of the ſword; and the number of thoſe who ſo fell was indeed very great. Of thoſe who periſhed during the whole ſiege, there were 1,100,000; many were likewiſe ſlain at other times, and in other places, of every age, ſex, and condition, the number of whom, according to Joſephus, amounts to above 1,357,666, which would appear almoſt incredible, if their own hiſtorian had not ſo particularly enumerated them. See on Matth. xxiv. 28. II. That they ſhould be led away captive into all nations. Now conſidering the number of the ſlain, the number of the captives was very great; generally eſtimated, in the whole war, to 97,000. The tall and handſomeſt young men Titus reſerved for his triumph: of the reſt, thoſe above ſeventeen years of age were ſent to the works in Egypt, but moſt of them were diſtributed through 26 Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after thoſe things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven ſhall be ſhaken.

27 And then ſhall they ſee the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory.

Ver. 25. Matth. xxiv. 29. Mark xiii. 24. 2 Pet. iii. 10, 12.—V. 26. Matth. xxiv. 29.—V. 27. Rev. i. 7. xiv. 14.

the Roman provinces, to be deſtroyed in their theatres by the ſword, or by wild beaſts. Thoſe under ſeventeen were ſold for ſlaves: Of theſe captives, many underwent a hard fate; eleven thouſand of them periſhed for want. Titus exhibited all ſorts of ſhews and ſpectacles at Cæſarea, and many of the captives were there deſtroyed, ſome being expoſed to the wild beaſts, and others compelled to fight in troops againſt one another. At Cæſarea too, in honour of his brother's birth-day, 2500 Jews were ſlain; and a great number likewiſe at Berytus, in honour of his father's; the like was done in other cities of Syria. Thoſe whom he reſerved for his triumph were Simon and John, the generals of the captives, and ſeven hundred others of remarkable ſtature and beauty. Thus were the captive Jews miſerably tormented, and diſtributed over the Roman provinces; and are they not ſtill diſtreſſed and deſpiſed over the face of the whole earth?—III. Our Lord foretels that Jeruſalem ſhall be trodden down of the Gentiles, &c. And the accompliſhment of this part of the prophecy, as indeed of every article of it, is wonderful: for after the Jews were almoſt utterly deſtroyed by death and captivity, Veſpaſian commanded the whole land of Judea to be ſold. "At that time, ſays Joſephus, (Bell. lib. vii. ch. 26.) Cæſar wrote to Baſſus, and to Liberius Maximus, the procurator, to ſell the whole land of the Jews; for he did not build any city there, but appropriated their country to himſelf, leaving there only eight hundred ſoldiers, and giving them a place to dwell in called Emmaus, thirty ſtadia from Jeruſalem: and he impoſed a tribute upon all the Jews whereſoever they lived, commanding every one of them to bring two drachms into the capitol, according as in former times they were wont to pay unto the temple of Jeruſalem. And this was the ſtate of the Jews at this time." Thus was Jeruſalem in particular, with its territory, poſſeſſed by the Gentiles, becoming Veſpaſian's property, who ſold it to ſuch Gentiles as choſe to ſettle there. That Jeruſalem continued in this deſolate ſtate we learn from Dio; for he tells us, that the emperor Adrian rebuilt it, ſent a colony there to inhabit it, and called it Ælia; but he altered its ſituation, leaving out Zion and Bezetha, and enlarging it ſo, as to comprehend Calvary, where our Lord was crucified. Moreover, Euſebius informs us, that Adrian made a law, that no Jew ſhould come into the region round Jeruſalem, (Hiſt. xxi. 6.) So that the Jews being baniſhed, ſuch a number of aliens came into Jeruſalem, that it became a city and colony of the Romans. In later times, when Julian apoſtatiſed to heatheniſm, being ſenſible that the evident accompliſhment of our Lord's prophecies concerning the Jewiſh nation made a ſtrong impreſſion upon the Gentiles, and was a principal means of their converſion, he reſolved to deprive Chriſtianity of this ſupport, by bringing the Jews to occupy their own land, and by allowing them the exerciſe of their religion, and a form of civil government. For this purpoſe he reſolved to rebuild Jeruſalem, to people it with Jews, and to rear up the temple on its ancient foundations, becauſe there only he knew they would offer prayers and ſacrifices. In the proſecution of this deſign, he wrote to the community of the Jews a letter, which is ſtill extant among his other works, inviting them to return to their native country; and, for their encouragement, he ſays to them, among other things, "The holy city Jeruſalem, which of many years ye have deſired to ſee inhabited, I will rebuild by mine own labour, and will inhabit it." And now the emperor having made great preparations, began the execution of his ſcheme with rebuilding the temple; but his workmen were ſoon obliged to deſiſt by an immediate and evident interpoſition of God. Take an account of this matter in the words of Ammianus Marcellinus, an heathen hiſtorian, and therefore an author of unſuſpected credit, who ſays, (lib. 23.) "He reſolved to build, at an immenſe expence, a certain lofty temple at Jeruſalem; and gave it in charge to Alypius of Antioch, who had formerly governed in Britain, to haſten the work. When therefore Alypius, with great earneſtneſs, applied himſelf to the execution of this buſineſs, and the governor of the province aſſiſted him in it, terrible balls of fire burſting forth near the foundations, with frequent exploſions, and divers times burning the workmen, rendered the place inacceſſible; and thus the fire continually driving them away, the work ceaſed." This fact is atteſted likewiſe by Zemuth David, a Jew, who honeſtly confeſſes that Julian was hindered by God in this attempt. It is alſo atteſted by Nazianzen and Chryſoſtom among the Greeks, by Ambroſe and Ruffin among the Latins, who lived at the very time when the thing happened; by Theodoret and Sozomen, of the orthodox perſuaſion; by Philoſtorgius, an Arian, in the extracts of his hiſtory made by Photicis, lib. vii. numb. 9. and by Socrates, a favourer of the Novatians, who wrote his hiſtory within the ſpace of fifty years after the thing happened, and whilſt the eye-witneſſes thereof were yet alive. I ſhall only relate the teſtimonies of Sozomen and Chryſoſtom. The former, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, lib. v. c. 22. ſays, "This wonder is believed, and freely ſpoken of by all; nor is it denied by any: or if it ſhould ſeem incredible to any, let them believe thoſe who have heard it from the mouths of the eye-witneſſes, who are yet alive: Let them likewiſe believe the Jews and the Gentiles, who have left the work unfiniſhed; or, to ſpeak more properly, who have not been able to begin it." Chryſoſtom, adverſ. Judæos, ſpeaking of the ſame ſubject, ſays, "And now, if you go to Jeruſalem, you will ſee the foundations lying ſtill bare; and if you inquire the cauſe of this [namely in Jeruſalem, the ſcene of the miracle] you will hear no other than that which I have mentioned; and of this all we Chriſtians are witneſſes, the thing being done not long ſince, and in our own time." Orat. 2. Thus while Jews and heathens, under the direction of a Roman emperor, united their whole force to baffle our Lord's prediction, they did but ſtill more conſpicuouſly accompliſh his ſaying, That Jeruſalem ſhould be trodden of the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles ſhould be fulfilled. How exactly this paſſage of the prophecy has been fulfilled, we learn alſo from Benjamin of Tudela, a celebrated Spaniſh Jew of the twelfth century, who travelled into all parts to viſit thoſe of his own nation, and to learn an exact ſtate of their affairs. In his Itinerary he tells us, that in Jeruſalem he found only two hundred Jews. Sandys ſays, that the Holy Land "is for the moſt part inhabited now by Moors and Arabians, thoſe poſſeſſing the vallies, and theſe the mountains. Turks there be few; but many Greeks, with other Chriſtians, of all ſects and nations, ſuch as impute to the place an adherent holineſs. Here be alſo ſome Jews, yet inherit they no part of the land; but in their own country do live as aliens." Travels, b. iii. p. 114. 7th edit. The divinity of our Lord's prediction ſtill more clearly appears, if to the above we add the fact known throughout all Europe and Aſia at this day, namely, that the Jews are ſtill exiles from their own country, and have continued to be ſo ever ſince Titus diſperſed them. In former times the Jews, after being led away captive, were re-eſtabliſhed: Why then ſhould this captivity have laſted now ſo long? Why ſhould the effects of Titus's fury be indelible? God decreed that it ſhould be ſo. "Jeruſalem is to be trodden of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled;" and no power in the univerſe can fruſtrate his decree. For this reaſon likewiſe, though the Jews are at preſent, and have been through the whole period of their diſperſion, vaſtly more numerous, than they ever were in the moſt happy times of their commonwealth, none of the efforts which they have made to recover their own country has proved ſucceſsful. Moreover, while every diſperſed people mentioned in hiſtory has been ſwallowed up of the nations among whom they were diſperſed, without leaving the ſmalleſt trace of their ever having exiſted, the Jews continue, after ſo many ages, a diſtinct people in their diſperſion. The univerſal contempt into which they are fallen, one ſhould think, ought to have made them conceal whatever ſerved to diſtinguiſh them, and prompted them to mix with the reſt of mankind: but in fact it has not done ſo. The Jews in all countries, by openly ſeparating from the nations who rule them, ſubject themſelves to hatred and deriſion; nay, in ſeveral places, they have expoſed themſelves to death, by bearing about with them the outward marks of their deſcent. By this unexampled conſtancy they have preſerved themſelves every where a diſtinct people. But of this conſtancy, can any better account be given than that it is the means by which God verifies the prediction of his Son? He has declared, that when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, the Jews ſhall be converted; and therefore, through the whole courſe of their diſperſion, they muſt continue a diſtinct people. If the hand of Providence is not viſible in theſe things, I cannot tell where it is to be found. See Newton on the prophecies, vol. 2. and Harley's obſervations on man, vol. ii. p. 373.

Ver. 25. And there ſhall be ſigns] See on Matth. xxiv. 29. To what hath been ſaid there we may add, that the circumſtances of the light of the ſun and moon being obſcured; and of the ſtars falling from heaven, are not deſcriptive of the laſt day of judgement, but of the great and terrible day of the Lord, which in Scripture language means the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. For when the prophet Joel ſpeaks of that day, and deſcribes the locuſts, one of the four plagues, under a moſt beautiful allegory, he repreſents the earth as quaking before them;—the heavens ſhall tremble, ſaith he, the ſun and moon ſhall be dark, and the ſtars ſhall withdraw their ſhining, Joel ii. 15. And, to remove all poſſibility of doubt, concerning the meaning of theſe words in St. Matthew's Goſpel, our Saviour cloſes his predictions in this remarkable manner, Verily, I ſay unto you, this generation ſhall not paſs, till all theſe things be fulfilled. Nothing ſurely can be more explicit, more certain, more convincing to any unprejudiced mind, than this evidence for Chriſt and Chriſtianity from prophecy. Here is no ambiguity, no conjecture, no accommodation; all is plain and evident: And with regard to the laſt deſtruction of Jeruſalem, the words of our Lord himſelf in the Goſpels exactly correſpond with thoſe of the ancient prophets. See Sharpe's Sermon "on the riſe and fall of Jeruſalem." Bowyer, in his Greek Teſtament, propoſes to render the laſt clauſe, Through diſtreſs, as of the roaring ſea.

Ver. 26. Failing them for fear] Expiring with fear, is the literal rendering of the original. See Doddridge.

Ver. 28. Then look up] "Look upwards, and lift up your heads with to paſs, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh.

29 And he ſpake to them a parable; Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees;

30 When they now ſhoot forth, ye ſee and know of your own ſelves, that ſummer is now nigh at hand.

31 So likewiſe ye, when ye ſee theſe things come to paſs, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.

32 Verily I ſay unto you, This generation ſhall not paſs away, till all be fulfilled.

33 Heaven and earth ſhall paſs away: but my words ſhall not paſs away.

34 And take heed to yourſelves, leſt at any time your hearts be overcharged with ſurfeiting, and drunkenneſs, and cares of this life, and ſo that day come upon you unawares.

35 For as a ſnare ſhall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth.

36 Watch ye therefore and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to eſcape all theſe things that ſhall come to paſs, and to ſtand before the Son of man.

37 And in the day-time he was teaching in the temple; and at night he went out, and abode in the mount that is called the mount of Olives.

38 And all the people came early in the morning to him in the temple, for to hear him.

with joy and aſſurance; for whatever happens, your joy will be ſecure; and as ſoon as you ſee the firſt appearance of theſe ſights, you may comfortably conclude that your complete redemption and deliverance draws nigh." As the reſurrection is the time when we ſhall in fact be fully redeemed, or delivered from all the ſad conſequences of ſin,—and therefore is called, The redemption of our bodies; (Rom. viii. 23. comp. Epheſ. iv. 30. and Hoſea xiii. 14.) ſo, in a leſs proper ſenſe, the deliverance from the toils and ſorrows, temptations and infirmities of this ſinful and calamitous life, may on the like principles be called Redemption: And if we may judge of the length of the Apoſtles lives, by the extent of their labours, though we know not the time when many of them died, there is reaſon to conjecture, that it was not till about this period; which, by the way, would be an argument, that they were now moſt of them young men. The expreſſion, Look up, in this verſe, admirably ſuits the load of labour and ſufferings, under which the Apoſtles would be depreſſed in this afflicted ſtate. See Raphel. Annot. p. 270. and Doddridge.

Ver. 34. Your hearts be over-charged] The word βαρυνθωσιν properly ſignifies, burdened, or preſſed down; and ſo very elegantly and ſtrongly expreſſes the hateful conſequences of intemperance; and the Load it brings on thoſe rational faculties, which are the glory of human nature. See Horat. ſat. ii. lib. ii. line 77. The reader will obſerve that St. Luke's account of this diſcourſe is very ſhort, in compariſon with that of St. Matthew and St. Mark, for this obvious reaſon, that he had given the chief heads of it before, partly in a diſcourſe of our Lord's laſt coming, which was delivered to a very numerous aſſembly in Galilee, (ch. xii. 35, &c.) and partly in another diſcourſe, relating only to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, which was delivered in his journey thither at the feaſt of dedication, ch. xvii. 20, &c. Here therefore he chooſes to omit what had been inſerted upon thoſe occaſions; as John, who probably wrote after the accompliſhment of this prophecy, entirely omits it; and certainly, conſidering the circumſtance of time, it came with infinitely better grace from the other Evangeliſt, than it could afterwards have done from him. See Doddridge, and on ver. 11.

Ver. 35. As a ſnare] As a net. Heylin. The exhortations which connected with this verſe, limit the extent of the word all to a conſiderable number; for, were it to be taken otherwiſe, there could have been no room to offer them. Inſtead of earth, Dr. Waterland reads land.

Ver. 36. To ſtand before the Son of man] This doth not ſeem to be merely the counter-part of eſcaping the things ſpoken of before: There were thouſands of the Jews, that by one providence or another, eſcaped temporal deſtruction, who could with no propriety be ſaid to ſtand before the Son of Man at his coming. This latter clauſe therefore ſeems to be an advance upon the former, is an alluſion to the expreſſion in Pſ. i. 5. Nahum i. 6. Wiſd. v. 1. and, in that ſenſe, gives the context a greater connection and juſter diſtinction, than the ſignification in which it is taken by moſt commentators. See Doddridge, Grotius, and L'Enſant.

Ver. 37. And in the day-time he was teaching] Our Lord's cuſtom at this, and, it may be, at other paſſovers, was to ſpend the day in the city, moſt commonly in the temple, where he always found a great concourſe of hearers;—and in the evening to retire to the mount of Olives, where he lodged in the villages, or in the gardens, or in the open air among the trees. He choſe to lodge at night in ſuch places as theſe, not ſolely for the ſake of prayer,—being deſirous to ſecure that only ſeaſon of ſolitude, that he might prepare himſelf for his approaching ſufferings, by a proper ſeries of extraordinary devotions, and exemplify his own precept, ver. 36.—but alſo, that he might avoid falling into the hands of his enemies:—For, though they durſt not attack him in the midſt of his followers by day, they probably would have apprehended him during the ſilence and darkneſs of the night, had he lodged any where within the walls of the town. Accordingly they did not venture to lay hands on him, till Judas betrayed him to them, in the abſence of the multitude, by conducting an armed band to the place of his retirement.

Ver. 38. And all the people came early] St. Luke does not mean to ſay, that the people came and heard Jeſus preach in the temple after this; for Jeſus himſelf had declared, that he never was to preach to them any more. Matth. xxiii. 38, 39. But, having deſcribed in what manner our Lord ſpent his time at this Paſſover, the Evangeliſt adds, that his miniſtry ſuſtained no damage by his leaving the city at night, becauſe he did not fail to return every morning very early to the temple; thus exemplifying his precept of watching, as well as that of prayer, ver. 36. For general Reflections on this chapter, we refer the reader to thoſe on Matth. xxiv. and ſubjoin here

REFLECTIONS ON PATIENCE, from Ver. 19.

We learn from ſtory, and obſervation, and experience, that the life of man is full of miſery: all hiſtories are little more than continual regiſters of the evils incident to humanity; and what we read of paſt time, we find repeated in the preſent. Yet, notwithſtanding theſe concurrent advertiſements, how apt are we ſtill to promiſe ourſelves a laſting felicity in the enjoyments of this world! And though our paſt life has been vexatious, and the preſent is perplexed with daily evils, how do we feed ourſelves with vain hopes in the remainder yet unſeen.

The Scriptures give us a different view of things, teaching us that this life is a ſtate of probation and exerciſe, wherein God leads us through many wants and difficulties, to humble, to rectify, and to improve us. They promiſe us no outward calm, but inward ſerenity and peace of mind in the midſt of the ſtorm; not peace with the world, but ſucceſsful war; not to eſcape evil, but overcome it; ſo enduring for a ſeaſon, as thereby to fit ourſelves for heaven, where only is perfect happineſs, becauſe there only is perfect holineſs.

The art of rightly enduring the evils of this life is very remarkably taught us by our Lord in the verſe now under notice. In your patience, ſaith he, poſſeſs ye your ſouls:—To poſſeſs is the common deſire of mankind; but they do not rightly conſider what thoſe things are, the poſſeſſion of which can make us happy. They look for happineſs out of themſelves, in the poſſeſſions of this world; but true happineſs muſt ariſe from within,—from a rectified frame of mind; and the only rule to attain it, is that which our Lord preſcribes.

We cannot think as we ought, or act in conſequence as rational creatures, till our ſoul, that thinking faculty, be fully poſſeſſed by us,—till we have it in our power, and uſe that power to the proper end; and this cannot be done while paſſions diſturb the mind, and put us, as it were, beſide ourſelves. Anger, for inſtance, or grief, when they are exceſſive, obſtruct the uſe of reaſon, and the proper office of patience is to repreſs and hold them down, ſo that the ſoul may be maintained in vigour to bear, and to extricate itſelf from the evils which invade it. As long as we can preſerve an inward calm and compoſure, the croſs accidents of life make but ſlight impreſſions upon us; but when we loſe our temper, then they break in with violence, they overbear the judgement, they captivate the will, and fill the ſoul with darkneſs and confuſion.

The ſoul may, in this reſpect, be compared to a water, which, whilſt it ſtands ſerene, is within its own ſubſtance clear, tranſparent, and delightful; and from its ſurface, as from a poliſhed mirror, reflects the images of all things that ſurround it, in their proper forms and juſt proportions: But, when it is ruffled with winds, its clearneſs and brightneſs ceaſes; and though it ſhould not be ſo much obſcured, as to loſe all reflection, yet does the wrinkled ſurface, at beſt, give but falſe and miſſhapen forms, fallacious images, and monſtrous repreſentations of things.

Thus it is with the ſoul, whoſe inward tranquility can only be preſerved by patience. While that is duly exerciſed, all is calm and ſerene; a man has the free uſe of his reaſon, and can hear and follow its

CHAP. XXII.

The Jews conſpire againſt Chriſt: Satan prepareth Judas to betray him. The apoſtles ſent to prepare the paſſover. Chriſt inſtituteth his holy ſupper: covertly foretelleth of the traitor: dehorteth the reſt of his apoſtles from ambition: aſſureth Peter his faith ſhould not fail, and yet he ſhould deny him thrice: he prayeth in the mount, and ſweateth blood: is betrayed with a kiſs: he healeth Malchus's ear: he is thrice denied of Peter, ſhamefully abuſed, and confeſſeth himſelf to be the Son of God.

NOW the feaſt of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the Paſſover.

2 And the chief prieſts and ſcribes ſought how they might kill him; for they feared the people.

3 Then entered Satan into Judas, ſurnamed Iſcariot, being of the number of the twelve.

4 And he went his way, and communed

Ver. 1. Matth. xxvi. 2. Mark xiv. 1.—V. 2. Pſ. ii. 2. John xi. 47. Acts iv. 27.—V. 3. Matth. xxvi. 14. John xiii. 2, 27.

its dictates. But when the ſoul is ruffled through impatience, evil paſſions darken and obſcure it; they dethrone reaſon; unhinge the mind, and diſcompoſe all its faculties.

Hence we may collect the force of that expreſſion, Poſſeſs ye your ſouls; which to do, under any notable provocation, is the proper act of patience. A virtue, which prevents many evils, and mitigates all; which is found ſo neceſſary, in order to make life tolerable, that even thoſe who have no religion, and reject many of the virtues, are forced to have recourſe to this, and extol its excellence. They cannot but agree with Solomon, that the triumphs of patience are more eſtimable than thoſe of valour; that the patient man is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his ſpirit, than he that taketh a city: Nay, they muſt confeſs too, with him, the danger and miſery of the contrary practice; who obſerves, that he who hath no rule over his own ſpirit, is like a city that is broken down, and without walls. Theſe are acknowledged truths, even with bad men, who, though void of thoſe religious principles, which can alone produce a genuine patience, yet forge to themſelves ſome ſpurious kinds of it, which may well be termed, the political and the ſtoical.

The political patience is much ſtudied and practiſed by men of buſineſs. Wiſe as they are in their generation, they hold, as a ſure maxim, that "good policy has no paſſions;" and therefore they heedfully ſuppreſs their own, and ſtrive to excite thoſe of others, that they may dexterouſly play them off to their advantage. This is a cruel cunning, an antichriſtian ſelf-denial, which will one day have its proper reward.

The ſtoical patience is chiefly in vogue with men of letters and ſpeculation, who, confiding in the force of their own minds, endeavour to harden themſelves againſt misfortune, and by forcibly diverting their thoughts to other objects, may ſometimes maintain a certain ſerenity and ſelf-poſſeſſion in the article of diſtreſs. But as this firmneſs of temper depends much upon conſtitution, and a flow of animal ſpirits, it will not prove a laſting remedy; and it is happy for ſuch men that it will not: for as all the diſpenſations of God tend to the good of his creatures, and misfortunes in particular are graciouſly ſent to reclaim them to a ſenſe of their duty, and of their dependance on him; to humble them under his Almighty arm, and oblige them to have recourſe to Him for deliverance;—If theſe men could ſupport themſelves by their own philoſophy, and deaden the ſenſe of their ſufferings, ſo as not to be affected by them, they would fruſtrate the merciſeſs deſigns of the Creator, who never corrects his creatures but for their Amendment.

Such are the ſpurious kinds of patience; they are void of religion, and therefore want the eſſence of true virtue. Not ſo the genuine patience, which is a pious ſubmiſſion to the will of God: Her firſt leſſon is to ſee his hand in all his ſufferings, and from that view ſhe receives not only conſolation and ſupport under the preſent evil, but alſo gradually engages us to extirpate the cauſe of all evil, even the root of all inordinate paſſions.

All the paſſions are deſires differently modified. If the deſire be juſt in its nature, and reaſonable in its degree, the paſſion, in whatever form it appears, will be equally juſt and reaſonable; but all exceſs in the deſire will be felt in the paſſion which it produces; and therefore the patience aſſuaging paſſion is never a ſolitary virtue that acts alone, but muſt have with it ſome of that ſpecific virtue, which anſwers to the original exceſs. When pride is the cauſe of anger, patience cannot calm that anger, if humility does not concur with it. It might be dangerous, if we could do it, to ſtop a ſymptom while the diſeaſe remains in its vigour; yet the ſymptom may be of great ſervice in directing where to apply the remedy.

When therefore an ambitious man, for inſtance, is perplexed with paſſions which deſtroy his peace; when he is enraged with anger, or oppreſſed with grief, at the diſappointment of his aſpiring projects, he ſhould conſider ſuch grief, or anger, as the painful ſymptoms of a depraved heart; a heart eſtranged from God, and idolizing worldly grandeurs. If he deſires the relief of patience, he muſt firſt turn from theſe vanities to the living God. This is the cardinal point, the hinge on which all that deſerves the name of virtue depends and moves. He muſt in prayer obtain ſome lively knowledge of God, ſome pious ſenſe of the Divine Majeſty, who made, who governs all things, and who graciouſly interpoſes thoſe obſtacles to his ambitious purſuits, on purpoſe to divert him from them. He will then diſcern the hand of God in the croſs accidents which cauſed his diſtreſs, and he will bear it with patience, ſeeing that in reality be ought to be thankful for it.

What has been ſaid of ambition is equally applicable to covetouſneſs, ſenſuality, and every other evil propenſity, which bring with them their own puniſhment in the painful affections which accompany them. The crime is ours, but the puniſhment comes from God, and is executed within by the fixed laws of our nature, againſt which it is in vain to ſtrive. As mercy predominates in all the ways and works of God, ſo thoſe pains which he has annexed to every inordinate deſire, are intended for its cure. He hedges up our way with thorns, as his prophet ſpeaks, (Hoſea ii. 6.) to hinder our advancing in it; and patience can give us no redreſs, until we change our courſe, and return to him in a dutiful ſubmiſſion.

Men want a patience whereby they may ſin at eaſe; whereby they may indulge their evil deſires with impunity: but, by the goodneſs of God, that is not poſſible; for a ſolid patience can never be attained but in the practice of religion.

The true art of patience under any kind of trouble conſiſts in a devout recollection, whereby we withdraw our attention as much as poſſible from the painful ideas excited in us, that ſo the mind may aſcend in pious meditations to the throne of Grace, and there find ſhelter from the anguiſh and tumult of the paſſions. There it will feel divine influence, and recover an inward peace, which will ſoon diffuſe itſelf through the lower paſſions. Such was the advice of Eliphaz to Job, (ch. xxii. 21, &c.) "Acquaint thyſelf now with God, and be at peace; receive the law from his mouth, and lay up his words in thine heart. If thou return to the Almighty, thou ſhalt be built up; and thou ſhalt put away iniquity far from thee. Yea, the Almighty ſhall be thy defence; thou ſhalt have thy delight in him, and the light ſhall ſhine upon thy ways."

Such is the true practice of patience, and ſuch is its reward. By patience we poſſeſs our ſouls, and by patience we ſhall ſave them for eternity;—where patience will be a needleſs virtue, and all our duty joy.

Chap. XXII. Ver. 4. And captains] The captains with whom Judas communed are here and elſewhere called captains of the temple, (ſee ver. 52.) and are joined with the prieſts as their companions; a circumſtance, which proves that they were Jews, and not heathens. See Acts iv. 1. From David's time the prieſts and Levites kept watch firſt in the tabernacle, and then in the temple, night and day, as appears from 2 Chron. viii. 14. The guards of prieſts were ſtationed at three places; but thoſe of the Levites at one and twenty. The Levites, while they performed this office according to their courſes, under the firſt temple, were called porters, 2 Chron. viii. 14. and each of the watches had a chief or captain,—στρατηγος; and over them all was one called, by way of eminence, αρχηγος, the chief leader, or captain. That theſe names of military men ſhould have been given to the prieſts and Levites, who were no ſoldiers, neither had ſoldiers under them, will not ſeem ſtrange, when it is remembered, that the attendance of the Levites is called the warfare of the ſervice; Numb. viii. 24, 25. and that they performed all the offices of ſoldiers in garriſons. They kept guard at the gates of the temple, preſerved the peace within its precincts, and brought ſuch as were diſorderly before the high-prieſts and council. But beſides the Levite porters, there was another guard belonging to the temple, namely, the Roman garriſon, in the tower or caſtle of Antonia, which was built hard by the temple. Of this caſtle or garriſon there is mention made, Acts xxi. 31—34. St. Matthew calls a detachment from it, appointed to guard our Lord's ſepulchre, κουστωδια, which was the proper Latin name of ſuch a body of Roman ſoldiers. But it was not with the captains of the garriſon Antonia that Judas bargained to deliver up his Maſter, neither were they the perſons Jeſus ſpake to, when he addreſſed them who came to apprehend him, ver. 52. In both paſſages theſe captains are called στρατηγοι, whereas the captains of the garriſons are termed by Joſephus φρουραρχοι, and by St. Luke, Acts xxi. and xxii. χιλιαρχοι. Beſides, no heathens were ever admitted into the ſupreme eccleſiaſtical court of the Jews; not to mention that the latter ſhunned the company of the former as much as poſſible. It is plain therefore that the perſons with whom Judas communed, and who are called the captains, and captains of the temple, were the prieſts who commanded the temple guard, and who were at the devotion of the high-prieſt and council, to execute whatever orders they thought fit to give them. See Macknight and Calmet.

with the chief prieſts and captains, how he might betray him unto them.

5 And they were glad, and covenanted to give him money.

6 And he promiſed, and ſought opportunity to betray him unto them in the abſence of the multitude.

7 Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the paſſover muſt be killed.

8 And he ſent Peter and John, ſaying, Go, and prepare us the paſſover, that we may eat.

9 And they ſaid unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare?

10 And he ſaid unto them, Behold, when ye are entered into the city, there ſhall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water; follow him into the houſe where he entereth in.

11 And ye ſhall ſay unto the good-man of the houſe, The Maſter ſaith unto thee, Where is the gueſt-chamber, where I ſhall eat the paſſover with my diſciples?

12 And he ſhall ſhew you a large upper room furniſhed: there make ready.

13 And they went and found as he had ſaid unto them: and they made ready the paſſover.

14 And when the hour was come, he ſat down, and the twelve apoſtles with him.

15 And he ſaid unto them, With deſire I have deſired to eat this paſſover with you before I ſuffer:

16 For I ſay unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.

17 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and ſaid, Take this, and divide it among yourſelves:

18 For I ſay unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God ſhall come.

19 And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, ſaying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me.

20 Likewiſe alſo the cup after ſupper, ſaying, This cup is the new teſtament in my blood, which is ſhed for you.

21 But behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table.

22 And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!

23 And they began to enquire among themſelves, which of them it was that ſhould do this thing.

Ver. 6. Or, without tumult.—V. 7. Matth. xxvi. 17. Mark xiv. 12.—V. 14. Matth. xxvi. 20. Mark xiv. 17.—V. 15. Or, I have heartily deſired.—V. 16. Ch. xiv. 15. Rev. xix. 9—V. 18. Matth. xxvi. 29. Ver. 12. There make ready] The ſame prophetic gift which enabled Chriſt to predict theſe circumſtances, would no doubt guide him to the houſe; and it is a beautiful modeſty in the ſacred hiſtorian only to hint obliquely at it. See the note on Mark xiv. 13.

Ver. 15. With deſire I have deſired] This is an Hebraiſm, ſignifying a very fervent and longing deſire: "I have longed greatly, ſaid he, to eat this paſſover with you before I ſuffer, becauſe it is the laſt I ſhall ever celebrate with you, and becauſe I deſire, before my death, to give you the ſtrongeſt proofs of my love." The proofs he had in view were, his ſetting them a pattern of humility and charity, by waſhing their feet;—his inſtructing them in the nature of his death, as a propitiatory ſacrifice;—his inſtituting the ſacrament of the ſupper, in commemoration of his ſufferings;—his comforting them by the tender diſcourſes recorded by St. John, ch. xiv. xv. xvi. in which he gave them a variety of excellent advice, and many gracious promiſes;—laſt of all, his recommending them ſolemnly by prayer to the protection and guidance of his heavenly Father. The magnanimity which our Lord diſcovered in the expreſſion before us, is beyond conception: It implies, that although he knew this ſupper would be the laſt he ſhould celebrate with his diſciples, and that he ſhould riſe from it but a few hours before he ſuffered the moſt cruel inſults and torments, which would end in his death; yet ſuch was his love to his people, ſuch his deſire to glorify his heavenly Father, that no paſſover was ever ſo welcome to him as this. See Grotius and Doddridge.

Ver. 16. Until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God] That is, "until the deliverance of mankind from the bondage of ſin, is accompliſhed in the Goſpel diſpenſation; a deliverance typified by that of our fathers from the Egyptian bondage, to keep up the memory of which the paſſover was inſtituted." The particle until, uſed here and ver. 18. does not imply, that after the accompliſhment of the ſalvation of men our Lord was to eat the paſſover; it was an Hebrew form of expreſſion, ſignifying that the thing mentioned was no more to be done forever. See on Matth. i. 25. and Mark xiv. 25. Beza and ſome other commentators think, that ver. 17. and 18. ſhould probably be placed after ver. 20. as this will make the whole narration conſiſtent with itſelf, and with Matth. xxvi. 26. and Mark xiv. 22.

Ver. 19. This do, &c.] From our Lord's words here recorded, and from thoſe wherewith the Apoſtle has concluded his account of the ſacrament, 1 Cor. xi. 26. (—for, as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do ſhew the Lord's death till he come,—καταγγέλλετε,—ye preach,—ye declare the Lord's death, ye aſſure the world of the truth of it,)—it appears that the ſacrament of the ſupper was inſtituted not only to bring Chriſt's ſufferings and the happy conſequences thereof to the remembrance of his diſciples, but to demonſtrate the truth of theſe things to the world in all ages. In this view the ſacrament of the laſt ſupper is the ſtrongeſt proof of our Lord's integrity, and of the truth of his miſſion. For if he had been an impoſtor, and was to have ſuffered death on account of his deluding the people, is it to be imagined that he would have inſtituted any rite with a view to preſerve the memory of his having ſuffered puniſhment for the worſt of crimes. This is beyond all human belief; and therefore, ſince by this inſtitution he has perpetuated the memory of his own ſufferings, it is a ſtrong preſumption that he was conſcious of his own innocence; that his character was really what the Evangeliſts have repreſented it to be, and that our faith in him, as the Son of God, is well founded. See Macknight, and Leſlie's Short Method with a Deiſt.

Ver. 20. The new teſtament] The new covenant. Wat.

Ver. 21, 22. The hand of him that betrayeth me] Our Lord was now deeply affected with his own thoughts; for he uttered ſome of the things twice, which lay heavieſt upon his ſpirits, as is uſual with perſons in great concern; particularly after delivering the ſacramental cup, and telling them that his blood was ſhed for them, he mentions the treachery of Judas a ſecond time; and this ſecond declaration came in very properly, after the inſtitution of the ſacrament, which exhibits the higheſt inſtance of love to mankind,—His dying to obtain the remiſſion of their ſins; for it ſhewed that the perſon who could deliberately do ſo great an injury to ſo kind a friend, muſt have been a monſter, the foulneſs of whoſe ingratitude cannot be reached by the force of language. See the Reflections on Matth. xxvi.

Ver. 23. They began to enquire among themſelves] St. Matthew and St. Mark expreſly affirm, that Jeſus plainly pointed out Judas as the traitor, before the inſtitution of the ſacrament. Here St. Luke ſays, that after the inſtitution of the ſacrament, the diſciples enquire among themſelves, which of them it was that ſhould do this thing: But the difficulty may be removed, by correcting the tranſlation of St. Luke thus: ἤρξαντο συζητεῖν, they began to diſpute;—for ſo the word συζητεῖν ſignifies, Mark viii. 11. ix. 16. Luke xxiv. 15. When Judas was marked out a ſecond time, by our Lord's deſiring the other diſciples to behold the hand of the traitor that was with him on the table, ver. 21. it is natural to think that the reſt would upbraid him with his wickedneſs; and conſidering his imprudence, it is highly probable that he would flatly deny it; but they, urging their maſter's repeated declaration, and he, inſiſting on his deteſtation of ſuch a crime, might have alledged that ſome of their hands had been on the table when Jeſus ſpake laſt; and ſo have charged them with the black deſign, which indeed was harboured no where but in his own breaſt: Thus the diſpute among the diſciples mentioned by St. Luke might eaſily have happened, notwithſtanding our Lord had immediately before that pointed out Judas as the traitor.

24 And there was alſo a ſtrife among them, which of them ſhould be accounted the greateſt.

25 And he ſaid unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exerciſe lordſhip over them; and they that exerciſe authority upon them, are called benefactors.

26 But ye ſhall not be ſo: but he that is greateſt among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth ſerve.

27 For whether is greater, he that ſitteth at meat, or he that ſerveth? is not he that ſitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that ſerveth.

28 Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations.

29 And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me;

30 That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and ſit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael.

31 And the Lord ſaid, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath deſired to have you, that he may ſift you as wheat:

32 But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, ſtrengthen thy brethren.

33 And he ſaid unto him, Lord, I am ready to go with thee both into priſon, and to death.

34 And he ſaid, I tell thee, Peter, the cock ſhall not crow this day, before that thou ſhalt thrice deny that thou knoweſt me.

35 And he ſaid unto them, When I ſent you without purſe, and ſcrip, and ſhoes, lacked ye any thing? And they ſaid, Nothing.

36 Then ſaid he unto them, But now he that hath a purſe, let him take it, and likewiſe his ſcrip: and he that hath no ſword, let him ſell his garment, and buy one.

Ver. 25, 26. The kings of the Gentiles exerciſe lordſhip] "Among the Gentiles, they are reckoned the greateſt men who have the greateſt power, and who exerciſe it in the moſt abſolute manner. Such, however, have at times affected the pompous title of Benefactors, Ευεργετης, (a ſurname, which ſome of the kings of Egypt and of Syria aſſumed) and thereby have tacitly acknowledged that true greatneſs conſiſts in goodneſs. But your greatneſs ſhall not be like theirs, ſhall not conſiſt in the unlimitedneſs of tyrannical power, though it ſhould be joined with an affectation of titles, which denote qualities truly honourable. Whoſoever deſires to be great or chief among you, let him be ſo by his humility, and by his ſerviceableneſs to the reſt; in imitation of me your Maſter, whoſe greatneſs conſiſts in this,—that I am become the ſervant of you all." Inſtead of greateſt, ver. 26. the original word might be rendered more properly eldeſt, as it is oppoſed to the youngeſt. Comp. Rom. ix. 12. According to the manners of the Jews, the aged expected great ſervice and ſubmiſſion from the younger. See the notes on Matth. xx. 25, &c.

Ver. 28—30. Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations] In my trials, or afflictions. This anſwers to what is termed following Chriſt in the regeneration, Matth. xix. 28. where ſee the note. The kingdom which the Father beſtowed on Jeſus, ver. 29. as the reward of his humiliations, was his mediatorial kingdom, Philip. ii. 9. not the happineſs of heaven, which he enjoyed from eternity; wherefore, the kingdom which he beſtowed on his Apoſtles, as the peculiar reward of their ſervices, being of the ſame nature with his own, was nothing elſe but the authority which they enjoyed next to him in the Goſpel diſpenſation. That ye may eat and drink at my table, &c. is evidently metaphorical, and ſignifies, that they were to ſhare with him in the honours and pleaſures of his high dignity; and ſit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael. As their eating and drinking at his table does not imply any ſingle act, but a continuation of enjoyment; ſo their ſitting on thrones, judging, cannot ſignify their being aſſeſſors to Chriſt in the one act of paſſing ſentence upon the tribes, which rather implies a continuation of action; namely, their giving laws to the converted tribes by the Goſpel which they preached to them. But ſee this fully explained in the note on Matth. xix. 20. We may juſt obſerve, that it is well known the word διατιθεμαι, uſed ver. 29. and rendered appoint, properly ſignifies to covenant, or, "to beſtow in virtue of a covenant;" and therefore the laſt clauſe of this verſe may properly allude to what divines commonly call, "the covenant of redemption," to which there are ſo many references in Scripture, and concerning the reality of which we could have no doubt, if the references were not ſo expreſs; conſidering on the one hand, the great importance of that undertaking of our Lord's to which it refers; and, on the other, the plain declarations of thoſe prophecies which his ſpirit ſuggeſted, and the confidence wherewith he hath promiſed thoſe bleſſings, which as mediator it empowers him to beſtow.

Ver. 31, 32. Simon! Simon!] This repetition of the name of Simon ſhews much earneſtneſs in our Saviour, and intimates the great danger to which Peter was expoſed. Satan hath deſired to have you, (ἐξῃτήσατο:—hath requeſted of God permiſſion to aſſault you) ſeems to allude to Job ii. 4, 5. Our Lord ſpeaks here in the plural,—υμας; "You, my apoſtles in general."—That he may ſift you as wheat, is an expreſſion denoting the violent agitations, the formidable temptations, and numerous artifices, which the enemy of mankind would make uſe of to try their integrity. See Amos ix. 9. "But, continues our Lord, I have prayed for thee,—Peter, in particular,—foreſeeing the danger to which thou wilt be peculiarly expoſed; and when thou art returned back to thy duty, [επιστρεψας] from thoſe wanderings into which I know thou wilt fall;—ſtrengthen thy brethren, by ſetting them an example of eminent faith and fortitude; and do thine utmoſt all the remainder of thy days, to engage all over whom thou haſt any influence, ſteadily to adhere to my cauſe, in the midſt of the greateſt difficulties." There can be no objection againſt taking the charge in this comprehenſive ſenſe; And as there can be no queſtion but that Peter, after he had wept his fall ſo bitterly as we know he did, applied himſelf to rally his diſperſed brethren, and to prevent their fleeing to Jeruſalem till the third day was over,—in the morning of which he was up betimes, and early at the ſepulchre of our Lord; (See John xxii. 3.)—ſo indeed, the ſtrain of his epiſtles ſhews his long and affectionate remembrance of this ſolemn charge. Many paſſages of the firſt are peculiarly intended to animate his Chriſtian brethren to a courageous adherence to Chriſt, amidſt the greateſt dangers; and the ſecond has ſeveral cautions to guard them againſt the ſeductions of error; in ſome inſtances more to be dreaded than the terrors of the ſevereſt perſecution. See Doddridge, Elſner, and Acts ix. 35. xi. 2. xiv. 15.

Ver. 34. The cock ſhall not crow this day, &c.] As it is plain from hence, and from the event, that the cock actually crew before Peter's third denial, we muſt certainly take the words of St. Luke and St. John for the common time of cock-crowing, which probably did not come till after the cock, which Peter had heard, had crowed the ſecond time, and perhaps oftener; for it is well known that thoſe vigilant animals, on any little diſturbance, often crow at midnight, or before it, though they do not quit their rooſt till about three in the morning, which was uſually called the cock-crowing. See on Mark xiii. 35. Whitby on Matth. xxvi. 34. and the Reflections on Mark xiv.

Ver. 36. But now, he that hath a purſe] Our Lord having finiſhed what he had to ſay to Peter in particular, turned to the other diſciples, and put them in mind how they had been prohibited, when they were firſt ſent out to make any proviſion for their journey, and directed to rely wholly on God; and that though they had gone away without purſe, ſcrip, and ſhoes, they had never wanted any thing: But he told them that matters were now altered; they were to be violently aſſaulted by their enemies; were to meet with the ſtrongeſt temptations, and to be ſo hotly perſecuted by their countrymen, that they could no longer expect any ſuccour at their hands; for which reaſon, he ordered them in their future journies to provide money, and cloaths, and a ſword, for themſelves; i. e. beſides relying on the divine Providence as formerly, they were to uſe all prudent precautions in fortifying themſelves againſt the trials which were coming on them; and our Lord tells them they were thus to arm themſelves, becauſe he was to be treated as a malefactor, condemned and crucified, agreeably to the predictions of the prophets. See Iſai. liii. 12. He added too, that theſe misfortunes were not at a diſtance, but juſt at hand; for the things concerning me have an end; "They are juſt ready to be accompliſhed.—Now you may eaſily gueſs at the 37 For I ſay unto you, That this that is written, muſt yet be accompliſhed in me, And he was reckoned among the tranſgreſſors: for the things concerning me have an end.

38 And they ſaid, Lord, behold, here are two ſwords. And he ſaid unto them, It is enough.

39 And he came out, and went, as he was wont, to the mount of Olives; and his diſciples alſo followed him.

40 And when he was at the place, he ſaid unto them, Pray, that ye enter not into temptation.

41 And he was withdrawn from them about a ſtone's caſt, and kneeled down, and prayed, 42 Saying, Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me: nevertheleſs, not my will, but thine be done.

43 And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, ſtrengthening him.

44 And being in an agony, he prayed more earneſtly: and his ſweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground.

45 And when he roſe up from prayer, and was come to his diſciples, he found them ſleeping for ſorrow, 46 And ſaid unto them, Why ſleep ye? riſe and pray, leſt ye enter into temptation.

47 And while he yet ſpake, behold, a multitude, and he that was called Judas, one of the twelve, went before them, and drew near unto Jeſus, to kiſs him.

48 But Jeſus ſaid unto him, Judas, betrayeſt thou the Son of man with a kiſs?

49 When they which were about him, ſaw what would follow, they ſaid unto him, Lord, ſhall we ſmite with the ſword?

50 And one of them ſmote a ſervant of the high prieſt, and cut off his right ear.

51 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, Suffer ye thus far. And he touched his ear, and healed him.

52 Then Jeſus ſaid unto the chief prieſts and captains of the temple, and the elders which were come to him, Be ye come out as againſt a thief, with ſwords and ſtaves?

53 When I was daily with you in the temple, ye ſtretched forth no hands againſt reception you are likely to meet with, as my meſſengers and miniſters, when you come to preach in the name and authority of one, who has ſuffered as a malefactor, and yet demands faith and obedience as an Almighty Saviour."

Ver. 38. Lord, behold here are two ſwords] Our Lord's diſciples miſtaking his meaning about the ſwords, replied, they had two: The reaſon why they had any at all, probably, was, that they might defend themſelves againſt robbers, in their journey from Galilee and Perea, and from the beaſts of prey, which in thoſe parts were very frequent and dangerous in the night-time: It afterwards appears, that one of theſe ſwords were Peter's. See John xviii. 10. Our Lord replies to the diſciples, "It is enough for weapons of this ſort; my chief intent is, to direct you to another kind of defence; even that which ariſes from piety and faith." This is ſtrongly intimated by our Lord's ſaying that two ſwords were ſufficient; which, it is evident, they could not have been for ſo many men, had our Lord meant what he ſaid in a literal ſenſe.

Ver. 42. If thou be willing, remove this cup, &c.] Oh that thou wouldeſt,—or, that thou wert willing to remove this cup from me! &c. Wat. and Blackwall. Our Lord ſpoke this, not as deſirous to be excuſed from ſufferings and death, but in reference to the terror and ſeverity of the combat in which he was now actually engaged. See on Matth. xxvi. 39. Heb. vi. 7. Sir Matthew Hale's Contemplations, vol. i. p. 59. and Jackſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 813, &c.

Ver. 43. There appeared an angel] Some of the ancient Chriſtians thought it ſo diſhonourable to Chriſt that he ſhould receive ſuch aſſiſtance from an angel, that they omitted this verſe in their copies, as St. Jerome and Hilary informs us. It is indeed wanting in ſome MSS. but far the greater number of copies have it. And could Hilary have proved it a ſpurious edition, he would no doubt have done it, ſince it ſo directly contradicts the wild notion he ſeems to maintain, that Chriſt was incapable of any painful ſenſations. See Mill, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 44. And his ſweat was as it were great drops of blood] Some commentators have taken this expreſſion in a metaphorical ſenſe; fancying that as thoſe who weep bitterly are ſaid to weep blood, ſo they may be ſaid to ſweat blood, who ſweat exceſſively, by reaſon of hard labour or acute pain. They explain it, "His drops of ſweat were large and clammy, like drops of gore:" But others more juſtly affirm, that our Lord's ſweat was really mixed with blood to ſuch a degree, that its colour and conſiſtency was as if it had been wholly blood; for the Greek particle ὡσεὶ, rendered, as it were, does not always denote ſimilitude, but ſometimes reality. See John i. 14. Matth. xiv. 5. Grotius eſpouſed the metaphorical meaning of this paſſage; but Bartholinus (de Cruce, p. 134.) diſputes againſt him, and gives examples of ſweats which have actually been mixed with blood. See alſo Maldonat on Matth. xxvi. 37. Dr. Whitby obſerves, that Ariſtotle and Diodorus Siculus both mention bloody ſweats, as attending ſome extraordinary agony of mind; and Leti, in his life of Pope Sixtus V. p. 200. and Sir John Chardin, in his Hiſtory of Perſia, vol. i. p. 126. mention a like phenomenon: To which Dr. Jackſon in his works, vol. ii. p. 819. adds another from Thuanus, lib. 10. However, that which puts this matter beyond all doubt, is a fact well known in hiſtory; namely, that Charles the IXth of France died of a malady, in which his blood guſhed out of all pores of his body. Voltaire deſcribes it thus, in his Univerſal Hiſtory, chap. 142. "Charles the IXth died in his five and twentieth year; the malady he died of was very extraordinary; the blood guſhed out of all his pores. This accident, of which there are ſome inſtances, was owing either to exceſſive fear, to violent paſſion, or to a warm and melancholy conſtitution." Some learned writers are of opinion, that our Saviour during this extreme agony ſtruggled with the ſpirits of darkneſs; and that hence an angel appeared, as in the deſart, when he was tempted by the devil. See Scot's Chriſtian Life, vol. iii. p. 149. and Fleming's Chriſtology, vol. ii. p. 130.

Ver. 48. Judas, betrayeſt thon the Son of man with a kiſs?] "Doſt thou betray him, whom thou canſt not but know to be the Son of man,—"the Meſſiah," by that which all men uſe as the ſymbol either of love or homage,—making it the ſignal of thy treachery? And doſt thou think that He can be impoſed upon by this poor artifice, or that God, who has promiſed him ſo glorious and triumphant a kingdom, will not puniſh ſuch baſeneſs and cruelty to him?"—There is great reaſon to believe, that our Lord uſes this phraſe of the Son of man to Judas on this occaſion, as he had done the ſame evening at ſupper twice in a breath, in the ſenſe here given; ſee Matth. xxvi. 24. and it adds a great ſpirit to theſe words, which the reader will diſcern to be attended with much greater ſtrength and beauty, than if our Lord had only ſaid, Doſt thou betray Me with a kiſs? See on Matth. xxvi. 51.

Ver. 51. Suffer ye thus far] The ſenſe which has been affixed to this paſſage is various. Some have underſtood it as a requeſt from Jeſus, that the perſons who had apprehended him would oblige him ſo far as to let him go to the wounded man; and the context ſeems to countenance this opinion, repreſenting him as immediately touching the ear, and healing it. Others, and amongſt them the Syriac, ſuppoſe it to be ſpoken to the diſciples, and to contain a prohibition againſt their offering any more violence; in which ſenſe they paraphraſe the words, "It is enough that you have oppoſed their violence ſo far; go no farther, but ſtop here." The circumſtance of our Lord's healing Malchus's ear by touching it, ſeems to imply, that he created a new part in the room of that which was cut off; or though he performed the cure any other way, he equally demonſtrated both his goodneſs and power. No wound or diſtemper whatever was incurable in the hand of Jeſus, neither was any injury ſo great that he could not forgive it; and as this was an act of great compaſſion and forgiveneſs, ſo likewiſe was it an act of ſingular wiſdom; for it would effectually prevent thoſe reflections and cenſures on Jeſus, which the raſhneſs of Peter's attack might otherwiſe have occaſioned. See the Reflections on Mark xiv.

Ver. 53. When I was daily with you in the temple] This was a proof of me: but this is your hour, and the power of darkneſs.

54 Then took they him, and led him, and brought him into the high-prieſt's houſe. And Peter followed afar off.

55 And when they had kindled a fire in the midſt of the hall, and were ſet down together, Peter ſat down among them.

56 But a certain maid beheld him, as he ſat by the fire, and earneſtly looked upon him, and ſaid, This man was alſo with him.

57 And he denied him, ſaying, Woman, I know him not.

58 And after a little while another ſaw him, and ſaid, Thou art alſo of them. And Peter ſaid, Man, I am not.

59 And about the ſpace of one hour after, another confidently affirmed, ſaying, Of a truth this fellow alſo was with him: for he is a Galilean.

60 And Peter ſaid, Man, I know not what thou ſayeſt. And immediately while he yet ſpake, the cock crew.

61 And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had ſaid unto him, Before the cock crow, thou ſhalt deny me thrice;

62 And Peter went out, and wept bitterly.

63 And the men that held Jeſus, mocked him, and ſmote him.

64 And when they had blindfolded him, they ſtruck him on the face, and aſked him, ſaying, Prophecy, who is it that ſmote thee?

65 And many other things blaſphemouſly ſpake they againſt him.

66 And as ſoon as it is was day, the elders of the people, and the chief prieſts and the ſcribes came together, and led him into their council,

67 Saying, Art thou the Chriſt? tell us. And he ſaid unto them, If I tell you, ye will not believe:

68 And if I alſo aſk you, ye will not anſwer me, nor let me go.

69 Hereafter ſhall the Son of man ſit on the right hand of the power of God.

70 Then ſaid they all, Art thou then the Son of God? And he ſaid unto them, Ye ſay that I am.

71 And they ſaid, What need we any further witneſs? for we ourſelves have heard of his own mouth.

Ver. 53. John xii, 27.—V. 54. Matth. xxvi. 57.—V. 55. Matth. xxvi. 69. Mark xiv. 66.—V. 61. Matth. xxvi. 34, 75.—V. 63. Matth. xxvi. 67.—V. 66. Matth. xxvii. 1. Acts xxii. 5.—V. 69. Matth. xxvi. 64. Mark xiv. 62. Hebr. i. 3. viii. 1.—V. 70. Mark xiv. 62.

of our Saviour's innocence; for had he been conſcious of any crime which could render him obnoxious to puniſhment, he would not have expoſed himſelf in this public manner; and had the Jews either thought him guilty, or been able to bring any accuſation againſt him, it is evident that they neither wanted will nor power to have apprehended him. But the reaſon why they continued ſo long inactive is intimated in the cloſe of the verſe. They were kept under reſtraint, till the time predicted for his ſufferings was accompliſhed; and that being now come, power was allowed to the prince of darkneſs to inſtigate them to this crime, and opportunity was permitted them to perpetrate it. See on Matth. xxvi. 56.

Ver. 54. And Peter followed afar off] His love to his maſter was not extinguiſhed, yet it was weakened; he followed, but afar off: He was here beginning to equivocate; he had ſaid that he would follow Chriſt, and he perſuades himſelf that he is fulfilling his promiſe by thus following him afar off. St. John informs us with his uſual modeſty, that another diſciple followed Jeſus, John xviii. 15. who appears to have been himſelf; whence we may infer, that Peter and John recovered themſelves quickly after their flight, or elſe they could not have followed at ſome diſtance, and yet be ſo near, as to be ready to go into Caiaphas's houſe with him. Doddridge, and Sir D. D—.

Ver. 63, 64. And the men that held Jeſus] And the men who had Jeſus in cuſtody. Wynne. See the note on Matth. xxvi. 69. If what is ſaid there to reconcile the accounts of the ſacred hiſtorian be not thought ſufficient, perhaps the following obſervation of Mr. Macknight may be thought ſo: "Though Luke, ſays he, has told us how Jeſus was inſulted, before he deſcribes his trial, contrary to the other Evangeliſts, who mention thoſe inſults as ſucceeding his being condemned, it does not follow that he meant to ſay, he was inſulted before his trial. I acknowledge indeed that his judges and their retinue were abundantly capable of being thus unjuſt and barbarous towards him, even before they made the ſhew of condemning him; nevertheleſs, what St. Luke has ſaid here does not neceſſarily oblige us to ſuppoſe this. He might conclude his account of Peter's denials with relating what followed upon our Lord's being condemned, becauſe it happened immediately after the laſt denial, and to ſhew what a load of indignity was laid at once on the Son of God;—Whilſt the moſt zealous of all his diſciples was denying his Lord with oaths and imprecations, the ſervants and others inſulted him in the moſt barbarbarous manner."

Ver. 65. Many other things blaſphemouſly ſpake they] There is ſomething very remarkable in this expreſſion. They charged him with blaſphemy, Matth. xxvi. 65. in aſſerting himſelf to be the Son of God; but the Evangeliſt here fixes that charge on them, becauſe he really was ſo. See Doddridge.

Ver. 66. As ſoon as it was day] When the band of ſoldiers arrived at the high-prieſt's with Jeſus, they found many of the chief prieſts, and ſcribes, and elders aſſembled there. Some perſons of diſtinction however may have been abſent, for whoſe coming they would wait; wherefore, although the ſoldiers brought Jeſus to the high-prieſt's a while after midnight, his trial did not begin till about three in the morning; for if the paſſover this year fell late in April, the ſun muſt at that ſeaſon have ariſen to the inhabitants of Jeruſalem about twenty-three minutes after five, and the day have dawned about fifteen minutes after three: wherefore, ſince St. Luke fixes the appearance of Jeſus before the council to the dawn, his trial muſt have begun about three in the morning. This is confirmed by the account which St. Matthew gives of the hour when Jeſus was led away to the governor, ch. xxvii. 1. The intermediate time between the taking of Jeſus and his trial might have paſſed in procuring witneſſes, in ſending for the abſent members, in gathering the clerks and officers of the court, and in fitting up an apartment for the trial; for that Jeſus was tried by the council, not in the temple, as many ſuppoſe, but in the high-prieſt's palace, is evident from John xviii. 28. where we are told expreſly, that they led Jeſus from Caiaphas's houſe to the prætorium. See Macknight, and on Matth. xxvii. 1.

Ver. 68. If I alſo aſk you, &c.] That is, "If I propoſe the proofs of my miſſion, and require you to give your opinion of them, you will overbear me with renewed violence, and neither acquit nor releaſe me." See on Matth. xxvi. 64.

Ver. 70. Ye ſay that I am] Ye ſay true; for I am. It follows; we have heard of his own mouth. See Mark xiv. 62. Beza, Bengelius, &c.

Ver. 71. We have heard] It was cuſtomary for the Jews to ſuppreſs the word blaſphemy in their diſcourſes relating to it. St. Luke retains this cuſtom; but St. Matthew and St. Mark have added the word, for the ſake of perſpicuity. See Grotius, and on Matth. xxvii. 67.

REFLECTIONS ON OUR SAVIOUR'S AGONY IN THE GARDEN. Ver. 39—46.

What a preface do we hear find to our Saviour's paſſion! an hymn and an agony! a chearful hymn, and an agony no leſs ſorrowful. An hymn begins, both to raiſe and to teſtify the courageous reſolution of his ſuffering; an agony follows, to ſhew that he was truly ſenſible of thoſe extremities wherewith he was reſolved to ſtruggle.

ALL his diſciples bore their part in that hymn; it was fitting they ſhould all ſee his comfortable and divine magnanimity on entering thoſe melancholy liſts: Only three of them ſhall be allowed to be the witneſſes of his agony; only thoſe three who had been the witneſſes of his glorious transfiguration. That ſight had well fore-armed and prepared them for this: how could they be diſmayed to ſee his body now ſweat, which they had then ſeen to ſhine? How could they be

CHAP. XXIII.

Jeſus is accuſed before Pilate, and ſent to Herod: Herod mocketh him. Herod and Pilate are made friends. Barabbas is deſired of the people, and is looſed by Pilate, and Jeſus is given to be crucified: he telleth the women that lament him, the deſtruction of Jeruſalem: and prayeth for his enemies. Two evil-doers are crucified with him: His death: his burial.

AND the whole multitude of them aroſe, and led him unto Pilate.

2 And they began to accuſe him, ſaying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæſar, ſaying, that he himſelf is Chriſt, a King.

3 And Pilate aſked him, ſaying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And he anſwered him and ſaid, Thou ſayeſt it.

4 Then ſaid Pilate to the chief prieſts and to the people, I find no fault in this man.

5 And they were the more fierce, ſaying, He ſtirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place.

daunted to ſee him now accoſted by Judas and his train, whom they ſaw attended by Moſes and Elijah? How could they be diſcouraged to hear the reproaches of baſe men, when they had heard the voice of God to him, from that excellent glory,—This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed.

Now before theſe eyes the Sun of Righteouſneſs begins to be overcaſt with clouds: He began to be ſorrowful, and very heavy. Many ſad thoughts for mankind had he ſecretly indulged, yet ſmothered in his own breaſt:—Now his grief is too great for reſtraint: My ſoul is exceeding ſorrowful, even unto death. O Saviour, what muſt thou needs feel, when thy tongue uttered ſuch a ſentence! Feeble minds are apt to bemoan themſelves upon light occaſions; the grief muſt be violent, that cauſeth a ſtrong heart to burſt forth into a paſſionate complaint. Woe is me! what a word is this for the Son of God? Where is that Comforter whom thou promiſedſt to ſend to others? Where is that Father of all mercies, and God of all comfort, in whoſe preſence is the fulneſs of joy, and at whoſe right-hand there are pleaſures for evermore? Where are thoſe conſtant, thoſe chearful reſolutions of a fearleſs walking through the valley of the ſhadow of death?—Alas! if that face were not hid from thee, whoſe eſſence could not be diſunited, theſe pangs could not have been. The ſun was withdrawn for a while, that there might be night, as in the world around thee, ſo in thy breaſt; withdrawn, in reſpect, not of being, but of ſight;—it was the harſheſt portion of thy ſufferings, that thou muſt be diſconſolate.

But to whom doſt thou make this moan, O thou Saviour of men? What iſſue couldſt thou expect? Thy diſciples might be aſtoniſhed with thy grief; but there is neither power in their hands to free thee from thy ſorrows, nor efficacy in their compaſſion to mitigate them. What creature can help, when thou complaineſt?—It muſt be the ſtronger only that can help the weak.

What human ſoul is capable of conceiving the leaſt of thoſe ſorrows that oppreſſed thine? Thou didſt not only ſay, "My ſoul is troubled;" ſo it often was,—even to tears; but, My ſoul is ſorrowful,—as if it had been before aſſaulted, now poſſeſſed with grief,—and that not in any tolerable moderation;—Changes of paſſion are inherent to every human ſoul; but thine is exceeding ſorrowful;—And yet there are degrees in the very extremities of evils: Thoſe that are moſt vehement, may ſtill be capable of a remedy, at leaſt of a relaxation; thine, however, was paſt all theſe hopes; exceeding ſorrowful, even unto death!

What was it, what could it be, O Saviour, that lay thus heavy upon thy divine ſoul?—Was it the fear of death?—Was it the fore-felt pain, ſhame, torment of thine enſuing crucifixion?—O poor and baſe thoughts of the narrow hearts of cowardly and impotent mortals! How many thouſands of thy bleſſed martyrs have welcomed no leſs tortures with ſmiles and gratulations?—If their weakneſs was thus undaunted and prevalent, what was thy power? O no; it was the ſad weight of the ſin of mankind; it was the heavy burden of thy father's wrath for our ſin, that thus preſſed down thy ſoul, and wrung from thee theſe bitter expreſſions of ſorrow.

What can it avail thee, O Saviour, to tell thy grief to men?—Who can eaſe thee, but He, of whom thou ſaidſt, my Father is greater than I? Lo, to him thou turneſt;—Father, if it be poſſible, let this cup paſs from me!

Was not this that prayer, O bleſſed Lord, which in the days of thy fleſh thou offeredſt up with ſtrong crying and tears, to him that was able to ſave thee from death?—Never was cry ſo ſtrong; never was God thus ſolicited. How could heaven but ſhake at ſuch a prayer from the power that made it? How can my heart but tremble to hear this ſuit from the captain of our ſalvation?

But, O thou that ſaidſt, I and my Father are one,—doſt thou ſuffer aught from thy Father, but what thou wouldeſt, what thou determinedſt? Was this cup of thine or forced or caſual?—Far hence be theſe miſ-raiſed thoughts of ignorance and frailty; Thou cameſt to ſuffer, and thou wouldſt do what thou cameſt for; yet ſince thou wouldeſt be a man, thou wouldeſt take all of man, ſave ſin; it is but human, and not ſinful, to be loth to ſuffer what we may avoid. In this velleity of thine thou wouldſt exhibit what that nature of ours which thou hadſt aſſumed could incline to wiſh; but in thy reſolution thou wouldſt ſhew us what thy victorious thoughts, raiſed and aſſiſted by thy divine power, had determined and appointed;—nevertheleſs, not as I will, but as thou wilt. As man, thou hadſt a will of thine own. No human mind can be perfect without that main faculty; that will, which naturally inclines towards an exemption from miſeries, gladly vails to the divine will whereby thou art appointed to the chaſtiſements of our peace; thoſe pains which in themſelves were grievous, thou embraceſt as decreed, ſo as that thy fear hath given place to thy love and obedience. How ſhould we have known thoſe evils to be ſo formidable, if thou hadſt not in half a thought inclined to deprecate them? How could we have avoided evils ſo formidable and deadly, hadſt not thou willingly undergone them?

Whilſt the mind was in this fearful agitation, no marvel if thy feet were not fixed. One while thou walkeſt to thy drowſy attendants, and ſtirreſt up their vigilancy; then thou returneſt to thy paſſionate devotions. Thou falleſt again upon thy face; thy prayers are ſo much more vehement than thy pangs, as thy ſoul is yet lower than thy humble body:—And being in an agony, he prayed more earneſtly, and his ſweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground.

O my Saviour! what an agony muſt every heart endure which thinks on thine? What pain, what fear, what ſtrife, what horror was in thy ſacred breaſt! How didſt thou ſtruggle under the weight of our ſins, that thus thou ſweateſt, that thus thou bleddeſt!—All was peace with thee: Thou waſt one with thy co-eternal and co-equal Father;—all the angels worſhipped thee; all the powers of heaven and earth awefully acknowledged thine infinity. It was our perſon that enfeoffed and involved thee in this miſery and torment; in that perſon thou ſuſtainedſt thy Father's wrath, and the curſe denounced on man. If eternal death be unſufferable,—if every ſin deſerve eternal death, what, O what was it for thy ſoul, in this ſhort time of thy bitter paſſion, to anſwer thoſe millions of eternal deaths, which all the ſins of all mankind had deſerved from the juſt hands of thy Godhead! I marvel not if thou bleedeſt a ſweat, if thou ſweateſt blood. If the moiſture of that ſweat be from the body, the tincture of it is from the ſoul. As there never was ſuch another ſweat, ſo neither can there ever be ſuch a ſuffering; no wonder if the ſweat were more than natural, when the ſuffering was more than human.

But oh ye bleſſed ſpirits, which came to comfort the afflicted Saviour, how did ye look upon this Son of God, when ye ſaw him labouring for life under theſe violent temptations? ver. 43. With what aſtoniſhment did ye behold him bleeding, whom ye adored? Oh the wiſe and marvellous diſpenſation of the Almighty! whom God will afflict, an angel ſhall relieve. The Son ſhall ſuffer, the ſervant ſhall relieve him: The God of angels droopeth, the angel of God ſtrengthens him!

Bleſſed Jeſu! if, as man, thou wouldeſt be made a little lower than the angels, how can it diſparage thee to be attended and cheared up by an angel? Thine humiliation would not diſdain comfort from meaner hands. How free was it for thy Father to convey ſeaſonable conſolations to thine humbled ſoul, by whatſoever means! Behold, though thy cup ſhall not paſs, yet ſhall it be ſweetened. What though thou ſee not for the time thy Father's face, yet ſhalt thou feel his hand. What could that ſpirit have done without the God of ſpirits? O Father of mercies, thou mayeſt bring thine into agonies, but thou wilt never leave them there. In the midſt of the ſorrows of my heart, thy comforts ſhall refreſh my ſoul; and whatſoever be the means of my ſupport, I know, and I adore the author. Thou wilt not ſuffer us to be tried above that we are able; but wilt with the trial alſo make a way to eſcape, that we may be able to bear it.

Chap. XXIII. Ver. 1, 2. And the whole multitude—aroſe] At break of day Chriſt was brought before Pilate, and charged with three capital crimes,—perverting the nation,—forbidding to give tribute to Cæſar,—and ſaying, that he himſelf was Chriſt, a king. They did not charge him with calling himſelf the Son of God, knowing very well that Pilate would not have concerned himſelf with ſuch an accuſation, which no way affected the ſtate. All the three crimes with which the Jews charge him, were only inferences of theirs from his ſaying that he was the Son of God; (ch. xxii. 70.) They themſelves drew imaginary conſequences from his doctrine, which he had expreſly denied; nay, and taught the contrary: They who oppoſe his followers ſtill uſe the ſame method. Pontius Pilate finding this, (for it is moſt probable that he examined them as to the preciſe words Chriſt had ſpoken,) their accuſation had no weight with him. See Ward's Diſſertations, p. 129. and Locke's Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, p. 146.

6 When Pilate heard of Galilee, he aſked whether the man were a Galilean.

7 And as ſoon as he knew that he belonged unto Herod's juriſdiction, he ſent him to Herod, who himſelf was alſo at Jeruſalem at that time.

8 And when Herod ſaw Jeſus, he was exceeding glad: for he was deſirous to ſee him of a long ſeaſon, becauſe he had heard many things of him; and he hoped to have ſeen ſome miracle done by him.

9 Then he queſtioned with him in many words; but he anſwered him nothing.

10 And the chief prieſts and ſcribes ſtood and vehemently accuſed him.

11 And Herod with his men of war ſet him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and ſent him again to Pilate.

12 And the ſame day Pilate and Herod were made friends together: for before they were at enmity between themſelves.

13 And Pilate, when he had called together the chief prieſts, and the rulers, and the people,

14 Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people: and behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man, touching thoſe things whereof ye accuſe him:

15 No, nor yet Herod: for I ſent you to him; and lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him:

16 I will therefore chaſtiſe him, and releaſe him.

17 (For of neceſſity he muſt releaſe one unto them at the feaſt.)

18 And they cried out all at once, ſaying, Away with this man, and releaſe unto us Barabbas:

19 (Who for a certain ſedition made in the city, and for murder, was caſt into priſon.)

20 Pilate therefore, willing to releaſe Jeſus, ſpake again to them.

Ver. 7. He ſent him to Herod] Herod Antipas, the Tetrarch of Galilee, who had beheaded St. John. Pilate probably ſent Chriſt to Herod, with a deſign to pay him a compliment, and as a means of reconciliation, which it accordingly proved, ver. 12. Another reaſon likewiſe for Pilate's doing this might be to oblige his wife, who had cautioned him by a meſſage to have nothing to do with that juſt man. Matth. xxvii. 19. And he might be further induced to it, in order to eaſe his own conſcience, as being convinced of our Saviour's innocence; and at the ſame time to gratify the Jews, if Herod had thought fit to comply with their ſolicitations. The Roman governors indeed were impowered to puniſh any perſons for crimes committed by them within the limits of their reſpective provinces, even though they belonged to other ſtates and juriſdictions; but yet there appears no irregularity in this procedure of Pilate, nor any thing but what was cuſtomary on ſome occaſions, as we learn from the Roman law. See Ward as above.

Ver. 9. But he anſwered him nothing] Herein our Lord followed the rule obſerved by God in the adminiſtration of his moral government. He beſtows on men means, opportunities, and Aſſiſtances, ſuch as, if they improve them properly, will lead them to knowledge and happineſs; but theſe being ſlighted by men, God, after waiting the determined time, for wiſe reaſons ſhuts up from them all the ſprings of grace, and leaves them hopeleſs of that ſalvation which they have ſo long deſpiſed.

Ver. 11. And Herod, with his men of war, ſet him at nought] Herod finding himſelf diſappointed, ver. 9. ordered Chriſt to be cloathed with an old robe, in colour like thoſe which kings uſed to wear, and permitted his attendants to inſult him, perhaps with an intention to provoke him to work a miracle, though it ſhould have been of an hurtful kind. Our Lord's being dreſſed in this manner by Herod's order, ſhews that the prieſts had accuſed him here alſo of having aſſumed the titles and honours belonging to the Meſſiah, the king of the Jews: for the affront put upon him was plainly in deriſion of that pretenſion. The other head of accuſation,—his having attempted to raiſe a ſedition in Galilee on account of the tribute, they durſt not touch upon, becauſe Herod could not fail to know the groſs falſhood of it. Herod's uſage of our Lord was exceedingly inſolent; but perhaps the remorſe of conſcience which he had felt on account of the murder of John the Baptiſt, might render him cautious how he joined in any attempt on the life of Jeſus, which we do not find that he ever did. The robe in which Herod cloathed our Lord is called εσθητα λαμπραν, that is, either rich or white cloathing; for the epithet λαμπραν denotes both the quality of a garment, and its colour, James ii. 2. White robes, as well as purple, were worn by kings and great men, eſpecially among the Jews. Hence David, deſcribing the flight of the Canaanites, compares the field of battle and the adjacent country to mountains covered with ſnow, on account of the many white upper-garments which their kings and generals threw from them, to render their flight more expeditious; when the Almighty ſcattered kings in it, it was white as ſnow in Salmon. Pſal. lxviii. 14. Hence alſo in the Revelation, white robes are given to the ſaints, as the moſt honourable cloathing. For the ſame reaſon, in the transfiguration, our Lord's garments became whiter than any thing known in nature. So likewiſe the angels who appeared at his ſepulchre in human form, were cloathed in white robes; John xx. 12. Probably alſo it is in alluſion to the Apparel of the Jewiſh princes, that GOD himſelf is repreſented as appearing in the clouds, and on his throne, in robes white as ſnow. See Le Clerc, Calmet, and Doughteius in Analectis, p. 36.

Ver. 12. For before they were at enmity] The cauſe of this enmity can only be conjectured; perhaps it might be the ſlaughter which Pilate had made of ſome of the Galileans, who had come up to ſacrifice at Jeruſalem. See ch. xiii. 1. M. Saurin obſerves, that conſidering on the one hand the jealouſy of the Jews, where any foreign power was concerned, and on the other the oppreſſive meaſures generally taken by thoſe who are inveſted with commiſſions, like this which Pilate bore over conquered countries, and eſpecially the accounts we have of his own bad character and conduct; their reconciliation is much more wonderful than their enmity." See his Sermons, vol. x. p. 246.

Ver. 14. I having examined him, &c.] Had there been any the leaſt appearance of truth in the allegations of the Jews, that Jeſus had perverted the nation,—forbidden to pay tribute to Cæſar,—or drawn the people after him, as their king, Pilate would not ſo readily have pronounced him innocent; therefore, finding a man of that mean condition and innocent life, no mover of ſeditions, or diſturber of the public peace, without a friend or follower, he would have diſmiſſed him as a king of no conſequence; as an harmleſs innocent man, falſely and maliciouſly accuſed by the Jews. Locke.

Ver. 15. Nothing worthy of death is done unto him] By him. Wat. and Blackwall. He has not treated him as one that deſerves a capital puniſhment. Heylin.

Ver. 16. I will therefore chaſtiſe him] Pilate might imagine that Chriſt was an enthuſiaſt; though not a ſeditious perſon; and this puniſhment might be deſigned as an admonition to him in future, not to uſe ſuch expreſſions, as had given ſo much umbrage; being perſuaded, that if he was ſet at liberty, he neither would nor could give them any further trouble. He might likewiſe order Jeſus to be ſcourged, to pacify the Jews, hoping that they would be contented with that leſſer puniſhment, being himſelf fully ſatisfied of his innocence. John xix. 1. It was the cuſtom of the Romans, to ſcourge criminals condemned to crucifixion after they had received their ſentence. See Livy, lib. i. ch. 26. But Chriſt was ſcourged by the order of Pilate, before ſentence was paſſed on him, for the reaſons above-mentioned; and therefore it is thought that during the time he underwent that puniſhment, he was bound to a pillar, and not to his croſs, like thoſe criminals who were ſcourged after their condemnation; as St. Paul afterwards would alſo have been treated, had he not prevented it by pleading his privilege as a Roman citizen. See Ward, as above.

Ver. 17. (For of neceſſity he muſt releaſe one] See on Matth. xxvi. 15. and Mark. xv. 6.

Ver. 18. Away with this man!] Put this man to death! Heylin. The word αιρε properly ſignifies, to take away; and ſo to deprive of life, to lift up, or crucify.

Ver. 20. Pilate ſpake again] But it is not ſaid what he ſpake; ſome therefore, by a ſlight alteration of the text, would read, Pilate therefore ſaid again to them, I will releaſe Jeſus. See Bowyer's Greek Teſtament.

21 But they cried, ſaying, Crucify him, crucify him.

22 And he ſaid unto them the third time, Why, what evil hath he done? I have found no cauſe of death in him: I will therefore chaſtiſe him, and let him go.

23 And they were inſtant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them, and of the chief prieſts, prevailed.

24 And Pilate gave ſentence that it ſhould be as they required.

25 And he releaſed unto them him, that for ſedition and murder was caſt into priſon, whom they had deſired; but he delivered Jeſus to their will.

26 And as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the croſs, that he might bear it after Jeſus.

27 And there followed him a great company of people, and of women, which alſo bewailed and lamented him.

28 But Jeſus turning unto them, ſaid, Daughters of Jeruſalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourſelves, and for your children.

29 For behold, the days are coming, in the which they ſhall ſay, Bleſſed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave ſuck.

30 Then ſhall they begin to ſay to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us.

31 For if they do theſe things in a green tree, what ſhall be done in the dry?

32 And there were alſo two other malefactors led with him to be put to death.

33 And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors; one on the right hand, and the other on the left.

34 Then ſaid Jeſus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and caſt lots.

35 And the people ſtood beholding, And the rulers alſo with them derided him, ſaying, He ſaved others; let him ſave himſelf, if he be Chriſt, the choſen of God.

36 And the ſoldiers alſo mocked him, coming to him, and offering him vinegar, 37 And ſaying, If thou be the king of the Jews, ſave thyſelf.

38 And a ſuperſcription alſo was written

Ver. 22. Why, what evil hath he done?] Why?—What evil hath he done? "Why will ye be ſo cruel as to inſiſt upon it? What evil hath he done, or can you prove againſt him?" See Raphel. Annot. ex Xenoph. p. 64.

Ver. 28—30. Weep not for me, &c.] "Though my death affects you, and ſeems to call for all your tears, yet it is rather a reaſon for joy than ſorrow, as it will be a means of reconciling mankind to God: Rather reſerve your tears for a real calamity which threatens you, and your children, which will terminate in the deſtruction of this city and nation, and which will be moſt terrible, and call for the bittereſt lamentations: For in thoſe days of vengeance, you will vehemently wiſh that you had not given birth to a generation, whoſe wickedneſs has rendered them objects of the divine wrath, to a degree, that never was experienced in the world before. The thoughts of thoſe calamities afflict my ſoul, far more than the feeling of my own ſufferings." Theſe words ſufficiently imply that the days of diſtreſs and miſery were coming, and would fall on them and their children: but at that time there was not any appearance of ſuch an immediate ruin. The wiſeſt politician could not have inferred it from the preſent ſtate of affairs; nothing leſs than the divine preſcience could have certainly ſeen and foretold it. The expreſſion in ver. 30. is proverbial, as appears from Hoſea x. 8. Iſai. ii. 19. and is generally made uſe of to imply the preſſure of ſome intolerable calamity. See Grotius, and Newton on the prophecies, vol. 2.

Ver. 31. For if they do theſe things in a green tree, &c.] If theſe things are done in green wood. Heylin. "If the Romans are permitted by heaven to inflict ſuch heavy puniſhments upon me who am innocent, how dreadful muſt the vengeance be which they ſhall inflict on the nation, whoſe ſins cry aloud to heaven, haſtening the pace of the divine judgements, and rendering the perpetrators as fit for puniſhment, as dry wood is for burning. Comp. Ezek. xx. 47. with Ezek xxi. 3. where God's burning every green and every dry tree, is explained to be his deſtroying the righteous and the wicked together. See alſo Pſ. i. 3. where a good man is compared to a green tree full of leaves; and both Chriſt and John the Baptiſt reſemble bad men to dry, dead, and barren trees. It is proverbial among the Jews, that "two dry ſticks will burn a green one:" that is, the company of two wicked men will corrupt and bring judgements upon a good man. See Prov. xi. 31. 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. Whitby, Druſius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 32. And there were alſo two other malefactors] This ſhould either be ſtopped in the following manner;—And there were alſo two others, malefactors, led with him, &c. or, tranſlated, And they led along with him two other men, who were malefactors. The diſtinction between Jeſus and the malefactors is remarkably preſerved in the next verſe.

Ver. 34. Father, forgive them] This is one of the moſt ſtriking paſſages in the world. While they were actually nailing our Lord to the croſs, He ſeems to feel the injury which they did to their own ſouls, more than what they did to him, and to forget his own anguiſh, in a concern for their ſalvation. Thus did Jeſus Chriſt, though expiring by the tortures which he felt, give us an example of that benevolence which he hath commanded us to practiſe; and with his laſt breath, as it were, breathed out at once a prayer and an apology for his executioners. The Roman ſoldiers, who were the immediate inſtruments of his death, had indeed but little knowledge of him; and the Jews, who were the authors of it, through their obſtinate prejudices, apprehended not who he was: For, if they had known him, they would not have crucified the Lord of life and glory. Inſtead of, They know not what they do; ſome read, They know not what they are doing. See Grotius, the Adventurer, and Doddridge.

Ver. 35. He ſaved others, &c.] They here acknowledge the miracles by which others were ſaved; referring, it is probable, to his raiſing the dead: But they imagined, that now they had found the extent of his power, and that he could not ſave himſelf. Nothing could be baſer than thus to upbraid him with his ſaving power, which was not a vain pretence, but had produced ſo many noble and ſtupendous effects: And it was equally unreaſonable to put the credit of his miſſion on his coming down from the croſs; a vigorous ſpring might poſſibly have forced the nails from the hands and feet of a crucified perſon, ſo that he might have leaped from the croſs. What Chriſt had ſo lately done before their eyes, and in part on themſelves in the garden, was a far more convincing diſplay of the divine power, than, ſurely, to have deſcended now could have been; and though they promiſe, upon this, to believe in him, there is no room to think they would have yielded to conviction. All they meant was to inſult him by it, as thinking it impoſſible he ſhould eſcape out of their hands. See the ſequel to "the Trial of Witneſſes," p. 39. and for more on this ſubject, the note on Matth. xxvii. 41.

Ver. 37. If thou be the king of the Jews, ſave thyſelf] As this claim ſeemed to the ſoldiers moſt derogatory to the Roman authority, it is no wonder that they grounded their inſults on this, rather than on his profeſſing himſelf the Son of God.

Ver. 38. And a ſuperſcription alſo] There is no tranſpoſition neceſſary here; for St. Luke does not tell us when the ſuperſcription was written, ſo far was he from ſaying that it was written after Jeſus was mocked. He only obſerves in general that there was a title placed over him; and by mentioning it, together with the inſults, inſinuates, that it was one of them; and perhaps the Greek may with propriety be ſo rendered, as to introduce this verſe, in explanation of that preceding. For a ſuperſcription was alſo written over him, &c. By which, over him in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew, THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

39 And one of the malefactors which were hanged, railed on him, ſaying, If thou be Chriſt, ſave thyſelf and us.

40 But the other anſwering, rebuked him, ſaying, Doſt not thou fear God, ſeeing thou art in the ſame condemnation?

41 And we indeed juſtly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiſs.

42 And he ſaid unto Jeſus, Lord, remember me when thou comeſt into thy kingdom.

43 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Verily I ſay unto thee, To-day ſhalt thou be with me in paradiſe.

44 And it was about the ſixth hour, and there was darkneſs over all the earth until the ninth hour.

45 And the ſun was darkened, and the veil of the temple was rent in the midſt.

Ver. 44. Matth. xxvii. 45. Mark xv. 33. Or, land.—V. 45. Matth. xxvii. 51. Mark xv. 38.

as well as by common report, theſe ſoldiers were acquainted with his claim to the kingdom of Iſrael. St. John has marked the particular time when the title was written and affixed. See ch. xix. 19.

Ver. 39. And one of the malefactors—railed on him] The word rendered malefactor, κακουργος, does not always denote a thief, or a robber, but was likewiſe applied to the Jewiſh ſoldiers, who were hurried by their zeal to commit ſome crime, in oppoſition to the Roman authority. See the note on Matth. xxvii. 44.

Ver. 40. Doſt thou not fear God] Have you too no fear of God; i. e. no more than thoſe others who were inſulting Jeſus. Heylin.

Ver. 41. And we indeed juſtly] The faith of the penitent thief has ſomething very remarkable in it; for he had conceived juſt ſentiments both of his own conduct, and of Chriſt's character. It is a ſtrong proof of a ſincere repentance to acknowledge our crimes, and to reſign ourſelves to the puniſhment of them. But to this the penitent thief adds the virtues of reproving the other malefactor for his faults, and of defending the innocent. He ſhews his faith in God, the judge and rewarder in a future ſtate; his fear of God, which is the beginning of juſtification, Eccles. i. 28. and his charity; 1. towards God, in reſtraining the blaſphemies offered him and his Chriſt; and 2. to his neighbour, whom he ſo charitably reprehends, ſo earneſtly requeſts not to proceed in his reproaches, ſo lovingly invites to the fear of God, and ſo earneſtly endeavours to amend and reclaim him. In avowing that Chriſt had done nothing amiſs, he diſcovers a remarkable degree of conſtancy, daring to charge the Jewiſh rulers, and Pilate himſelf, in the preſence of their miniſters and ſoldiers, with having condemned him unjuſtly; ſo that the glory which he did to Chriſt by his faith and piety on the croſs, ſeems ſuch as the whole ſeries of a pious life in other men can hardly parallel. It has generally been thought that this grace was begun in the thief, and raiſed to perfection all on a ſudden, and on the preſent occaſion too, when every circumſtance concurred to hinder him from believing; yet it is far from being certain that either his faith or repentance were the fruits of this particular ſeaſon: He was acquainted with our Lord's character before he came to puniſhment, as is plain from the teſtimony he bore to his innocence: This man hath done nothing amiſs. He might therefore have often heard our Lord preach in the courſe of his miniſtry, and might have ſeen many of his miracles, and from the conſideration of both joined together, have been ſolidly convinced that he was the Meſſiah. Nay, it is poſſible that he might have been a good man, as well as a profeſſed diſciple of Chriſt; for his untimely and unfortunate end might have been occaſioned by a ſingle act of groſs wickedneſs, of which he ſincerely repented, and into which ſaints themſelves may fall, through the ſtrength of temptation conſiſtently with their being in a ſtate of grace; witneſs David's adultery and murder. We only ſay, the thing is poſſible; and if it is poſſible, thoſe who encourage themſelves in ſin from this example, as if it was an undoubted inſtance of a late-accepted repentance, proceed upon a ſuppoſition, of the truth of which no man can be certain; while, in the mean time, the doctrine built upon it is of ſuch undeniable importance, that it loudly demands the excluſion of every doubt. Beſides, this is the only paſſage in Scripture which can be alledged in favour of a repentance produced and accepted in the article of death: for the parable of the labourers in the vineyard,—the other paſſage uſually quoted upon this ſubject,—has no relation at all to it. See Matth. xx. Macknight, Whitby, and the Reflections at the end of this chapter.

Ver. 42. Lord, remember me] This man ſeems to have entertained a more rational and exalted notion of the Meſſiah's kingdom, than the diſciples themſelves: They expected nothing but a ſecular empire; he gave ſtrong intimations of his having an idea of Chriſt's ſpiritual dominion; for at the very time that Jeſus was dying on the croſs, he begged to be remembered by him, when he came into his kingdom. It may be ſaid, indeed, that he hoped Jeſus would exert his miraculous power in delivering himſelf from the croſs, and ſetting up his kingdom immediately; but even on this ſuppoſition, his faith, though not clearer and more extenſive, muſt be praiſed as ſtronger than that of the diſciples, who, becauſe their Maſter was crucified, had almoſt univerſally deſpaired of his being the Meſſiah. However, the anſwer which Jeſus made to his requeſt, ver. 43. and his acquieſcence in that anſwer muſt be acknowledged as the ſtrongeſt preſumption in favour of the extenſiveneſs and propriety of his faith. His petition certainly diſcovers great modeſty, humility, and conſciouſneſs of his own demerits. He begged only for a remembrance; he knew himſelf ſo ſinful, that he durſt aſk no more. He owned Chriſt publickly; he pitied him; he prayed to him; he hoped in him; and confeſſed his power and authority in the future world. It muſt be allowed a ſtriking act of faith in this man, to believe, amidſt ſuch circumſtances, that Jeſus was the Juſt one, Chriſt the Lord, and a king about to enter into his kingdom. By whatever marks he diſcovered this truth, he excelled the high-prieſt, the Phariſees, and doctors of the law in his idea of the nature of the Meſſiah's kingdom; nay, and as we have obſerved, he excelled the Apoſtles themſelves, though they had been for ſome years inſtructed by Chriſt himſelf in the nature of that kingdom. The Jewiſh prieſts had condemned Chriſt as an impoſtor; but he owns him to be the king of the Jews. They expected a temporal king; but he ratifies what our Lord had ſaid, and intimates that he knew his kingdom was not of this world. Peter had denied him, when before his judge; but this man, though he ſees him hanging on the croſs, owns him for his Lord. Though he ſaw him expiring, he addreſſes him as the Lord of life. Amidſt his own ſufferings, he regards only the ſufferings of Chriſt, and was raiſed to entertain hopes of the pardon of his ſins, and to a belief of the miſſion of Jeſus. It is but juſtice to this argument, after what we have ſaid on the preceding verſe, to inſert what is urged on the contrary, which we ſhall do in the words of Dr. Doddridge; who obſerves, that ſome have inferred from the words when thou comeſt into thy kingdom, that this malefactor had learned ſomething of Chriſt in priſon;—and have urged the poſſibility of his having exerciſed perhaps a long and deep repentance there againſt the ſuppoſition of the ſudden change, which has been generally imagined in this caſe: But Chriſt's kingdom was now ſo much the ſubject of public diſcourſe, that he might on that day, and indeed in a few minutes of it, have learned all that was neceſſary as the foundation of this petition. I cannot therefore but look on this happy man, for ſuch he ſurely was, amidſt all the ignominy and tortures of the croſs, as a glorious inſtance of the power as well as ſovereignty of divine grace; which as many have obſerved, perhaps taking the firſt occaſion from the preternatural darkneſs, wrought ſo powerfully, as to produce by a ſudden and aſtoniſhing growth in his laſt moments, all the virtues which could be crowded into ſo ſmall a ſpace.

Ver. 43. To-day ſhalt thou be with me in Paradiſe] Bos has ſhewn that this expreſſion, thou ſhalt be with me,—μετ' εμου εση,—was the language uſed when inviting gueſts to an entertainment; and the word Paradiſe originally ſignified a garden of pleaſure, ſuch as thoſe in which the eaſtern monarchs made their magnificent banquets. Here it means the ſame as Abraham's boſom in the ſtory of Lazarus, and it was a common expreſſion amongſt the Jews for the manſion of beatified ſouls in their ſeparate ſtate. Thus the Targum on the 90th Pſalm ſays, "May the pleaſures of Paradiſe, or of the garden of Eden, be from the Lord upon us." The prayer of the Jews for the dead runs thus: "May the Lord remember the ſoul of N. which is gone into the garden of Eden." The confeſſion of a Jew in ſickneſs is this: "I confeſs unto thee, my God, and the God of my fathers, that health and death are in thine hands; may it pleaſe thee to reſtore me to my former health: but if I muſt die, may my death atone for all the ſins, iniquities, and prevarications of which I have been guilty, and grant me my portion in Paradiſe, and remember me in the world to come." One of their prayers for a perſon at the point of death is: "May his ſoul reſt, and may his ſleep be in peace, until the Comforter come! Come ye who keep the treaſures of Paradiſe, open ye the gates of Paradiſe to him, and ſalute him with peace." The Jews were likewiſe of opinion, that only the ſouls of the good had an immediate and quick entrance into theſe regions of bliſs. From our Saviour's uſing this expreſſion of Paradiſe to him it appears, that this dying penitent was a Jew. See Wetſtein, Heylin, and the Reflections.

Ver. 44. Over all the earth] Over all the Land. See Matth. xxvii. 45. and Mark xv. 33.

Ver. 45. The veil of the temple was rent] This being ſo high a day, it was very probable that Caiaphas himſelf might now be performing the ſolemn act of burning incenſe juſt before the veil; which if he did, it is inexpreſſibly aſtoniſhing that his obdurate heart ſhould not be impreſſed with ſo aweful and ſignificant a phænomenon. There is no room to doubt that many of the other prieſts who had a hand in Chriſt's death ſaw the rent of the veil, which, conſidering the texture

46 And when Jeſus had cried with a loud voice, he ſaid, Father, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit: and having ſaid thus, he gave up the ghoſt.

47 Now when the centurion ſaw what was done, he glorified God, ſaying, Certainly this was a righteous man.

48 And all the people that came together to that ſight, beholding the things which were done, ſmote their breaſts, and returned.

49 And all his acquaintance, and the women that followed him from Galilee, ſtood afar off beholding theſe things.

50 And behold, there was a man named Joſeph, a counſellor; and he was a good man, and a juſt:

51 (The ſame had not conſented to the counſel and deed of them;) he was of Arimathea, a city of the Jews: (who alſo himſelf waited for the kingdom of God.)

52 This man went unto Pilate, and begged the body of Jeſus, 53 And he took it down, and wrapped it in linen, and laid it in a ſepulchre that was hewn in ſtone, wherein never man before was laid.

and other circumſtances of it, muſt as fully convince them of the reality of this extraordinary fact, as if they had been preſent when it was rent. The veil of the temple was rent, the wall of ſeparation was broken down, that the Gentiles might come in; and the uſe of the temple, with its typical rites, aboliſhed and ſuperſeded by the death and reſurrection of Chriſt. See Sharpe's Sermon on the Riſe and Fall of Jeruſalem, and the note on Matth. xxvii. 51.

Ver. 46. I commend my ſpirit] Παραθη σομαι,—I place, as a precious depoſit. See on Pſ. xxxi. 5. and for the next clauſe, the note on Matth. xxvii. 50. Dr. Heylin has well and nervouſly deſcribed our Lord's paſſion in the following manner: "The appointed ſoldiers dig the hole, in which the croſs is to be erected,—the nails and the hammer are ready,—the croſs is placed on the ground,—and Jeſus lies down upon that bed of ſorrows,—they nail him to it,—they erect it,—his nerves crack,—his blood diſtils,—he hangs upon his wounds, a ſpectacle to heaven and earth! It is not unuſual for thoſe who ſpeak in public to profeſs that their ſubject ſurpaſſes their utmoſt efforts, and when they have exhauſted their abilities in ſaying all that they poſſibly can, to break off in interjections, and abrupt exclamations of wonder and aſtoniſhment. Whatever may have given occaſion to theſe paſſionate figures of ſpeech, it is ſure that they can never find their place ſo properly as here. For what tongue of man or angel can ſuffice to tell the depth and the height,—the profundity of his ſufferings, and the ſublimity of perfection to which they raiſed him?—We muſt here adore in ſilence what we cannot comprehend." See his Lectures, vol. i. p. 103. and Sir Richard Steele's Chriſtian Hero.

Ver. 47. He glorified God] That is, by a free confeſſion of his perſuaſion of the innocence of Jeſus: Certainly this was a righteous man; δικαιος,—the character given of him before he was condemned, Matth. xxvii. 19. See ch. v. 26. Joſhua vii. 19. and the note on Matth. xxvii. 54. where, as well as Mark xv. 37. the centurion teſtifies that Jeſus is the Son of God. "How then is it, ſay ſome, that St. Luke declares him only a righteous man?" To which it may be replied, that he made uſe of both theſe expreſſions; though others ſeem to ſolve the difficulty better by adding the article ὁ δικαιος, This man was the juſt one, agreeable to the expreſſion of this very writer, Acts vii. 52. xxii. 14. and alſo to James v. 6. See Waſſe Biblioth. Literar. N°. I. p. 25.

Ver. 48. And all the people—ſmote their breaſts] The people who came to behold this melancholy ſpectacle were wonderfully affected when Jeſus gave up the ghoſt. They had been inſtant with loud voices to have him crucified; but now that they ſaw the face of the creation darkened with a ſullen gloom during his crucifixion, and found his death accompanied with an earthquake, as if nature had been in an agony when he died, they rightly interpreted theſe prodigies to be ſo many teſtimonies from God of his innocence; and their paſſions, which had been inflamed and exaſperated againſt him, became quite calm, or moved them in his behalf. Some could not forgive themſelves for neglecting to accept his life, when the governor offered to releaſe him; others were ſtung with remorſe for having had an active hand both in his death, and in the inſults which were offered to him; others felt the deepeſt grief at the thought of his lot, which was undeſervedly ſevere; and theſe various paſſions appeared in their countenances; for they came away from the cruel execution penſive and ſilent, with downcaſt eyes, and hearts ready to burſt, or groaning deeply within themſelves, they ſhed tears, ſmote their breaſts, and bewailed greatly. The grief which they now felt for Jeſus was diſtinguiſhed from their former rage againſt him by this remarkable difference, that their rage was produced intirely by the craft of the prieſts who had wickedly incenſed them; whereas their grief was the genuine and natural feeling of their own hearts, greatly affected with the truth and innocence of him, who was the object of their commiſſeration. Wherefore, as in this mourning flattery had no ſhare, the expreſſions of their ſorrow were ſuch as became a real and unfeigned paſſion. Nor was this the temper only of a few, who may be thought to have been Chriſt's particular friends;—it was the general condition of the people, who had come in great numbers to look on. And the conviction thus produced in them undoubtedly made way for the converſion of ſuch a multitude by the preaching of the Apoſtles on the deſcent of the Spirit, which was but ſeven weeks after, when theſe things were freſh in their memories. See Acts ii. 41. Macknight, Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 49. And all his acquaintance, and the women, &c.] Who theſe acquaintance were, we learn from Matth. xxvii. 55, &c. and Mark xv. 40. The three Evangeliſts agree in affirming that theſe women ſtood afar off; yet this is not inconſiſtent with John xix. 25. where our Lord's mother, and her ſiſter, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalen are ſaid to have ſtood beſide the croſs. They were kept at a diſtance a while perhaps by the guards, or they were afraid to approach; but when the greateſt part of the ſoldiers were drawn off, and the eclipſe was begun, they gathered courage, and came ſo near, that Jeſus had an opportunity to ſpeak to them a little before he expired.

When we call to mind the perfect innocence of the Lord Jeſus, the uncommon love he bore to mankind, and the many ſubſtantial good offices which he did to multitudes groaning under the burden of their afflictions: when we think of the eſteem in which the common people held him all along, how chearfully they followed him to the remoteſt corners of the country, and with what pleaſure they heard his diſcourſes, it cannot but be matter of the greateſt ſurpriſe to find them, at the concluſion, ruſhing all of a ſudden into the oppoſite extremes, and every body as it were combined to treat him with the moſt barbarous cruelty. When Pilate aſked the people if they inclined to have Jeſus releaſed, his diſciples, though they were very numerous, and might have made a great appearance in his behalf, remained quite ſilent. The Roman ſoldiers, notwithſtanding their general had declared him an innocent perſon, moſt inhumanly inſulted him; the Scribes and Phariſees ridiculed him; the common people, who had received him with hoſannahs a few days before, wagged their heads at him, as they paſſed by, and railed on him as a deceiver; nay, the very thief on the croſs reviled him. This ſudden revolution in the humours of the nation may ſeem unaccountable; yet if we could aſſign a proper reaſon for the ſilence of the diſciples, the principles which influenced the reſt might be diſcovered in their ſeveral ſpeeches. Chriſt's followers had attached themſelves to him in expectation of being raiſed to great wealth and power in this kingdom; but ſeeing no appearance at all of what they looked for, they permitted him to be condemned, perhaps becauſe they thought it would have obliged him to break the Roman yoke by miracle. If the reader can trace out a more probable reaſon for their ſilence, when Pilate offered thrice to releaſe their Maſter, and in a manner begged them to aſk his life, his pains in ſuch an inquiry will certainly be well beſtowed. With reſpect to the ſoldiers, they were angry that any one ſhould have pretended to royalty in Judea, where Cæſar had eſtabliſhed his authority: hence they inſulted him with the title of King, and paid him mock honours. As for the common people, they ſeem to have loſt their opinion of him, probably becauſe he had neither convinced the council, nor reſcued himſelf when they condemned him. They began therefore to look upon the ſtory induſtriouſly ſpread abroad of him, viz. his having boaſted that he could deſtroy and rebuild the temple in three days, as a kind of blaſphemy, becauſe it required divine power to execute ſuch an undertaking. Accordingly, in deriſion, they ſaluted him by the title of The deſtroyer and builder again of the temple in three days; and with a malicious ſneer, bade him ſave himſelf, and come down from the croſs; inſinuating that the one was a much eaſier matter than the other. The prieſts and ſcribes were filled with the moſt implacable and diabolical hatred of him, becauſe he had torn off their maſks, and ſhewed them to the people in their true colours; wherefore they ridiculed his miracles from whence he drew his reputation, as a parcel of tricks, by pretending to acknowledge them; but at the ſame time adding a reflection, which they thought intirely confuted them, He ſaved others, himſelf he cannot ſave. To conclude, the impenitent thief alſo fancied that he muſt have delivered both himſelf and them, if he had been the Meſſiah. But as no ſign of ſuch a deliverance appeared, he upbraided him for making pretenſions to that high character, by ſaying, If thou be the Chriſt, ſave thyſelf and us. See Macknight.

Ver. 50. A good man] Αγαθος, an humane and compaſſionate man. He united in his character the two great principles of morality, juſtice and benevolence. See Rom. v. 7.

Ver. 55. And how his body was laid] The word ὡς rendered how, ſignifies him from Galilee, followed after, and beheld the ſepulchre, and how his body was laid.

56 And they returned, and prepared ſpices and ointments; and reſted the ſabbath-day, according to the commandment.

Ver. 56. Exod. xx. 10.

ſignifies no more than that;—and the ſentence may be rendered they came to the ſepulchre, and ſaw that the body was placed or buried there. St. Mark has it, ch. xv. 47. beheld where he was laid. See the Sequel to the Trial of the Witneſſes, p. 73.

Ver. 56. And they—prepared ſpices and ointments, and reſted, &c.] Dr. Waterland connects this verſe with the firſt of the following chapter, thus;—ointments: and they reſted, &c. commandment; But upon the firſt day, &c. As the women were not preſent when Joſeph and Nicodemus bound up the body with ſpices; as it does not appear that they ſaw the body after it was bound up, or if they did, they could not ſee the ſpices, which were hid by the linen winding-ſheet; as they were without, watching, while the body was preparing, and when it was carried out to be buried, went after, to ſee where it was laid, they may be ſuppoſed to have been ignorant of its having been imbalmed, and conſequently were guilty of no impropriety in preparing ingredients for that purpoſe themſelves. But even allowing that they knew what had been done to the body, they could not but know that all was done in great haſte. It cannot be ſaid that as much had been done by Joſeph and Nicodemus as was uſual or neceſſary to be done, and that the whole ceremony was already compleated; this is more than in the nature of the thing is poſſible to be true. No nation was more careful of their dead than the Jews: the body was firſt to be waſhed all over, and cleaned with much care, and afterwards to be anointed; but in regard to Chriſt's body, there was not time before the ſabbbath to perform even thus much of the ceremony. When the body was taken down from the croſs, the evening was coming on, and it was not yet dark when it was left in the ſepulchre. The funeral ceremony therefore, it is plain was not, could not be already compleated. Offices of this ſolemn kind, eſpecially to perſons of diſtinction, were not uſed to be performed the moment they were dead; nor to be huddled up in ſo haſty and negligent a manner. Moſes informs us, that when Jacob was embalmed, no leſs than forty days were employed in the operation; and amongſt the Egyptians, from whom the Jews borrowed this ceremony, no leſs than ſeventy days were required to complete it. Joſeph and Nicodemus intended, no doubt, to interr the body of Chriſt in a manner agreeable to the notion they had of his dignity and character, no leſs than one hundred pounds weight of ſpices and perfumes were provided for this purpoſe; John xix. 39. Not wholly to be employed in preparing the body, but to be burned both before and after it was laid in the ſepulchre, and to be conſumed in other neceſſary offices. The ſepulchre in which the body was laid, was probably not that into which is was to be finally depoſited; it was wrapped up in ſome of the ſpices, and laid there for preſent convenience only, becauſe it happened to be near the place of crucifixion, and becauſe the ſabbath was ſo near, that it was impoſſible to carry it further off. The funeral ceremonies were reſerved to be performed after the ſabbath, had not Providence prevented it by a more wonderful event. Indeed, whether the women were acquainted with the little which had already been done to the body or not, is immaterial: They knew where it had been depoſited, and knew probably that it was afterwards to be removed; they came therefore early in the morning to pay their laſt reſpects to it, by anointing and perfuming it; a common method of ſhewing reſpect to perſons of dignity and diſtinction, both living and dead. See the Sequel to the "Trial of the Witneſſes." p. 73. and the note on Mark xvi. 1.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CONDUCT OF THE TWO THIEVES, Ver. 39—43.

What different effects the judgements of God have upon the minds of men, may be learned from theſe examples now before us. Here are two thieves crucified with our bleſſed Saviour. But mark their end: one died reproaching and blaſpheming Chriſt, and breathed out his ſoul in the agonies of guilt and deſpair; the other ſaw, acknowledged, and openly confeſſed his Redeemer, and expired with the ſound of thoſe bleſſed words in his ears, This day ſhalt thou be with me in paradiſe. How adorable is the wiſdom of God, who has thus inſtructed us; and by ſetting the examples of his juſtice and mercy ſo near together, has taught us to fear without deſpair, and to hope without preſumption!

Who would not tremble for himſelf, when he ſees the man periſh in his ſins who died by his Saviour's ſide, within reach of that blood which was poured out for his redemption; within reach of that hand which alone is able to ſave?—Yet he who had all theſe advantages enjoyed none of them; but died in his ſins, void of hope and comfort.

Muſt the ſinner then deſpair?—No; caſt your eyes on the other ſide of the croſs, and ſee the mercy of God diſplayed in the brighteſt colours. There hangs the penitent, ſurrounded with all the terrors of approaching death;—yet in the midſt of all, calm and ſerene; confeſſing his ſins, glorifying the juſtice of God in his own puniſhment, rebuking the blaſphemy of his companion, juſtifying the innocence of his Saviour, and adoring him, even in the loweſt ſtate of miſery; and at laſt receiving the certain promiſe of a glorious immortality.

Thus the caſe ſtands, with all the allowances made to it, which ſeem moſt to favour a death-bed repentance: And yet, as if the Scripture had ſaid nothing of the wretch who died blaſpheming Chriſt, nor given us any cauſe to fear that a wicked life may end in an obdurate death; the caſe of the penitent only is drawn into example, and ſuch hopes are built upon it, as are neither conſiſtent with the laws of God, nor the terms of man's ſalvation.

But allowing the caſe of the penitent thief to be what it is generally ſuppoſed, yet, after we have briefly conſidered the circumſtances which diſtinguiſh it from that of the dying Chriſtian, it will ſeem not very difficult to ſhew, how little hope the preſent example affords.

Perhaps in all this relation before us, there may be nothing reſembling a death-bed repentance. It is no uncommon thing for malefactors to lie in priſon a long time before they are brought to trial and execution; and if that is the preſent caſe, there is room enough for the converſion of this criminal before he came to ſuffer. The circumſtances incline this way. How came he to be ſo well acquainted with the innocency of Chriſt? How came it into his head to addreſs him in the manner he does; Lord, remember me when thou comeſt into thy kingdom? ver. 42. What were the marks of royalty diſcoverable on the croſs? What the ſigns of dignity and power? What could lead him to think that his fellow-ſufferer had a title to any kingdom? What to imagine that he was Lord of the world to come? Theſe circumſtances make it probable that he had elſewhere learned the character and dignity of Chriſt, and came perſuaded of the truth of his miſſion:—But what is this to them, who have no deſire to lie down Chriſtians upon their death-bed, though they would willingly go off penitents.

Beſides, ſuppoſe this great work were begun and finiſhed on the croſs, yet it cannot be drawn into example by Chriſtian ſinners; becauſe the converſion of a Jew, or an heathen, is one thing, and the repentance of a Chriſtian is another. If a heathen ſins, he ſins under thoſe infirmities for which Chriſt died; but the Chriſtian ſins under the uſe of all the remedies which the Goſpel has provided, and which were purchaſed for him by his dying Redeemer. From the natural condition of man after the fall, the ignorant and unenlightened ſinner has a right to plead many arguments of pity and compaſſion in his own behalf. His is the common cauſe of mankind; and nature, with unutterable groans, cries for him and all her children before her great Creator.

But what ſhall the dying Chriſtian ſay, after an hardened life of ſin and impenitence? What words ſhall we put into his mouth to appeaſe the anger of his injured Redeemer? You may ſpend your time in lamenting your paſt folly, but with what language will you approach to God? You have neither ignorance nor weakneſs to plead: You were enlightened by his word; and his Holy Spirit was ever ready to aſſiſt you, had you been ready to endeavour after holineſs. What will you then ſay, when, frighted and amazed, you call for mercy at your laſt moments! Let the reader conſider this calmly, and he will find that the wicked Chriſtian's caſe is ſo much worſe than this penitent's on the croſs, that there can be no reaſon for him to encourage himſelf upon this example, or to hope for the ſame mercy, when his caſe will be ſo greatly different. But again,

He that ſins in hopes of repenting at laſt, may ſin ſo far as to grow obdurate, and incapable of repentance when the time comes. Look upon the impeninent thief in this view; who, though he had certainly all the outward advantages which the penitent had, yet made no advances towards repentance, but died reproaching Chriſt, and joining with his crucifiers in that bitter jeer, ver. 39. If thou be the Chriſt, come down from the croſs. Now to what can this, and numerous circumſtances like this, be attributed, but to the deſertion of God's Holy Spirit, which will not always ſtrive with ſinners, but ſometimes leaves them to periſh in the hardneſs of their hearts.

And hence it comes to paſs, that when theſe ſinners lie down upon a ſick bed, they often want both the will and the power to aſk forgiveneſs of God; and by an habitual neglect of all parts of religion, become unable to perform any; even that, in which all their hopes centered, and are included,—to repent of, and aſk pardon for their ſins.

Nor is it in the power of man to ſin to what degree he pleaſes, or to preſerve a ſenſe of religion amidſt the pleaſures of iniquity. Habits grow inſenſibly: There is a kind of mechaniſm in it, and he that gives himſelf up to ſin, can no more reſolve how great a ſinner he will be, than he that is born a man can reſolve how tall or how ſhort of ſtature he will be. To the truth of this, experience daily witneſſes: Happy thoſe who want this fatal experience! Upon the whole, there is much more reaſon to fear that ſin, if once indulged, ſhould get the better of, and deſtroy every reſolution of repentance, than that the reſolutions to repent ſhould ever conquer and deſtroy the confirmed powers and habits of ſin. I wiſh thoſe who have not yet put it out of their own power to reaſon calmly upon theſe things, would enter into this debate with their own hearts, and conſider what danger they are in. A few moments cannot be too much to ſpend in ſo weighty an affair; and whenever we retire to theſe cool thoughts, may the Father of mercies influence thoſe moments of our life, upon which all ETERNITY depends.

But could you preſerve your reſolutions of repentance, yet ſtill it is not in our own power to ſecure an opportunity to execute them. The penitent thief upon the croſs died a violent death by the hands of juſtice; he had no pretence to defer his repentance in proſpect of a future

CHAP. XXIV.

Chriſt's reſurrection is declared by two angels to the women that come to the ſepulchre: theſe report it to others, Chriſt himſelf appeareth to the two diſciples that went to Emmaus. Afterward he appeareth to the apoſtles, and reproveth their unbelief: giveth them a charge: promiſeth the Holy Ghoſt: and ſo aſcendeth into heaven.

NOW upon the firſt day of the week, very early in the morning, they came unto the ſepulchre, bringing the ſpices which they had prepared, and certain others with them.

2 And they found the ſtone rolled away from the ſepulchre.

3 And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jeſus.

4 And it came to paſs, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men ſtood by them in ſhining garments:

Ver. 1. Matth. xxviii. 1. Mark xvi. 1. John xx. 1.

a future opportunity; nor was his heart to be allured by the ſoft pleaſures of life, when life itſelf was ſo near expiring. From the like death God defend us all! And yet without it, which of us can hope for ſuch favourable circumſtances for repentance? Whenever the ſinner thinks of repenting, he will find that he has a work of great ſorrow and trouble upon his hands; and this makes him unwilling to ſet about it. No man is ſo old, but that he thinks he may laſt out one year more; and then, why will not to-morrow ſerve for repentance as well as to-day? The years to come which men rejoice in, ſerve only to make them negligent and thoughtleſs of the great concerns of immortality: And whether men are not deluded by theſe hopes, let any one judge; and hence it comes to paſs that very few, who ſin with reſolutions of repentance, ever think of it till confined to a ſick bed; becauſe, as long as they are in health, they have always a ready anſwer, "It will be time enough hereafter." So that the unfortunate end to which juſtice brought this penitent on the croſs, was with reſpect to his converſion, an advantage which few Chriſtians will give themſelves: The certainty of his death made his repentance certain, permitted him no delays, no vain excuſes, no flattering hopes of better opportunities hereafter.

But, conſidering that Chriſtians who propoſe to themſelves the example before us, ſeldom repent till warned by ſickneſs to prepare for death; they will evidently want another advantage which this penitent had. His death not being the effect of any bodily pain or diſtemper, but of the judge's ſentence, he brought with him to the croſs,—which, if you pleaſe, you may call his death-bed,—a ſound body and mind. He had his ſenſes perfect, his reaſon freſh and undiſturbed, and was capable of performing ſuch acts of faith and devotion, as were neceſſary to his repentance and converſion.

But, how different often is the caſe of the ſick and languiſhing ſinner! Perhaps he labours under ſuch acute pains, as will give him no reſpite for thought or reflection; or perhaps he doſes, and lies ſtupid, without knowing his friends and relations, or even himſelf; or perhaps, the diſtemper ſeizes his head,—and he raves, and is diſtracted;—loſes his reaſon, and every thing of the man, but the outward ſhape, before his death!—And are not theſe hopeful circumſtances for repentance?—Is a man likely to know, and find out his Saviour, when he knows not even his own brother who ſtands by his bed-ſide?—Theſe are very common circumſtances, and ſuch as render repentance impracticable.

But ſhould the ſinner eſcape all theſe accidents, and go off gently, without being forſaken by his ſenſe or reaſon; yet ſtill it may happen, and often it does,—that his promiſed repentance produces nothing but horror and deſpair! In his life-time he flattered himſelf with unreaſonable hopes of mercy, and now,—he begins to ſee how unreaſonable they were. Now he can think of nothing, but that he is going to appear before his Judge, to receive the juſt reward of his wickedneſs. He ſees him already, cloathed with wrath and majeſty; and forms within his own tormented breaſt the whole progreſs of the laſt day. If he ſleeps, he dreams of judgement and miſery; and when he wakes, believes his dreams forebode his fate. Thus reſtleſs and uneaſy, thus void of comfort and hope, without confidence to aſk pardon, without faith to receive it, does the wretched ſinner expire, and has the misfortune to ſee his hopes die before him! In a word then, put all the favourable circumſtances together that you can imagine; bring the ſinner by the gentleſt decays to his latter end; give him the faireſt and the longeſt warning; yet ſtill you give him no ſecurity. Nothing but an extraordinary degree of grace can preſerve him in a temper fit for true repentance. And whether thoſe who have lived under the continual calls of grace to holineſs; who have rejected the counſel of God whilſt they had health and ſtrength to ſerve him, ſhall be thought worthy of ſuch extraordinary mercy at laſt, let any reaſonable man judge.

Chriſt came to deſtroy ſin, and the works of the devil; but were men promiſed forgiveneſs upon the account of a few ſighs and tears at laſt, this would effectually eſtabliſh and confirm the kingdom of Satan. Though God has promiſed pardon to penitent ſinners, yet his promiſe muſt be expounded ſo, as to be conſiſtent with his deſign in ſending Chriſt into the world. In a word, we have the promiſes of the Goſpel ſet before us, we have the mercies of God in Chriſt offered to us; if we will accept them, and do our part, happy are we; but if we are for finding out new ways to ſalvation, if we ſeek to reconcile the pleaſures and profits of ſin with the hopes of the Goſpel, we do but deceive ourſelves; for God is not mocked, nor will he regard thoſe who make ſuch perverſe uſe of his mercy.

What then remains, but that all who love their own ſouls, ſeek the Lord whilſt haply he may be found; and work for their ſalvation whilſt they have the light; for the night cometh, when no man can work. The night cometh on apace, and brings with it a change, which every mortal muſt undergo. Then ſhall we be forſaken of all our pleaſures and enjoyments, and deſerted by thoſe gay thoughts which now ſupport our fooliſh hearts againſt the fears of religion. The time cometh,—and who, O Lord, may abide its coming!—when we muſt all ſtand before the judgement-ſeat of Chriſt; when the higheſt and the loweſt ſhall be placed on the ſame level, expecting a new diſtribution of honours and rewards. In that day, the ſtouteſt heart will tremble, and the countenance of the proudeſt man will fall, in the preſence of his injured Lord. I ſpeak not to you the ſuggeſtion of ſuperſtition or fear, but the words of ſoberneſs, and of truth. May they ſink into our hearts, and yield us the fruits of ſpiritual joy and comfort here, and of glory and immortality hereafter! See Bp. Sherlock's Diſcourſes, vol. ii. diſc. 10.

Chap. XXIV. Ver. 1. And certain others with them] By theſe other women muſt be meant ſome beſides thoſe who had followed Jeſus from Galilee; of whom alone St. Luke ſpeaks in the former part of this verſe, and the latter part of the preceding chapter. By theſe, therefore, as contra-diſtinguiſhed from the Galilean women, he probably means the women of Jeruſalem, a great number of whom followed Jeſus as he was going to his crucifixion, ch. xxiii. 27. But what number of them went upon this occaſion out of Galilee is not any were ſaid. Neither of theſe are any other named, than Joanna, Mary Magdalen, Mary the mother of James, and Salome, though many others followed Jeſus from Galilee to Jeruſalem, and were preſent at his crucifixion. See Matth. xxvii. 55. Mark xv. 41. It is therefore probable, that moſt, if not all thoſe who were wont to miniſter to him in Galilee, who attended him to Jeruſalem, and accompanied him to mount Calvary, contributed to this pious office, of embalming their Maſter's body, either by buying and preparing the ſpices, or by going to aſſiſt their companions in embalming the body, and rolling away the ſtone, for which purpoſe we may ſuppoſe the women of Jeruſalem principally attended, ſince none of them ſeem to have made any purchaſe of ſpices for the embalming: And for this laſt purpoſe it is further probable, they thought their number ſufficient. To diſtinguiſh thoſe women who made their report to the diſciples from the others who came with them, St. Luke adds the words in ver. 10. It is obſervable that St. Mark, chap. xvi. 1. ſays of the women mentioned by him no more than that they had bought ſpices to anoint the body; enough to ſhew with what intent they went to the tomb; that they had any ſpices with them, he does not ſay: But St. Luke ſays, that they actually brought the ſpices with them; and not only ſo, but that they had prepared them, i. e. made them fit for the uſe intended. The ſeveral drugs were bought ſingly, each by itſelf, at the ſhop, and were neceſſarily to be mixed or melted together for uſe; and we may imagine, that though all the women joined in buying the ſpices, yet the care of getting and preparing them was left particularly to the women firſt mentioned by St. Luke; but as they were Galileans, and not at home at Jeruſalem, and probably unacquainted with the method of embalming bodies, it is moſt likely they employed ſome inhabitants of the place to buy and prepare the ſpices, and to go with them to apply them to the body; and theſe are the others with them here mentioned. This will account for St. Matthew's ſaying nothing of the ſpices, ch. xxviii. 1. for the women there ſpoken of had none with them: they ſet out before thoſe who were to bring the ſpices, to ſee what condition the ſepulchre was in; and this is properly expreſſed by the words to ſee, or take a view of the ſepulchre. We may obſerve further, that it was a circumſtance of decency, conſidering the office they intended to perform, that the men and the women ſhould perform their reſpective parts in it by themſelves, which accordingly the Evangeliſts plainly intimate they did. Their ſetting out alone was a remarkable inſtance of their zeal and courage; perhaps ſome appointment might be made with Peter and John (who were early up on this occaſion) either to meet them, or come after them, to aſſiſt in removing the ſtone, though not in embalming the body. See on Matth. xxviii. 1. Doddridge, and Weſt on the Reſurrection.

Ver. 4. And it came to paſs, as they were much perplexed thereabout, &c.] This threw them into great perplexity, when on a ſudden two men ſtood, &c. It ſeems probable from hence, that the angels diſappeared at certain times; for the words intimate, that the women did not ſee

5 And as they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they ſaid unto them, Why ſeek ye the living among the dead?

6 He is not here, but is riſen: remember how he ſpake unto you when he was yet in Galilee,

7 Saying, the Son of man muſt be delivered into the hands of ſinful men, and be crucified, and the third day riſe again.

Ver. 5. Or, him that liveth?—V. 6. Matth. xvi. 21. xvii. 23. Mark ix. 31. Ch. ix. 22.

them at their firſt entrance into the ſepulchre, and that their appearance was ſudden, and occaſioned a ſurprize. The Evangeliſt here calls them men; but ver. 23. he calls them angels. The truth is, angels are ſometimes called men, becauſe they appeared in the human form. See Gen. xviii. 2.—and Mark xvi. 5. where one angel only is mentioned under the appellation of a young man; from whence ſome have inferred, that the tranſaction there mentioned was different from this before us: but be that as it may, it is eaſy to account for the preſence of two angels, though only one of them might be ſeen by ſome of thoſe who came to view the ſepulchre. If the reader will attend to the ſuppoſed form of the ſepulchre, and to the poſition of our Lord's body therein, he will find this method of reconciling the Evangeliſts eaſy, natural, and probable. The ſepulchre ſeems to have been a ſquare room, hewn out of a rock, partly above-ground, its roof being as high as the top of the door which formed its entrance. The door opened upon a ſtair, which ran down ſtrait to the bottom of the ſepulchre, along the ſide of the left wall. Having therefore carried the body down with its feet foremoſt, they would naturally place it lengthwiſe by the right ſide wall of the ſepulchre, in ſuch a manner, that its head lay pointing towards what might be called the front, had the ſepulchre been wholly above-ground, and its feet to the back wall. They laid the body on the floor, cloſe to the right ſide wall of the ſepulchre, becauſe in that poſition it was moſt out of the way of thoſe who might come down. This deſcription is agreeable to the accounts which travellers give us of the Jewiſh ſepulchres; particularly Mr. Maundrell, who was on the ſpot, and ſaw ſeveral of them. They were generally caves, or rooms hewn out out of rocks; and as the Jews did not make uſe of coffins, they placed their dead ſeparately in niches or little cells cut into the ſides of theſe caves or rooms. But Joſeph's ſepulchre being a new one, was in all probability unfiniſhed; and particularly it might have no niches cut into the ſides where they could depoſit the dead, for which reaſon they laid Jeſus on the floor, (ſee John xx. 12.) in the manner deſcribed, intending, when the ſabbath was paſt, to remove him to ſome finiſhed burial-place. See John xix. 42. Admitting theſe ſuppoſitions,—moſt of which are founded on ſome authority, and all of them perfectly natural,—the women intending to ſearch the ſepulchre a ſecond time, might, as ſoon as they came upon the threſhold, ſee the angel, who ſat on the right ſide, where the feet of Jeſus had been; that is, who ſat in the furthermoſt right corner of the ſepulchre: and though his companion, who ſat on the ſame ſide at the head, or in the hithermoſt right corner, had been then viſible, they would not have obſerved him; ſo that, at the firſt, they muſt have ſeen one angel only, as St. Matthew and St. Mark tells us: but ſtepping down the ſtair upon the invitation of the angel who appeared, they got the whole cavity of the ſepulchre under their eye, and diſcovered the other heavenly meſſenger. Thus they ſaw two angels, as St. Luke affirms. Beſides, the brilliant appearance of him who ſpake to them might ſo fix their eyes, as to hinder them from taking notice of his companion, till, landing at the bottom of the ſtairs, they turned themſelves about upon the floor. Their fear and confuſion alſo might have ſome influence upon them.—The word επίϛησαν, which we render ſtood by, does not imply that the angels at their firſt appearance were cloſe by the women; this is proved from Geneſis xviii. 2.—LXX: where, though it be ſaid, that Abraham lift up his eyes, and looked, and lo three men,—εϛηκεισαν επανω αυτȣ,—ſtood by him, it is added, that when he ſaw them, he ran to meet them from the tent-door, which ſhews that they were at ſome diſtance from him; wherefore επίϛησαν αυταις in St. Luke, anſwering to εϛηκεισαν επανω αυτῶν, ſignifies ſimply they appeared unto them: If ſo, we may ſuppoſe that both the angels were in a ſitting poſture when they ſhewed themſelves to the women, becauſe St. Mark expreſly affirms it of the one whom he mentions ch. xvi. 5. and becauſe they ſhewed themſelves in this poſture afterwards to Mary Magdalene, John xx. 12. However, if the reader is not ſatisfied with this ſolution, the Evangeliſts may eaſily be reconciled, by ſuppoſing that the angel, of whom St. Mark ſpeaks, aroſe when the women went down into the ſepulchre.—It may be proper, and perhaps agreeable to the reader to obſerve, that it cannot be objected to the deſcription of our Lord's ſepulchre given above, that what is ſhewn at this day as his ſepulchre is of a different form; for the real ſepulchre being originally a matter of private property, muſt have paſſed from one owner to another, and of courſe have undergone various changes; eſpecially as it does not appear that the firſt Chriſtians were led to preſerve it, from that veneration for places and things which in later ages engroſſed the attention of the world. Beſides, it ſhould be conſidered that though ſuperſtition taught Chriſtians very early to venerate and perpetuate things of this kind, yet their enemies, on the other hand, would do what they could to deſtroy them, as having a tendency to confirm the followers of the new religion in their opinions; and therefore, if our Lord's ſepulchre was viſited by Chriſtians before they obtained the protection of the civil government in Judea, the rulers would certainly deſtroy it. Nor is this ſuppoſition rendered improbable by the accounts which are given of the ſepulchre as ſubſiſting in later times; for when the Roman empire became Chriſtian, and ſuperſtition grew apace, the monks would repair the repoſitory of our Lord's body; or if it was intirely deſtroyed, would make a new one to ſupply its place. Farther, it ought to be conſidered, that although the ſepulchre had actually ſubſiſted ſafe till it came into the poſſeſſion of the monks, it was liable to many accidents after that period: For during the wars which the Mahometans waged with the Chriſtians about the poſſeſſion of the Holy Land, it is natural to ſuppoſe, that when the former carried their victorious arms into Judea, they would deſtroy every monument of Chriſtianity, as well as of learning. After they were driven out indeed, the Chriſtians would be equally aſſiduous to repair the devaſtations occaſioned by the Mahometans; and in particular they would take care not be without the holy places, ſo neceſſary to the ſuperſtition of the times. What confirms this conjecture is, that in the deſcription given of thoſe places, as they now ſubſiſt, things evidently and groſly fictitious are found. For example, before our Lord's ſepulchre there lies a great marble ſtone, on which they affirm his body was anointed; and near at hand is another ſepulchre, in which Joſeph of Arimathea is ſaid to have been buried: Nay, they even ſhew the room where the virgin Mary was ſaluted by the angel, with many other things, the knowledge of which could not poſſibly have been preſerved during the courſe of ſo many ages. Farther, it is certain that the ſepulchre in Bede's time was different not only from what it is at preſent, but from that which the Evangeliſts have deſcribed: for he tells us, that the travellers of thoſe days affirmed it had a niche, into which our Lord's body was put; whereas from John xx. 11, 12. it appears, that his body was laid on the floor. See Maldonat on Matth. xxvii. 60. Maundrell and Sandys's Travels, and Macknight.

Ver. 5—7. And bowed down their faces] Theſe words do not intimate their proſtrating themſelves before the angels, but a reſpectful and reverential declining their heads, and looking downward, that they might not appear to gaze, which is well known to have been forbidden to the Jews, upon the ſight of a celeſtial viſion. See Exod. xix. 21. Judges xiii. 20. And it was alſo conſidered as dangerous by the heathens, when their deities, or any celeſtial meſſengers from them, were ſuppoſed to make themſelves viſible.—Becauſe the women were exceedingly afraid when the firſt angel appeared, he ſpake to them with the moſt condeſcending mildneſs. See Matth. xxviii. 5. but now that their terror was a little abated, and they were come down into the ſepulchre, he chid them gently, for ſeeking the living among the dead. By which we are not to underſtand their coming down to the ſepulchre, in obedience to his invitation; but their having brought ſpices to the ſepulchre with an intention to do their Maſter an office, which belonged only to the dead; for this is a clear proof of their not entertaining the leaſt thought of his reſurrection. Accordingly he found fault with them alſo for not believing the things which Jeſus had ſpoken to them in Galilee concerning his riſing from the dead on the third day. See ch. xviii. 31—33. Or rather for not remembering them, ſo as to have had ſome hopes of his reviving again. Remember how he ſpake, &c. This familiar manner in which the angel ſpeaks of what paſſed between them and Jeſus in Galilee, ſeems to intimate, that he had then been preſent, though inviſible, and heard what Jeſus ſaid. The hint ſuggeſts many agreeable reflexions, which the pious reader will dwell upon at pleaſure. See the note on Mark xvi. 7. St. Luke having no intention to tell which of the angels ſpake, attributes to them both words, which in the nature of the thing could be ſpoken only by one of them; perhaps the one mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark. See on Matth. xxvii. 44. Further, as it is the cuſtom of the ſacred hiſtorians to mention one perſon or thing only, even in caſes where more were concerned, the difficulty ariſing from St. Luke's ſpeaking of two angels, and the reſt but of one, would have been nothing, becauſe we might have ſuppoſed that all the women went into the ſepulchre together, as St. Luke tells us; and that when they did not find the body, they diſpatched Mary Magdalen immediately into the city with an account of the matter; and that when ſhe was gone, the angels appeared unto the reſt, while they were yet in the ſepulchre. But as St. Luke affirms that they had ſearched the ſepulchre, and were in perplexity on account of the body's being away before the angels appeared; and as St. Matthew intimates that they were out of the ſepulchre when they ſaw the viſion he ſpeaks of, we are obliged to make the ſuppoſition, that the women, after miſſing the body, came out of the ſepulchre, and ſearched for it up and down the garden; then went a ſecond time, and diſcovered the angels as they entered; for they were ſtill in perplexity when the heavenly meſſengers ſpoke to them, which is all that St. Luke affirms; and as there is nothing in his narration forbidding us to make this ſuppoſition, ſo the circumſtance taken notice of by St. John, ch. xxii. that Mary Magdelen told the Apoſtles, that they had taken away the Lord's body, obliges us to make it: for if when ſhe entered into the ſepulchre with her companions, the angel had appeared to them, and told them, that Jeſus was riſen, ſhe could not have ſpoken in this manner to the Apoſtles. St. Luke indeed joins the appearance of the two angels with the account which he gives of the perplexity of the women, occaſioned by their not finding the body, becauſe he did not judge it worth while to diſtin-

8 And they remembered his words,

9 And returned from the ſepulchre, and told all theſe things unto the eleven, and to all the reſt.

10 It was Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women that were with them, which told theſe things unto the apoſtles.

11 And their words ſeemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not.

12 Then aroſe Peter, and ran unto the ſepulchre; and ſtooping down, he beheld the linen clothes laid by themſelves, and departed, wondering in himſelf at that which was come to paſs.

13 And behold, two of them went that ſame day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jeruſalem about threeſcore furlongs.

14 And they talked together of all theſe things which had happened.

15 And it came to paſs, that while they communed together, and reaſoned, Jeſus himſelf drew near, and went with them.

16 But their eyes were holden, that they ſhould not know him.

guiſh the appearance of the one angel while the women were on the top of the ſtairs, from the appearance of both the angels after they were come down, as they happened in cloſe ſucceſſion. St. Matthew and St. Mark have ſupplied this defect, by informing us, that immediately upon their entering, the women ſaw an angel, who told them Jeſus was riſen, and deſired them to come down, and ſee the place where the Lord lay. Inſtead of, Why do ye ſeek the living among the dead, ver. 6. Dr. Heylin reads, Why ſeek ye, among the dead, Him, who is alive?

Ver. 9—11. And returned from the ſepulchre, &c.] Theſe words may be rendered, And turning back from the ſepulchre, they told all theſe things to the eleven, and to all the reſt, ver. 10. Now they who related theſe things to the Apoſtles, were Mary Magdalen, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and the reſt with them, i. e. of their company. As the account of the Galilean women begins in the foregoing chapter, and is carried on without any interruption to the 9th verſe of the preſent; ſo that the ſeveral verbs occurring in this and the preceding verſes are all governed by the ſame nominative caſe, namely, the women, (ch. xxiii. 55.) it is evident that the words all theſe things muſt be taken to extend to all the particulars mentioned in that account, and cannot be confined to the tranſactions of the ſepulchre only; and the ſame obſervation holds equally with the expreſſion theſe things, ver. 10. The utmoſt therefore that can be inferred from St. Luke's naming Mary Magdalen and the other Mary is, that they were concerned in ſome or other of theſe tranſactions, and joined in relating ſome of theſe things to the Apoſtles; which is true: for they ſat over-againſt the ſepulchre when Joſeph laid in it the body of the Lord; They alſo bought ſweet ſpices, that they might come and anoint him; and they were the firſt who came to the ſepulchre that morning, and brought the firſt account of the body's being miſſing; and though by comparing the accounts given by the Evangeliſts with this of St. Luke, it appears that neither of theſe women went with Joanna and her company to the ſepulchre; yet as they were Galilean women, and bore a part, and a principal part too, in what the women of Galilee were then chiefly employed about, namely, the care of embalming the body of Jeſus, there is certainly no impropriety in St. Luke's naming them with Joanna and the reſt, as he does in the end of the general collective account he gives of what was reported and done by the Galilean women: neither does his naming them appropriate to them any particular part of that general account, any more than his not naming them would have excluded them from their ſhare in thoſe tranſactions, and the report then made to the Apoſtles. In this caſe they would have been included in the general terms of the Galilean women, as by being named they are diſtinguiſhed and marked as the moſt eminent perſons and leaders of that company who followed Jeſus out of Galilee. See Weſt on the Reſurrection, and the on note John xx. 4, &c.

Ver. 11. Their words ſeemed to them as idle tales] Their Maſter's crucifixion gave ſuch a ſevere blow to their faith, that they laid aſide all the thoughts which they had entertained of his being the Meſſiah, and therefore they had not the leaſt expectation of his reſurrection, notwitſtanding he had often predicted it to them; nay, they looked upon the ſtory which the women told them about it as a mere chimera, the deluſion of a diſordered imagination. It may ſeem ſtrange, that in the accounts which the Evangeliſts have given of our Lord's reſurrection, there is not the leaſt mention made of the diſciples meeting one another by the way, although they went ſeveral times backwards and forwards in ſeparate companies, between their lodging in the city and the ſepulchre. On the contrary, the circumſtances of the hiſtory obliges us to ſuppoſe that they did not meet one another. But there is nothing improbable in this; for as Jeruſalem was a great city, the Apoſtle's lodging might be at the diſtance of a mile or two from that extremity of it which was neareſt to the ſepulchre, and therefore from their lodging to the ſepulchre there might be ſeveral different ways through the city, all equally convenient. Further, Calvary, where our Lord was crucified, is ſaid to have been nigh to the city; John xix. 20. but it would be nigh, though it was at the diſtance of half a mile. Suppoſe it, however, to have been only a little more than a quarter of a mile. In this place, or nigh to it, εν τοπῳ was the garden where our Lord was buried; (John xix. 41.) Yet the garden might be on the ſide of Calvary which was furtheſt from Jeruſalem; wherefore, as it was a ſpacious garden, the ſepulchre could not well be nearer to the city than half a mile. It may, however, have been at the diſtance of a whole mile, conſiſtently enough with the deſcription which John hath given of its ſituation. On either ſuppoſition, there may have been different roads from Joſeph's villa and garden to the city. Beſides, as Jeruſalem was walled round, the Apoſtles lodgings might be ſo ſituated, that perſons going from thence to Joſeph's garden could come out of the city by two different gates. To conclude, the garden where the ſepulchre was might have more doors than one, and ſeveral ſhady walks in it, leading to the ſepulchre. On theſe ſuppoſitions it is eaſy to imagine, that the diſciples, and the women who went to and from the ſepulchre, may have miſſed each other, by taking their route through different ſtreets in the city, or different roads in the field, or they may have been hid from each other by the ſhady walks of the garden in which the ſepulchre ſtood. See Macknight and Weſt.

Ver. 12. Then aroſe Peter] But Peter aroſe. Wat. Concerning this tranſaction, ſee the note on John xx. 3, &c.

Ver. 13, 15. And behold, two of them went—to—Emmaus] The ſame day on which our Lord aroſe, one of his diſciples, named Cleophas or Alpheus, the huſband of Mary, who was ſiſter of our Lord's mother, and who, in the hiſtory of his reſurrection, is called Mary the mother of James, was travelling to Emmaus, a village about ſeven miles diſtant from Jeruſalem, in company with another diſciple, whoſe name is not mentioned, and who, for that reaſon, is by ſome ſuppoſed to have been St. Luke himſelf; ſee on ver. 34. Theſe two were in the utmoſt dejection, on account of their Maſter's death; inſomuch, that their grief appeared viſible in their countenances, ver. 17. Moreover, as they went along, they talked of the things which ſat heavieſt on their ſpirits: They argued the point together; for the word συζητειν, ver. 15. rendered reaſoned, as we have obſerved, ſignifies to diſcuſs, examine, or enquire together; and it appears from the connection, that as they were diſcourſing on the ſufferings, death, and reſurrection of Jeſus, the ſcope of their enquiry was, how to reconcile theſe events with what had been foretold concerning the Meſſiah; which by the meſſage that the women had but juſt before brought from the angels, they were particularly called upon to remember. Comp. ver. 6, 7. with ch. xviii. 31—33. Accordingly, when Jeſus enquired, ver. 17. What arguments are theſe that ye are debating one with another,—for ſo it ſhould more properly be rendered,—this is the point which he took occaſion to illuſtrate and explain, ver. 26, 27. by ſhewing them it was neceſſary, in accompliſhment of what was foretold, that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer theſe things, and ſo ſhould enter into his glory; and with this view, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himſelf. Our Lord overtook theſe two diſciples as he was coming himſelf from Jeruſalem; which ſhews the propriety of Cleophas' reply, ver. 18. Art thou a ſtranger, &c. Probably the diſciples had juſt left the city when Jeſus came up with them; for on any other ſuppoſition, he could not have had time to deliver all the things which the Evangeliſt tells us he ſpake to them. See ver. 27. Doddridge, and Weſt.

Ver. 16. But their eyes were holden] St. Mark ſays that our Saviour appeared to the two diſciples in another form, ch. xvi. 12. St. Luke, that their eyes were holden: Who does not ſee that both Evangeliſts meant to expreſs the ſame thing? If Jeſus appeared in another form, their eyes of courſe were holden that they ſhould not know him: All that the hiſtorians meant to intimate is, that there was an impediment which prevented their knowing him. That this might happen either in a natural, or a ſupernatural way, may be proved in a manner agreeable to reaſon and true philoſophy; and ſuch as will correſpond exactly with the expreſſions of both Evangeliſts. To ſtate the caſe in a natural way; two men meet an acquaintance whom they thought dead; they converſe with him for ſome time without ſuſpecting who he was; the very perſuaſion they were under that he was dead, contributing greatly to their not knowing him. Beſides, he appeared in a habit and form different from what he uſed, when they converſed with him; the tone of his voice might be altered; he appeared to them on a journey, and walking with them ſide by ſide, in which ſituation no one of the company has a full view of another: Moreover, their thoughts were ſo ſwallowed up in the depth of their grief, 17 And he ſaid unto them, What manner of communications are theſe that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are ſad?

18 And one of them, whoſe name was Cleopas, anſwering, ſaid unto him, Art thou only a ſtranger in Jeruſalem, and haſt not known the things which are come to paſs there in theſe days?

19 And he ſaid unto them, What things? And they ſaid unto him, Concerning Jeſus of Nazareth, which was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God, and all the people:

20 And how the chief prieſts and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified him,

21 But we truſted that it had been he which ſhould have redeemed Iſrael: and beſides all this, to-day is the third day ſince theſe things were done.

22 Yea, and certain women alſo of our company made us aſtoniſhed, which were early at the ſepulchre;

23 And when they found not his body, they came, ſaying, that they had alſo ſeen a viſion of angels, which ſaid, that he was alive.

24 And certain of them which were with us, went to the ſepulchre, and found it even ſo as the women had ſaid: but him they ſaw not.

25 Then he ſaid unto them, O fools, and ſlow of heart to believe all that the prophets have ſpoken!

26 Ought not Chriſt to have ſuffered theſe things, and to enter into his glory?

27 And beginning at Moſes, and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the ſcriptures the things concerning himſelf.

grief, that as they took little notice of any thing without them, ſo they might not narrowly examine his features: and where then was the impoſſibility of their not knowing him? Yet as the words may be taken, ſo as to ſignify ſome ſupernatural reſtraint, doubtleſs, there might have been ſome particular agency from above, either to divert their minds from looking ſtedfaſtly upon him, or ſo to affect their memories, as to render them incapable of recollecting who he was. Comp. Gen. xxi. 19. Numb. xxii. 31. and 2 Kings vi. 17, 18. We may juſt obſerve, that in the 19th book of the Odyſſey we have an inſtance parallel to this, in Euryclea's diſcovery of Ulyſſes; for though it was made in the preſence of Penelope, and was attended with ſuch circumſtances, as might have engaged her attention, and led her to know that her gueſt was her huſband, yet ſhe did not then diſcover who he was. The poet repreſents this as the effect of Minerva's diverting her attention, or employing it otherwiſe; that is to ſay, Penelope at that inſtant was wholly intent on ſomething elſe, and did not attend to what was paſſing. See the Trial of Witneſſes, p. 69, &c.

Ver. 22, 23. Yea, and certain women alſo] The ſmalleſt attention will ſhew, that Cleophas and his companion do not here ſpeak of Mary Magdalene's ſecond information, given after ſhe had ſeen the angels; becauſe Jeſus himſelf having appeared to her before ſhe ſtirred from the ſpot, it is by no means probable, that ſhe would relate the leſſer, and omit the greater event. Neither do they ſpeak of the information which the women, Mary Magdalene's companions, gave the Apoſtle's after they had ſeen Jeſus; becauſe they, in like manner, muſt have related that much rather than any thing elſe: But the report of which they ſpeak, was either made by a company of women, different from that in which Mary the mother of James, and Salome were, who ſaw Jeſus as they went to tell his diſciples concerning the viſion of angels; or it was made by that company before they ſaw the Lord. That it was not made by any company different from that in which Mary and Salome were, is certain, becauſe St. Luke ſays expreſly, that Mary, Joanna, and the reſt, concurred in giving it, ver. 10. Wherefore, it muſt have been the report which Mary Magdalene made alone, after having been with the women at the ſepulchre the firſt time; and which they confirmed before they ſaw the Lord. See the General Scheme of the reſurrection, at the end of St. John's Goſpel. According to this account of the matter, the report which Mary Magdalen made alone, is not diſtinguiſhed from that of her companions; yet there ſeems to be a hint given of it in the 23d verſe, for the words, And when they found not his body, may refer to Mary Magdalen's firſt information, as the ſubſequent words, They came, ſaying, that they had alſo ſeen a viſion of angels, deſcribe the information given by her companions. In the mean time, though it ſhould be allowed that Mary Magdalen's report is not diſtinguiſhed from that of her companions, either by St. Luke, in his hiſtory of the reſurrection, or by the diſciples going to Emmaus, it will not follow that her report was made at the ſame time with theirs, or that the Evangeliſt meant to ſay ſo: For though they were diſtinct in point of time, they might be fitly joined together for four reaſons. 1. Becauſe the perſons who made them had gone out in one company to the ſepulchre. 2. Becauſe they were made ſoon after each other. 3. Becauſe the ſubject of both was the ſame: Mary Magdalen firſt brought word, that the ſtone was rolled back, that the door was open, and the body gone; the other women came immediately after her, and told the ſame things, adding, that they had ſeen a viſion of angels, who affirmed that Jeſus was alive. 4. In telling their ſtory to this ſuppoſed ſtranger, the two diſciples would think it needleſs to make the diſtinction more particularly. But if the diſciples, in their account of theſe reports, join them together for the reaſons mentioned, St. Luke might for the ſame reaſons ſpeak of them as one in his hiſtory of the reſurrection, agreeable to the brevity which he has ſtudied throughout the whole of his work. See Macknight, and on ver. 9.

Ver. 25. Then he ſaid,—O fools, &c.] Again he ſaid,—O thoughtleſs men;—ανοητοι. The word expreſſes a want of due attention and conſideration. The ſlowneſs of Chriſt's friends to believe his reſurrection, is ſo far from being an argument, that the proofs of it were defective; that on the contrary, their believing afterwards carries the greater weight. For it removes all ſuſpicion of a colluſion betwixt Chriſt and them in his life-time; and alſo implies, an impartial examination of the fact, and the ſtrength of thoſe proofs which vanquiſhed this incredulity. It appears from the reproof which our Saviour gave them, that Cleophas and his companion were of the number of thoſe who gave little credit to the tidings which the women had brought of their Maſter's reſurrection; wherefore, to ſhew them their error, Jeſus reproved them ſharply for not underſtanding and believing the prophecies; which, ſaid he, declare it to be the decree of heaven, that before the Meſſiah enters into his glory, i. e. before he receives his kingdom, he muſt ſuffer ſuch things as you ſay your Maſter has ſuffered. See Bp. Chandler's Vindication of Chriſtianity, p. 45, &c.

Ver. 27. And beginning at Moſes, &c.] That his reproof might appear well founded, that their drooping ſpirits might be ſupported, and that they might be prepared for the diſcovery he was about to make of himſelf, he explained the whole types and prophecies of the Old Teſtament, which relate to the Meſſiah's ſufferings; ſuch as the Moſaical ſacrifices, the lifting up of the brazen ſerpent, the 22d pſalm, the 53d of Iſaiah, &c. &c. It is no way neceſſary to ſuppoſe that Chriſt's ſufferings, reſurrection, and exaltation, are each of them diſtinctly foretold in each of thoſe parts of the ſacred writings which are mentioned in this verſe. It is enough if Moſes gave ſome intimation concerning him, which ſucceeding prophets carried on; and if when all their teſtimonies are taken together, all theſe events are expreſſed by ſome one or other of them. The deſign of our Lord's entering into ſo particular an expoſition of the prophets, or the ſacred writers, was to ſhew, that by making a proper uſe of their underſtanding, they might from thoſe very Scriptures, whoſe authority they allowed, have been convinced that the Meſſiah ought to have ſuffered, as they had ſeen him ſuffer, and to riſe from the dead on the third day. That is, Chriſt choſe rather to convince them by reaſon than by ſenſe, or at leaſt ſo to prepare their minds, that their aſſenting afterwards to the teſtimony of their ſenſes, ſhould be with the concurrence of their reaſon: He had proceeded in the ſame manner with the other diſciples at Jeruſalem; from all of whom he had hitherto with-holden the evidence of ſenſe, having not appeared to any of them, except Peter, till after the return of theſe two diſciples to Jeruſalem. This proceeding, at once ſo becoming the Lord of righteouſneſs and truth, and the freedom of man as a reaſonable being, muſt have been prevented, had Chriſt diſcovered himſelf to

28 And they drew nigh unto the village, whither they went: and he made as though he would have gone further.

29 But they conſtrained him, ſaying, Abide with us: for it is towards evening, and the day is far ſpent. And he went in to tarry with them.

30 And it came to paſt, as he ſat at meat with them, he took bread, and bleſſed it, and brake, and gave to them.

31 And their eyes were opened, and they knew him; and he vaniſhed out of their ſight.

32 And they ſaid one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the ſcriptures?

33 And they roſe up the ſame hour, and returned to Jeruſalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them,

Ver. 28. See Gen. xxxii. 26. xlii. 7. Mark vi. 48.—V. 29. Gen. xix. 3. Acts xvi. 15.—V. 31. Or, ceaſed to be ſeen of them. V. 34. 1 Cor. xv. 5.

them at his firſt appearing. Wonder and aſtoniſhment in that caſe would have taken the place of reaſon, and have left them, perhaps, when the ſtrong impreſſion was a little worn away, in doubt or ſcepticiſm. The point diſcuſſed upon the road was, whether it was agreeable to prophecy that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer and riſe again from the dead; Chriſt himſelf undertook to prove this propoſition at large from the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament; and the argument ſeemed to have its intended effect. Suppoſe now he had made himſelf known, and then entered upon his argument, what would have been the conſequence? Plainly this, the ſurpriſe of ſeeing one from the dead, and the authority of Chriſt reaſoning from the Scriptures, muſt have diſturbed their judgement, and made them, perhaps, ſubmit to his interpretation of the prophecies, without conſidering whether it were juſt or not. The plain reaſon, therefore, why the diſcovery was not made ſooner, is, that their underſtandings might be firſt convinced upon the ſtrength of reaſon and argument; whilſt their minds were yet free from any impreſſion by the event itſelf, and the irreſiſtable force of Chriſt's authority. See Sequel to the Trial of the Witneſſes. Weſt, and Mede's Diſcourſe on the words.

Ver. 29. They conſtrained him] They preſſed him. Heylin, &c. See ch. xiv. 23. We are told in the ſubſequent verſes, that the diſciples having returned from Emmaus, were telling their brethren what had happened to them, when Jeſus ſtood in the midſt, and ſaluted them, ver. 35, 36. Moreover, it is taken notice of, that this appearance happened on the firſt day of the week at even; John xx. 19. Theſe circumſtances, together with the departure of the diſciples, who went to Emmaus before the news of Chriſt's reſurrection had reached the city, ſhew plainly that by the evening in this verſe, we are to underſtand the firſt evening of the Jewiſh day, which began at three o'clock. See Matth. xiv. 15. It is towards evening, means, "It is towards three o'clock;" and the day is far ſpent, κεκλικεν ἡ ἡμερα, means, The day has declined: For, on any other ſuppoſition, the two could not have returned to Jeruſalem, after dining at Emmaus, ſo as to have been preſent when Jeſus ſhewed himſelf to his diſciples the firſt day of the week, which ended at ſun-ſetting.

Ver. 30, 31. And—as he ſat at meat, &c.] The 31ſt verſe ſhews that the impediment, or ſupernatural influence, which hindered their knowing him before, was now removed. Yet, granting that no ſupernatural impediment was then exiſting, our Saviour's very action of breaking bread, which was the office of the Maſter of the family, plainly implied that he was no ſtranger, but their Maſter, though they did not know him. Be this as it may, he had duly prepared them to receive the teſtimony of their ſenſes, and now diſcovered himſelf, and that by an act of devotion in breaking bread, which among the Jews was always attended with thanks to God, the Giver of our daily bread. But there ſeems to have been ſomething ſtill more peculiar in this action, on which account it was introduced by St. Luke in his narration of this hiſtory, and by the two diſciples themſelves when they related to the apoſtles at Jeruſalem what had happened to them at Emmaus, ver. 25. Undoubtedly the manner of breaking the bread, and probably the form of the words in the thankſgiving were peculiar to our Saviour: Probably, they were the ſame with thoſe made uſe of by him in the Lord's ſupper; at leaſt theſe two actions are deſcribed by St. Luke in the ſame words. If ſo, how ſtrongly were the diſciples called upon by this action to remember their Lord, who had inſtituted that form, as a memorial of his own death! And how properly did he accompany that diſcovery of himſelf, which he now thought fit to make to them. We are told after this, that he vaniſhed out of their ſight; the word vaniſhed leads the mind to think of the perſon vaniſhing as a mere ſpectre. The original words literally ſignify "becoming inviſible to, or withdrawing himſelf from them." In the margin of our Bibles they are well rendered, He ceaſed to be ſeen of them. If this paſſage be thought to be inconſiſtent with the reality of Chriſt's body, it may reaſonably be aſked whether there is no way for a real body to diſappear? If in the night-time we put out the candles, we ſhall all diſappear; if a man falls aſleep in the day-time, all things diſappear to him, his ſenſes are locked up; and yet all things about continue to be real, and his ſenſes continue perfect; as ſhutting out all rays of light from any particular body, would make that diſappear. Perhaps ſomething like this was the caſe; or perhaps ſomething elſe, of which we know nothing: But be it what it will, it does not follow that a body is not real, becauſe we loſe ſight of it ſuddenly. This paſſage does not therefore infer, that the body of Chriſt was no real body; if it did, it would prove likewiſe, that Chriſt had no real body before his death; for we read, that when the multitude would have thrown him down a precipice, he went through the midſt of them unſeen. Now nothing happened after his reſurrection more unaccountable than this, which had happened before it; and if the argument be good at all to prove that Chriſt had no real body, it will be good to prove that there never was ſuch a man as Jeſus Chriſt in the world. Perhaps the adverſaries of Chriſtianity may think this a little too much to prove; but if they do, it is to be hoped, they will quit the argument in one caſe, as well as in the other; for difference there is none. See Beza, Calvin, and the Trial of the Witneſſes, p. 71, &c.

Ver. 32. Did not our heart burn, &c.] Nothing can be more natural and beautiful than this remark: The author of the Guardian obſerves, that this whole narrative is delivered in a ſtile which men of letters call the great and noble ſimplicity. The attention of the diſciples when Chriſt expounded the Scriptures concerning himſelf, his offering to take his leave of them, their fondneſs of his ſtay, and the manifeſtation of the great gueſt whom they had entertained while he was yet at meat with them, are all incidents which wonderfully pleaſe the imagination of a Chriſtian reader, and give to him ſomething of that touch of mind which the diſciples felt, when they ſaid one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, &c? See Guardian, N°. 21. Pſ. xxxix. 3. Jer. xx. 9.

Ver. 33. They roſe up the ſame hour] As ſoon as Jeſus departed, the two diſciples made all the haſte they could to Jeruſalem, that they might have the pleaſure of acquainting their brethren with the agreeable news; but they were in ſome meaſure prevented: for immediately on their arrival, the eleven with the women accoſted them, giving them the news of their Maſter's reſurrection. The eleven was the current ſtile for the whole college of Apoſtles; and after the call of Matthias to the Apoſtleſhip, they were again called the twelve. In virtue of this ſtile, a general meeting of the Apoſtles is called a meeting of the eleven, or the twelve, though one or more may happen to be abſent. This is agreeable to both ancient and modern uſage, in the caſe of ſenates, councils, and the like. Hence it is that St. Luke ſays the eleven were gathered together, though it appears that Judas was dead, and that Thomas was abſent, John xx. 24. St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 5. calls it a meeting of the twelve, becauſe he was not converted till after the election of Matthias, when that again came to be the uſual ſtile. See Doddridge, Weſt, and the Sequel to the Trial of the Witneſſes.

Ver. 34. The Lord is riſen indeed] Our Lord appeared to St. Peter the ſame day as he did to the diſciples, in their way to Emmaus; but whether before he converſed with the diſciples, or after, is not certain. It was not till after the two diſciples had left Jeruſalem, and ſet out for Emmaus; for it appears from the account which they give our Lord of what had come to their knowledge, that they knew nothing of any appearance to St. Peter: and yet it muſt have been before they returned to Jeruſalem; for they found the eleven diſcourſing of this appearance to Simon. It is doubtful therefore which of theſe two appearances ſhould be placed firſt; but they both happened on the day of Chriſt's reſurrection. As neither the time nor the particulars of this appearance are recorded by the Evangeliſts, though St. Paul expreſly refers to it, 1 Cor. xv. 5. we ſhall not pretend to ſay any thing more about it, than that the Apoſtles ſeem to have laid greater ſtreſs upon that alone, than upon all thoſe related by the women; for upon the two diſciples coming into the chamber, they acoſt them immediately, without waiting to hear their ſtory, with the Lord is riſen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon, but make no mention of any of his appearances to the women. Probably Peter was the firſt man, as Mary Magdalen was the firſt woman favoured with a ſight of our Saviour after his reſurrection. Peter's report of his being riſen may have been ſuppoſed leſs ſubject to ſuſpicion, after his having denied him; and therefore our Lord's firſt appearance to him might have been deſigned to eſtabliſh this important circumſtance upon the moſt unexceptionable evidence. Peter had denied his maſter, and had his Maſter ſhewn himſelf to any other diſciple before he ſhewed himſelf to him, might not Peter have thought his repentance ineffectual, his reconciliation impoſſible, and conſequently have been plunged in deſpair? But what greater conſolation could be afforded to this penitent ſinner, and through him to all other penitents, than to find that his Lord was intirely reconciled to him, by the peculiar honour paid him; that though he had denied him, he was not rejected by him; and though his fall was attended with inconceivable aggravations, the magnanimity and mercy of his Saviour 35 And they told what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in breaking of bread.

36 And as they thus ſpake, Jeſus himſelf ſtood in the midſt of them, and ſaith unto them, Peace be unto you.

37 But they were terrified and affrighted, and ſuppoſed that they had ſeen a ſpirit.

38 And he ſaid unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts ariſe in your hearts?

39 Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myſelf: handle me, and ſee; for a ſpirit hath not fleſh and bones, as ye ſee me have.

40 And when he had thus ſpoken, he ſhewed them his hands and his feet.

41 And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, he ſaid unto them, Have ye here any meat?

42 And they gave him a piece of broiled fiſh, and of an honey-comb.

43 And he took it, and did eat before them.

44 And he ſaid unto them, Theſe are the words which I ſpake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things muſt be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moſes, and in the prophets, and in the pſalms, concerning me.

45 Then opened he their underſtanding, that they might underſtand the ſcriptures.

46 And ſaid unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Chriſt to ſuffer, and to riſe from the dead the third day:

47 And that repentance and remiſſion of ſins ſhould be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jeruſalem.

viour was ſtill greater, and knew no bounds. As the faith of the diſciples was much ſtrengthened by the report of St. Peter, ſo muſt it have been greatly confirmed by the arrival of theſe two diſciples, who declared that the Lord had appeared to them alſo. St. Mark, however, repreſents the reception which their report met with ſomewhat differently, ch. xvi. 12, 13. They went and told it; but neither believed they them. But there is no inconſiſtency between the Evangeliſts; for though the greateſt part of the Apoſtles believed that Jeſus was ariſen, as St. Luke affirms, ſome who had not given credit either to the women or to Simon, continued obſtinately to diſbelieve, in ſpite of all that the two diſciples or the reſt could ſay. This ſeems to be a better method of reconciling the Evangeliſts, than to ſuppoſe that on Peter's information the Apoſtles believed Jeſus was riſen, but did not believe that he had appeared to the two diſciples; becauſe according to their own account of the matter, they did not know him at firſt, and becauſe at parting he had vaniſhed out of their ſight: for ſurely it is natural to think that the diſciples, who, on this ocaſion, were more than twenty in number, would divide in their opinions upon ſuch a ſubject as the reſurrection of their Maſter from the dead. We know from St. Luke himſelf, that a few did not believe after they had ſeen Jeſus with their own eyes. See ver. 41. and compare Matth. xxviii. 17. It is therefore no ſtraining of the text to ſuppoſe, that by the eleven ſaying, the Lord is riſen indeed, and hath appeared unto Simon, St. Luke means only ſome of the eleven; perhaps the greateſt part of them ſaid ſo. Beſides, we muſt underſtand the Evangeliſt's words in a limited ſenſe, becauſe Peter, of whom he ſpeaks, was himſelf one of the eleven. See Weſt, Macknight, and the Sequel to the Trial of the Witneſſes.

Ver. 36. And as they ſpake] See the note on John xx. 19.

Ver. 41—43. And while they believed not, &c.] The diſciples beholding the infallible proofs of their Maſter's reſurrection, ſpecified in the former verſes, received him with exultation and rapture; but their joy and wonder ſo wrought upon their minds, that ſome of them, ſenſible of the commotion they were in, ſuſpended their belief, till they had conſidered the matter more calmly. Jeſus therefore, knowing their thoughts, to calm their minds, and to eſtabliſh their conviction, calls for meat, and eats with them; ſo much compaſſion did he ſhew for their infirmity; ſo much care did he take, that not even a ſhadow of a ſcruple ſhould remain in their minds, upon a point of the utmoſt importance to the great buſineſs for which he came into the world: and perceiving now that every doubt was vaniſhed, and that they were perfectly convinced, he ſaid to them, purſuing the argument begun by the angels, and carried on by himſelf with the two diſciples in the way to Emmaus, Theſe are the words, &c. ver. 44—48. See Weſt, and the note on ch. xi. ver. 12.

Ver. 44. In the law of Moſes and the prophets, &c.] The Old Teſtament was in thoſe days divided into three parts; firſt, the Law, which contained the five books of Moſes; ſecondly, the Hagiographa, which contained divine hymns and moral inſtructions, and went under the general title of the Pſalms, becauſe they were eſteemed the moſt eminent, and were placed at the head of thoſe writings; and thirdly, the Prophets, which contained not only the books merely prophetical, but thoſe likewiſe which were hiſtorical, wrote by prophetic men.

Ver. 45. Then opened he their underſtanding] That is, he ſtrengthened and enlarged their underſtanding, ſo as to make them comprehend the meaning of the inſpired writings, ſeveral paſſages of which he now explained to them, as we may gather from the next verſe.

Ver. 47. Beginning at Jeruſalem] It was both graciouſly and wiſely appointed by our Lord, that the Goſpel, which was to be diſſeminated among all nations, ſhould begin to be preached at Jeruſalem. Graciouſly, as it encouraged the repentance of the greateſt ſinners, when they ſaw that even the murderers of Chriſt were not exempted from the offer of Goſpel mercy. And wiſely, as hereby Chriſtianity was more abundantly atteſted, the facts being publiſhed firſt on the very ſpot where they happened, and as the vaſt concourſe of people of various nations preſent there at the feaſt of Pentecoſt would contribute greatly to its ſpeedier propagation. Our Lord commands that his Goſpel ſhould be preached among all nations, to the whole Gentile world; an event inconceivable to the Jews, and to human reaſon almoſt impoſſible. Naturally every man is zealous for the religion of his fathers; and though it may have many abſurdities in it, he doth not eaſily perceive them, becauſe he imbibed them in his earlieſt years. Idolatry had this further advantage, that all the pleaſures of the fleſh were conſiſtent with this religion. Its worſhip required no attention of mind; every part of it was external and pompous, fit to captivate and entertain the ſenſes; beſides, all degrees of men were engaged to defend it. The civil powers, from maxims of policy, every great change in religion portending danger to the ſtate, and every change in religion being prohibited by the laws, unleſs the conſent of the ſovereign power was obtained; the artiſts, becauſe of gain; the prieſts, to preſerve their authority and emoluments; the people, out of ſuperſtition and miſguided devotion. This was the unpromiſing proſpect when Chriſt foretold and commanded the ſetting up of his religion in the room of idolatry; a religion which taught the denial of man's ſelf, his irregular appetites and paſſions; which preſcribed an inviſible God for the object of adoration, and a ſpiritual worſhip and purity of heart ſuitable to the nature of that object; which promiſed nothing deſirable in this world, neither riches, nor dignities, nor grandeur, but often the loſs of all theſe, as their portion who ſhould embrace it.—And what were the means which Chriſt propoſed for ſo vaſt an undertaking?—As diſproportioned to the work, as the religions were oppoſite.—A few men of mean extraction, of no education or experience, without the arts of rhetoric and perſuaſion, without language, without armies, without force or policy; of a nation hated by the Gentiles, and hating them from a bigotry to their own cuſtoms. What an extravagancy was it to think by ſuch means of extirpating a religion deeply rooted in human nature, ſupported by prejudices, vices, intereſt, and authority, wherein ſo many wiſe men and philoſophers formerly miſcarried, and to plant upon its ruins Chriſtianity, which to the Greeks was fooliſhneſs. How vain the attempt,—had not God declared the ſucceſs beforehand. Nothing leſs than certain aſſurance of the event could have tempted Chriſt to declare it from the prophecies, as he did in his life-time to the Apoſtles, or move his diſciples to ſet about ſuch reformation. St. Luke tells us, that Chriſt had diſcourſes to this purpoſe with his diſciples, and reminded them, after his reſurrection, of what he had ſaid upon that ſubject; ver. 44—47. Theſe reſpective events are written in ſeveral prophets. See Pſ. ii. Hoſea ii. 23. Joel ii. 32. Mal. i. 11. Dan. vii. 14. But this of preaching among all nations ſeems to be taken from Iſai. xlix. 6. from whence St. Paul alſo tells the Jews, that Salvation ought to be offered to the Gentiles, and that they would hear it, Acts xxviii. 47. St. Matthew, ch. xii. 17—22. applies another text of the ſame prophet, Iſai. xliii. 1—4. which is direct to his purpoſe. From theſe and the like paſſages in the New Teſtament there is good ground to affirm, that Chriſt and his Apoſtles did declare the converſion of the Gentiles to Chriſtianity, as impoſſible as it ſeemed to be, upon the authority of the Scripture prophecies, and the preſent and paſt face of the world demonſtrates, that they were not miſtaken. See Chandler's Defence of Chriſtianity, and "The Truth of the Chriſtian Religion vindicated."

48 And ye are witneſſes of theſe things.

49 And behold, I ſend the promiſe of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jeruſalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.

50 And he led them out as far as to Bethany, and he lifted up his hands, and bleſſed them.

51 And it came to paſs, while he bleſſed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven.

52 And they worſhipped him, and returned to Jeruſalem with great joy;

53 And were continually in the temple, praiſing and bleſſing God. Amen.

Ver. 48. John xv. 27. Acts i. 8.—V. 49. John xiv. 16, 26. xv. 26. xvi. 7. Acts i. 4. ii. 1, &c.—V. 50. Acts i. 12.—V. 51. Mark xvi. 19. Acts i. 9.—V. 52. Matth. xxviii. 9, 17.—V. 53. Acts ii. 46. v. 42.

Ver. 48. And ye are witneſſes of theſe things] That this was the grand buſineſs of the Apoſtles, is evident; and the ingenious author of Miſcellanea Sacra has taken great pains to ſhew how the title of witneſſes, and the office of teſtifying, is in the ſacred writings appropriated to the Apoſtles. But after all, though it was indeed eſſential to the apoſtolical office, that they who bore it ſhould be able to teſtify the facts as of their own perſonal knowledge, yet it is certain that a great many others, who were not Apoſtles, were to teſtify the ſame; and it was their duty, and no doubt their care to do it, as Providence gave them an opportunity. The Apoſtles had many other duties incumbent upon them for the edification of the church; and in order to the performance of them, were furniſhed with extraordinary gifts and powers, for which they would have had little occaſion, had it been their only buſineſs to teſtify theſe facts. See Doddridge, and Miſcel. Sacr. eſſay iii. p. 17.

Ver. 49. Behold, I ſend the promiſe, &c.] That is, I will ſhortly ſend; the preſent being uſed forthe future tenſe, as it is frequently in Scripture. Till ye be endued, or inveſted with power from on high, means, " Till you are inſpired with the Holy Ghoſt from above."

Ver. 50. He led them out as far as Bethany] The town of Bethany was about fifteen furlongs from Jeruſalem; John xi. 18. whereas the place from which our Lord aſcended on mount Olivet was but a ſabbath-day's journey, or about half that diſtance from Jeruſalem; Acts i. 12. So that to reconcile what St. Luke here tells us in his Goſpel, with the account he gives of our Lord's aſcenſion in theActs, we muſt conclude, that he conducted his diſciples only to the boundaries of Bethany, which came much nearer to Jeruſalem, and took in part of the mount of Olives. See on Matth. xxi. 1. It is indeed poſſible that our Lord might make his laſt viſit on earth to Lazarus and his pious ſiſters; but it is manifeſt that he did not aſcend from the town of Bethany, where many others muſt have ſeen him, but from the mount of Olives, where none beheld him but his own diſciples; nor is there any intimation in the words of the Evangeliſts that he came from Bethany to the mount of Olives on the day of his aſcenſion; but rather that he went directly from Jeruſalem thither. See Doddridge and Calmet. Lifting up the hands was an attitude of bleſſing, as well as of prayer. See Gen xxvii. 4, 7, 12, 19, 21, 22. xlviii. 14, 15, &c. It has been obſerved that it was much more proper our Lord ſhould aſcend to heaven in the ſight of his Apoſtles, than that he ſhould ariſe from the dead in their ſight; for his reſurrection was abundantly proved to them, when they ſaw him alive after his paſſion; but they could not ſee him in heaven, while they continued upon earth. See Jennings's Sermons at Bury-ſtreet, vol. i. p. 373.

Ver, 52, 53. And they worſhipped] The Apoſtles having ſeen their Maſter aſcend into heaven, were fully convinced of his having come down from thence, and of his being the Meſſiah. This perſuaſion they teſtified by paying him divine honours; they worſhipped him, and they returned to Jeruſalem, filled with great joy, not only on account of his reſurrection, but becauſe they conſidered it not as their Maſter's final parting with them; for we may reaſonably ſuppoſe that they underſtood what the angel ſaid unto them concerning his return, not of his return to judge the world at the laſt day, but of his return to reſtore and take upon himſelf the kingdom of Iſrael; an event which they would expect to happen very ſoon. Separate, however, from this conſideration, it muſt have rejoiced them exceedingly to think, that their Lord was ſo ſingularly honoured by his heavenly Father, and received up into a ſtate of everlaſting felicity and glory, in which he would be able to protect all his followers, and to provide in the moſt effectual manner for their preſent and eternal happineſs. See John xiv. 1—3. Some have imagined, by comparing the 53d verſe with Acts i. 13, 14. that the Apoſtles dwelt for ſome time afterwards in an upper chamber of the temple; but they had no ſuch intereſt with the prieſts as to allow us to ſuppoſe they would permit them to lodge in an apartment of the temple. It is ſufficient that they were always there at the proper ſeaſons; for it is well known, that by night the temple was ſhut up. Comp. Luke ii. 37. and John xviii. 20. The word Amen, at the end of this Goſpel, is omitted in many copies; but ſee the note on Matth. xxviii. 20. As we have ſubjoined Reflections on the reſurrection at the cloſe of the two former Evangeliſts, and propoſe, at the end at St. John's Goſpel, to give a ſummary of this remarkable event, we ſhall here, though rather foreſtalling ſome circumſtances in the ſacred ſtory, ſubjoin

CONTEMPLATIONS ON OUR LORD'S ASCENSION.

Who can be too rigorous in cenſuring the ignorance of well-meaning Chriſtians, when he ſees the domeſtic followers of Chriſt, even after his reſurrection, miſtake the main end of his coming in the fleſh? Lord, ſaid they, wilt thou at this time reſtore the kingdom to Iſrael? Acts i. 6. They ſaw their Maſter now out of the reach of all Jewiſh envy, they ſaw his power unlimited and irreſiſtable: They ſaw him ſtay ſo long upon earth, that they might imagine he meant to fix his abode there;—And what ſhould he do there but reign?—Oh weak thoughts of well-inſtructed diſciples! What ſhould an heavenly body do in an earthly throne? How ſhould a ſpiritual life be employed in ſecular cares? How poor a buſineſs is the temporal kingdom of Iſrael, for the king of heaven! And even yet, O bleſſed Saviour, I do not hear thee ſharply controul this erroneous conceit of thy miſtaken followers; thy mild correction inſiſts rather (Acts i. 7, 8.) upon the time, than the miſconceived ſubſtance of that reſtoration. It was thy gracious purpoſe, that thy ſpirit ſhould by degrees rectify their judgements, and illuminate them with thy divine truths; in the mean time it was ſufficient to elevate their hearts to an expectation of that Holy Ghoſt, which ſhould ſhortly lead them into all needful and requiſite information:—And now, with gracious promiſe of that ſpirit of thine, (ver. 49.) with a careful charge renewed unto thy diſciples for the promulgation of thy Goſpel; with an heavenly benediction of all thine acclaiming attendants,—Thou takeſt leave of earth, ver. 51. And it came to paſs, while he bleſſed them, that he was parted from them and carried up into heaven.

O happy parting! fit for the Saviour of mankind, anſwerable to that divine converſation, to that ſucceeding glory! Bleſſed Jeſu, let me ſo far imitate thee, as to depart hence with a bleſſing in my mouth; and let my ſoul, when it is ſtepping over the threſhold of heaven, leave behind it a legacy of peace and happineſs!

From the mount of Olives thou wouldſt take thy riſe into heaven; the place from whence thou hadſt wont to ſhower down thine heavenly doctrine upon the hearers. The place whence thou hadſt wont to ſend up thy prayers unto thine heavenly Father. On this very hill was the bloody ſweat of thine agony; now is it the mount of thy triumph: From this mount of Olives did flow that oil of gladneſs, wherewith thy church is everlaſtingly refreſhed. That God, who uſes to puniſh in the ſame kind wherein we have offended, retributes alſo to us in the ſame kind and circumſtances, wherein we have been afflicted: Even to us, thy unworthy members, O Saviour, doſt thou give a ſeaſonable proportion of joy for our heavineſs, comfort for our mourning, glory for our contempt and ſhame. Our agonies ſhall be anſwered with exaltation.

Whither then, bleſſed Jeſu, whither didſt thou aſcend,—but home into thine heaven? From the mountain waſt thou taken up, and what but heaven is above the hills? Thou haſt now climbed up that infinite ſteepneſs, and left all ſublimity below thee: Already hadſt thou approved thyſelf Lord and commander of earth, of ſea, of hell: The earth confeſſed thee her Lord, when at thy voice ſhe rendered thee up Lazarus;—when ſhe ſhook at thy paſſion, and gave up her deceaſed ſaints. The ſea acknowledged thee, in that it became a pavement to thy feet, and, at thy command, to the feet of thy diſciple; in that it became thy treaſury for thy tribute-money. Hell found and acknowledged thee, who conqueredſt all the powers of darkneſs, even him who had the power of death,—the devil. It now only remained that, as Lord of the air, thou ſhouldſt paſs through all the regions of that yielding element, to thy celeſtial abodes; that ſo every knee might bow to thee both in heaven, in the earth, and under the earth. Gracious Redeemer, I ſee now where thou art, even far above all heavens, at the right hand of Paternal Glory. Oh do thou raiſe up my heart thither to thee; place thou my affections on thee above, and teach me therefore to love heaven, becauſe thou art there.

Now, if ever, my ſoul, be thou raviſhed with the contemplation of this comfortable, this bleſſed farewel of thy Lord. Methinks I ſee it ſtill with their eyes, how thou, my glorious Saviour, didſt inſenſibly riſe up from thine Olivet, taking leave of thine acclaiming diſciples now left behind thee, with gracious eyes, with heavenly benedictions. How unwillingly did their intentive eyes in return let go ſo bleſſed an object? How unwelcome that cloud which interpoſed itſelf betwixt thee and them, and cloſing up, left only a glorious ſplendor behind it, as the bright track of thine aſcenſion! Never was the ſun itſelf gazed on with ſo much intention. With what piercing regards, with what aſtoniſhed acclamations, did theſe tranſported beholders follow their aſcending Saviour?—as if they would pierce that cloud, and lay open that heaven which hid thee from them.

But, what tongue of the higheſt archangel in heaven can expreſs the welcome of thee, the King of Glory, into thoſe bleſſed regions of immortality? Never, ſurely, did the empyreal realms reſound with ſuch tranſcending joy. " God aſcended with jubilation, and the Lord with the ſound of the trump." If when the only begotten Son of God was brought into the world, He ſaid, Let all the angels

worſhip him, how much more now that he aſcendeth up on high, and leadeth captivity captive! If the holy angels did ſo carol at his obſcure and humble birth, with what boundleſs triumph muſt they receive him now, returning from the perfect atchievement of man's redemption? If when David his type had vanquiſhed Goliath, and was carrying the head into Jeruſalem, if then the damſels came forth to meet him with dances and timbrels, how, did thoſe angelic ſpirits triumph now, on meeting the great conqueror of death and hell: How did they ſing, Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlaſting doors, and the King of Glory ſhall come in!

And why doſt not thou, O Chriſtian, help to bear thy part with this happy choir of heaven? Why is not thy heart rapt out of thy boſom, with an extacy of joy, to ſee this human nature of ours exalted above all the company of heaven, adored of angels, and archangels, and all thoſe illuſtrious and mighty ſpirits, and ſitting there crowned with infinite glory and majeſty?—Alas! little will it avail thee, that our nature is thus honoured, if the benefit of this aſcenſion doth not reflect upon thee. How many are there miſerable in themſelves, notwithſtanding all this glory of the human nature in Chriſt? But how is this?—None but thoſe who are found in him, can be the happier by him; none but the members can be the better for the glory of the head.

O bleſſed Jeſu! thou that art the way, haſt made the way to thyſelf and us: Thou didſt humble thyſelf, and becameſt obedient unto death, even the death of the croſs; therefore hath God alſo highly exalted thee: and upon the ſame terms will he not fail to advance thy true diſciples. We ſee thy track before us of humility and obedience. O teach us to follow thee in the rougheſt ways of obedience, in the bloody paths even of death, ſo we may but at laſt overtake thee in thoſe high ſteps of immortality and glory!

Among thoſe millions of angels which attended this triumphant aſcenſion of our Lord, ſome are appointed to the lower ſtation of comforting his aſtoniſhed diſciples, in the certain hope of his no leſs glorious return; Acts i. 10, 11. Two men ſtood by them in white apparel. They ſtood by them,—they were not of them; though angels, they ſeemed men, from their familiarity. Two, for more certainty of teſtimony; in white, for joy of their Lord's aſcenſion.

Their errand was calculated for a purpoſe of conſolation and love: they ſtand not ſilent, therefore, but directing their ſpeech to the amazed beholders, ſay, Ye men of Galilee, why ſtand ye gazing up into heaven? What a queſtion was this? Why, O ye bleſſed angels, did they gaze, but that their love of Chriſt conſtrained them; never could they have gazed ſo happily as now. If but ſome great man be advanced to honour over our heads, how apt we are to gaze up, and to eye him as ſome ſtrange meteor: Let the ſun but ſhine a little upon theſe tranſient dials, and how are they looked at by every paſſenger?—How much more worthy then is the King of Glory to command all eyes, now in the higheſt pitch of his heavenly exaltation!

But it was not the purpoſe of theſe angels to check the longing looks of theſe faithful diſciples after their aſcended Maſter: It was only a change of eyes that they intended, of carnal for ſpiritual; of the eye of ſenſe for the eye of faith: This ſame Jeſus who is taken up from you into heaven, ſhall ſo come, in like manner, as ye have ſeen him go into heaven.

"Look not after him, O ye weak diſciples, as ſo departed that ye ſhall ſee him no more; though gone, he is not loſt: Thoſe heavens which received, ſhall again reſtore him;—Ye have ſeen him aſcend upon the chariot of a bright cloud; and in the clouds of heaven ſhall ye ſee him deſcend again to his laſt judgement. He is gone, but can it trouble you to know you have an advocate in heaven? Strive not now ſo much to exerciſe your bodily eyes, in looking after him, as the eyes of your ſouls in looking unto him, and looking for him. If it be your ſorrow to part with your Saviour, yet to part with him in heaven, ſhould be your comfort and felicity; for if his abſence could be grievous, his return ſhall be happy and glorious."

Even ſo, Lord Jeſus, come quickly! In the mean time, while it is not heaven that can keep thee from us, it is not earth which can keep us from thee. O raiſe thou up our ſouls to a life of faith with thee; and let us ever enjoy thy converſation while we ardently expect and wait for thy return!

SAINT JOHN.

CHAP. I.

The divinity, humanity, and office of Jeſus Chriſt. The teſtimony of John. The calling of Andrew, Peter, &c.

IN the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

Ver. 1. Prov. viii. 22, 24. Col. i. 17. 1 John i. 1. Rev. xix. 13. Prov. viii. 30. Ch. xvii. 5. 1 John i. 2. Phil. ii. 5, 8.

St. JOHN.] This Goſpel is univerſally agreed to have been written after all the reſt, with a view of compleating whatever was deficient in them all. St. John, independant of his divine inſpiration, muſt be allowed to have a moſt perfect knowledge of the facts he relates; and as he undoubtedly examined all the other Goſpels before he wrote, he is an authentic witneſs of their veracity. He was, according to the teſtimony of the ancients, of our Lord's near kindred. Before he became acquainted with our Lord, he was a diſciple of John the Baptiſt, and probably one of thoſe two whom he ſent to Chriſt. Our Saviour honoured him with his moſt intimate confidence, and loved him beyond his other diſciples. He and Peter, and James, were, excluſive of the reſt, witneſſes of the raiſing Jairus's daughter, of Chriſt's transfiguration, and of his agony in the garden. He was the only Apoſtle who ſtood under the croſs when Chriſt was crucified: So that he was better qualified than any other to deſcribe the miracles and hiſtory of Jeſus Chriſt. Michaelis thinks that St. John, in the life-time of his bleſſed Maſter, wrote down ſome of the heads of his diſcourſes; at leaſt that his ſtile perfectly reſembles that of thoſe who relate the diſcourſes of another, after having taken down the heads while they were ſpoken. But we are not to conſider this Goſpel merely as an hiſtorical narrative, but alſo as a controverſial treatiſe, deſigned to refute various hereſies; for no ſooner was the Chriſtian church eſtabliſhed, but its doctrines were obſcured, debaſed, and corrupted by errors and hereſies of various kinds. The firſt heretics aſſumed the name of Gnoſtics, that is, knowing ones, pretending to ſuperior light and knowledge. They were afterwards followed by the Nicolaitans, whoſe falſe tenets were propagated by Ebion and Cerinthus. Theſe heretics prevailed moſt in Aſia: Wherefore the Aſiatic biſhops deſired St. John to draw up a refutation of them; and he, in compliance with their requeſt, compoſed his Goſpel with a view, "to put theſe heretics to ſhame, and to ſhew that there is one God, who by Chriſt, his word, made all things; and that the Creator and Father of our Lord were not, as they pretended, diſtinct beings, &c." Wherefore, he does not relate the birth and parentage of Chriſt, or even thoſe facts of which he, Peter and James, were eye-witneſſes, excluſive of the other Apoſtles; but he meant only to collect ſuch diſcourſes and miracles, as might confirm the doctrines laid down in the firſt chapter, which were counter-poſitions to Cerinthus and other heretics, who maintained the groſſeſt errors concerning Chriſt.

Cerinthus is ſaid to have taught, 1. That the moſt high God was entirely unknown before the appearance of Chriſt, and dwelt in a remote heaven, called Pleroma, with the chief ſpirits or æons. 2. That this ſupreme God firſt generated an only-begotten Son, who again begat the word, which was inferior to the firſt-born. That Chriſt was a lower Æon, though far ſuperior to ſome others. 4. That there were two high Æons diſtinct from Chriſt; one called life, and the other light. 5. That from the Æons again proceeded inferior orders of ſpirits; and particularly one Demiurgus, who created this viſible world out of eternal matter. 6. That this Demiurgus was ignorant of the ſupreme God, and much lower than the Æons, who were wholly inviſible. 7. That he was however the peculiar God and Protector of the Iſraelites, and ſent Moſes to them; whoſe laws and injunctions were to be of perpetual obligation. 8. That Jeſus was a mere man, the real ſon of Joſeph and Mary. 9. That the Æon Chriſt deſcended upon him in the form of a dove, when he was baptized; revealed to him the unknown Father, and empowered him to work miracles. 10. That the Æon light entered John the Baptiſt in the ſame manner, and therefore that John was in ſome reſpects to be preferred to Chriſt. 11. That when Jeſus had propagated the knowledge of God, and came to ſuffer, Chriſt left him, and fled to the uppermoſt heaven. 12. That Jeſus Chriſt ſhould reign on earth a thouſand years, and his diſciples enjoy all ſenſual delights.—Some of the Cerinthian ſect denied alſo the reſurrection of the dead, and many of them maintained that Jeſus Chriſt was not yet riſen.

Now we ſhall find St. John's Goſpel divided into three parts. The firſt, contains doctrines laid down in oppoſition to thoſe of Cerinthus, ch. i. 1—18. The ſecond, delivers proofs of theſe doctrines in an hiſtorical manner, ch. i. 19.—xx. 29. The third, is a concluſion, or appendix, giving an account of the perſon of the writer, and of the view he had in writing, ch. xx. 30. to the end. In what year this Goſpel was written, is not agreed among the ancients. It ſhould ſeem to have been before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, which happened in the year of our Lord 70; for St. John ſpeaks of that city as ſubſiſting, ch. v. 2. There is at Jeruſalem, by the ſheep-market, a pool, &c. On the other hand, it appears from the Goſpel itſelf to have been written after the death of St. Peter, which is generally placed in the year 78: for the other Evangeliſts, when they relate the cutting off the high-prieſt's ſervant's ear, conceal the name of Peter, leſt the Jews ſhould have a legal pretence to proſecute him, and deliver him to the Romans, to be capitally puniſhed: whereas St. John mentions him expreſly by name, ch. xviii. 10. Nor could St. John probably have interpreted the words of Chriſt, ch. xxi. 18. Thou ſhalt ſtretch forth thy hands, and another ſhall gird thee, concerning the manner of Peter's death, if it had been written before the crucifixion of that Apoſtle; for before that time the words were ambiguous. This limits the writing of this Goſpel to the year 69, a year expreſly ſpecified by an ancient writer. Others give the date of it ſo late as A.D. 97. According to either computation, however, St. John is allowed to have cloſed the whole Goſpel hiſtory, to have ratified and confirmed the former Goſpels, and to have eſtabliſhed the Evangelical canon on the firmeſt ground, and moſt venerable authority.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. In the beginning was the word] "In the beginning, before the foundation of the world, or the firſt production of any created being, a glorious perſon exiſted, who may properly be called the Word of God, not only becauſe God at firſt created, and ſtill governs all things by him, but becauſe, as men diſcover their ſentiments and deſigns to one another by the intervention of words, ſpeech, or diſcourſe, ſo God, by his Son, diſcovers his gracious deſigns in the fulleſt and cleareſt manner to men. All the various manifeſtations which he makes of himſelf, whether in the works of creation, providence, or redemption; all the revelations he has been pleaſed to give of his will, are conveyed to us through him, and therefore he is, by way of eminence, fitly ſtiled the Word of God. The Evangeliſt ſeems here to allude to the firſt word of Geneſis, Beraſhith, tranſlated by the LXX εν Αρχη. See on Gen. i. 1. As this divine Word exiſted at the time when all things were created, (See ver. 3—10.) He exiſted conſequently from all eternity. This verſe therefore is a direct contradiction of the tenets of Cerinthus, as repreſented in article 2, 3, and 8, of the argument above. Λογος, [Logos] the name which St. John applies to the eternal Son of God, ſignifies, according to the Greek etymology, both diſcourſe and reaſon. Le Clerc, in his notes on this paſſage, takes it in the latter ſenſe, when applied to the Son, becauſe, long before St. John wrote, the Platoniſts, and after them ſeveral learned Jews, particularly Philo, had uſed it in the ſame ſenſe, to ſignify the Creator of the world. The Stoics too ſeem to have affixed a ſimilar idea to the word Logos, when they affirmed that all divine things were formed by reaſon, or the divine wiſdom, in oppoſition to the Epicurean ſyſtem, which taught that the world came into being by chance, or was made without reaſon. The Platoniſts and Philo, by the divine reaſon, underſtood ſometimes the moſt perfect idea, conception, or model which God had formed of every thing in his own mind, and of which he ſtamped the ſignature on his works; at other times theſe writers ſpeak of the divine

2 The ſame was in the beginning with God.
3 All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made.

Ver. 2. Gen. i. 1.—V. 3. Col. i. 16. Hebr. i. 2. Rev. iv. 11.

divine reaſon, or Logos, as a diſtinct being, inferior and ſubordinate to the ſupreme God; nevertheleſs they have more than once ſpoken of him in terms not unlike thoſe uſed by the inſpired writers. Induced by theſe particulars, Le Clerc fancies, that as the name Λογος was familiar to the philoſophers and learned Jews, who had imbibed Plato's principles, ſuch Chriſtians as admired the writings of Plato and his followers muſt very early have adopted not the name of Λογος only, but all the phraſes which the Platoniſts uſed in ſpeaking of the perſon to whom they gave that name, and conſequently were in danger of corrupting Chriſtianity with the errors of Platoniſm. At the ſame time he imagines, that though the notions of theſe philoſophers concerning the ſecond perſon of the Godhead were in general very confuſed, they had derived certain true ideas of him from tradition; and that the Evangeliſt St. John, for this reaſon, in ſpeaking of the ſame perſon, made uſe of the term Λογος to ſhew in what ſenſe, and how far it might be uſed with ſafety by Chriſtians: But as it is very uncertain whether the primitive Chriſtians ſtudied the writings of Plato and Philo, it is not probable that St. John would think it neceſſary, in compoſing his Goſpel, to adopt the terms and phraſes of theſe philoſophers. Accordingly the generality of Commentators have rejected Le Clerc's ſuppoſitions, believing that John borrowed the name Λογος either from the Moſaic hiſtory of the creation, or from Pſ. xxxiii. 6. where, in alluſion to that hiſtory, it is ſaid, the heavens were created by the Word of God; or from the Jewiſh Targums, particularly the Chaldee Paraphraſes, where the Word of God is often ſubſtituted for what in the text is Jehovah. Nay, the term is uſed in ſuch a manner, as to have perſonal attributes, even the attributes of the Deity aſcribed to it, and is introduced in all or moſt of thoſe places where the Hebrew mentions the face, the hands, or the eyes of God. St. John aſſerts, that this Word was with God; namely, before any created being had exiſted. This perhaps is ſpoken in alluſion to what the wiſdom of God ſays of himſelf, Prov. viii. 30. Our verſion of the Greek particle προς, rendered with, is ſupported by the beſt claſſical writers among the Greeks, and is confirmed by ch. xviii. 11. and xxiv. 12. This ſentence is in oppoſition to the following verſes, wherein we are told, that the Word was made fleſh, that he dwelt among us, and was ſeen, which intimates his præexiſtence before theſe circumſtances. It is added, and the Word was God; upon which ſome have remarked, that as there is no article before the word Θεος, it ſhould be read, and God was the Word: But this manner of expreſſion is made uſe of by this ſame writer, ch. iv. 24. and ſeveral of the pureſt writers among the Greeks have frequently ſentences wherein the ſubſtantive with an article, though placed after the verb, is to be conſtrued firſt, and as the nominative to the verb. Many have eagerly contended that the word God is uſed here in an inferior ſenſe, the neceſſary conſequence of which is, as they affirm, that this clauſe ſhould be rendered the Word was a God, that is, a kind of inferior Deity, as governors are called gods: but it is impoſſible he ſhould here be ſo called merely as a governor, becauſe he is ſpoken of as exiſting before the production of any creatures whom he could govern; and it is moſt incredible, that when the Jews were ſo exceedingly averſe to idolatry, and the Gentiles ſo unhappily prone to it, ſuch a plain writer as this Apoſtle ſhould lay ſo dangerous a ſtumbling-block at the threſhold of his work, and repreſent it as the Chriſtian doctrine, that in the beginning of all things there were two Gods, one ſupreme, and the other ſubordinate; a difficulty which, if poſſible, would be yet further increaſed, by recollecting what has been mentioned in the argument, that this Goſpel was written with a particular view of oppoſing Cerinthus and the Ebionites, on which account a greater accuracy of expreſſion muſt have been neceſſary. There are ſo many inſtances in the writings of this Apoſtle, and even in this chapter, (ſee ver. 6, 12, 13, 18.) where Θεος, without the article, is uſed to ſignify God, in the higheſt ſenſe of the word, that it is ſurpriſing any ſtreſs ſhould be laid on the want of that article as a proof that it is uſed in a ſubordinate ſenſe. But indeed St. Paul ſeems fully to have determined this point; for he inſinuates that no being can be God who is not God by nature. Gal. iv. 8. Grotius and Le Clerc affirm, that in the Old Teſtament the name Jehovah is ſometimes given to angels, and to prove this, they quote Gen. xviii. but, it is replied, the appearance of Jehovah to Abraham, mentioned in the firſt verſe of that chapter, was different from the appearance of the three angels in the form of men, ſpoken of, ver. 2. The appearance of Jehovah was that of the Shechinah, or viſible ſymbol of the Divine Preſence, as is evident from ver. 22. where we are told, that the men, that is, the angels who appeared in the form of men, turned their faces from thence, and went towards Sodom, while Abraham ſtood yet before Jehovah, and converſed with him. We may therefore ſuppoſe, that as often as Jehovah is repreſented ſpeaking in the former part of the chapter, it was not any of the angels who ſpake, but a voice from the Shechinah; accordingly, to intimate this, the hiſtorian in ſuch caſes makes uſe of the ſingular number; whereas, when the angels ſpeak, or are ſpoken to, the plural is uſed, ver. 9. This ſolution, it is thought, will ſerve for all the other paſſages produced by the Socinians, in proof that the name Jehovah is given in Scripture to angels, or created beings. It is obſervable, that St. John's diſcourſe here riſes by degrees: he tells us firſt, that the Word in the beginning of the world exiſted; thus aſſerting his eternity: Next, that he exiſted with God; thus aſſerting his co-eternity: And then, that he was God, and made all things; thus aſſerting his co-equality. I cannot conclude the remarks on this important paſſage in properer words than thoſe with which Dr. Doddridge cloſes his note: "I am deeply ſenſible of the ſublime and myſterious nature of the doctrine of Chriſt's Deity as here declared; but it would be quite foreign to my purpoſe to enter into a large diſcuſſion of that great foundation of our faith. It has often been done by much abler hands: it was, however, matter of conſcience with me, thus ſtrongly to declare my belief of it; and I ſhall only add, with Bp. Burnet, that had not St. John and the other Apoſtles thought it a doctrine of great importance in the Goſpel ſcheme, they would rather have waved, than inſerted and inſiſted upon it, conſidering the critical circumſtances in which they wrote." See Burnet on the Articles, p. 40. Merrick's Annotations on John, and Waterland's "Importance of the Doctrines of the Trinity."

Ver. 2. The ſame was in the beginning with God] This repetition is uſed, becauſe in the laſt ſentence he had aſſerted, that the Word was God; intimating, that he was God in ſuch a ſenſe, that it ſhould appear he was with God, or that their perſonality was diſtinct: But to conceive of Chriſt as a diſtinct and co-ordinate God, would be highly inconſiſtent with the moſt expreſs declarations of Scripture, and far more irreconcileable with reaſon. The Socinians, who have laboured hard to ſubvert the authority of this ſtubborn portion of Scripture, moſt perverſely underſtand this paſſage of Chriſt's being taken up into heaven after his baptiſm, in order to be inſtructed in the will of God, for which they think they have Chriſt's own teſtimony. John iii. 13. But they miſtake the meaning of that paſſage. See the note. Beſides, the Evangeliſt is here deſcribing the exiſtence of the Word before he was made fleſh, ver. 14. and therefore he cannot be underſtood as ſpeaking of any thing which happened after his incarnation. See Grotius, Doddridge, and Macknight.

Ver. 3. All things were made by him] Although the word make is capable of an extenſive ſenſe, yet, as in other paſſages, Jeſus is ſaid to have created all things, Col. i. 16. we cannot doubt that St. John uſes the word εγενετο in the ſenſe of creation, a meaning which it often has in the Jewiſh ſcriptures. It is true, this and the other paſſages which ſpeak of Chriſt's making all things, are by ſome explained of his erecting the Chriſtian diſpenſation; and though the terms thus underſtood turn out very high metaphors, they fancy the genius of the Jewiſh language eaſily enough admits of ſuch. But let it be obſerved here, once for all, that if the Socinian explication of the texts, which attribute unto Jeſus the names, perfections, and actions of the true God, are admitted, it will be very difficult to clear the Evangeliſts from the imputation of having laid in man's way a violent temptation to idolatry; for it is well known that, as in all ages men have been exceeding prone to worſhip falſe gods, ſo it was the prevailing vice of the Gentile world when the New Teſtament was wrote: that the groſſeſt corruption of morals has ever flowed from this poiſonous ſpring, Rom. i. 24. and that to deſtroy idolatry, and bring mankind to the worſhip of the true God, was the great end propoſed by God in all the revelations which he made of himſelf to men. This being the caſe, is it to be imagined, that either Chriſt himſelf, who brought the laſt and beſt revelation of the divine will, or his Apoſtles, who committed that revelation to writing, would on any occaſion have uſed ſuch expreſſions, as in their plain and obvious meaning could not fail to lead at leaſt the bulk of mankind to think, that the names, perfections, and actions of the true God were aſcribed to a creature, and that the worſhip due to the true God was due to him, Heb. i. 6. while in reality they meant no more than that he was miraculouſly formed, was commiſſioned to deliver a new religion to the world, was endowed with the power of miracles, and in conſideration of his exemplary death was raiſed from the grave, and had divine honours conferred upon him. Inſtead of reforming the world, this was to have laid in their way ſuch a temptation to idolatry as they could not well reſiſt; nor has the effect been any other than what was to be expected: for the generality of Chriſtians, moved by theſe expreſſions, have all along conſidered Chriſt as God, and honoured him accordingly, (John v. 23.) as the God who made all things, and without whom was not any thing made: "not ſo much as any ſingle thing (ουδε εν) having exiſtence, whether among the nobleſt or the meaneſt of God's works was made without him." But, if all things were made by him, he cannot be himſelf of the number of the things that were made: He is ſuperior therefore to every created being. Beſides, it ſhould be remembered that in the Old Teſtament the creation of the heavens and the earth is often mentioned as the prerogative of the true God, whereby he is diſtinguiſhed from the heathen idols. The deſign of the Evangeliſt in eſtabliſhing ſo particularly and diſtinctly the dignity, but eſpecially the divinity of Chriſt, was to raiſe in mankind the profoundeſt veneration for his inſtructions; and without doubt He who is the Word of God, the interpreter of the divine counſels, and who is himſelf God, ought to be heard with the deepeſt attention, and obeyed with the moſt implicit ſubmiſſion. It is this circumſtance,—that the Son of God, who is God, came down from heaven to earth, and in perſon inſtituted the Chriſtian religion,—which gives it a dignity beyond any thing that can be imagined by men. It would be the work of a treatiſe, rather than of a note, to repreſent the Jewiſh doctrine of the creation of all things by the divine Logos, to which, rather than to the Platonic, there may be ſome reference here. They who have no opportunity of examining the original authors, may ſee what thoſe learned men have ſaid, to whom Dr. A. Taylor refers, in 4 In him was life; and the life was the light of men.

5 And the light ſhineth in darkneſs; and the darkneſs comprehended it not.

6 There was a man ſent from God, whoſe name was John.

7 The ſame came for a witneſs, to bear witneſs of the Light, that all men through him might believe.

8 He was not that Light, but was ſent to bear witneſs of that Light.

9 That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.

10 He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not.

11 He came unto his own, and his own received him not.

Ver. 4. In him was life] The moſt ancient fathers who quote this text, ſo generally join the words at the end of the laſt verſe, 'Ο γεγονεν, which we render that was made, with this 4th verſe; and St. John uſes ſo frequently to begin the following ſentence with what ended the foregoing, that many judicious commentators think it to be the true reading, and therefore render it,—that which was in him was life; "that fulneſs of power, wiſdom, and benignity which was in him, was the fountain of life to the whole creation; and the life which was in him, St. John goes on to obſerve, was the light of men; i. e. reaſon and revelation, the greater and leſſer lights of the moral world, were the effect of his energy on the minds of intelligent beings. Elſner hath fully ſhewn on this text, that the heathens ſometimes ſpeak of their deities and heroes as the light and life of mankind. The reader will recollect, that Cerinthus (as we have ſhewn in article 4.) aſſerted, that there were two high Æons diſtinct from Chriſt, one called Life, and the other Light; in oppoſition to which, St. John here aſſerts, that the Word, Life, and Light were the ſame identical perſon. As having life in himſelf, is the characteriſtic of God, St. John, by ſaying this of Chriſt, aſſerts his proper divinity, and intimates at the ſame time, that he was the great fountain of life to all creatures. Life and Light are frequently connected in Scripture; if any one ſhould queſtion how the Logos could be the author of ſo many things, it is here fully explained, In him was life. And leſt it ſhould be imagined that this power of life could be exhauſted in calling ſo many creatures into being, it is added, that this life was light; light being of that nature, that though it enlightened many, it is not in the leaſt diminiſhed thereby. The Apoſtle, in another place, tells us, that God is light; here the Word is ſo called, and conſequently was God, as the Evangeliſt aſſerts in ver. 1. It is remarkable, that in Midraſh the Meſſiah is deſcribed as a moſt glorious light, exceeding the ſun in radiance. See Wetſtein, Elſner, and Mills's Prolegomena.

Ver. 5. And the light ſhineth in darkneſs] We have obſerved on the former verſe, that by light is here meant the light of reaſon and revelation. This light ſhone in the heathen world, and under the diſpenſation of Moſes, and ſtill ſhineth in darkneſs, even upon the minds of the moſt ignorant and wicked part of mankind; darkneſs being not only uſed for a ſtate of ignorance, whether wilful or natural, but likewiſe for a ſtate of obſtinate wickedneſs. See Epheſ. v. 8. It is not eaſy to determine with exactneſs the ſenſe of the word κατελαβεν, which we render comprehend. Some have obſerved, that it ſignifies to attend to, or embrace, ſo as to attain or enjoy the end and benefit deſigned by a thing. Thus it is applied to the knowledge of the law, Ecclus. xv. 7. and to juſtice, ch. xxvii. 8. of the ſame book. Any clear inſtances which would prove the word to be ſometimes ſimply uſed for to ſee, or to perceive any outward object, might confirm us in the ſuppoſition that the ſentence ſignifies, that mankind involved in the darkneſs of error, wilful ignorance, or obſtinate wickedneſs, did not perceive, or were not ſenſible of the light here mentioned; or as the perception ſpoken of muſt mean an intelligent or mental perception, any examples of the word ſignifying ſuch a perception might be to our purpoſe. The word has two or three ſignifications nearly approaching to this, ſuch as to diſcover any thing that is hidden,—to know a thing with certainty,—in which ſenſe it is uſed as a philoſophical term,—and to comprehend. A learned writer is rather inclined to take the word in this verſe in the ſenſe of perceiving, as Plotinus applies the term to the ſenſes or underſtanding, and Porphyry to the apprehenſion of ſenſible objects. If then we render the words, and the darkneſs perceived it not, or rather hath not perceived it, we may either ſuppoſe that the word darkneſs at the beginning of the verſe is uſed in its common ſignification, and afterwards by a metonymy ſignifies mankind themſelves, darkened and benighted; or that it is firſt uſed in a ſimple manner, and then by a kind of proſopopœia has the act of perception applied to it. Thus, in Galen, the word life is uſed ſimply, and immediately after has the act of invention aſcribed to it. Darkneſs, as we have obſerved, is uſed for perſons involved in darkneſs,—Ye were ſometimes darkneſs, but now are light in the Lord; where we may note the ſame double uſe in the word light, which has been ſuppoſed darkneſs in St. John, is capable of admitting, as it firſt ſignifies, perſons enlightened, and then ſimply light itſelf. It is a ſufficient objection to our retaining the word comprehend, that it cannot appear at all ſtrange that the world did not fully comprehend the ſpiritual, ſince it certainly doth not fully comprehend the material light, nor indeed any of the moſt familiar objects it diſcovers. It appears from Acts iv. 13. x. 34. compared with Acts xiv. 17. xvii, 25. Rom. i. 20. that κατελαβεν is ſometimes uſed for perceiving, as contended for above, and from 1 Cor. ix. 24. Philip iii. 12. that it is ſometimes uſed for apprehending or laying hold of a thing, from whence we may deduce the following as the Apoſtle's aſſertion, "that the prevailing degeneracy was ſo great, that men not only oppoſed the light, but likewiſe that they did not apprehend it, or ſo perceive and regard its doctrines, as to ſecure the bleſſings to which it would have led them." See Mintert, Stockius, and Merrick's Annotations on John. Dr. Waterland renders it, and the darkneſs obſcured it not, or cometh not upon it.

Ver. 6. There was a man, ſent from God] The Evangeliſt, in giving the hiſtory of the Baptiſt's miniſtry, tells us, in the firſt place, that he was merely a man, in oppoſition to article 10. in the argument, wherein Cerinthus repreſents John as ſuperior to our Saviour, whom the Apoſtle has already ſhewn to be God; and therefore Dr. Waterland ſtops the paſſage as above. The Evangeliſt tells us next, that John had a ſpecial commiſſion from God, being called to his office by inſpiration, as the prophets were of old, and that he was ſent to bear witneſs of the light, or, to point out the Meſſiah, whom he had called in the 4th verſe, the light of men, becauſe it was one of the principal prophetic characters of the Meſſiah, that he was to enlighten the world. Hence he is called by one prophet, the Sun of righteouſneſs, by another, the light of Sion, and a light to lighten the Gentiles. See on ch. v. 35. and the paſſages in the margin.

Ver. 7. The ſame came for a witneſs] To bear teſtimony. The next ſentence may be underſtood as explanatory of that which goes before, He came for a teſtimony, that is, to bear teſtimony concerning that light. Some commentators apply the word Him, in the next clauſe, to the light here ſpoken of, and others to John, as the inſtrument of men's belief. By believing we are to underſtand the acknowledging and receiving Chriſt as the Meſſiah.

Ver. 9. That was the true light] "The true light of which he ſpake was Chriſt, even that Sun of righteouſneſs and ſource of truth, which coming into the world enlighteneth every man; diſperſing his beams, as it were, from one end of the heavens to the other, to the Gentile world, which was in midnight darkneſs, as well as to the Jews, who enjoyed but a kind of twilight." See John iii. 19. xii. 46. and Doddridge. Heinſius would read the 8th, 9th, and 10th verſes, thus: He, John, was not that light; but he was, (that is, he exiſted or came, taking the ην at the beginning of the 9th verſe) that he might bear witneſs to that light:—Ver. 9. The true light which, &c. Ver. 10. Was in the world. Dr. Waterland reads, ver. 9. The true light, who came into the world, to enlighten every man, &c. Ver. 10. And the world had been made by him, but, &c. To the interpretation given by Waterland and Doddridge it has been objected, that where Chriſt is ſaid to have come into the world, that expreſſion ſeems to refer to the manifeſtation of him to the world, or his appearance in the fleſh. Now this appearance of Chriſt ſeems to be expreſſed by St. John, in the two next verſes, by the paſt tenſe; He was in the world, He came unto his own: whereas the uſe of the preſent tenſe, in the verſe before us, rather leads us to think of that ſpiritual illumination which Chriſt ſtill imparts,—though no longer manifeſt in the fleſh,—to all who will receive him; according to that of St. Paul, Epheſ. v. 14. To which may be added, that as ερχομενον, rendered cometh, immediately follows ανθρωπον, man, it ſeems rather more natural to conſtrue it with that word, than with a world more remote. It may be added further, that this conſtruction is more ſuitable to St. John's deſign, which was to oppoſe the doctrine of Cerinthus, who aſſerted, (article 1.) that the moſt high God was entirely unknown before the appearance of Chriſt; in oppoſition to which the Evangeliſt aſſerts, that men had received ſuch lights on this head, under the various diſpenſations through which they paſſed, as rendered them inexcuſable if they remained ignorant; and though this heretic had pretended, (article 7.) that his Demiurgus was the peculiar God and protector of the Iſraelites, yet is it here ſhewn that he had an equal affection for the reſt of mankind; and that the light to be diffuſed by Chriſt was not to be confined to the narrow circle of the Jewiſh commonwealth, but, like that of the ſun, communicated to every man that cometh into the world.

Ver. 10. He was in the world, &c.] The Word and Son of God came down to earth; and though the world was made by him, all the inhabitants thereof being the work of his hands, yet that very world, that is, thoſe inhabitants of it, did not know and acknowledge him as their Creator, and as the word ſent to reveal the will of God to them. This is in oppoſition to the doctrine of Cerinthus, article 5. See the Reflections at the end of the chapter.

Ver. 11. He came unto his own] "He came into his own territories; even to the Jewiſh nation, which was under the moſt diſtinguiſhed obligations to him, and to which he had been expreſly promiſed as their

12 But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the ſons of God, even to them that believe on his name:

14 And the Word was made fleſh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth.

15 John bare witneſs of him, and cried, ſaying, This was he of whom I ſpake, He that cometh after me, is preferred before me: for he was before me.

16 And of his fulneſs have all we received, and grace for grace.

17 For the law was given by Moſes, but grace and truth came by Jeſus Chriſt.

their Meſſiah: Yet his own people did not receive him, as they ought, but, on the contrary, treated him in the moſt contemptuous and ungrateful manner.". Thus we have endeavoured to expreſs the difference between εις τα ιδια, and οι ιδιοι, in the original, which is ſo difficult, that few verſions have attempted it: Yet, as Grotius has well obſerved, the energy of the text cannot be underſtood without attending to it. That the Jewiſh nation was in ſome peculiar ſenſe under the care and guardianſhip of Chriſt, before his incarnation, this paſſage ſtrongly intimates, as well as a variety of texts in the Old Teſtament, where we have not failed to remark this particular. See Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 12. Gave he power, &c.] Gave he the privilege to become ſons, &c. Doddridge, Waterland, &c. See the 12th poſition in the argument. The word name is frequently uſed, as we have had occaſion to obſerve, for the perſon or man who bears it; as likewiſe for that characteriſtic by which he is diſtinguiſhed from all others. The verb πιστευω, to believe, is in the Greek claſſics uſed with a dative caſe, ſignifying the perſon, and with an accuſative, ſignifying the thing. Thus, when joined to the word man, in the dative, it denotes to believe a man, or to rely upon him; but when joined with the word thing, in the accuſative, it ſignifies to believe that it is true; but in the words to believe in his name, where the word believe is followed with a prepoſition governing the accuſative, the paſſage has a ſenſe different from the examples produced above, and ſignifies a religious belief in Chriſt; which is underſtood to include a confidence in him as the Saviour of mankind. See Calmet, and Merrick.

Ver. 13. Which were born, not of blood] They who thus believed on him became poſſeſſed of this privilege, not in conſequence of their being born of blood, or of their being deſcended from the loins of the holy patriarchs, or ſharing in circumciſion and the blood of the ſacrifices, nor could they aſcribe it merely to the will of the fleſh, or to their own ſuperior wiſdom and goodneſs; as if by the power of corrupted nature alone they had made themſelves to differ; nor to the will of man, or to the wiſeſt advice and moſt powerful exhortations which their fellow-creatures might addreſs to them; but muſt humbly acknowledge that they were born of God; and indebted to the efficacious influences of his free and regenerating grace for all their privileges, and for all their hopes. Comp. ch. iii. 1—8. Titus iii. 3—7. and James i. 18. This appears a very important and edifying ſenſe of the preſent paſſage, which is very difficult, and has been variouſly tranſlated and underſtood. See Doddridge, Whitby, Wetſtein, L'Enfant, and Beauſobre.

Ver. 14. And the Word was made fleſh] For, &c. Wat. This divine and eternal Word was made fleſh; united itſelf to our inferior miſerable nature, with all its innocent infirmities, (ſee the 9th article in the argument); and not only made a tranſient viſit, but for a conſiderable time pitched his tabernacle among us,—εσκηνωσε, which manifeſtly alludes to the tabernacle of Moſes, where the Shechinah, or divine glory, inhabited. So the legos, or divine nature ſhechenized, or tabernacled in the human body, which Chriſt aſſumed. The word glory here alludes to this Shechinah, or ſplendid light, which the Chaldee paraphraſt always interprets by the word glory. "We, his diſciples, ſays St. John, beheld his glory with admiration, and knew it to be ſuch as became the only begotten of the Father; for he was not decked with the glitter of worldly pomp and grandeur; but he ſhone moſt beautiful with the glory of the divine perfections, and withal he poſſeſſed the power of working the greateſt and moſt beneficent miracles, expreſly called by this Evangeliſt, His glory, ch. ii. 11. Perhaps alſo there is an alluſion here to the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt upon Jeſus at his baptiſm; to the glory with which his body was adorned in the transfiguration, and to the voice from heaven wherewith he was honoured a little before his crucifixion. The particle ως, rendered as of, does not denote ſimilitude or compariſon, but reality and confirmation. In this ſenſe it is uſed by the LXX, Pſ. lxxiii. 1. Truly, God is, &c.—And here it ſignifies, The glory of the true and real Monogenes, or Only-begotten. For this verſe aſſerts, that the Logos and Monogenes were not diſtinct beings, but one and the ſame perſon, in oppoſition to Cerinthus, article 2. The laſt words, full of grace and truth, ſeem much more naturally properly to belong to the Word,—the preceding ſentence being read in a parentheſis,—than to the Father, as ſome would connect them. The meaning is, that as this Word who dwelt among us, was in himſelf moſt benevolent and upright, ſo he made the ampleſt diſcoveries of pardon to ſinners, which the Moſaic diſpenſation could not poſſibly do; and exhibited the moſt important and ſubſtantial bleſſings; whereas that was at beſt but a ſhadow of good things to come. Truth is here uſed, as it often is in the Scripture, not ſo much in oppoſition to falſhood, as to hieroglyphics, types, and ſhadows. See ver. 17. Heb. x. 1. viii. 2. ix. 24. Dan. vii. 17. and Col. ii. 3, 17. See alſo Merrick, Hammond, and Lowman's Rational of the Hebrew Ritual, p. 374.

Ver. 15. John bare witneſs of him, &c.] This might probably happen at the time when Jeſus made his firſt appearance amongſt thoſe who came to be baptized by John, when, at his offering to receive his baptiſm, though John had been a ſtranger to him before, and knew him not by any perſonal acquaintance with him, yet by ſome powerful impreſſion on his mind, he preſently diſcerned that this was He, whom he before had taught the people to expect, and of whoſe perſon he had given them ſo high a character; for it was plain from his knowledge of Jeſus, that John at firſt would have declined baptizing him, as an honour of which he looked upon himſelf to be unworthy. Nor is it to be doubted, but that when firſt he knew the perſon, of whoſe appearance he had raiſed ſuch expectations by his preaching, he would immediately be ready to acquaint his hearers that this was He who was intended by him; which they themſelves might have been ready to conclude, from the uncommon veneration and reſpect wherewith he was treated by the Baptiſt, who had been always uſed to treat men with the greateſt plainneſs. Comp. ver. 27, 30. with Matth. iii. 14. Eraſmus ſuppoſes that St. John, in the words, He that cometh after me, is preferred, &c. refers to the honours which he knew had been paid to Jeſus in his infancy by the angels, who announced his birth to the ſhepherds; by the ſhepherds themſelves; by the eaſtern magi, by Simeon and Anna, &c. Honours, which could not be paralleled by any thing that had happened to him: But the words ſeem to have a more extenſive meaning; comprehending the ſuperior dignity of Chriſt's nature, office, commiſſion, and exaltation as Mediator, as may be collected from Matth. iii. 11. the paſſage here referred to. The Baptiſt adds, For he was before me; "It is fit that Jeſus ſhould be raiſed above me, becauſe he is a perſon ſuperior in nature to me; for though he was born after me, he exiſted before me. This undoubtedly refers to that ſtate of glory in which Chriſt exiſted before his incarnation, of which the Baptiſt ſpeaks ſo plainly, ch. iii. 31. See the 10th article in the Argument.

Ver. 16. And have his fulneſs, &c.] "And I, (John the Apoſtle) who had the honour of being numbered among his moſt intimate friends, would, with pleaſure, in my own name, and that of my brethren, add my teſtimony to that of the Baptiſt, as I and they have the greateſt reaſon to do; for of his overflowing fulneſs have we all received whatever we poſſeſs as men, as Chriſtians, or as Apoſtles; and he hath given us even grace upon grace: A rich abundance and variety of favours, which will ever make his name moſt dear and precious to our ſouls." It is evident, that what is ſaid in this verſe muſt be conſidered as the words of the Evangeliſt. John the Baptiſt had never yet mentioned the name of Jeſus; and the expreſſion, we all, ſhews it could not be his words; for thoſe to whom he addreſſed himſelf, do not appear to have received grace from Chriſt. The laſt French verſion, with great propriety, includes ver. 15. in a parentheſis, and ſo connects the 16th with the 14th verſe, as if it had been ſaid, He dwelt among us,—full of grace and truth;—and of his fulneſs have we all received, &c. The interpretation which we have given of Και χαριν αντι χαριτος, even grace upon grace, is approved by Sir Richard Ellis, Waterland, Doddridge, and many others, and ſeems the moſt eaſy ſenſe. Grotius would render it, Grace of mere grace; that is, "the freeſt grace imaginable;" and others approving the preſent tranſlation, obſerve, that the meaning is, that under the Goſpel diſpenſation all men receive grace for grace;—privileges and advantages, in proportion to the improvement which they make of thoſe already beſtowed upon them. See a ſimilar uſe of the prepoſition αντι, Rom. xii. 7. and comp. Matth. xiii. 12. James iv. 6. and Merrick's Annotations.

Ver. 17. Grace and truth came by Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] Εγενετο, rendered came, which, according to the uſual acceptation of the verb γινομαι, would ſignify was, or was made, here implies, that grace and truth were exhibited, or appeared. This verſe is delivered in oppoſition to the Ebionites, who preferred Moſes to Jeſus. The Goſpel is here, as in other places, called grace; the word grace, in its moſt obvious meaning, ſignifies favour; favour flowing from mercy and beneficence, to which the perſon who receives it can make no claim as of right. In this ſenſe, the Goſpel is moſt particularly and emphatically grace, in all and every part of it, it was the gift of God, which we could not in any manner be ſaid to deſerve. The Goſpel is grace, as it promiſes repenting ſinners not only an exemption from punishment,

18 No man hath ſeen God at any time; the only-begotten Son, which is in the boſom of the Father, he hath declared him.

19 And this is the record of John, when the Jews ſent prieſts and Levites from Jeruſalem, to aſk him, Who art thou?

20 And he confeſſed, and denied not; but confeſſed, I am not the Chriſt.

21 And they aſked him, What then? Art thou Elias? And he ſaid, I am not. Art thou that prophet? And he anſwered, No.

22 Then ſaid they unto him, Who art thou? that we may give an anſwer to them that ſent us. What ſayeſt thou of thyſelf?

23 He ſaid, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, Make ſtraight the way of the Lord, as ſaid the prophet Eſaias.

Ver. 18. Matth. xi. 27. Luke x. 22. 1 Tim. vi. 16. 1 John iv. 12.—V. 19. Ch. v. 33.—V. 20. Ch. iii. 28. Acts xiii. 25.—V. 21. Deut. xviii. 15, 18. Or, a prophet.—V. 23. Matth. iii. 3. Ch. iii. 28. Iſai. xl. 3.

puniſhment, but a reſurrection to eternal life. The Goſpel is grace, as it promiſes us the divine aſſiſtance to comfort us in afflictions, and enable us to work out our ſalvation. The Goſpel may be called grace, with reſpect to the manner in which it was revealed. The law was delivered with a pomp and majeſty that ſtruck terror; but the Goſpel made its appearance with mildneſs and condeſcenſion, and was introduced by the Son of God, converſing familiarly with men, teaching them by his doctrine and example. Whatſoever was burdenſome in the law of Moſes, was aboliſhed in the Goſpel. The Goſpel is grace, as it contains righteous and equitable laws; the duty it teaches towards God is a reaſonable ſervice, which we are bound in gratitude to perform; and that to our neighbour promotes the happineſs of mankind, while the duty which is enjoined by it to ourſelves tends to moderate every unruly paſſion. The Goſpel is grace, as it is a gift offered to all, an invitation from which none are excluded. Again, grace in ſome places of the New Teſtament means thoſe extraordinary powers which the Holy Ghoſt conferred upon the Apoſtles and firſt believers, as well as the ordinary influences of the Spirit, and in this ſenſe the Goſpel emphatically is grace. Laſtly, grace means goodneſs and moral virtue; in which ſenſe the Goſpel is grace, as it ſets morality in a clear light, and inforces the practice of it by the beſt and moſt effectual motives. The Goſpel is called truth, in oppoſition to the falſhood of paganiſm, which had over-run the world. Truth, as it is the accompliſhment of the prophecies of future favours made under the law, and becauſe an image and repreſentation of good things to come was contained in the law; whereas in the Goſpel theſe good things are brought to light. The Goſpel therefore is truth, in oppoſition to the Jewiſh diſpenſation, as it is the ſubſtance and reality of all thoſe things which are figured by the law; or as they were mere ſhadows compared to that ſolid and ſubſtantial truth which Chriſt has diſcovered to us. See Jortin on the Chriſtian religion, diſc. 7. and Merrick's Annotations, p. 36.

Ver. 18. No man hath ſeen God at any time] Neither Moſes nor any of the prophets, who in former ages delivered the will of God to men, ever ſaw the Divine Being, and therefore they could not make a full diſcovery of his perfections and counſels to men. The only perſon who ever enjoyed this privilege was the Son of God, who is in the boſom of the Father:. He always was, and is the darling object of his tendereſt affection, and the intimate partner of his counſels, and therefore he was able fully to declare the great purpoſe of God concerning the redemption of the world. To be in one's boſom, denotes the greateſt familiarity and intimacy, a communication of counſels and deſigns, and intire and tender affection. Hence it is uſed, Deut. xiii. 6. xxviii. 54. to ſignify a man's beſt-beloved wife. The word ἐξηγησατο, rendered declared, ſignifies to explain, to interpret, to declare, and is particularly applied by the heathen writers to the explanation or declaration of things relating to religion. See particularly Elſner's Obſervations, vol. i. p. 296. and Merrick.

Ver. 19, 20. And this the record of John] Theſe verſes would be better rendered thus, Now this is the teſtimony of John, (mentioned ver. 15.) When the Jews ſent prieſts, &c. ver. 20. then he confeſſed, &c. The rulers at Jeruſalem having been informed, that the Baptiſt's extraordinary ſanctity, zeal, and eloquence, together with the ſolemnity of his baptizing, had made ſo great an impreſſion on the people, that they were beginning to think he might be the Meſſiah, reſolved that certain of their number, whoſe capacity and learning rendered them equal to the taſk, ſhould go and examine him. When theſe meſſengers arrived at Bethabara, they aſked the Baptiſt if he was the Meſſiah, or Elias, or that prophet who was ſaid to ariſe and uſher in the Meſſiah, of whoſe coming there was at this time a general expectation? And this is the record of John; this is the teſtimony which John bare publickly to Jeſus, when the Jews, that is, the ſanhedrim, or great council of the nation, who took cognizance of the pretenſion which any perſon made to the character and office of a prophet, ſent prieſts and Levites from Jeruſalem, perſons of the firſt conſideration for learning and office, and who being maintained at the public expence, had better opportunities of ſtudying the law, and acquiring knowledge, to aſk him, Who art thou? "What character doſt thou aſſume to thyſelf?" The queſtion is not concerning his office, but his perſon. And he confeſſed, and denied not, but in the ſtrongeſt terms ſolemnly proteſted, I am not the Meſſiah. "I know that the people begin to look on me as their long-expected Deliverer; but I tell you plainly they are miſtaken." To every candid judge, the declaration, which on this occaſion John made ſo freely to the prieſts and Levites, and which on other occaſions he repeated publickly in the hearing of the people, will appear a ſtrong proof of his divine miſſion, notwithſtanding he performed no miracle; for when deputies from ſo auguſt a body as the ſenate of Iſrael ſeemed to ſignify, that, in order to their acknowledging him as the Meſſiah, they wanted only a declaration from himſelf; if he had been an impoſtor, he would immediately have graſped at the honours offered him, and have given himſelf out for the Meſſiah; but he was animated by a different Spirit; integrity and truth were evidently the guides of his conduct. Why then ſhould we entertain any doubt of his miſſion, ſeeing he expreſly claimed the character of a meſſenger from God? See Macknight, and Bell's Inquiries.

Ver. 21. Art thou Elias? And he ſaith, I am not] It is plain by this queſtion, that they were ſtrangers to the parentage of John the Baptiſt; and with regard to the reply he makes to this inquiry, there is no ſcruple to be made, but that the Baptiſt might juſtly deny that he was Elijah; that is, the true and real Elijah, whom the Jews expected perſonally to return before the coming of the Meſſiah, though he came in his ſpirit and power. See on Luke i. 17. The Baptiſt, therefore, might truly deny himſelf to be Elijah in the ſenſe of the enquirers. But ſtill ſome have aſked, why he did not expreſs himſelf more fully, by acquainting them with his true character, and who he really was; which, as they apprehend, would have beſt ſuited with the ſimplicity and openneſs of his conduct at other times. But in the Evangeliſt, after the anſwer given them by the Baptiſt, it is ſaid, ver. 24. And they which were ſent, were of the Phariſees. Which account of the perſons was doubtleſs not ſubjoined, without ſome good reaſon; and may ſeem to intimate, that they came not barely as enquirers, but with ſome ill deſign, had he given them a more explicit anſwer. So that he treated them in no other manner than Chriſt himſelf thought fit to do upon ſome like occaſions;—as in the caſe of the tribute-money, Matth. xxii. 17. and when they aſked him, if he was the Chriſt, John x. 25. And this method he took while it was neceſſary in ſome meaſure to conceal himſelf: But afterwards, when his time was come, upon the ſame queſtion being put to him by the high-prieſt, he anſwered, I am; Mark xiv. 60. and added further, what he knew they would ſo interpret as to condemn him. Their next queſtion is, Art thou that prophet? by which cannot be meant, as ſome interpret it, "That prophet, namely, the Meſſiah, whom Moſes has aſſured us, God will raiſe up, and of whom we are in daily expectation;" (ſee Deut. xviii. 15—18. John vi. 14.) becauſe he had already aſſured them that he was not this prophet, ver. 20. I am not the Chriſt. The Greek ſhould be rendered, Art thou a prophet? That is, "of the former generation, raiſed from the dead?" And it is abſolutely neceſſary that this queſtion ſhould be underſtood with ſuch a limitation, becauſe John the Baptiſt was really an illuſtrious prophet, as we may plainly ſee from what is ſaid by Chriſt himſelf, Matth. xi. 9. This interpretation, which is largely vindicated by Caſtalio, ſeems much preferable to that of Theophylact and Eraſmus; who, becauſe of the article ὁ προφητης, would render it as we do, that prophet; concluding, without any proof, that the Jews underſtood Deut. xviii. 18. not of the Meſſiah himſelf, but of ſome prophet of conſiderable note, who was to introduce him. Grotius has ſuppoſed the queſtion which they offer, to refer to Jeremiah, of whoſe return to life there was a mighty rumour prevailing among the Jews. See on Matth. xvi. 14. But there ſeems no reaſon to reſtrain it to a particular prophet; and ſince, as Limborch well obſerves, in his diſpute with Orobio the Jew, that text in Deuteronomy was the cleareſt and ſtrongeſt in all the Moſaic writings, to enforce the neceſſity of ſubmitting to the Meſſiah; it is moſt probable that John would have corrected ſo great a miſtake, if they had put the queſtion to him upon this preſumption. The beſt French verſions render it as above; and it ſeems the word prophet in the Evangeliſt generally ſignifies one of thoſe holy men, who were the meſſengers of God to Iſrael of old; which appears eſpecially from Mark vi. 15. where to be a prophet, and to be as one of the prophets, are ſpoken of as diſtinct, which they could not be but on this interpretation. See Doddridge, Ward's Diſſert. p. 61. and Merrick.

Ver. 23. I am the voice, &c.] It is to be feared Clemens of Alexandria, and Archbp. Fenelon, lay too great a ſtreſs on the word φωνη, voice; when the former of theſe excellent men ſays, "Does not John call men to ſalvation, and is he not entirely an exhortatory voice?"—And then the latter endeavours to illuſtrate the humility of John the Baptiſt's reply, as if he had ſaid, "Far from being the Meſſiah, or Elias, or one of the old prophets, I am nothing but a voice; a ſound, that as ſoon as it has expreſſed the thought, of which it is the ſign, dies into air, and is known no more." Had the Baptiſt ſaid only, I am a voice crying in the wilderneſs, there might have been more room for ſuch a ſuppoſition: But ſince he calls himſelf the voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, the words are plainly to be 24 And they which were ſent, were of the Phariſees.

25 And they aſked him, and ſaid unto him, Why baptizeſt thou then, if thou be not that Chriſt, nor Elias, neither that prophet?

26 John anſwered them, ſaying, I baptize with water: but there ſtandeth one among you, whom ye know not;

27 He it is, who coming after me, is preferred before me, whoſe ſhoe's latchet I am not worthy to unlooſe.

28 Theſe things were done in Bethabara beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing.

29 The next day John ſeeth Jeſus coming unto him, and ſaith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the ſin of the world.

30 This is he of whom I ſaid, After me cometh a man, which is preferred before me: for he was before me.

31 And I knew him not: but that he ſhould be made manifeſt to Iſrael, therefore am I come baptizing with water.

32 And John bare record, ſaying, I ſaw the Spirit deſcending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him.

33 And I knew him not: but he that ſent me to baptize with water, the ſame ſaid unto me, Upon whom thou ſhalt ſee the Spirit deſcending and remaining on him, the be underſtood with very great latitude; for they would elſe imply that he was not the very perſon that ſo cried; and deſignedly referring his hearers to the words of Iſaiah, who cannot be imagined to have intended a diminution of this ſaint's character, they are an inſtance of that remarkable liberty of expreſſion which the Hebrew language, wherein they were ſpoken, admits. It is as if he had ſaid, "I am the perſon of whom Iſaiah ſpeaks, when he ſays, the voice of him that crieth in the wilderneſs." By a like liberty, the kingdom of heaven is ſaid, Matth. xiii. 24. to be like unto a man that ſowed good ſeed in his field, i. e. as Dr. Doddridge paraphraſes the words, "The kingdom of heaven, or the Goſpel diſpenſation, may be compared to that which happened to a man who had ſown good ſeed in his ground." Several very conſiderable Greek writers expreſs themſelves in much the ſame manner. See Merrick's Annotations.

Ver. 25. Why baptizeſt thou then] The Jews, it ſeems, had conceived an opinion that they were all to be baptized, either by the Meſſiah himſelf, or by ſome of his retinue; which they drew from Zachariah xiii. 1. The deciſions of the Phariſees were held by the common people as infallible, wherefore they are mentioned ver. 24. and as this ſect had determined that only proſelytes were to be baptized, they found fault with John for baptizing the Jews, ſeeing he was neither the Meſſiah, nor Elias, nor a prophet. They thought his altering in this manner their inſtitutions, was an exerciſe of authority, which, by his own confeſſion, did not belong to him. It is not to be certainly determined from this text, whether the baptiſm of proſelytes was then in uſe among the Jews or not. The words indeed will make a very ſtrong and well-adapted ſenſe, ſhould they be underſtood as if it had been ſaid, "Why is it then that thou doſt inſtitute ſuch a new rite as this?" But ſurely too they will be very proper in the other ſenſe, if we underſtand them to imply, "Why is it then that thou takeſt upon thee, without any commiſſion from the ſanhedrim, to adminiſter baptiſm; and that not only, as is uſual unto thoſe who before this were heathens, but even to the Jews?" And this ſeems to be the more probable ſenſe; while the Baptiſt's uſe of this ceremony in ſuch a manner appears to be a ſtrong intimation that Jews, as well as Gentiles, muſt become proſelytes to the new diſpenſation which was then opening to the world; and that however holy they imagined themſelves, yet they all ſtood in abſolute need of being waſhed from their ſins, as he had before moſt emphatically declared, Matth. iii. 8, 9.

Ver. 26—28. John anſwered them, ſaying, &c.] "I baptiſe, to ſhew you the nature and neceſſity of repentance; but it is with water only, which cannot cleanſe you from your ſins, as the waſhing predicted by Zechariah will do:" (ſee the preceding note.) "That more efficacious baptiſm will be diſpenſed unto you by the Meſſiah, who is at preſent among you, though you do not know him, becauſe he hath not manifeſted himſelf. Beſides in dignity, he is infinitely my ſuperior; for I am not worthy to be his ſervant, or to do him the meaneſt offices." See on Luke iii. 16. Theſe things were done in Bethabara, or the houſe of paſſage; it lay near that part of the river which was miraculouſly dried up for the Iſraelites, under the command of Joſhua. See Joſh. iii. 16. and Judg. xii. 6.

Ver. 29. The next day John ſeeth Jeſus, &c.] It ſeems Jeſus returned from the wilderneſs about the time that the prieſts and Levites arrived at Bethabara; for the day after they propoſed their queſtions, he happened to paſs by while the Baptiſt was ſtanding with the multitude on the banks of the Jordan. The great buſineſs of the Meſſiah's forerunner being to lead the people to that Meſſiah, John embraced this new opportunity of pointing him out to them; "Behold, ſaid he, with the ſtricteſt attention and regard that innocent and holy perſon, who may properly be called the Lamb of God, as he is the great atoning ſacrifice, of which the lambs, daily offered by divine command in the temple, were intended to be types; which expiates and takes away the ſin of the whole world; and is ſet forth to be a propitiation not only for the Jews, for whom alone the ſacrifices of the law were offered, but for the Gentiles too; that through his name whoſoever believeth in him, may receive remiſſion of ſins." It is well obſerved by the author of the treatiſe called, "Chriſt the Mediator," that this is the only ſenſe in which a lamb can be ſaid to take away ſin: Many ſuppoſe that this refers to the paſchal lamb, which, however, was not ſo much an expiatory, as an euchariſtical ſacrifice. Grotius ſtrangely enervates the force of this text, by chooſing to explain it of Chriſt's reforming men's lives; whereas there is nothing more evident than that the great end for which Chriſt lived and died, was to atone for ſin, and to exempt us from the puniſhment which our iniquities deſerved; that having put away ſin by the ſacrifice of himſelf, we might have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveneſs of our ſins, Comp. Heb. ix. 26, 28. Epheſ. i. 7. Col. i. 14. and ſee Grotius, Doddridge, and Hammond.

Ver. 30. For he was before me] For he exiſted before me. See ver. 15. and Hammond.

Ver. 31. And I knew him not] St. Matthew relates, ch. iii. 14. that when Chriſt came to be baptized, John forbad him, ſaying, I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comeſt Thou to me? "By this hiſtory of St. Matthew, ſays Dr. Clarke, John ſeems to have known Chriſt before he baptized him: whereas in St. John's Goſpel, Chriſt ſeems to have been firſt made known to him by the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt after his baptiſm. See ver. 33. It is moſt probable that God, having before given John that token to know Chriſt, did upon Chriſt's coming to be baptized, reveal to John that this was the perſon upon whom he ſhould preſently ſee the ſignal." Though this ſuppoſition be approved by ſeveral commentators, there does not appear any neceſſity of having a recourſe to it. When the Baptiſt ſays, he knew not Jeſus, he may be underſtood to mean that he knew him not with certainty to be the Meſſiah, and conſequently was not yet authorized to declare him ſuch: As he was related to Chriſt, it is poſſible that he might perſonally have known him, and obſerved him from his infancy; and though we ſhould ſuppoſe him not to have been informed by his parents Zachariah and Elizabeth, of the miraculous circumſtances which attended Chriſt's birth, yet a character of ſuch unparalleled ſanctity, might reaſonably draw from ſo modeſt and humble a perſon as St. John, an acknowledgement of his own inferiority, and prompt him to ſay, "I have need to be baptized of thee, rather than perform this office to a perſon ſo far my ſuperior in purity and holineſs." A circumſtance mentioned by St. Matthew himſelf in the ſame chapter, ver. 6. and by St. Mark i. 5. makes it ſtill leſs ſurprizing that the Baptiſt ſhould thus expreſs himſelf. Thoſe Evangeliſts informs us, that the people were baptized in Jordan, confeſſing their ſins. If theſe words imply, as well they may, that every perſon who came to be baptized confeſſed his ſins; this circumſtance alone might ſufficiently diſtinguiſh the bleſſed Jeſus from all others as he alone had no ſins to confeſs, and might lead the Baptiſt to conclude, that he was the perſon appointed to take away the ſins of the world. Conſcious then as he was of his own imperfections, how naturally might he ſay to this ſinleſs perſon, I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comeſt Thou to me? But however ſtrongly he might from thence preſume him to be the Meſſiah, yet he could not be ſaid to know him to be ſo, nor therefore as yet bear teſtimony to him under that character. In this ſenſe then he might properly ſay, And I knew him not: that is, I knew him not to be the Meſſiah; for ſo the words whom ye knew not, ver. 26. are probably to be underſtood; and the ſame expreſſion is uſed in a like reſtrained ſenſe by Chriſt himſelf, ch. xiv. 10. Have I been ſo long time with you, and yet haſt thou not known me, Philip? where the words, Haſt thou not known me, certainly did not imply that Philip had no perſonal knowledge of Chriſt; nor could Socrates mean that his friend Apollodorus had no perſonal knowledge of him, when, as Ælian relates, he ſaid, "If Apollodorus imagines that the corpſe, which you will ſoon ſee lying at your feet, is Socrates, it is plain that he does not know me." See Ælian's Var. Hiſt. i. 16. Jackſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 518. and Merrick's Annotations.

ſame is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghoſt.

34 And I ſaw, and bare record that this is the Son of God.

35 Again the next day after, John ſtood, and two of his diſciples;

36 And looking upon Jeſus as he walked, he ſaith, Behold the Lamb of God.

37 And the two diſciples heard him ſpeak, and they followed Jeſus.

38 Then Jeſus turned, and ſaw them following, and ſaith unto them, What ſeek ye? They ſaid unto him, Rabbi, (which is to ſay, being interpreted, Maſter) where dwelleſt thou?

39 He ſaith unto them, Come and ſee. They came and ſaw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day: for it was about the tenth hour.

40 One of the two which heard John ſpeak, and followed him, was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother.

41 He firſt findeth his own brother Simon, and ſaith unto him, We have found the Meſſias; which is, being interpreted, the Chriſt.

42 And he brought him to Jeſus. And when Jeſus beheld him, he ſaid, Thou art Simon the ſon of Jona: thou ſhalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation a ſtone.

43 The day following Jeſus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and ſaith unto him, Follow me.

44 Now Philip was of Bethſaida, the city of Andrew and Peter.

45 Philip findeth Nathanael, and ſaith unto him, We have found him of whom Moſes in the law, and the prophets did write, Jeſus of Nazareth, the ſon of Joſeph.

Ver. 35. Two of his diſciples] It appears from ver. 40. that Andrew was one of theſe, and perhaps John himſelf might be the other; who frequently conceals his own name in his Goſpel. See ch. xiii. 23. and xx. 2.

Ver. 36. And looking upon Jeſus] Looking ſteadfaſtly on Jeſus, ſeems the exact ſignification of the original ιμϐλεψας. See on ver. 29.

Ver. 37, 38. And they followed Jeſus] As Jeſus was a perſon who had no attendants, and was a ſtranger in this country, we may conclude that he had only ſome obſcure and private lodging here, which muſt have been no great diſtance from the place where John baptized, as may be gathered from his appearing there from day to day: By this means he did an honour to John's miniſtry, and had an opportunity of receiving his teſtimony. Jeſus, knowing the intentions of the two diſciples who followed him, gave them an invitation to his lodging, ver. 39. for they had aſked him, "Rabbi, πȣ μενεις, where doſt thou lodge? intimating their inclination to converſe with Jeſus. Their calling him rabbi, which was a title of great honour and reſpect, given to men famous for their abilities and inſtructions, intimates, that they had been informed of this part of his character from John the Baptiſt. It was about the tenth hour, i. e. ten in the morning, when they came to him; for this Evangeliſt uſes the Roman method of reckoning the hours of the day in his Goſpel; wherefore the two diſciples converſed with Jeſus almoſt a whole day, and no doubt were highly edified and inſtructed by our Lord's diſcourſes to them. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Macknight's Obſerv. 5.

Ver. 41. He findeth his own brother, Simon] Hence it ſhould ſeem that both theſe diſciples ſought Peter different ways. He may perhaps be called Andrew's own brother, to diſtinguiſh him from ſome other who belonged to the family, and who poſſibly might be his brother-in-law, or was related to him only in half blood. Peter was ſo remarkable a perſon, that it might be proper to tell us who was the firſt inſtrument of bringing him acquainted with Chriſt; and if John was the other diſciple here referred to, he might mean this as an humble intimation, that Andrew's zeal in this reſpect was greater than his own. We may obſerve here, by the way, that Peter was not the firſt of Chriſt's diſciples,— in which the Papiſts would have been ready to have gloried; but that another was the occaſion of bringing him to an acquaintance with Jeſus. The great king, whom the Jews expected, is called Meſſiah by none of the prophets but Daniel; who has named him, ch. ix. 25. Meſſiah the Prince: wherefore, as by the preſent, and many other paſſages of the Goſpels, it appears, that this name was now familiar to the Jews; it ſhews how much their attention was turned towards Daniel's prophecy of the ſeventy weeks, and how firmly they expected the arrival of their king, according to the time fixed in that prophecy. See Doddridge, Chandler, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 40. Which heard John ſpeak] Who had received information from John; namely, that mentioned ver. 36. Merrick.

Ver. 42. Thou art Simon] Though Jeſus had never ſeen Simon before, immediately on his coming in, he ſaluted him, in full proof of his omniſcience, by his own and his father's name; adding, in proof of his being poſſeſſed of the gift of prophecy, that he ſhould afterwards be called Cephas, which means the ſame in Syriac that Peter does in the Greek, namely, a rock; a name well adapted to his character, upon account of that reſolute and patient firmneſs, with which he ſhould maintain the cauſe of the Goſpel, and which alſo expreſſed the uſe afterwards to be made of him; as he ſhould prove in ſubordination to Chriſt, one of the great foundations of the church. See on Matth. xvi. 18. Some have thought that when our Lord ſaid, Thou art Simon, he intended an alluſion to the name Simon, which may ſignify a hearer; intimating the candour and impartiality with which he was willing to hear Chriſt's inſtructions. See Dr. Clarke, and Merrick on the place.

Ver. 43. Jeſus would go forth] Jeſus determined to depart from thence. The force of the word ϑελω ſeems to be greater than our tranſlation expreſſes, and perhaps may here intimate, that our Lord on this occaſion broke though the importunity of ſome, who would rather have perſuaded him to continue at Bethabara, for the advantage of further teſtimony from the Baptiſt; or to have gone to Jeruſalem, where they might imagine that his miniſtry would have opened more honourably than in Galilee; comp. John vii. 3, 4. When we conſider how ſuddenly ſome of Chriſt's diſciples left their ſtated employments to follow him, as we read Matth. iv. 18—22. Luke v. 27, 28. xix. 5, 6. it ſeems reaſonable to allow ſome ſingular kind of impreſſion on their minds, (as there was in the calling of Eliſha, 1 Kings xix. 19, &c.) which, though for the preſent it ſuperſeded the neceſſity of argument, yet did not exclude their attending to that afterwards, which might be neceſſary to defend their conduct to others. See Doddridge, and Mintert.

Ver. 44. Now Philip was of Bethſaida] As it appears from the ſubſequent part of the hiſtory, that Philip was already acquainted with our Lord's character, and believed on him, this obſervation is made by the Evangeliſt to ſhew by what means he was brought to Jeſus. His townſmen Andrew and Peter had done him the favour. Bethſaida was a town in Galilee, on the ſea of Tiberias.

Ver. 45. Of whom Moſes and the prophets did write] Whom, &c. have deſcribed. Γραφω is frequently uſed in the ſame ſenſe elſewhere; and in particular is juſtly rendered thus, Rom. x. 5. It ſeems Peter and Andrew, in their converſation with Philip, had perſuaded him to believe on Jeſus, by ſhewing him how the types and predictions of the law and the prophets were fulfilled in him. Perhaps, this was the method which Jeſus himſelf had taken to confirm Peter and Andrew, Philip's inſtructors, in the good opinion they had conceived of him, by means of the teſtimony which their maſter, John the Baptiſt, had given concerning him; though the Evangeliſt hath not thought fit to mention this circumſtance. Nathanael is thought, as we have obſerved on Matth. x. 2. to have been the ſame with Bartholomew, that is, the ſon of Tholomew; and the ſuppoſition is probable, were it for no other reaſon but this, that all the other perſons who became acquainted with Jeſus at Jordan, when he was baptized, and who believed upon him there, were choſen to be his apoſtles.

Ver. 46. Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?] Philip, not knowing that Jeſus was born at Bethlehem, calls him Jeſus of Nazareth: Upon which occaſion Nathanael applies a proverb, by which the reſt of the Iſraelites ridiculed the Nazarenes; and he applied it the rather, as the Meſſiah's nativity had been determined by the prophet Micah to be at Bethlehem. Nazareth was a mean town, inhabited by fiſhermen and mechanics of the loweſt degree, made up of ignorant Jews, and a mixture of Gentiles, as Nathanael was a native of Galilee, it appears from hence, that the Galileans themſelves had but an ill opinion of Nazareth. As worſe than the reſt of that country; and, indeed, by the figure its inhabitants make in the Evangeliſts, they ſeem to have deſerved it. See Matth. xiii. 54, &c. and Luke iv. 16, 28, 29. In this place Jeſus ſpent a great part of his life, and in that reſpect might fairly be called a Nazarene. But the there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip ſaith unto him, Come and ſee.

47 Jeſus ſaw Nathanael coming to him, and ſaith of him, Behold an Iſraelite indeed, in whom is no guile.

48 Nathanael ſaith unto him, Whence knoweſt thou me? Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto him, Before that Philip called thee, when thou waſt under the fig-tree, I ſaw thee.

49 Nathanael anſwered and ſaith unto him, Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Iſrael.

50 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto him, Becauſe I ſaid unto thee, I ſaw thee under the fig-tree, believeſt thou? thou ſhalt ſee greater things than theſe.

51 And he ſaith unto him, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Hereafter ye ſhall ſee heaven open, and the angels of God aſcending and deſcending upon the Son of man.

Ver. 47. Pſ. xxxii. 2. lxxiii. 1. Rom. ii. 28, 29.—V. 51. Gen. xxviii. 12. Matth. iv. 11. Luke ii. 9, 13. xxii. 43. xxiv. 4. Acts i. 10.

the Jews, in calling him Jeſus of Nazareth,—the prophet of Nazareth, &c. added to that of his country, the idea of ſcorn and contempt: "What! that poor deſpicable fellow, that mean mortal,—he our Meſſiah! Can any good, any great and enterprizing perſon, any thing ſuitable to the character of Chriſt, come out of Nazareth?" Pilate wrote his inſcription,—Jeſus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews, with deſign to have it read in this light. He joins together two contradictory titles, in his opinion, that of Nazareth, and that of a king, in order to expoſe the Jewiſh hope, and the Chriſtian belief: But the Evangeliſt prepares his reader againſt prejudices from this appellation. Though the Jews call him a Nazarene in deriſion, we are not aſhamed of that name. What do they mean by it but a deſpiſed, afflicted, ſuffering man?—And ſo the Meſſiah is foretold to be, not in one, but in all the prophets. While therefore they reproach Jeſus as a Nazarene, they actually fulfil the prophecies which deſcribe him as ſuch, and prove Jeſus to be the Meſſiah. See the note on Matth. ii. 23. To obviate Nathanael's objection, Philip replies to him, "Do not ſuffer yourſelf to be borne away by a vain popular prejudice; but come, and ſee; converſe with him yourſelf, and you will ſoon be ſatisfied." The ſame anſwer had been received from our Lord the day before. By the way, we may learn from hence how cautiouſly we ſhould guard againſt popular prejudices, which poſſeſſed ſo honeſt a heart as that of Nathanael, and led him to ſuſpect that the bleſſed Jeſus himſelf was an impoſtor, and that no good could be expected from him, becauſe he had been brought up at Nazareth; But his integrity prevailed over that fooliſh bias, and laid him open to the conviction of evidence, which a candid inquirer will always be glad to admit, even when it brings the moſt unexpected diſcovery. See Doddridge, Chandler's Defence, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 47. Jeſus ſaw Nathanael] Nathanael being a man of a candid diſpoſition, reſolved to go and converſe with Jeſus, that he might judge with the more certainty concerning his pretenſions. He was coming therefore with Philip on this errand, when Jeſus, who knew his thoughts, honoured him with the amiable character of a true Iſraelite, in whom there was no guile; a plain, upright, honeſt man, free from hypocriſy, and open to conviction, who not only derived his pedigree from Abraham, but who inherited his virtues. Compare Rev. iii. 9. and John viii. 39. This contains the character given to Jacob, Gen. xxv. 27. according to the ſenſe of the Hebrew, which fully ſhews in what ſenſe our Lord is to be underſtood, when he calls Nathanael an Iſraelite without guile.

Ver. 48. Whence knoweſt thou me?] "I am a perfect ſtranger to thee, How is it then that thou canſt at once undertake to anſwer for the moſt ſecret part of a ſtranger's character? Jeſus replied, I am not ſo intire a ſtranger to thy character as thou art ready to ſuppoſe; nor do I take it merely from uncertain report: for before Philip called thee, when thou waſt alone under the fig-tree, I ſaw thee; and as I was preſent in Spirit to obſerve what paſſed in that ſecret retirement, I know how well thou deſerveſt the teſtimony which I have now borne to thine integrity." See the next note.

Ver. 49. Rabbi, thou art the Son of God] Moſt commentators are of opinion, that this conviction was produced in Nathanael's mind by our Lord's miraculous power. But his faith may be accounted for on ſuppoſition that he had been praying under the fig-tree, and that in his prayer he had made confeſſion of his ſins, in ſuch a particular manner, as to merit the ample character which I had given him. Accordingly, when Jeſus inſinuated that he had given it to him on account of what had paſſed under the fig-tree, Nathanael immediately perceived that he not only knew what was done at a diſtance, but could alſo look into mens hearts; and therefore cried out in great aſtoniſhment, tha the was the long-expected Meſſiah of the Jews. It may not be improper to obſerve here, that the Jews univerſally believed the Son of God would appear on earth, and be that great king whom they had for ſo many ages expected, as appears from the paſſage before us, and from Matth. viii. 29. John vi. 69. Matth. xxvi. 16. John xi. 27. Matth. xxvi. 63. It is remarkable, that the woman of Samaria draws the ſame inference with Nathanael from a ſimilar circumſtance; (ſee ch. iv. 29.) which plainly intimates, that they ſuppoſed that the Meſſiah would be endowed with the moſt perfect knowledge, and have the gift of prophecy in the higheſt degree. There was a great deal of courage in Nathanael's making ſuch a declaration as that before us, if it was made before a mixed company: for Chriſt's aſſuming the title of the Son of God, was afterwards interpreted to be no leſs than blaſphemy. See ch. x. 36. xix. 7. and ix. 22, 34. Macknight, and Evans's Chriſtian Temper, vol. ii.

Ver. 50. Becauſe I ſaid I ſaw thee] "You believe becauſe I told you, that I had ſeen you under the fig-tree: You ſhall ſee greater things than thoſe. It is ſuppoſed that under the fig-tree Nathanael had ſome revelation or divine impreſſion upon his mind concerning the Meſſiah; to which our Lord here alludes. Schoettgenius proves that it was then the hour of prayer. See Heylin, and the preceding note.

Ver. 51. Verily, verily, I ſay unto you] There is no doubt but that theſe words are to be taken for a ſolemn affirmation; in which it is obſervable, that John has conſtantly repeated the Amen, while it is only mentioned once by the other Evangeliſts; and this we may ſuppoſe him to have done either to excite the greater attention, or in a more emphatical and ſtronger manner to aſſert the truth not only of the thing affirmed, but of the perſon who affirms it; for as Amen in Hebrew ſignifies Truth, (Iſaiah lxv. 16.) ſo Chriſt, as being the true and faithful witneſs, is called the Amen, Rev. iii. 14. This repeated aſſeveration therefore may be conſidered as an intimation to us, not only that the ſaying to which it is prefixed is true, but that we ſhould regard it as proceeding from the true and faithful witneſs. Inſtead of hereafter, many commentators tranſlate the Greek απ'αρτι,—from this time—henceforth,—"From this time you ſhall ſee the whole frame of nature ſubject to my commands, and ſuch a ſurpriſing train of miracles wrought by me, in the courſe of my ſucceeding miniſtry, that ſhall ſeem as if heaven was opened, and all the angels of God were continually, as they appeared in a viſion to Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 12.) aſcending and deſcending to wait upon the Son of man, and to receive and execute his orders. Accordingly, within three days one glorious miracle was performed by Chriſt at Cana of Galilee, which being the town whereunto Nathanael belonged, there is great reaſon to believe he was preſent with the reſt of Chriſt's diſciples at it; and if he was the ſame perſon with the Apoſtle Bartholomew, he muſt regard the viſion of angels attending Chriſt's aſcenſion, as a glorious accompliſhment of theſe words, as his final appearance at the day of Judgement, when the Son of man ſhall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, will yet more eminently be. If we underſtand this prediction, ſays Mr. Merrick, concerning the opening of heaven and the viſion of angels, in a literal ſenſe, which ſeems the moſt eaſy method of interpreting it, we may, with Dr. Hammond, refer it to Chriſt's aſcenſion, when the heaven was opened to receive him, and the angels came down from thence to wait on him, and aſcended after him. The appearance of an angel in his agony might alſo be referred to; and as many tranſactions of Chriſt's life are omitted in the Goſpels, there might be other appearances not recorded, which, if any of them were exhibited ſoon after Nathanael's coming to Chriſt, would determine απ'αρτι, as we have obſerved, to its moſt obvious ſignification, from this time. But we may obſerve, that as the deſcending of the angels was previous to their aſcending, the order of the facts ſeems to be inverted, which is not unuſual in heathen writers, and is the ſame in Gen. xxviii. 12. to which our Saviour evidently alludes."—Though there may be much truth in what Mr. Merrick obſerves, and our Lord's reſurrection and aſcenſion may be referred to, as amongſt the greateſt of his miracles, and by which the truth of his miſſion is inconteſtably proved; yet I cannot help thinking that the paſſage is of more general import, and means, upon the whole, "You ſhall be witneſſes to ſuch mighty works, and ſuch remarkable interpoſitions of Providence on my behalf, as will leave you no room to doubt of my miſſion from God." The Jews, as we have had occaſion frequently to obſerve, aſcribed every ordinary and extraordinary work of God to the miniſtration of angels: Our Saviour ſpeaks this language, and it would be difficult perhaps to prove the impropriety of it. It is evident from the change of number in this verſe,—ye ſhall ſee,—οψεσθε, that the words do not refer to Nathanael only. See on Matth. viii. 20.

REFLECTIONS ON CHRIST, AS THE CREATOR OF THE WORLD.

It is one thing not to be able to diſcern the reaſons of Providence, and another to ſuppoſe that there is no reaſon in them. The reaſons which made it either neceſſary or proper for Chriſt to die for the ſins of mankind, may be removed out of our ſight; but to ſuppoſe that Chriſt really did die for the ſins of the world, and yet that there was no reaſon or propriety in ſo doing, is to found revealed religion upon a principle deſtructive of natural religion: for no religion

CHAP. II.

Chriſt turneth water into wine: departeth into Capernaum, and to Jeruſalem, where he purgeth the temple of the buyers and ſellers: he gion can ſubſiſt with an opinion that God is a Being capable of acting without reaſon.

The publication of the Goſpel has made an alteration in the ſcheme of religion, by revealing to us the Son of God, whom God hath appointed heir of all things, by whom alſo he made the worlds; who is the brightneſs of his glory, and the expreſs image of his perſon, and upholdeth all things by the word of his power. Heb. i. 2, 3.

The knowledge of the Son of God, of his power and dominion in the creating and upholding all things, became neceſſary, as the foundation of the faith required to be placed in him as our Redeemer. The character of Redeemer would be but ill ſupported by any perſon who had not power equal to the great undertaking. The New Teſtament doctrines therefore relating to the dignity and authority of Jeſus Chriſt, are relative to his office of Redeemer, and therefore there was no explicit declaration of them, either before or under the law of Moſes.

When we conſider what expectations we have from our Redeemer, and what great promiſes he has made to us in his Goſpel, we cannot poſſibly avoid inquiring who this perſon is: when we hear his promiſe to be always preſent with us to the end of the world, to ſupport us under all our difficulties, it is but a reaſonable demand to aſk by what authority he does theſe things? And when we are told that he liveth for ever, and is the Lord of life and glory, there is no room to doubt of his being able to ſave us. St. Paul tells, that the Lord Jeſus Chriſt ſhall change our vile bodies, that they may be faſhioned like unto his glorious body. A great expectation this! But conſider what the reaſonable foundation of this expectation is: St. Paul tells us, " It is the energy of power with which Chriſt is endued, whereby he is able even to ſubdue all things to himſelf. Our Saviour puts this article upon the ſame foot, declaring, Verily, verily I ſay unto you, the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead ſhall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear ſhall live. John v. 25. The reaſon of which follows in the next verſe: For as the Father hath life in himſelf, ſo hath he given to the Son to have life in himſelf. If the Son is really endued with a power to which all nature ſubmits and obeys; a power ſufficient to the creation of the world at firſt, and to the preſervation of it ever ſince, we have reaſon to conclude, that he is now as able to reſtore life, as he was at firſt to give it; to call men from the grave into being, as well as to call them out of nothing at the firſt creation.

The relation of Chriſt to mankind as Creator and Governor conſidered, the work of redemption could not properly have been undertaken by any other hand. Were we to conſider one perſon as our Creator, and another as our Redeemer, it would be extremely to the diminution of the honour and regard due to the Creator, inaſmuch as the bleſſing of redemption would greatly outweigh the benefit of creation; and it would be natural for us to prefer the love that delivered us from the evils and miſeries of the world, to that which placed us in them. In the daily ſervice of our church we praiſe God „ for creating and preſerving us;—but above all, for his ineſtimable love in the redemption;" which is very conſiſtent with reſpect to one great benefactor, who both made us and redeemed us; but had any other hand redeemed us, ſuch expreſſions of gratitude to him, would have reflected diſhonour on the Creator.

St. Paul tells us expreſly, that Chriſt is the head of the church; a title founded in the right of redemption, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence; in whom it pleaſed the Father that all fulneſs ſhould dwell, that is, that Chriſt ſhould be all in all; the head of the ſecond, as well as of the firſt creation. Col. i. 18. Now, according to St. Paul's reaſoning here, if any other perſon had redeemed the world, or if the world had been redeemed without Chriſt, he would not in all things have had the pre-eminence, which yet he had before ſin came into the world; and conſequently the ſin of the world would have been the diminution of the headſhip and power of Chriſt. The work was ſuch, that no perſon of leſs power could undertake it; and his relation to the world was ſuch, as made it fit and proper to commit the world to him.

The Goſpel having thus diſcovered to us the juſt relation between Chriſt and the world, it requires from us, in conſequence, ſuch hope and faith, and ſuch obedience as naturally flow from this relation; and could it poſſibly require leſs? Would it not be abſurd to tell us, that Chriſt is Lord of the world which is, and of that which is to come, and yet not require us to have hope and confidence in him? Would it not be abſurd to tell us, that he is the Lord of life and glory, and yet to bid us expect life and glory through any other hands than his? Would it not be abſurd to tell us, that all judgement is comitted to the Son, and yet no obedience due to him? Or, that God has appointed him to be head over all, and yet no honour to be paid him?

From theſe and the like conſiderations we may diſcern how reaſonable, how natural the religion of the Goſpel is; the myſterious work of our redemption itſelf ſeems to have ariſen from the original relation between the only Son of God, and man the creature of God; and our faith, in every article of it, has a juſt foundation and ſupport in the power, authority, and pre-eminence of the Son of God, by whom all things were made, and without whom was not any thing that was made. We may well believe he has redeemed us, ſince we know he made us; and though all nature ſeems to frown on us, and to threaten death and deſtruction, from which no human power or cunning can deliver us; yet our hope si ſteadfaſt and unmoveable, being placed in him, who is able to ſubdue all things unto himſelf. Eſpecially the belief that the dead ſhall hear the voice of the Son of God, and ariſe to life, is the fundamental article of a Chriſtian's faith; and if this be not well eſtabliſhed, our hope and confidence are vain, and the preaching the croſs of Chriſt is fooliſhneſs.

Let us reflect a little how the caſe ſtands with us, with reſpect to the proſpect beyond the grave: let us conſider what hopes nature furniſhes, and how they are ſupported, confirmed, and enlarged by the Goſpel of Chriſt Jeſus.

When we view the world in its preſent circumſtances; when we conſider that the diſtreſſes and ſorrows ariſing from the weakneſs and wickedneſs of men, are in number and in weight ten times more than all the ſufferings to which we were expoſed by the mere frailty of our condition;—and when we look further, and find that the beſt men oftentimes fare worſt,—that even the deſire and endeavour to pleaſe God frequently expoſes them to infinite ſorrows in this world;—we ſtand amazed, and are ready to doubt whether theſe appearances can be reconciled with the belief that God governs the world! But ſince all nature proclaims the being and the power, the wiſdom and goodneſs of him who created all; under the conviction of this evidence that there is a God, we can find no poſſible way to account for his juſtice and goodneſs towards the children of men, but by ſuppoſing that he has appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteouſneſs. And ſince this world evidently is not the ſcene of this judgement, we conclude there muſt be another, in which we ſhall ſtand before his tribunal. Thus far nature goes; all beyond this is vain philoſophy and imagination, founded on conceits which are in vogue to-day, and forgot to-morrow.

Look now into the Goſpel; there you will find every reaſonable hope of nature, nay, every reaſonable ſuſpicion of nature cleared up and confirmed, and every difficulty anſwered and removed. Do the preſent circumſtances of the world lead you to ſuſpect that God could never be author of ſuch corrupt and wretched creatures as men now are? Your ſuſpicions are well founded: God made man upright; but through the temptation of the devil ſin entered, and death and deſtruction followed after.

Do you ſuſpect, from the ſucceſs of virtue and vice in this world, that the Providence of God does not interpoſe to protect the righteous from violence, or to puniſh the wicked? The ſuſpicion is not without ground. God leaves his beſt ſervants here to be tried oftentimes with affliction and ſorrow, and permits the wicked to flouriſh and abound. The call of the Goſpel is not to honour and riches here, but to take up our croſs and follow Chriſt.

Do you judge, from comparing the preſent ſtate of the world with the natural notion you have of God, that there muſt needs be another ſtate, in which juſtice ſhall take place? You reaſon right, and the Goſpel confirms the judgement; God has appointed a day to judge the world in righteouſneſs; then thoſe who mourn ſhall rejoice, thoſe who weep ſhall laugh, and the perſecuted and afflicted ſervants of God ſhall be heirs of his kingdom.

Have you ſometimes miſgivings of mind? Are you tempted to miſtruſt this judgement, when you ſee difficulties which ſurround it on every ſide? Some which affect the ſoul in its ſeparate ſtate; ſome which affect the body in its ſtate of corruption and diſſolution? Look to the Goſpel, there theſe difficulties are accounted for, and you need no longer puzzle yourſelf with dark queſtions concerning the ſtate, condition and nature of ſeparate ſpirits, or concerning the body, however to appearance loſt and deſtroyed; for the body and ſoul ſhall once more meet to part no more, but to be happy for ever.

Would you know who it is that gives this aſſurance? It is one who is able to make good his word; one who loved you ſo well as to die for you; yet one too great to be held a priſoner in the grave. No, he roſe with triumph and glory, the firſt-born from the dead, and will in like manner call from the duſt of the earth all thoſe who put their truſt and confidence in him.

But who is this, you will ſay, who was ſubject to death, and yet had power over death? How could ſo much weakneſs and ſo much ſtrength meet together? That God has the power of life we know; but then he cannot die. That man is mortal we know; but then he cannot give life.

Conſider, does this difficulty deſerve an anſwer, or does it not?—Our bleſſed Saviour lived among us in a low and poor condition, expoſed to much ill treatment from his jealous countrymen: When he fell into their power, their rage knew no bounds; they reviled him, they inſulted him, they mocked him, ſcourged him, and at laſt nailed to a croſs, where, by a ſhameful and wretched death, he finiſhed a life of ſorrow and affliction. Did we know no more of him than this, upon what ground could we pretend to hope that he will be able to ſave us from the power of death? We might ſay with his diſciples, "We truſted that this had been he who ſhould have ſaved Iſrael; but—he is dead, he is gone, and all our hopes are buried in his grave."

If it be thought that this deſerves an anſwer, and that the faith of a Chriſtian cannot be a reaſonable faith, unleſs it be enabled to account for this ſeeming contradiction, I beſeech you then never more complain of the Goſpel for furniſhing an anſwer to this great objection, for removing this ſtumbling-block out of the way of our faith. Chriſt was a man, and therefore he died. He was the Son of God, and therefore he roſe from the dead, and will give life to all his true diſciples. He it was who formed this world, and all things in it; and for the ſake of man was content to become man, and to taſte death for all, that all through him may live. This is a wonderful piece of knowledge, which God has revealed to us in his Goſpel: But he has not revealed it to raiſe our wonder, but to confirm and eſtabliſh foretelleth his death and reſurrection. Many believed becauſe of his miracles, but he would not truſt himſelf with them.

AND the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee; and the mother of Jeſus was there.

2 And both Jeſus was called, and his diſciples, to the marriage.

3 And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jeſus ſaith unto him, They have no wine.

4 Jeſus ſaith unto her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come.

5 His mother ſaith unto the ſervants, Whatſoever he ſaith unto you, do it.

6 And there were ſet there ſix water-pots of ſtone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece.

7 Jeſus ſaith unto them, Fill the water-pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim.

Ver. 1. See Joſh. xix. 28.—V. 4. Ch. xix. 26. Ch. vii. 6.—V. 6. Mark vii. 3.

eſtabliſh our faith in him, to whom he hath committed all power, and whom he hath appointed heir of all things.

That the world was made by the Son of God, is a propoſition with which reaſon has no fault to find: that he who made the world ſhould have power to renew it to life again, is highly conſonant to reaſon. All the myſtery lies in this, that ſo high and great a perſon ſhould condeſcend to become man, and ſubject to death for the ſake of mankind;—but are we the firſt perſons to complain of this tranſcendent myſterious love? Or does it become us to quarrel with the kindneſs of our bleſſed Lord towards us, only becauſe it is greater than we can conceive? No; it becomes us to bleſs and to adore this exceeding love, by which we are ſaved from condemnation, by which we expect to be reſcued from death, knowing that the power of our bleſſed Lord is equal to his love; and that he is able to ſubdue all things unto himſelf.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. And the third day there was a marriage] On the third day after Jeſus and his diſciples arrived in Galilee, they went to a marriage feaſt (ſee on Matth. xxii. 1, 2.) in Cana, which is mentioned, Joſh. xix. 28. as ſituated in the poſſeſſion of the tribe of Aſhur, not far from the city of Sydon, and by conſequence in the moſt northern part of Galilee. Hence it was called Cana of Galilee, to diſtinguiſh it from another Cana in the tribe of Ephraim, mentioned Joſh. xvi. 8. xvii. 9. this latter Cana therefore was at no great diſtance from Jeruſalem. Here Jeſus furniſhed wine for the entertainment by miracle, at the deſire of his mother, who was alſo bidden. Dr. Clarke thinks, that our Lord, in the courſe of his private life, had ſometimes exerted his divine power for the relief of his friends; and that his mother having ſeen or heard of thoſe miracles, knew the greatneſs of his power, and ſo applied to him on this occaſion. Or we may ſuppoſe ſhe had heard him ſpeak of the miracles he was to perform, for the confirmation of his miſſion, and the benefit of mankind, and begged him to favour his friends with one in the preſent neceſſity. Probably Mary intereſted herſelf in this matter, becauſe ſhe was a relation or an intimate acquintance of the new-married couple, and had the management of the entertainment committed to her care. Some have ſuppoſed that this marriage was celebrated at the houſe of Cleophas or Alpheus, whoſe wife was ſiſter to the mother of our Lord, (ch. xix. 25.) and one of whoſe ſons was Simon the Cananite, whom ſome have thought to have been ſo called from being an inhabitant of this Cana, Mark iii. 18. and this may be conſidered as the more probable, as Mary was not only preſent at the feaſt,—was there—not as a gueſt, but as a perſon concerned, and was ſolicitous about ſupplying them with wine; and when the feaſt was over, we are told, ver. 12. that Jeſus was attended, on his leaving Cana, not only with his diſciples, but with his brethren, or neareſt kinſmen, who moſt likely came thither, as relations, to be preſent at the marriage. As Mary here is ſpoken of alone, it may be reaſonable to conclude, that Joſeph was now dead, and that he lived not to the time when Jeſus entered on his public miniſtry; eſpecially as he is no where mentioned in the Goſpel afterwards. See Lightfoot on the place, Chemnitz, and my 11th Diſcourſe on the Miracles.

Ver. 2. Jeſus was called, and his diſciples] Was invited, &c. MS. The perſons called his diſciples, who were with him at this marriage, as alſo at Jeruſalem, and who accompanied him to the diſtant parts of Judea, and baptized thoſe who offered themſelves to his baptiſm, (ſee ch. iii. 22. iv. 1.) ſeem to have been Philip, Simon, Andrew, and Nathanael, the four mentioned in the preceding chapter; for as theſe tranſactions happened before the Baptiſt's impriſonment, (ch. iii. 24.) we cannot think the diſciples preſent at them had followed Jeſus in conſequence of the call given near the ſea of Galilee, Matth. iv. 18. or the call ſpoken of Luke v. 1. becauſe it is certain that neither the one nor the other was given till after the Baptiſt was put in priſon. See Macknight.

Ver. 3. When they wanted wine, &c.] The wine beginning to fail;—ὑςερήσαντος. But a ſmall ſtock poſſibly was provided at firſt, as the perſons were not in the higheſt circumſtances; and that began to fail the ſooner, as greater numbers of gueſts attended than was expected, probably on account of Jeſus, whoſe fame began to ſpread abroad. His mother, provident for the young couple, and having conceived great expectations, as ſhe had good grounds, of her wonderful ſon, whoſe miraculous conception ſhe could never forget,—no more than the wonderful circumſtances which attended his birth,—and whoſe entrance on his public miniſtry ſhe now obſerved with joy, witneſſed as it was by a voice from heaven, and by the teſtimony of the Baptiſt: In this ſituation of things his mother ſaith unto him, They have no wine; hinting, as our Saviour's anſwer ſhews, that he would afford ſome miraculous ſupply; and it is plain, that notwithſtanding the rebuke ſhe met with, yet ſhe had ſtill a view to this, by her direction to the ſervants afterwards, ver. 5. See Theophilact on the place.

Ver. 4. Woman, what have I to do with thee?] The compellation with which Jeſus addreſſed his mother ſounds harſh in our language, becauſe with us it is never uſed, where reſpect is meant to be ſhewn. Nevertheleſs woman anciently was a term of honour, being uſed in ſpeaking to perſons of the firſt quality, as we find in the politeſt writers of antiquity. Beſides, it was that by which our Lord addreſſed her at a time when his reſpect and tenderneſs for her cannot be called in queſtion,—ch. xix. 26. The clauſe which in our tranſlation runs, What have I to do with thee, might be rendered ſo as to have a milder aſpect, What haſt thou to do with me? For the original words τι εμοι και σοι, are evidently uſed in this ſenſe, 2 Sam. xix. 22. Mark v. 7. What haſt thou to do with me? Mine hour is not yet come. "The ſeaſon of my public miniſtry in this country is not yet come. Before I work miracles in Galilee, I muſt go into Judea and preach, where the Baptiſt, my forerunner, has been preparing my way." Some tranſlate the latter clauſe interrogatively, Is not mine hour come? "The ſeaſon of my public miniſtry, at which period your authority over me ceaſes?" Upon the whole, our Lord's anſwer to his mother, though perhaps intended as a ſlight rebuke, was not in the leaſt diſreſpectful; as is evident likewiſe from the temper with which ſhe received it, and from her deſiring the ſervants to do whatever he ordered them. The generality of writers upon this ſubject have obſerved, that this rebuke was intended by our Lord in his prophetic ſpirit, as a ſtanding teſtimony againſt that idolatry, which he foreſaw after-ages would ſuperſtitiouſly beſtow upon his mother, even to the robbing him of the right and honour of his alone Mediatorſhip and Interceſſion. See the Reflections, Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. i. p. 206. and Pearce's Vindication of the Miracles.

Ver. 6. After the manner of the purifying of the Jews] For the purifying of the Jews. Wat. They were placed there, ſome of them for the cleanſing of cups and tables, and others for ſuch purifications as required the immerſion of the whole body, (ſee on Mark vii. 3.) for the Jews were ſuperſtitiouſly nice in theſe particulars. Beſides the purifications appointed by the law of God, there were a multitude of others then practiſed, in compliance with the tradition of the elders. Poſſibly this clauſe is thrown in by St. John, by way of explanation, as he wrote this Goſpel for the uſe of the Gentiles, who might be ſtrangers to the Jewiſh cuſtoms. Theſe water-pots are ſaid to contain two or three firkins a-piece. Now the meaſures of the ancients are ſo very uncertain, that it is hardly poſſible to determine the exact contents of theſe veſſels; ſome have computed them to contain about two or three hogſheads; and the Greek is ſo rendered in our tranſlation, as to make them contain above one hundred gallons; but it is hardly probable the veſſels were ſo large; and as μετρητὰς ſignifies no more than meaſures, it is much better we ſhould leave it as we find it, unleſs the quantity could be determined with more certainty. It ſeems moſt probable, that as the Jewiſh bath was the moſt common meaſure uſed in liquids, this is the quantity deſigned, where meaſures are expreſſed without any limitation; and as the Jewiſh bath is reckoned to contain four gallons and a half, the contents of theſe veſſels, if they are computed only at two meaſures each, will amount to no leſs than fifty-four gallons; a quantity ſufficient to ſupply the gueſts for the remainder of the marriage week; particularly if we ſuppoſe, with Lamy, that the firſt verſe intimates, that three days of this week, including the preſent, were expired. See the note on the next verſe, Cumberland's Weights and Meaſures, Lightfoot's Harmony on the place, and Godwin's Moſes and Aaron, book vi. ch. 9.

Ver. 7. Fill the water-pots with water] Mary was without doubt blameable for preſuming to direct her ſon in the duties of his miniſtry, her parental authority not extending to thoſe matters; therefore he very juſtly gave her the gentle rebuke, ver. 4. in which he inſinuated that his miracles were not to be performed at the deſire of his relations for civil and private reaſons; but in purſuance of the great ends he had in charge,—the converſion and ſalvation of mankind. But though Mary might have had only private reaſons of conveniency for aſking this miracle, yet Jeſus, knowing that it would tend to the confirmation of his diſciples faith, and to the advancement of his miſſion, thought proper to comply; being not the leſs willing to exert his power, becauſe his friends would reap ſome be-

8 And he ſaith unto them, Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feaſt. And they bare it.

9 When the ruler of the feaſt had taſted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was: (but the ſervants which drew the water knew;) the governor of the feaſt called the bridegroom,

10 And ſaith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth ſet forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worſe: but thou haſt kept the good wine until now.

11 This beginning of miracles did Jeſus in Cana of Galilee, and manifeſted forth his glory; and his diſciples believed on him.

12 After this, he went down to Capernaum, he, and his mother, and his brethren, and his diſciples: and they continued there not many days.

Ver. 11. Ch. i. 14.—V. 12. Matth. xii. 46.

nefit from the matter of the miracle. Ordering the ſervants therefore to fill the water-pots, which were at hand, to the brim with water, he converted the whole maſs of the fluid into excellent wine. The quantity of water turned into wine on this occaſion deſerves notice. We have ſpoken ſomething on the ſubject in the preceding note. The following is Macknight's remark: "The ſix water-pots, in which the wine was formed, being appointed for ſuch purifications or waſhings as required the immerſion of the whole body, were of a very large capacity; ſo that, being filled to the brim, there was an abundance of wine produced: But the deiſts, a ſort of people who look on all Chriſt's actions with an evil eye, have not let this eſcape their cenſure, making it the ſubject of ridicule. This might have been ſpared, had they conſidered that the ſpeech made by the governor of the feaſt to the bridegroom, ver. 10, does not imply that any of the company were drunk, as they would have it believed; it is only a compariſon between the order in which he had produced his liquor, and that commonly obſerved by other people. But ſee the note on that verſe. Beſides, it ought to be conſidered, that Jeſus did not order all the wine he furniſhed to be drank at this ſolemnity; though, according to the cuſtom of Judea, it laſted a whole week. See Judg. xiv. 12, &c. and the notes on Solomon's Song. It is probable that our Lord deſigned to provide for the future occaſions of the new-married couple, making them a valuable and ſeaſonable nuptial preſent, in this modeſt though miraculous manner; and ſurely He, who in the firſt creation made ſuch liberal proviſion for the neceſſities of men, might, on a particular occaſion, when he was forming nouriſhment for the natural life of his friends, do it plentifully; becauſe thus the favour was inhanced, and by the quantity furniſhed he both ſhewed his own exuberant goodneſs, and gave ſuch magnificence to the miracle, as removed it beyond all probability of fraud. Whereas had the quantity been conſiderably leſs,—only the cup, for inſtance, which was born to the governor of the feaſt (as ſome have thought) who knows but the enemies of Chriſtianity might have affirmed that here was no miracle at all; but that the water was artfully changed, and wine put into its place?—an impoſſible cheat in ſo large a quantity, eſpecially as the tranſmutation happened the moment the veſſels were filled. We need not then diſpute with the Deiſts, concerning the capacity of the meaſure μητρητης, mentioned by the Evangeliſt; let them make it as large as they pleaſe; let them ſuppoſe it was the Attic meaſure of that name, equal to our firkin, and that each water-pot held three of thoſe meaſures, the miracle will ſtill be decent, and in all reſpects worthy both of the wiſdom and goodneſs of him who performed it."

Ver. 8. Bear unto the governor of the feaſt] Among the Greeks, Romans, and Jews, it was uſual at great entertainments, eſpecially at marriage-feaſts, to appoint a maſter of ceremonies, who gave directions not only concerning the form and method of the entertainment, but likewiſe preſcribed the laws of drinking. Jeſus therefore ordered the wine which he had formed, to be carried to the governor of the feaſt, that by his judgement paſſed upon it, in the hearing of all the gueſts, it might be known to be genuine wine of the beſt kind. Our Lord's furniſhing wine for this feaſt by miracle ſhews, that on ſome occaſions a more than ordinary chearfulneſs, ariſing from the uſe of the creatures which God's power hath formed, and his bounty beſtowed on man, is by no means inconſiſtent with piety; particularly when the benefits are ſanctified to us, by the word of God, and of prayer; that is, when they are uſed in moderation, as the word of God directs, and with due expreſſions of thankfulneſs. We may obſerve that every circumſtance in this miracle was wonderfully directed by our Lord to ſhew its reality. For this purpoſe, Jeſus ordered the water-pots to be filled with water; for the ſervants who poured the water out of one veſſel into the other, could eaſily ſee that there was nothing but water in the veſſel from which they had poured; and when the other was filled to the brim, it was equally viſible that the veſſel which they had filled had nothing but water in it likewiſe. Further, it was known to all the gueſts that theſe pots or veſſels never contained any thing but water; and as all the gueſts had waſhed themſelves with the fluid contained in them, they were convinced that they held nothing but water. The changing the water in the veſſels was another proof to the ſame purpoſe; and the drawing out inſtantly ſhewed there could be no fraud. The ſervants bearing to the governor what they thought to be water, and their being ſo far from parties with Jeſus in any colluſion, that they ſeem not to have known, or to have been willing to obey him, had not Mary ordered them to do it, is another proof of the reality of this miracle. The ignorance of the governor concerning the filling of the pots, and the change made in the water, ſhews that he could not have been concerned in any deceit; as his, and not the gueſts' taſting of the wine, and applauding it, ſhews that no other perſon could have been a party in the fraud, if there was any. Theſe and other circumſtances, which the diligent reader will obſerve, abundantly prove the reality of the miracle, and ſet it above the probability of a cavil. See Whitby, Bp. Pearce, and my Sermons on the Miracles, vol. ii. p. 14.

Ver. 9, 10. The governor of the feaſt called the bridegroom] The governor's application to the bridegroom, and not to Jeſus, ſhews him to have been ignorant of the miracle; and could have proceeded from no other reaſon than his perſuaſion, that this wine had been provided at the expence of the bridegroom. Surprized at the exquiſite delicacy of the flavour, he ſaid to the bridegroom, "It is uſual with moſt men to ſet forth the good wine—τον καλον οινον,—at the beginning, and when men have drank plentifully,—οταν μεθυσθωσι,—then that which is worſe; thou haſt proceeded in a different manner; thou haſt kept the good wine until now." In which words every diſcerning reader muſt remark, that there is not the leaſt room for thoſe many blaſphemous inſults upon the pure and ſpotleſs character of the holy Jeſus, which deiſts and infidels have the hardineſs to throw out, as we hinted on ver. 7. For, in the firſt place, the governor of the feaſt doth not ſay even ſo much as that the preſent gueſts had drank plentifully; he only urges the common proceedings in ſuch feſtivals as theſe; and the words rather countenance a contrary opinion, for he ſaith, "Every man ſets forth good wine at the beginning, and when it ſhall happen that men ſhall have drank plentifully, then that which is worſe: thou (without any connecting particle) haſt kept the good wine until now. Thou haſt not done as others do, the beſt wine comes laſt." Herein is the whole of the compariſon: He by no means ſaith that they had drank plentifully, or to exceſs: It is more than probable, that there was no appearance of ſuch irregularity or exceſs; ſeeing the governor was thus capable of diſtinguiſhing the reliſh of the good wine ſo inſtantly, which, when men have well drunk, is not the caſe; and therefore it is, that, as he ſays, bad wine is brought laſt. However, allowing ſecondly, that the words, when men have well drunk, did refer to the preſent gueſts, yet the true meaning of the original word Μεθυσθωσι, and its uſe in Scripture, ſhews that it ſignifies, not criminal drinking, or drinking to exceſs; its proper and immediate ſenſe is, to drink after ſacrificing, [Μεθυω ἀ μετα θυειν] and ſo it is uſed in a religious import; and in Scripture, it is applied to drinking where there could be no exceſs: It is thus uſed, Gen. xliii. 34. where the LXX render the Hebrew word by εμεθυσθησαν; and it is well known that the original word ישכרו iſhekru, is frequently uſed for drinking without exceſs, nay, and for ſpiritual drinking, as in Cantic. v. 1. I have drunk my wine with my milk; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved! Beza obſerves, that שכר ſheker, which anſwers to the Greek word μεθυειν, is frequently applied, not in a bad ſenſe, but ſometimes to ſignify the liberal uſe of wine only, without deviating into any exceſs. See Epheſ. v. 18. But thirdly, allowing both theſe objections to be true, namely, that theſe gueſts had already drunk well, and that the word ſo rendered doth import criminal drinking; yet it will by no means follow that the miracle which Chriſt now wrought was intended to encourage any vice of this ſort. Far from the mouths of Chriſtians, far from the hearts of men, be the leaſt ſurmiſe or ſuppoſition of ſuch a fact! It is moſt reaſonable to conclude, that the change of the water into wine drew off their attention, wholly from the feaſt to this divine and wonderful perſon, who thus manifeſted forth his glory, and obtained the faith of thoſe who ſaw it: It is moſt reaſonable to conclude, that this was a great means of ſobriety and ſeriouſneſs, bringing the beholders to the uſual admiration, What manner of man is this?

Ver. 11. And manifeſted forth his glory] That is, demonſtrated his power and character to the conviction of the diſciples, and of all the gueſts. This being the firſt miracle they had ever ſeen Jeſus perform, it tended not a little to the confirmation of their faith, and made his fame ſpread over all the neighbouring country. Moſes confirmed his miſſion by producing water from a rock; but our Lord, by changing water into wine; and by that change he manifeſted himſelf to be the Lord of the creation. It was as eaſy for that omnipotence which is the Author of all things, to do this in the preſent method, as it is to do it every year from the moiſture deſcending from heaven, which is imbibed by the roots of the vine, and after frequent filtrations is ripened in the grape. It is true, the frequency with which this change occurs, renders it familiar and unnoticed; but when water is changed into wine in the veſſels, the novelty makes a ſtronger impreſſion on the mind, and the effect, though not more miraculous than that which is produced by the common courſe of nature, ſtrikes us much more than that which is become familiar. See St. Auguſt. tract 8. in Johan. and the 28th page of my ſecond volume on the Miracles.

13 And the Jews paſſover was at hand, and Jeſus went up to Jeruſalem,

14 And found in the temple thoſe that ſold oxen, and ſheep, and doves, and the changers of money, ſitting:

15 And when he had made a ſcourge of ſmall cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and the ſheep, and the oxen; and poured out the changers money, and overthrew the tables:

16 And ſaid unto them that ſold doves, Take theſe things hence; make not my Father's houſe an houſe of merchandiſe.

17 And his diſciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine houſe hath eaten me up.

18 Then anſwered the Jews, and ſaid unto him, What ſign ſheweſt thou unto us, ſeeing that thou doeſt theſe things?

19 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Deſtroy this temple, and in three days I will raiſe it up.

20 Then ſaid the Jews, Forty and ſix years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days?

21 But he ſpake of the temple of his body.

Ver. 14. And found in the temple] Moſes, in Deut. xiv. 24, 25. from conſidering the neceſſity of the Jews reſorting to the capital of their country, and the inconveniences which would attend the driving the cattle which were to be offered, and could be offered only there, gave them liberty to carry money with them, and purchaſe their victims on the ſpot. When, therefore, the Jews were diſperſed among all nations, this injunction ſeemed not only convenient and prudent, but even neceſſary; and therefore it was appointed that thoſe animals which were uſed in ſacrifices, ſhould be ſold without the temple, near the gates. This inſtitution, which was ſo convenient, was in proceſs of time turned into abuſe, and the market was at length kept in the very court of the Gentiles, the only place which was allotted to the Gentiles to worſhip in. The noiſe of the cattle, and the hurry of the place, were great obſtacles to worſhip, eſpecially when we conſider that the numbers which thronged this court, amounted at one paſſover to no leſs than three millions; when, according to Joſephus, no leſs than 256,500 victims were offered. But the abuſe did not reſt here; for it is generally ſuppoſed that the prieſts let out this part of the temple for profit, and that the ſellers, to enable themſelves to pay the rent of their ſhops and ſtalls, demanded an exorbitant price for their commodities. Nay, it is ſaid, that the prieſts and Levites very often ſold the animals they had received for ſacrifices, to the dealers in cattle at a lower rate, that they might ſell them again with profit; ſo that the ſame ſacrifice was often ſold to different perſons, and the ſpoils or gain of the ſacrifices were divided between the prieſts and the ſaleſmen. In order to expedite this traffick, there were money-changers at hand, who gave the Jews from foreign countries the current money of Judea, in lieu of the money of the countries from whence they came; and for this ſervice they took a premium, which upon the whole became very conſiderable. Thus was the temple profaned by the avarice of the prieſts, and literally made a den of thieves. When our Lord viewed this ſcene of iniquity, we need not wonder at his indignation; for it was an honeſt zeal, which ſhewed his high regard to religion, and his implacable enmity to vice; while at the ſame time it illuſtrated the character given him by the prophet Malachi, iii. 1. and eſtabliſhed the pretenſions he made of being the meſſenger mentioned by that prophet. See Joſeph. Jewiſh War, b. vi. ch. 9. and the note on Matth. xxi. 13. with the authors referred to there.

Ver. 15. A ſcourge of ſmall cords] It has been very juſtly obſerved, that this circumſtance, ſeemingly ſlight, is inſerted, to ſhew that the inſtrument could not have been the cauſe of ſo wonderful an effect. See Grotius, and Hervey's Theron and Aſpaſio, vol. 3.

Ver. 16. Make not my Father's houſe, &c.] "Make not the temple, which is dedicated to the ſervice of God, a place for carrying on a low traffick." It was the principle of Jeſus to avoid publickly aſſerting himſelf to be the Meſſiah, till the time predicted for his death was fulfilled; and therefore, calling the temple His Father's houſe, though it openly proclaimed that God was his Father, might not be ſo underſtood, in the preſent circumſtances, ſince the Jews in general ſpake of God as their Father. See John viii. 41. But though in the circumſtances which here attended it, there was a ſtrong intimation of ſomething extraordinary, it might not be ſo dangerous now as afterwards, becauſe our Lord, not having opened the ſpiritual nature of his kingdom, or as yet rendered himſelf obnoxious to the Phariſees, by ſuch juſt invectives as he afterwards uſed, they who expected the Meſſiah to appear about this time, and longed for his appearance, might be inclinable for a while to wait the iſſue of Chriſt's pretenſions; and ſo much the rather, as he now wrought ſome wonderful miracles. See ver. 23. and ch. iii. 2. Accordingly we find in the beginning of the next chapter, one of the chief among the Phariſees, comes privately to confer with Chriſt in a very reſpectful manner. It is remarkable, that at this ejection of thoſe who profaned the temple, our Saviour ſays, Make not my Father's houſe, &c. but when he repeated this miracle towards the cloſe of his life, when he had proved his divinity by a variety of miracles, he ſays My houſe, (Matth. xxi. 13.) and riſes in his expreſſion there reſpecting the abuſe of this houſe; in which the Jews were the more incorrigible, and deſerved ſeverer rebuke the ſecond time, on account of this firſt experience of his indignation. See Bp. Smallbrooke's Vind. vol. i. p. 180. and my Diſcourſes on the Miracles, vol. ii. p. 327.

Ver. 17. And his diſciples remembered, &c.] In the apprehenſion of the diſciples, their Lord expoſed himſelf to great danger by turning out a body of factious and intereſted men, whom the prieſts and rulers ſupported. On this occaſion, therefore, they called to mind that text in the Pſalms, where it is ſaid, The zeal of thine houſe hath eaten me up; imputing their Maſter's actions to ſuch a concern for the purity of God's worſhip, as that by which David, his great type, was animated. See on Pſ. lxix. 9.

Ver 18. Then anſwered the Jews, &c.] A fact ſo public and remarkable as this, could not but immediately come to the knowledge of the prieſts and rulers of the Jews, whoſe ſupreme council ſat in a magnificent chamber belonging to the temple; a fine rotunda, called from its beautiful pavement, Liſhcath Hagazith, which ſtood on the wall of the temple, part of it within, and part of it without its ſacred precincts. There ſeems to be no doubt that the Jews here mentioned were rulers; becauſe we know that the great aſſembly of the Jewiſh rulers,—the Sanhedrim,—ſat in the temple, and that the chief of them often attended public worſhip there. Chriſt's driving out the buyers and ſellers muſt undoubtedly have come to their knowledge; and as their office ſeemed to authorize them to call him to an account, we are ſure their prejudices againſt him would incline them to do it. The truth is, this affair had the mark of an extraordinary zeal; a zeal nothing inferior to that for which the prophets were famed; and this was the reaſon why the rulers came to him, deſiring to know by what authority he had undertaken ſingly to make ſuch reformation in the houſe and worſhip of God, eſpecially in reference to matters which had been declared lawful by the council, and by doctors of the greateſt reputation; and if he had any real authority for doing ſuch things, they required him to ſhew it them, by working a miracle for that purpoſe. See ver. 23. Calmet's Dictionary on the word Sanhedrim, and Macknight.

Ver. 19. Deſtroy this temple] The miracle which our Lord had already performed in driving the buyers and ſellers out of the temple, was ſufficient to convince them of the authority by which he made this reformation, if they were to have been convinced by any miracle at all. Therefore our Lord, inſtead of ſatisfying their unreaſonable demands, refers them to the great miracle of his reſurrection; but refers them to it in ſuch obſcure terms, as prejudiced minds could not underſtand, till the prophecy itſelf was cleared and explained by the event; yet, if he either pointed to his body, or alluded to their commonly-received opinions, one would wonder that they ſhould have miſtaken his meaning ſo far, as to ſuppoſe that he meant the temple, in which they were at that time aſſembled. The temple itſelf was ſuppoſed to be inhabited by the Divinity, and to derive its holineſs from that circumſtance; but as the Divinity dwelt in the body of Chriſt, that body deſerved the name of temple more juſtly than the building made with hands. One of the rabbies ſays expreſly, that the Meſſiah, the holy Son of David, is the Holy of Holies; and if that opinion exiſted in the time of Chriſt, as probably it might, there could be no great obſcurity in the application of this term then. By a ſimilar figure of ſpeech, the Apoſtle calls the bodies of believers the temple of God, on account of the inhabitation of the Holy Ghoſt. See Mark xiv. 58. Wetſtein, Macknight, and Ward's Diſſertations, p. 117. Inſtead of deſtroy this temple, Dr. Heylin reads, ye will deſtroy. In the prophetic ſtile, ſays he, the imperative is often uſed for the future.

Ver. 20. Forty and ſix years was this temple, &c.] Hath this temple been in building. Wat. MS. Heylin. Though Herod finiſhed what he propoſed in eight or nine years; yet the Jews continued to beautify and adorn the temple for many years afterwards, even to A. D. 65. But ſee this point fully cleared up in Macknight's 5th Diſſertation, p. 76. of the 2d vol. of his Harmony.

Ver. 22. And they believed the Scripture] They yet more firmly believed the Scripture in all its prophecies concerning the Meſſiah's kingdom, and their faith in him was confirmed by the word which Jeſus had ſpoken; for ſuch a wonderful event as the reſurrection of dead, his diſciples remembered that he had ſaid this unto them; and they believed the ſcripture, and the word which Jeſus had ſaid.

23 Now when he was in Jeruſalem at the paſſover, on the feaſt-day, many believed in his name, when they ſaw the miracles which he did.

24 But Jeſus did not commit himſelf unto them, becauſe he knew all men.

25 And needed not that any ſhould teſtify of man: for he knew what was in man.

Ver. 22. Luke xxiv. 8.—V. 25. 1 Sam. xvi. 7. 1 Chron. xxviii. 9. Ch. vi. 64. Acts i. 24. Rev. ii. 23.

Chriſt, conſidered in its connection with this ſolemn prediction, juſtly appeared as the fulleſt conceivable proof of his divine miſſion. See Doddridge, and particularly Jenkins's Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, vol. i. p. 25, &c.

Ver. 23. In the feaſt-day] At the feſtival,—ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ. Dr. Heylin renders it, at the feſtival of the paſſover. See on Matth. xxvi. 5. The miracles here ſpoken of, as well as thoſe ch. iii. 2. and iv. 45. plainly refer to ſome miracles wrought by Chriſt, the particulars of which are not tranſmitted to us.

Ver. 24. Jeſus did not commit himſelf to them] Did not diſcover himſelf to be the Meſſiah. He did not truſt to thoſe who believed merely upon account of his miracles,—neceſſitate rationis, as the ſchoolman ſpeaks. This is exemplified in the following account of Nicodemus; See ver. 2. of the next chapter.—Becauſe he knew all men. He had perfect knowledge of their diſpoſitions, and was aſſured, on the preſent occaſion, that the belief of many was not yet grown up to a full conviction; and foreſaw that they would quickly fall off, when they found he was rejected by the great men, and did not erect a ſecular empire. From the caution which Jeſus uſed, we may learn not raſhly to put ourſelves and our uſefulneſs into the power of others; but to ſtudy a wiſe and happy medium between that univerſal prejudice and ſuſpicion, which, while it wrongs the beſt and moſt worthy characters, would deprive us of all the pleaſures of an intimate friendſhip; and an undiſtinguiſhing eaſineſs and openneſs of temper, which might make us the property of every hypocritical pretender to kindneſs and reſpect. See Doddridge and Heylin.

REFLECTIONS ON THE MARRIAGE IN CANA,
Ver. 1—11.

Was this then the firſt miracle, O Saviour, that thou wroughteſt in Cana of Galilee? And could there be a greater miracle than this, that having been thirty years upon earth, thou didſt no miracle till now? That thy divinity did hide itſelf thus long in fleſh? That ſo long thou wouldeſt lie obſcure in a corner of Galilee, unknown to that world thou cameſt to redeem? That ſo long thou wouldeſt ſtrain the patient expectation of thoſe, who ever ſince thy ſtar waited for the revelation of a Meſſiah? We, ſilly wretches, if we have but a drachm of virtue, are ready to ſet it out to the beſt ſhew: Thou, who receivedſt not the Spirit by meaſure, wouldſt content thyſelf with a willing obſcurity, and concealedſt that power which made the world, in the roof of an human breaſt, in a cottage of Nazareth. O Saviour, none of thy miracles is more worthy of aſtoniſhment than thy not doing of miracles.

Thy firſt public miracle graceth a marriage. It is an ancient and laudable inſtitution; that the rites of matrimony ſhould not want a ſolemn celebration, the Son of the virgin, and the mother of that Son are both at the wedding. He that made the firſt marriage in Paradiſe, beſtows his firſt miracle upon a Galilean marriage. He that was the author of matrimony, and ſanctified it, doth by his holy preſence honour the reſemblance of his eternal union with his church. How boldly may be contemned all the impure adverſaries of Wedlock, when the Son of God pleaſes thus to honour it.

Happy is that wedding, where Chriſt is a gueſt! O Saviour, there is no holy marriage whereat thou art not; however inviſible, yet truly preſent by thy Spirit and gracious benediction. Thou makeſt marriages in heaven; thou bleſſeſt them from heaven. Thou who haſt betrothed us to thyſelf in truth and righteouſneſs, do thou conſummate that happy marriage of ours in the higheſt heavens.

It was no rich or ſumptuous bridal to which Chriſt, and his mother, and his diſciples vouchſafed to come from the fartheſt parts of Galilee. We find him not at the magnificent feaſts or triumphs of the great. The proud pomp of the world did not agree with the ſtate of a ſervant: This Galilean bridegroom, before the expiration of his feſtival, wants drink for the accommodation of his gueſts, ver. 3.

The bleſſed virgin feels a charitable compaſſion, and from a friendly deſire to maintain the decency of an hoſpitable entertainment, inquires into the wants of her hoſt, pities them, and ſeeks anxiouſly to redreſs them. How well doth it beſeem the eyes of piety and Chriſtian love to look into the neceſſities of others? She who conceived the God of mercies, ſearcheth into the penury of a poor Iſraelite, and feels thoſe wants whereof he complains not. They are made for themſelves, whoſe ſordid thoughts are only taken up with their own indigence or ſtore.

To whom ſhould we complain of any want, but to the Maker and Giver of all things? Hence we read, that when they wanted wine, the mother of Jeſus ſaid unto him, They have no wine. The bleſſed virgin knew to whom ſhe ſued: She had good reaſon to know the divine nature and power of her Son. It were hard if ſome of the neighbour-gueſts, had they been duly ſolicited, might not have furniſhed the bridegroom with ſo much wine as might ſuffice for the laſt ſervice of a dinner; but the bleſſed Mary thought it beſt evidently not to lade at the ſhallow channel, but rather to go to the fountain-head, where ſhe may dip and fill the firkins at once with eaſe. It may be ſhe ſaw that the train of Chriſt might help forward that defect, and therefore ſhe juſtly ſolicits her ſon Jeſus for a ſupply. Whether we want bread, or water, or wine, neceſſaries or comforts, whither ſhould we run, O Saviour, but to that infinite munificence of thine, which neither denieth nor upbraideth any thing? We cannot want, we cannot abound, but from thee; give us what thou wilt, ſo thou give us contentment with what thou giveſt.

But what is this we hear? A ſharp anſwer to the ſuit of a mother? —O woman, What have I to do with thee? He, whoſe ſweet mildneſs and mercy never ſent away any ſupplicant diſcontented,—Doth he only frown upon her who bare him?—He that commands us to honour father and mother, doth he diſdain her, whoſe fleſh he aſſumed? God forbid! But love and duty do not exempt parents from due admonition: She ſolicited Chriſt as a mother, he anſwers her as a woman: If ſhe was the mother of his fleſh, his Deity was eternal. She might not ſo remember herſelf to be a mother, that ſhe ſhould forget ſhe was a woman; nor ſo look upon him as a ſon, that ſhe ſhould regard him as a God: He was ſo obedient to her as a mother, that withal ſhe might obey him as her God. In all bodily actions his ſtile was, O mother; in ſpiritual and heavenly, O woman. Neither is it for us, in the holy affairs of God, to know any faces; yea, if we have known Chriſt heretofore according to the fleſh, henceforth know we him ſo no more.

Yet even in this rough anſwer, as it may ſeem, doth the bleſſed virgin deſcry cauſe of hope. If his hour were not yet come, it was therefore coming: When the expectation of the gueſts, and the neceſſity of the occaſion have made fit room for the miracle, it ſhall come forth and challenge their wonder. Faithfully therefore and obſervantly doth ſhe turn her ſpeech from her Son to the attendants, ver. 5. Whatſoever he ſaith unto you, do it.

How well doth it become the mother of Chriſt to agree with his Father eternal, whoſe voice from heaven ſaid, This is my beloved Son, hear him! She that had ſaid to herſelf, Be it unto me according to thy word, ſays unto others, Whatſoever he ſaith unto you, do it. This is is the way to have miracles wrought for us, and in us,—obedience to his word. The power of Chriſt did not depend on the officiouſneſs of theſe ſervitors: he could have wrought wonders equally without their contribution; but their perverſe refuſal of his commands might have rendered them incapable of the favour of a miraculous exertion. He that can when he will convince the obſtinate, will not grace the diſobedient.

This ſcanty houſe was yet furniſhed with many and large veſſels, for outward purification, as if iniquity had dwelt upon the ſkin, that ſuperſtition ſhould ſeek holineſs in frequent waſhings. Alas! it is the ſoul which needs ſcowering, and nothing can waſh that, but the blood which they deſperately wiſhed upon themſelves and their children, for guilt, not for expiation. Purge thou us, O Lord, with hyſſop, and we ſhall be clean; waſh us, and we ſhall be whiter than ſnow.

The waiters could not but think ſtrange of ſo unſeaſonable a command, as we read in ver. 7.—Fill the water-pots with water. "It is wine that we want, why do we go to fetch water? If there be no remedy, we could have ſought this ſupply unbidden;" and yet ſo far hath the charge of Chriſt's mother prevailed, that inſtead of carrying flaggons of wine to the table, they go to fetch water in their pails from the ciſterns. There is no pleading of improbabilities againſt the command of an Almighty power.

He that could have created wine immediately in thoſe veſſels, will rather turn water into wine. In all the courſe of his miracles, we never find him making aught of nothing: all his great works are grounded upon former exiſtences: He multiplied the bread, he changed the water, he reſtored the withered limbs, he raiſed the dead, and ſtill wrought upon that which was, and did not make that which was not. What doth he in the ordinary way of nature, but turn the watry juice which ariſes up from the root into wine? He will only do that now ſuddenly, and at once, which he doth uſually by inſenſible degrees. It is ever duly obſerved by the Son of God, not to do more miracles than he needs.

How liberal are the proviſions of Chriſt! If he had turned but one of thoſe veſſels, it had been a juſt proof of his power, and perhaps that quantity had ſerved the preſent neceſſity; now he furniſhes them with ſo much wine, as would have ſerved an hundred and fifty gueſts for an intire feaſt: even the meaſure magnifies at once both his power and mercy. The munificent hand of God regards not our needs only, but our honeſt affluence; it is our ſin and our ſhame if we turn his favour into wantonneſs.

There muſt be firſt a filling, ere there can be a drawing out. Thus in our veſſels, the firſt care muſt be of our receipt, the next of our expence: God would have us to be ciſterns, not channels. Our Saviour would not be his own taſter, but he ſends the firſt draught to the governor of the feaſt. He knew his own power, they did not;

CHAP. III.

Chriſt teacheth Nicodemus the neceſſity of regeneration: of faith in his death. The great love of God towards the world. Condemnation for unbelief. The baptiſm, witneſs, and doctrine of John concerning Chriſt.

THERE was a man of the Phariſees named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews:

2 The ſame came to Jeſus by night, and ſaid unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do theſe miracles that thou doeſt, except God be with him.

3 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto him, Verily, verily, I ſay unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot ſee the kingdom of God.

Ver. 2. Ch. vii. 50. xix. 39. Ch. ix. 16, 33. Acts x. 38.—V. 3. Tit. iii. 5. Or, from above.

neither would he bear witneſs of himſelf, but fetch it out of others mouths. They who knew not the original of that wine, yet praiſed the taſte, ver. 10. Every man at the beginning doth ſet forth good wine, &c.—but thou haſt kept the good wine until now. The ſame bounty which expreſſed itſelf in the quantity of the wine, ſhews itſelf no leſs in the excellence: nothing can fall from that divine hand not exquiſite; that liberality would not provide mean accommodation for its gueſts. It was fit that the miraculous effects of Chriſt, which came from his immediate hand, ſhould be more perfect than the natural. O bleſſed Saviour, how delicate is that new wine which we ſhall one day drink with thee in thy Father's kingdom! Yes, gracious Lord, thou ſhalt turn this water of our earthly afflictions into that wine of gladneſs, wherewith our ſouls ſhall be richly repleniſhed for ever and ever! Make haſte, O beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart upon the mountain of ſpices.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. There was a man of the Phariſees, &c.] Nicodemus was a member of the great council, or, as others ſuppoſe, a ruler of ſome ſynagogue; for ἄρχων, the title here given him, is often uſed in this ſenſe by the Evangeliſts; comp. Matth. ix. 18, 23. with Luke viii. 41. Accordingly, ver. 10. on this very occaſion, Jeſus calls him a maſter, or teacher of Iſrael. But he might poſſeſs both dignities, the members of the council being many of them rulers of ſynagogues. It is, however, certain that he was one of the council; for we are told ſo expreſly, ch. vii. 50. This doctor had heard our Lord's miracles often mentioned, perhaps had ſeen ſome of them; and, like many of his countrymen, conceived ſome notions, that he who performed ſuch things muſt be the Meſſiah; on the other hand, the meanneſs of our Lord's appearance, occaſioned ſcruples which he could not remove. In this ſtate of doubtfulneſs he reſolved to wait on Jeſus, that by converſing with him perſonally, he might find out the truth. See the next note.

Ver. 2. The ſame came to Jeſus by night] Leſt any offence ſhould be taken at his converſing openly with Jeſus, by his brethren of the council, who from the very beginning were Chriſt's enemies, he came ſecretly, by night, in order to have a private conference with him at his own lodgings; and with the greateſt reverence and reſpect ſaid to him, in his own name, as well as in the name of ſeveral of his brethren, Rabbi,—a very remarkable appellation from a perſon of ſo great dignity, to one, who, in regard to his education and rank in ſecular life, made ſo low an appearance as our bleſſed Lord: We know, &c. Chriſt's miracles left Nicodemus no room to doubt of his miſſion from God; yet they did not prove him to be the Meſſiah, becauſe he had not as yet called himſelf by that name, at leaſt, in the hearing of Nicodemus. Wherefore, when he told Jeſus that he believed him to be a teacher come from God; he inſinuated, that at preſent he did not believe in him as the Meſſiah; but that he would believe, if he aſſumed that character; and by theſe inſinuations modeſtly requeſted Jeſus to explain himſelf with regard to his pretenſions. We may juſt obſerve, upon the foundation of that ſtrong aſſertion which Nichodemus makes, No man can do theſe miracles, &c. that the miracles aſcribed to Chriſt and his apoſtles recommend themſelves to us, on the following account, excluſive of their being always eſteemed amongſt the Jews as credentials and proofs of the divine miſſion of thoſe who claimed to themſelves the authority of prophets and teachers: They were wrought by perſons who ſolemnly appealed to God, and who declared they would perform them; they were wrought in a public manner, before enemies and unbelievers; in a learned age and civilized country; not with any air of pride, vanity, and oſtentation; not for the ſake of lucre, or for worldly advantage; in confirmation of doctrines good and uſeful for mankind; at a time when men wanted neither power nor inclination to expoſe them, if they were impoſtures, and were in no danger of being called atheiſts and heretics, of being inſulted by the populace, and perſecuted by the civil magiſtrate, if they ridiculed and expoſed them: They were various and numerous; of a permanent nature, and might be reviewed and re-examined; had nothing fantaſtical and cruel in them, but were acts of kindneſs and beneficence: They ceaſed for a long time before Chriſt appeared, and therefore would raiſe the attention of men. They converted multitudes to the faith; were atteſted by proper witneſſes; foretold by prophets; were ſuch as the Jews expected from the Meſſiah, and were acknowledged even by adverſaries. Nicodemus, therefore, had great reaſon to be ſwayed by them, and to acknowledge their force. See Jortin's Diſcourſes on the Chriſtian Religion, p. 77. Chapman's Euſebius, vol. 1. and Stillingfleet's Orig. Sacra. b. ii. ch. 9.

Ver. 3. Jeſus anſwered and ſaid] It is remarkable that the Evangeliſt introduces this paſſage of the hiſtory, with obſerving that Jeſus knew the thoughts of all men: Probably he meant to ſignify, that in the courſe of the converſation, Jeſus prevented Nicodemus by forming his diſcourſe to him in ſuch a manner, as to obviate all the objections which his thoughts had ſuggeſted, without giving him time to propoſe them. This remark ſeems to ſhew the force and propriety of the things which our Lord ſaid to Nicodemus; and accounts for this ruler's being ſo ſpeedily and thoroughly convinced, though Jeſus did not aſſume either the name or character of the Meſſiah. It ſeems his reaſonings, beſides their own intrinſic light, had an additional evidence ariſing from their being exactly adapted to Nicodemus's moſt ſecret thoughts; ſo that they demonſtrated the extent of our Lord's knowledge with great advantages. We ſee this in all the branches of the converſation; wherein our Lord touches on the following grand points,—of the utmoſt importance to Nicodemus and his brethren; and indeed to all mankind, namely, that no external profeſſion, nor any ceremonial obſervances or privileges of birth, could entitle any man to the bleſſings of the Meſſiah's kingdom; that an entire change of heart and life was neceſſary to that purpoſe; that this muſt be accompliſhed by a divine influence on the mind; that mankind was in a ſtate of condemnation and miſery: That the free mercy of God had given his Son, to deliver them from it; and to raiſe them to a bleſſed immortality, which was the great deſign and purpoſe of his coming; that all mankind, that is, Gentiles as well as Jews, were to ſhare in the benefits of his undertaking; that they were to be procured by his being lifted upon the croſs, and to be received by faith in him; but that if they rejected Him, there was no other remedy; and their eternal aggravated condemnation would be the certain conſequence of it. Our Lord might enlarge more copiouſly on theſe heads, which it might be the more proper to do, as ſome of them were directly contrary to the notions commonly entertained by the Jews concerning the Meſſiah's kingdom. By the Jews being begotten and born again, our Lord meant, that their notions of things ſhould be rectified, and their inclinations changed; particularly their notions concerning the ſecular grandeur of the Meſſiah, and their paſſion for ſenſual enjoyments; their error concerning the immutability of the Moſaic law, and their hatred of heathens, more for their oppoſition to the Jewiſh inſtitutions, than for the wickedneſs of their lives; he meant alſo, that their manners were to be greatly reformed, even in matters which they pretended were allowed by the law: For example, they were to abſtain from all degrees of luſt, profane ſwearing, revenge, and uncharitableneſs; ſee on Matth. v. 27, &c. nor was this change of opinions, diſpoſitions, and actions, neceſſary to the Jews only; the Gentiles likewiſe had need to be begotten and born again, in order to their entering into the kingdom of God; for they entertained very low and diſhonourable ſentiments of the perfections of God, of the worſhip due to him, and of the method of appeaſing him; not to mention that they erred in many eſſential points of morality, and in their practice came far ſhort of their own imperfect ideas of virtue. Converſion, therefore, has in all ages been a great and ſurpriſing effect of the divine power upon the human mind, producing a change, the full extent of which cannot be better expreſſed than by the terms regeneration, begetting-again, new-birth, which import the communication of a new nature; and upon the diverſity of men's diſpoſitions before and after that change, are founded the names of old and new man, by which the apoſtle denominates the unconverted and converted ſtate; as if when converted men obtained a nature eſſentially different from what they had before. This, however, muſt not be ſo underſtood, as if the new nature was raiſed to its perfection immediately upon its being conveyed to us in regeneration; for as by the natural generation we are not born with the reaſon and perfections of men, but with the faculties and poſſibilities of obtaining theſe perfections; ſo in the ſpiritual generation, the habits of grace and holineſs are not all at once raiſed to their maturity. We have only the ſeeds of them conveyed to us, which muſt be gradually nouriſhed to their full meaſure, by long practice and experience. In ſpeaking to Jews, there was a peculiar propriety in expreſſing this change, by the idea of regeneration, as it ſhews them that Abraham's begetting them, however much they might glory in it, was not ſufficient to make them the people and children of God; but that, laying aſide the glory of their deſcent, it was neceſſary they ſhould be begotten anew by a greater Father, even the Spirit of God, who would communicate a better nature to them than that which they had derived from Abraham. The phraſe, he cannot ſee the kingdom of God, ſignifies, he cannot enter into it, juſt as to ſee death, Luke xi. 26. is to die. See Doddridge, Macknight and Calmet.

4 Nicodemus ſaith unto him, How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the ſecond time into his mother's womb, and be born?

5 Jeſus anſwered, Verily, verily, I ſay unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

6 That which is born of the fleſh, is fleſh; and that which is born of the Spirit, is ſpirit.

7 Marvel not that I ſaid unto thee, Ye muſt be born again.

8 The wind bloweth where it liſteth, and thou heareſt the ſound thereof, but canſt not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: ſo is every one that is born of the Spirit.

9 Nicodemus anſwered and ſaid unto him, How can theſe things be?

10 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto him, Art thou a maſter of Iſrael, and knoweſt not theſe things?

11 Verily, verily, I ſay unto thee, We ſpeak that we do know, and teſtify that we have ſeen; and ye receive not our witneſs.

12 If I have told you earthly things, and

Ver. 4. Nicodemus ſaith unto him, &c.] Nicodemus hearing Jeſus affirm that the poſterity of Abraham needed a ſecond generation and birth to fit them for becoming the people of God, could not take his words in the ſenſe which he, with the other doctors, commonly affixed to them, when ſpeaking of proſelytes, becauſe ſo applied they ſignified converſion to Judaiſm; a thing not applicable to the Jews: Not doubting, therefore, that Jeſus ſpoke of a ſecond natural generation and birth, he was exceedingly ſurprized, and his anſwer evidently proves, that the tranſlation which ſome give of ἄνωθεν, in the former verſe, from above, is wrong; for it is plain he thought that without entering a ſecond time into his mother's womb, there was no being born in the manner Chriſt ſpoke of, ανωθεν, that is, again. What is added at ver. 5. explains what is left undetermined ver. 3. as to the original of this birth. See 1 Pet. i. 3. and 1 John v. 18.

Ver. 5. Jeſus anſwered, Verily, verily, &c.] Jeſus replied, that he was not ſpeaking of a natural, but of a ſpiritual regeneration; "Verily, verily, I ſay unto thee, except a man be born of water, i. e. be baptized, the only appointed means of admiſſion into the Goſpel kingdom;—and of the Spirit, that is, have a new nature given him by the Spirit, and ſhew forth in his life the fruits of that new nature; he cannot be a ſubject of God's kingdom here, nor have a ſhare in his glory hereafter." Dr. Clarke paraphrazes the paſſage thus: "Except he that has the means of grace appointed by God, makes uſe of thoſe means, it is juſt he ſhould fall ſhort of the grace itſelf, and ſo be deprived of the kingdom of heaven. Sermon ii. vol. 6. Our Lord did not mean that baptiſm is in all caſes abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation; for in the Apoſtles commiſſion, Mark xvi. 16. notwithſtanding faith and baptiſm are equally enjoined upon all nations; not the want of baptiſm, but of faith, is declared to be damning. Beſides, it ſhould be conſidered that this is a mere ceremony, which in itſelf has no efficacy to change men's natures, or to fit them for heaven; and that in ſome circumſtances it may be abſolutely impracticable; nevertheleſs, as the waſhing of the body in water in baptiſm fitly repreſents the purification of the ſoul, neceſſary to its enjoyment, this ceremony is very properly made the rite by which we publickly take upon ourſelves the profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion, the diſpenſation preparatory to heaven. Wherefore, the receiving of this rite is eſſentially neceſſary in all caſes where it can be had; the confeſſion of Chriſt being oftentimes as neceſſary as believing on him. If ſo, perſons who undervalue water baptiſm, on pretence of exalting the baptiſm of the ſpirit, do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the commandment of Chriſt. See Macknight, and Wall on Infant Baptiſm.

Ver. 6. That which is born of the fleſh is fleſh] That Nicodemus might ſee the abſurdity of his notion, Jeſus told him that whatſoever is begotten, muſt neceſſarily partake of the nature of that which begets it; and therefore, that a man's being begotten and born a ſecond time by his natural parents, were that poſſible, would not make him holy and immortal, or qualify him for the kingdom of God. After ſuch a ſecond generation, his nature would be the ſame ſinful and corrupt thing as before, becauſe he would ſtill be endued with all the properties and imperfections of human nature; and conſequently would be as far from a happy immortality as ever:—That which is born of the fleſh is fleſh:—But that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit: Spiritual, heavenly, divine, like its Author. See Clarke's Sermons, vol. ix. ſerm. 14.

Ver. 7. Ye muſt be born again] "Even you, though the deſcendants of Abraham; even you, ſcribes, Phariſees, and doctors of Iſrael, however proud of ſuperior ſanctity and knowledge; even you muſt be born again, in this ſpiritual ſenſe." The paſſage is remarkably ſtrong and emphatical.

Ver. 8. The wind bloweth, &c.] Our Saviour obſerved, that there was no cauſe for Nicodemus to be ſurprized, if there were ſome things in this doctrine of regeneration of an obſcure and unſearchable nature; becauſe even in the natural world many things are ſo. As much as to ſay, "It is true, thou mayeſt not underſtand how this ſecond birth can be brought to paſs, but that is no reaſon why it ſhould be diſbelieved; ſince there are many great effects in nature, which you muſt acknowledge, though you cannot explain their cauſes. For inſtance, the wind bloweth where it pleaſes, and you hear the ſound of it, but you know not whence it comes,—πόθεν ἔρχεται,—from what repoſitory; or whither it goes, ποῦ ὑπάγει, into what place:" (alluding probably to Pſalm cxxxv. 7. where God is ſaid to bring the wind out of his treaſuries. See alſo Eccleſ. xi. 5.) So is every one that is begotten and born of the Spirit. The influences by which he is begotten, are altogether imperceptible to ſenſe, yet the effects thereof are far from being ſo. Moreover, to the actions and ends of the ſpiritual life, the new birth is as eſſential, as the natural is to thoſe of the animal life. See Macknight, and Grotius.

Ver. 9, 10. Nicodemus anſwered, &c.] Our Lord's arguments were undeniable; nevertheleſs Nicodemus, who had been accuſtomed to the pomp and ceremony of an external religion, ſurpriſed to hear that Jews (who by birth were the people of God) muſt be begotten and born again, ſtill urged that the thing was impoſſible; which it doubtleſs was, taking regeneration as he did for converſion to Judaiſm, a notion which he was led into from what Jeſus had told him, ver. 5, 6. namely, that the regeneration he ſpake of was a moral and ſpiritual one. Our Lord replies, Art thou a maſter,—διδάσκαλος, a teacher in Iſrael,—and knoweſt not theſe things? Our Lord having all along ſpoken to Nicodemus in the common dialect of the Jewiſh divinity ſchools, might juſtly expreſs his ſurpriſe, that he, who was a teacher in Iſrael, did not underſtand it: for though he affixed a meaning to the word regeneration a little differently from what it bare in the mouths of the doctors, it was plainly analogous to their ſenſe of it, and ſo might eaſily have been underſtood even by a novice; the admiſſion of a proſelyte being looked upon by the Jews as a ſecond birth to him, in regard his parents and relations were no longer reckoned ſuch, and the proſelyte was thought to have received a new ſoul by the change of his religion. It is ſtrange that any ſhould doubt whether proſelytes were admitted into the Jewiſh church by baptiſm, that is, by waſhing, when it is plain, from expreſs paſſages in the Jewiſh law, that no Jew who had lived like a Gentile for one ſingle day, could be reſtored to the communion of their church by baptiſm. Compare Numb. xix. 19, 20. and many other precepts relating to ceremonial pollutions, by which the Jews were rendered incapable of appearing before God in the tabernacle or temple, till they were waſhed, either by bathing or ſprinkling. See Lightfoot, Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 11. We ſpeak that we do know] Some have ſuppoſed, that as Chriſt ſpeaks here in the plural number, he may refer not only to the doctrine which was delivered by himſelf, but to the teſtimony which was given to the truth of it by John the Baptiſt, and to the preaching alſo of his own diſciples, who all concurred in teſtifying the ſame things, the certainty of which they were aſſured of by the teachings of the Spirit, and by their own experience, while it was known to Chriſt by his omniſcience, and by the intimate acquaintance he had with all the counſels of the Father.—And others have ſuppoſed, that he includes here with himſelf the Father and the Spirit, who are expreſly ſpoken of in other paſſages as being witneſs to the truth of what he ſaid, and as agreeing with him in the teſtimony he gave. Comp. ch. viii. 18. xiv. 20, 26. and 1 John v. 6, 8. But there is no neceſſity we ſhould ſuppoſe him to refer to any other than himſelf, ſince nothing is more uſual than for a perſon of authority to ſpeak of himſelf in the plural number, as Chriſt may be obſerved to have done elſewhere; (Mark iv. 30.) and here in the next verſe he appears to have reſtrained it to himſelf, where he ſays only in the plural number, if I have told you earthly things, &c. In the next clauſe, and teſtify that which we have ſeen, Chriſt ſeems to allude to what is mentioned in the law as qualifying a man to be a witneſs, that he was able to declare of what he had teſtified, that he had ſeen or known it, Lev. v. 1. and as he therefore had a clear perception and a certain knowledge of the truth of what he ſaid, there was the higheſt reaſon to receive his teſtimony, and to regard him as a true and faithful witneſs. See Doddridge, and Lightfoot's Harmony.

Ver. 12, 13. If I have told you earthly things] "If you believe not theſe obvious truths concerning the ſpiritual nature of God's kingdom, and the qualifications of his ſubjects, how ſhall you believe the more ſublime doctrines of religion, which I am come to teach you?" Our Lord goes on, "In the mean time, you may ſafely receive my ye believe not, how ſhall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?

13 And no man hath aſcended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the ſon of man which is in heaven.

14 And as Moſes lifted up the ſerpent in the wilderneſs, even ſo muſt the Son of man be lifted up:

15 That whoſoever believeth in him, ſhould not periſh, but have eternal life.

16 For God ſo loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whoſoever believeth in him ſhould not periſh, but have everlaſting.

17 For God ſent not his ſon into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be ſaved.

18 He that believeth on him, is not condemned: but he that believeth not, is condemned already, becauſe he hath not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God.

19 And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkneſs rather than light, becauſe their deeds were evil.

20 For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, leſt his deeds ſhould be reproved.

21 But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifeſt, that they are wrought in God.

22 After theſe things came Jeſus and his diſciples into the land of Judea; and there he tarried with them, and baptized.

23 And John alſo was baptizing in Enon, near to Salim; becauſe there much water there: and they came, and were baptized.

24 For John was not yet caſt into priſon.

inſtructions; for I am veſted with an authority, and endued with gifts far ſuperior to all the prophets that have ever appeared.; No man hath aſcended up to heaven, &c. Perhaps Jeſus mentioned his coming down from heaven, to put the Jewiſh doctor in mind of the acknowledgment with which, at the beginning of their interview, he had addreſſed him, namely, that he was a teacher come from God. Beza and others ſuppoſe, that the preſent tenſe here, who is, ὁ ὤν, is put for the paſt, ἦν; of which conſtruction we have ſome examples, particularly ch. ix. 25. Accordingly they tranſlate the clauſe, the Son of man, who was in heaven; but the common tranſlation may be well retained thus: "Moſes your law-giver did not aſcend into heaven; he only went up to mount Sinai, and that for a few days, that he might receive the law from God; whereas the Son of man (a known title of the Meſſiah) who is come down from heaven, who is commiſſioned by God in an extraordinary manner, to reveal his will to men, and in reſpect of whoſe commiſſion all the other meſſengers of God may be ſaid to have been of the earth. See ver. 31. Heb. xii. 25. He hath aſcended up to heaven; hath received the cleareſt and moſt extenſive views of ſpiritual things; hath penetrated into the receſſes of the divine counſels; Prov. xxx. 3, 4. nay, is at preſent in heaven; is with God; is conſcious of all his gracious purpoſes towards men; conſequently muſt be a meſſenger of much higher dignity than Moſes, or Elijah, or any of the prophets, for whom you entertain ſo great a regard." This paſſage is a plain inſtance of what is uſually termed the communication of properties between the divine and human nature, whereby what is proper to the divine nature is ſpoken concerning the human, and what is proper to the human, is ſpoken of the divine. See Beza, Bengelius, and Macknight.

Ver. 14, 15. And as Moſes lifted up] Our Lord, by telling Nicodemus that the death of the Meſſiah was prefigured by types in the law, ſhewed him, that it was agreeable both to the doctrine of Moſes, and to the counſels of heaven, that the Meſſiah ſhould be in a ſuffering ſtate; conſequently he inſinuated, that the meanneſs of his preſent appearance upon earth was no reaſon why Nicodemus ſhould doubt of his having been in heaven. The type he mentioned as prefiguring his ſufferings both in their circumſtances and conſequences, was that of the brazen ſerpent, which, though it repreſented a thing noxious in its nature, was ſo far from being ſo, that all who were poiſoned by the ſtings of real ſerpents, obtained a perfect and ſpeedy cure, if they but looked at it. In like manner, the Son of God, though made in the ſimilitude of ſinful fleſh, would, by his death on the croſs, heal all true penitents; even ſuch as had been guilty of the greateſt and moſt deadly ſins, when, by faith, applying to him for ſalvation. But ſee the note on Numb. xxi. 9. and Peters on Job, p. 305.

Ver. 16. For God ſo loved the world] Our Lord here aſſures Nicodemus, that men owed the unſpeakable happineſs ſpoken of in the preceding verſe to the free and unutterable love of God the Father, who deſired their ſalvation with ſuch ardency, that he ſent his only-begotten Son to beſtow everlaſting life on them; ſo far was he from ſending him to condemn them, as he had reaſon to fear. This is one of thoſe bright and heart-affecting paſſages in the Goſpel, which ſhines too ſtrong to admit the leaſt attempt at illuſtration in a commentator. Reader! may your ſoul and mine feel and experience its energy now and for ever!

Ver. 17. For God ſent not his Son—to condemn the world] God is often repreſented as an avenger in the Old Teſtament; and as mankind had incurred his wrath by their iniquities, it might be expected that when he ſent his Son into the world, it would have been to inflict puniſhments upon them, as the word rendered condemn alſo implies; but on the contrary, the Son of God was ſent to ſave the world, and to give life, as the Syriac emphatically renders it. See Grotius.

Ver. 18. He that believeth on him is not condemned] From the gracious deſign of God towards the world, mentioned in the preceding verſes, our Lord concludes, that they who believe on the Son of God are not condemned; whereas they who do not believe are condemned already for that ſin; and juſtly, becauſe their unbelief is owing to their own wickedneſs, and not to any defect in the evidences of his miſſion, which are ſufficiently full to work conviction in every unprejudiced mind. The condemnation mentioned here, and ſtrongly implied in ver. 15. is thought by Dr. Doddridge and many others to refer to that natural ſtate of condemnation wherein fallen man ſtands. And till men enter deeply into this important truth, ſays the learned expoſitor juſt mentioned, the Goſpel may indeed be their amuſement, but I ſee not how it is likely to be their joy or their cure. We may juſt obſerve, upon the expreſſion in the name of the only-begotten, &c. that though the name of a perſon be frequently put for the perſon himſelf, yet it ſeems further intimated in that expreſſion, that the perſon ſpoken of is great and magnificent, and therefore it is generally uſed to expreſs either God the Father, or our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Ver. 19. And this is the condemnation] That is, the cauſe of condemnation; they will not receive the light of the Logos, that is, right reaſon, the God of Chriſtians, becauſe they will not obey him. Heylin. See ch. i. 5.

Ver. 21. He that doeth truth] He that practiſeth truth. That is, "is exerciſed in righteouſneſs and goodneſs." See 1 Chron. xxxii. 1. Epheſ. v. 9. This phraſe often occurs as the character of a good man. Comp. Pſ. cxix. 30. Iſai. xxvi. 2. 1 Pet. i. 22. 1 John i. 6. 2 John v. 4. and it is uſed with great propriety, ſince there is really a truth or falſhood in actions as in words, as Mr. Wollaſton in particular has ſhewn at large, in his "Religion of Nature," ch. 1. Of the ſame kind is the phraſe ποιειν ψευδος, uſed more than once by St. John, perhaps in a beautiful oppoſition to this before us; and if it were rendered practiſeth a lie, that oppoſition would be more apparent. See Rev. xxi. 27. xxii. 15. The phraſe that they are wrought in God ſignifies, that they are always agreeable to the divine nature and will; and the conſequence of that union of ſoul with God, which is the perfection and happineſs of the rational nature.

Such was the purport of our Lord's diſcourſe with Nicodemus, which we may eaſily believe affected him greatly. He perceived that Jeſus ſaw into his heart, was thoroughly convinced, and from that time forth became his diſciple, defended him in the great council of which he was a member, and, with Joſeph of Arimathea, paid him the honours of a funeral, when all his boſom-friends had deſerted him. See ch. vii. 50. xix. 39. Grotius and Doddridge.

Ver. 22—24. After theſe things] Some time after the conference with Nicodemus, Jeſus and his diſciples leaving Jeruſalem, went into the land of Judea, or thoſe parts of Judea which were remote from Jeruſalem. As he took this journey that he might have an opportunity of baptizing his diſciples, that is, the perſons who believed him to be the Meſſiah, (ch. i. 41—45.) it is probable he went to Bethabara beyond Jordan. John having removed thence to Enon, a place in Samaria, about eight miles ſouth of Scythopolis, remarkable for its waters, and where he had great conveniency for baptizing; Jeſus himſelf never baptized any perſon with water, as appears from ch. iv. 2. but his diſciples adminiſtered that kind of baptiſm in his name,

25 Then there aroſe a queſtion between ſome of John's diſciples and the Jews, about purifying.

26 And they came unto John, and ſaid unto him, Rabbi, he that was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou beareſt witneſs, behold, the ſame baptizeth, and all men come to him.

27 John anſwered and ſaid, A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven.

28 Ye yourſelves bear me witneſs, that I ſaid, I am not the Chriſt, but that I am ſent before him.

29 He that hath the bride, is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, which ſtandeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly, becauſe of the bridegroom's voice: this my joy therefore is fulfilled.

30 He muſt increaſe, but I muſt decreaſe.

31 He that cometh from above is above all: he that is of the earth is earthly, and ſpeaketh of the earth: he that cometh from heaven, is above all.

32 And what he hath ſeen and heard, that he teſtifieth; and no man receiveth his teſtimony.

33 He that hath received his teſtimony, hath ſet to his ſeal that God is true.

34 For he whom God hath ſent ſpeaketh the words of God: for God giveth not the Spirit by meaſure unto him.

35 The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand.

36 He that believeth on the Son, hath everlaſting life: and he that believeth not the Son, ſhall not ſee life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.

name, and by his order. It ſeems probable, from the 24th verſe, as well as from tradition, and many other paſſages in this Goſpel itſelf, that John wrote it as a ſupplement to the reſt; for he ſpeaks of the Baptiſt's impriſonment as a thing generally known, and yet ſays nothing of his martyrdom, though he had given ſo large an account of his miniſtry. We cannot ſuppoſe he would have omitted ſo material a fact, had he not known that the other Evangeliſts had before recorded it at large. See Doddridge and Heylin.

Ver. 25. And the Jews] And a certain Jew, according to the reading of many manuſcripts. It is not material whether one only or more engaged in the diſpute; but it ſhould be obſerved, that Jew in this place, and ſome others, does not mean one of that nation in general, but one of the country of Judea. See ver. 22. where baptiſm had juſt then been adminiſtered under the direction of Jeſus, where, as moſt of John's diſciples were of Galilee, it was natural for perſons of theſe two ſchools, to bring their reſpective diſciples into competition, and that a Jew, or a man of Judea, baptized under Chriſt, ſhould, by ſome invidious compariſon, raiſe the jealouſy of a Galilean baptized by John. The Jews called all ſorts of ablutions preſcribed by their teachers purifications: the ſubject therefore of this debate was, how Jeſus, who had been himſelf baptized by John, came to rebaptize John's diſciples, Acts xix. 4, 5. that is, aſſume greater authority than John, and virtually declare, that his baptiſm was inefficacious for the purpoſes of purification. The Baptiſt's diſciples, though they had often heard their maſter ſpeak on the ſubject, not underſtanding the ſubſerviency of his miniſtry to that of Jeſus, were unable to give their antagoniſts a ſatisfactory anſwer, ſo came and propoſed their queſtion to John himſelf. See the next verſe, and Heylin.

Ver. 27, 28. A man can receive nothing, &c.] "A man of God, or prophet, can aſſume no greater dignity and authority than God has thought fit to confer on him: You yourſelves bear me witneſs, even by the words you have juſt now made uſe of, deſcribing Jeſus by the character of him, to whom I bare witneſs, that I ſaid I am not the Chriſt, &c. I never pretended to be the Meſſiah, as you very well know; but when you aſked me, I told you, I was only his harbinger, ſent before to give you notice of his coming, and to prepare you for receiving him."

Ver. 29. He that hath the bride is the bridegroom] "So far am I from envying his growing fame, or the number of his diſciples, that I greatly rejoice in both; juſt as the bridegroom's friend, who is appointed to ſtand and hear him converſe with his bride, rejoices in the love ſhe expreſſes to him; of which love the friend forms an idea likewiſe, by what he hears the bridegroom ſay to her in return. My higheſt joy therefore is, that men chearfully ſubmit to the Meſſiah, and pay him all due honour." Amongſt the Jews there is frequent mention in the marriage ceremonies of the Hhupa, a canopy or place where the bridegroom uſed to diſcourſe familiarly with the bride, under a covering, as the means of conciliating her eſteem, and ſecuring her affections, which he was not ſuppoſed to have done till he came chearfully out of the Hhupha. To this cuſtom David refers Pſ. xix. 1. a cuſtom preſerved by the modern Jews, either before the ſynagogue, in a ſquare place covered over, or where there is no ſynagogue, they throw a garment over the bridegroom and the bride. Whilſt the bridegroom is engaged in this conference with the bride, his friends ſtand at the door or entrance, and when they hear the voice of joy from the bridegroom, a ſignal of his ſucceſs, they immediately rejoice, and ſpread the happy news. Theſe circumſtances appear to give light to the preſent paſſage; and as the idea of a bridegroom is more than once affixed to our Saviour, and the Goſpel diſpenſation compared to a marriage feaſt, this interpretation will need no farther proof to eſtabliſh it. See Dr. Hammond, and Selden de Uxor. Heb. lib. ii. c. 16.

Ver. 30, 31. He muſt increaſe] "I am not ignorant that his fame and the number of his diſciples ſhall every day increaſe, while mine ſhall decreaſe; for he is a perſon of infinitely greater dignity than I am, poſſeſſes far more intimate knowledge of the divine will, and the diſcoveries which he makes thereof as far tranſcend mine, as heaven exceeds earth." Theſe verſes contain a full refutation of that doctrine of Cerinthus, which aſſerts that John the Baptiſt was ſuperior to Jeſus. See the 10th article in the argument.

Ver. 32. What he hath ſeen, &c.] In alluſion to his being from above, where he enjoyed the moſt intimate communications of the divine counſels; that he teſtifieth, and no man receiveth his teſtimony; particularly concerning the ſpiritual nature of the kingdom of God, and the qualifications requiſite in his ſubjects. There is a ſtrong reſemblance betwixt this and what our Lord himſelf ſaid to Nicodemus, ver. 11, 13. As the two ſenſes of ſeeing and hearing furniſh us with the moſt certain knowledge, they are mentioned to denote the certainty of the doctrines delivered by Chriſt.

Ver. 33, 34. Hath ſet to his ſeal, &c.] Hath made a moſt becoming and ſubſtantial acknowledgement of the veracity of God, who by his prophets in ancient times foretold what the nature of the Meſſiah's kingdom would be; and who ſpeaketh now to men by his only-begotten Son, in ſuch a manner as he never did by any other prophet. For He whom God hath ſent,—that is, his only-begotten Son, ſpeaketh the words of God; doctrines, which by their own native truth and light, ſhew themſelves to be the oracles of God: and which beſides have the confirmation of the moſt extraordinary miracles; for God giveth not the Spirit by meaſure to him. God has given him the inſpiration and aſſiſtance of the Spirit, without thoſe limitations and interruptions wherewith they were given to all other prophets whatſoever; for in Sacred Scripture, as well as in profane writers, to do, or give a thing by meaſure, is to do, or give it ſparingly. See Ezek. iv. 16. Jer. xlvi. 28. We may juſt obſerve, that it was cuſtomary among the Jews for the witneſs to ſet his ſeal to the teſtimony which he had given. See Heylin, Raphelius, and Merrick.

Ver. 35. The Father loveth the ſon] The affection which the Father bears to his only-begotten Son, is altogether different from the regard which he ſhewed to his other meſſengers. They were ſervants, and treated as ſuch, being endued with ſcanty portions of the ſpirit in compariſon: Whereas this is God's Son, for which reaſon he hath anointed him with the oil of gladneſs above his fellows, and made him not the greateſt Prophet and Prieſt only, but the greateſt King alſo that ever was; even King and Judge univerſal; by whoſe laws men muſt govern their lives, and at whoſe bar they ſhall all finally be tried. See Macknight.

Ver. 36. He that believeth on the Son, &c.] "This, ſays the Baptiſt, is the ſubſtance, and this is the end of my whole teſtimony; that he who has a lively faith in this only Son of God, hath everlaſting life; hath a ſure title to it, and the beginning of it already wrought in his ſoul; but he who diſobeys the Son, (for ſo the Greek ſhould be rendered) ſhall not ſee life. It is of great importance to preſerve a difference in the tranſlation correſponding to that in the original, becauſe the latter Phraſe explains the former, and ſhews that the faith to which the promiſe of life is annexed, is an effectual principle of ſincere and unreſerved obedience; and it is impoſſible to make one part of Scripture conſiſtent with another, unleſs this be taken into our idea of ſaving faith. "He who believes on the Son, is oppoſed to

CHAP. IV.

Chriſt talketh with a woman of Samaria, and revealeth himſelf unto her: his diſciples marvel: he declareth to them his zeal for God's glory. Many Samaritans believe on him: he departeth into Galilee, and healeth the ruler's ſon that lay ſick at Capernaum.

to him who diſobeys the Son, ſays Dr. Heylin; the ſenſe of the word faith, which was familiarly uſed among the Jews when Chriſt and his diſciples firſt taught, began to be perverted when St. John wrote his Goſpel, and therefore he guards the primitive ſenſe by the antitheſis." The Baptiſt adds, But the wrath of God abideth on him. In Scripture the word abide has a particular ſignification, denoting the adheſion and permanency of the thing which is ſaid to abide. Of this ſignification we have an example here; for there is a momentary wrath of God, which quickly paſſeth, and to which his own people are liable; but his abiding wrath torments, and does not kill; and being once inflicted, never draws to an end. Thus the baptiſt bare teſtimony to Jeſus anew, ſetting forth his dignity in the plenitude of his commiſſion, the excellency of his gifts, the nearneſs of his relation to the Deity, as his only Son, and the greatneſs of his power, as univerſal judge. See Grotius, Macknight, and Doddridge's firſt ſermon on Salvation by Grace.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 19.

The utmoſt that can be done for us in religion, is ſo to inſtruct us, that we may not err for want of knowledge of our duty; and ſo to aid us, that it may be in our power, whenever it is in our will to obey. Any thing beyond this is inconſiſtent with reaſon and freedom, and therefore can have no part in a religion deſigned for the government of rational free agents. And this being the caſe, that muſt in compariſon be judged the beſt religion, which does moſt fully enlighten the underſtanding, and in the moſt perfect manner reſtore us to our liberty and freedom, by removing the impediments which ariſe from the weakneſs and corruption of our nature. All who live under the influence of ſuch a religion as this, as they have a certain way of happineſs marked out for them, if they chooſe to walk in it, ſo are they certainly doomed to condemnation upon their diſobedience. For there are but two ſorts of men who can hope to eſcape puniſhment; the righteous, who have no reaſon to fear judgement, and the ſinners, who, offending through ignorance or weakneſs, have ſome plea to make for mercy and forgiveneſs: but the ſinners who knew their duty, and were ſo aſſiſted as to have been able, had they been but willing to perform it, have nothing to expect but condemnation. What our Lord therefore hath declared to us, is no more than a natural conſequence drawn from the excellency of the Goſpel and the perverſeneſs of men conſidered together. This is the condemnation, that light is come into the word, and men loved darkneſs rather than light, becauſe their deeds were evil.

Were the Goſpel leſs perfect than it is, or leſs known to the world, ſinners would have more to plead in their own behalf; but ſince they want no light to direct them, no aſſiſtance to ſupport them in doing their duty, they are left without excuſe for their diſobedience. The Goſpel, which was given to them for life and ſalvation, will be their judgement and condemnation, and the fault is all their own. They have as little reaſon to complain of the Goſpel religion upon this account, as the dying patient has of the phyſician, whoſe wholeſome medicines he wantonly abuſed, to his own deſtruction.

Were the Goſpel merely a matter of advice, which men might follow, or let alone, as they found moſt convenient for their own purpoſes, they would then have leſs to anſwer for, if they neglected it; but the Goſpel is a law proceeding from the beſt and higheſt authority, given by God to his creatures, and we are bound at our peril to take notice of it. If we will not walk in the light of God's law, when it ſhines ſo brightly before our eyes, we ſhall be condemned for chooſing darkneſs rather than light; nor can there be any reaſon aſſigned why men make this perverſe choice of continuing in darkneſs rather than light, but this only, becauſe their deeds are evil.

It evidently appears from the whole tenor of the Goſpel, that it is not left to every man's choice whether he will be ſubject to that Goſpel or no; for ſubject he ſhall be, ſo as to be intitled to the rewards of it for his obedience, or to the puniſhments of it for his diſobedience: and this is not a circumſtance peculiar to the Goſpel only, but common to all laws founded on ſufficient authority. No man is at liberty to chooſe whether he will be governed by the laws of the realm; and it would be to little purpoſe to plead to an indictment, that you never intended to be governed by the law, but choſe to act by other rules, and therefore deſire that the law may have no place in the judgement, but that you may be tried by thoſe rules by which you chooſe to live. The authority of the law-giver cuts off ſuch pleas, and the greater the authority of the law-giver, the more abſolute muſt our ſubmiſſion be.

Now if this be juſt reaſoning, it may perhaps appear, that the pretence for deiſm, which at preſent ſeems the moſt plauſible, will in the end be its greateſt aggravation. For though when men diſcard the Goſpel out of a zeal to preſerve the moral law of reaſon and nature, they may ſeem to act with great regard to virtue and holineſs, yet do they manifeſtly reject the authority of God, and deliberately refuſe that obedience which reaſon teaches to be due to the great Lawgiver of the world. But theſe pretences, conſidered in themſelves, will be found to have little weight, ſince the Goſpel being the trueſt light to direct us, men can have no reaſon to forſake it, but this only aſſigned by our Lord, becauſe their deeds are evil.

All the inſtitutions of the Goſpel of Chriſt, ſuch as baptiſm, the Lord's-ſupper, and the like, are ſet before us, as the proper means to enable us to make our calling and election ſure, by continuing ſteadfaſt in the works of holineſs; and what is it then that can tempt a man to reject a religion ſo excellently well adapted to ſerve all the good ends of living in this world, and to ſupport the hopes of living happily in that which is to come?

Is it for inſtruction you recur to the light of nature? Would you hence learn the true notions of virtue and juſtice, and ſee the image of holineſs in its native purity, ſtripped of the falſe ornaments and diſguiſes of ſuperſtition and ignorance? Would you know what is the pure and acceptable ſervice to be paid to the great Creator, or what are the juſt bounds of relative duty between man and man?—Look into the Goſpel, and there you will find all the moral duties fairly tranſcribed, and deduced from the two great principles of nature, the love of God, and the love of our neighbour. There you may be inſtructed how to worſhip God in ſpirit and in truth, and how to love your brother without diſſimulation. There is no precept of virtue laid down in the Goſpel which nature can reject; there is none which nature teaches, that the Goſpel has not explained and enforced; you cannot therefore forſake the Goſpel, in hopes of finding a purer religion elſewhere.

Many have complained, that the terrors of the Lord, ſet forth in the Goſpel of Chriſt, are too rigid and ſevere, and hardly reconcileable with the benignity of the divine nature, and have therefore ſought to ſcreen themſelves under a milder ſentence, denounced as they think by the voice of reaſon and nature; but whoever heard that any one rejected the Goſpel, that he might ſecure the practice of virtue upon a foundation of better hopes and fears, which ſhould with a more powerful influence ſubdue the minds of men to the obedience of holineſs?—Many have lamented the ſtrictneſs of the Goſpel morality, the laws of which require ſo great perfection, that man muſt hardly hope to attain to it; and have therefore recurred to the law of nature, not as a more perfect, but as a more equitable rule of juſtice, hoping to find, under the protection of nature, that liberty and allowance to their infirmities, which the Goſpel has precluded.—But do you know the man, who ever deſpiſed the Goſpel for the immorality of its precepts, or who left it that he might be more chaſte, more temperate, more charitable than the laws of Chriſt required he ſhould be? If not, let any one be judge what purpoſes a man ſerves, when he endeavours on one ſide to bring down the precepts of morality from the ſtrictneſs of the Goſpel, and to give greater liberty to the inclinations of the world; and on the other ſide, to weaken the reſtraints laid on the paſſions by the terrors of the Chriſtian law, by diſcarding the fears of perpetual puniſhment. Alas! is the cauſe of religion to be thus ſupported? Or will the world be better, when leſs holineſs is required of them, and when even what is required is become leſs neceſſary to be performed, by removing the danger of tranſgreſſing?

And yet, ſuch are the views upon which thoſe act, who retreat from the Goſpel with the greateſt ſhew of reaſon and moderation. Theſe are the pretences of ſuch as would not be thought to throw off all regard to religion, but only to ſeek a better,—I doubt they mean an eaſier form. And what is it that creates their averſion to the light which is held forth to them, and makes them chooſe to retire, if not to the total darkneſs of heatheniſh ignorance, yet to the ſhades of natural religion, unleſs this which our Lord hath aſſigned, becauſe their deeds are evil? Our bleſſed Saviour ſaw that the hopes of nature were obſcured, and therefore he did, by a wonderful revelation in his Goſpel, bring life and immortality to light again: He ſaw that her powers were decayed, and therefore he ſupplied the defect by the aſſiſtance of his Holy Spirit. If therefore we are not willing to reap the benefit, let us at leaſt forgive his kindneſs, and not think the worſe of him, or his religion, becauſe of the great proviſion he has made in it for our ſecurity and eternal happineſs.

Upon the whole, the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt being recommended to us as founded on the expreſs revelation of God, carries with it ſuch an authority, as cannot with ſafety to ourſelves be deſpiſed or neglected. It is not an indifferent matter whether we receive it or no; for if the Goſpel be truly what it is ſaid to be, whether you will receive it, or whether you will reject it, you ſhall moſt certainly be judged by the tenor of it. If the Goſpel be the word of God, it is death to forſake it. It is want of reflection that makes men think religion is a thing ſo perfectly in their own power, that they may chooſe where and how they pleaſe, without being accountable for the choice they make, provided only they live up to the terms of it: For in truth religion, properly and ſtrictly ſo called, admits of no choice. It does not lie before us to conſider whether we will love God or no, or whether we ſhall love our neighbour or no: we have no choice whether we will be ſober, temperate and chaſte, or otherwiſe; for in theſe eſſential parts of religion, we muſt either obey or periſh. But the weakneſs and corruption of man making it neceſſary for God to interpoſe by a new declaration of his will, the only diſpute is, of the truth and authority of this new declaration. If it indeed comes from God, it cannot be ſafe to reject it; and whether it does or no, it is abſurd to reject it, without weighing its merit. This therefore is of all others the moſt weighty and ſerious matter, and requires the exerciſe of our moſt compoſed thoughts, and unwearied application: for if we wantonly or perverſely refuſe the gift of God, this will be our final dreadful condemnation, that light is come into the world, and we loved darkneſs rather than light, becauſe our deeds were evil.

WHEN therefore the Lord knew how the Phariſees had heard that Jeſus made and baptized more diſciples than John,

2 (Though Jeſus himſelf baptized not, but his diſciples,)

3 He left Judea, and departed again into Galilee.

4 And he muſt needs go through Samaria.

5 Then cometh he to a city of Samaria, which is called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his ſon Joſeph.

6 Now Jacob's well was there. Jeſus therefore, being wearied with his journey, ſat thus on the well. (And it was about the ſixth hour.)

7 There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water: Jeſus ſaith unto her, Give me to drink.

8 (For his diſciples were gone away unto the city to buy meat.)

9 Then ſaith the woman of Samaria unto him, How is it that thou, being a Jew, aſkeſt drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans.

Ver. 1. Ch. iii. 22, 26.—V. 5. Gen. xxxiii. 19. xlviii. 22. Joſh. xxiv. 32.—V. 9. 2 Kings xvii. 24. Luke ix. 52, 53. Acts x. 28.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1—3. When therefore the Lord knew, &c.] The Baptiſt's impriſonment happened while our Lord was in Judea, (ſee Mark vi. 17, &c.) where he continued till the fame of his doctrine, diſciples and miracles reaching Jeruſalem, gave umbrage to the Phariſees. Theſe men claiming it as the privilege of their ſect to direct the conſciences of the people, were enraged to find numbers of them acknowledging as the Meſſiah one whoſe birth and fortune ſo little ſuited the notions which they had taught concerning the great deliverer of the nation; wherefore, to ſhun the effects of their malice, Jeſus, who knew all that paſſed, retired with his diſciples into Galilee. His preſence it ſeems was neceſſary there, as the miniſtry of his forerunner in that country was now brought to a period. The Evangeliſt obſerves, ver. 2. that Jeſus himſelf baptized not, which perhaps he omitted to do, becauſe it was not proper to baptize in his own name, and becauſe it was of more importance to preach than to baptize. (1 Cor. i. 17.) Beſides, it might have given thoſe who were baptized by him occaſion to value themſelves above others; as happened in the church of Corinth, where the brethren valued themſelves upon the character of the perſon who had baptized them. Perhaps too this might be partly to avoid importunate inquiries whether he was the Meſſiah, and partly to prevent thoſe prejudices which might have ariſen againſt the more perfect form of baptiſm afterwards inſtituted, if any had received this leſs perfect baptiſm from Chriſt himſelf. Indeed the baptiſm properly his, was that of the Holy Ghoſt. See Macknight, L'Enfant, and Calmet.

Ver. 4, 5. And he muſt needs go through Samaria] In his way to Galilee Jeſus was obliged to paſs through Samaria, where one evening, being wearied with his journey, he ſat down by Jacob's well, not far from the city of Sychar, which the Evangeliſt tells us was near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his ſon Joſeph. Now if, as Mr. Maundrell conjectures, the plain beginning at Jacob's well was part of that parcel, Sychar might juſtly be ſaid to be nigh to it, though it was as far diſtant as the preſent Naploſa, which is about a mile from it; but if Sychar in our Lord's time, as is probable, extended further towards the well than Naploſa does at preſent, the propriety of the Evangeliſt's expreſſion will appear yet more fully. It ſeems evident, however, from this hiſtory, that Sychar was at ſome diſtance from the well: for the diſciples are ſaid to have gone away into the city to buy meat, ver. 8. while the woman talked with Jeſus at the well; and ver. 30. we are told, that the Samaritans, on hearing what the woman ſaid concerning Jeſus, went out of the city, and came to ſee him, ver. 40. Beſides, that the town was at ſome diſtance from the well, ſeems highly probable from the earneſtneſs wherewith the woman begged Jeſus to give her ſuch water as would prevent her from being athirſt, and from coming thither to draw. It ſeems her coming from the town to the well was a great labour, from which ſhe wiſhed to be free. The name of this place was originally Sichem, but was changed into Sychar by the Jews, as a name of reproach; for, as Mr. L'Enfant obſerves, Sychar ſignifies, in the Syriac Language, a drunkard and a liar.

Ver. 6. Now Jacob's well was there] Mr. Maundrell, in his Travels, gives the following account of Jacob's well: "About one third of an hour from Naploſa (the ancient Sychar, as it is termed in the New Teſtament) ſtood Jacob's well, famous not only on account of its author, but much more for the memorable conference which our bleſſed Lord had there with the woman of Samaria. If it ſhould be inquired whether this be the very place it is pretended to be, ſeeing it may be ſuſpected to ſtand too remote from Sychar for the woman to come and draw water, we may anſwer, that in all probability the city extended farther in former times than it does now, as may be conjectured from ſome pieces of a very thick wall, the remains perhaps of the ancient Sichem, ſtill to be ſeen not far from hence. Over it ſtood formerly a large church, erected by that great and devout patroneſs of the Holy Land, the empreſs Irene; but of this the voracity of time, aſſiſted by the hands of the Turks, has left nothing but a few foundations remaining. The well is covered at preſent with an old ſtone vault, into which you are let down by a very ſtrait hole, and then removing a broad flat ſtone, you diſcover the well itſelf. It is dug in a firm rock, is about three yards in diameter, and thirty-five in depth, five of which we found full of water. This confutes a ſtory commonly told to travellers, who do not take the pains to examine the well, namely, "that it is dry all the year round, except on the anniverſary of that day in which our bleſſed Saviour ſat upon it, but then bubbles up with abundance of water." At this well the narrow valley of Sichem ends, opening itſelf into a wide field, which probably is part of the piece of ground given by Jacob to his ſon Joſeph. It is watered by a freſh ſtream running between it and Sichem, which makes it ſo exceeding verdant and fruitful, that it may well be looked upon as a ſtanding token of that good patriarch to the beſt of ſons." See Gen. xlviii. 22. and Maundrell's Travels, p. 62.

Jeſus therefore—ſat thus on the well] Sat down immediately by the well. Doddridge. Whitby ſays, "Sat down thus, means, weary as he was." See Elſner's Obſervat. vol. 1. And it was about the ſixth hour, ſays the Evangeliſt, that is, about ſix in the evening, and not, as commentators have generally thought, in the middle of the day, or at high noon; for in thoſe countries the women never drew water in the middle of the day, but always about ſun-ſetting, as is evident from Gen. xxiv. 11. Wherefore, as the woman came to draw water while Jeſus was ſitting by the well, it cannot be the Jewiſh but the Roman ſixth hour of which the hiſtorian ſpeaks. See on ch. i. 39. By this time, as the verſe informs us, Jeſus was fatigued with his journey, and therefore, before he proceeded, he ſent his diſciples to the neareſt town for refreſhment, as there was no place upon the road where he could meet with any accommodation. It may be objected, that the circumſtances of the hiſtory oblige us to ſuppoſe, that this journey through Samaria was made ſo late in the year, that the tranſactions could not happen at ſix in the evening. But it may be proved, that when Jeſus preached in the ſynagogue of Nazareth, after the leaving of Samaria, it was about the beginning of September; whence it will appear, that he travelled through Samaria in Auguſt: if ſo, all the particulars here related may have happened in the time allotted to them: for when Jeſus ſat down by the well, it was about the ſixth hour, perhaps half an hour before it, and from that time till it was dark was ſufficient for all the tranſactions mentioned in this hiſtory. See Macknight's 5th Prelim. Obſervat.

Ver. 7. There cometh a woman of Samaria, &c.] An inhabitant of the country, not the town of Samaria; for Sebaſte, the ancient Samaria, according to Mr. Maundrell, is about two hours, or ſix miles diſtant from Sychar, conſequently about ſeven miles from the well; a diſtance by far too great for one, even in that country, to come and fetch water. Though Jeſus did not chooſe to go to the town himſelf, he ſent his diſciples thither to buy meat; for it ſeems the Jews might buy what they would of the Samaritans, as they might likewiſe from heathens; but they were not to accept of any thing from them in the way of beneficence, (ſee on ver. 9.) that being a crime, in their opinion, equal to the eating of ſwine's fleſh; ſo bitter was the animoſity that ſubſiſted between the Samaritans and the Jews! See ch. viii. 48. and the note on Luke x. 43.

Ver. 9. For the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans] Have no friendly intercourſe, &c. This muſt be the meaning of ὐ συγχρῶνται here, for it is evident from ver. 8. that the Jews had ſome dealings with them. It has been frequently obſerved, that many cauſes concurred to occaſion this inveterate hatred of the Jews towards the Samaritans; ſuch as their foreign extract,—and the early mixture of ſuperſtition and idolatry in their religion, 2 Kings xvii. 24, &c.—The injurious manner in which they treated the Jews after their return from the captivity, Ezra iv. 1—6. Neh. vi. 1—14. and eſpecially their building a temple on mount Gerizim, which they made the centre of their worſhip, in oppoſition to that at Jeruſalem; and perhaps nothing contributed more to expoſe them to the contempt and abhorrence of the Jews, than the infamous offer they made to Antiochus, of dedicating that temple to Jupiter, and admitting the rites of his idolatrous worſhip, at a time when the Jews were ſuffering the utmoſt extremities in defence of their religion. We may obſerve that it is not ſaid, that the Samaritans had no dealings with the Jews, but that the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans; from whence it is natural to conclude, that the enmity was greateſt on the ſide of the Jews. As a proof of this, ſee a remarkable paſſage in Ecclus. l. 25, 26. Walton's Prolegomena, Wetſtein, Whitby, and Lightfoot on the place.

10 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto her, If thou kneweſt the gift of God, and who it is that ſaith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldeſt have aſked of him, and he would have given thee living water.

11 The woman ſaith unto him, Sir, thou haſt nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then haſt thou that living water?

12 Art thou greater than our father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himſelf, and his children, and his cattle?

13 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto her, Whoſoever drinketh of this water ſhall thirſt again:

14 But whoſoever drinketh of the water that I ſhall give him, ſhall never thirſt; but the water that I ſhall give him, ſhall be in him a well of water ſpringing up into everlaſting life.

15 The woman ſaith unto him, Sir, give me this water, that I thirſt not, neither come hither to draw.

16 Jeſus ſaith unto her, Go, call thy huſband, and come hither.

17 The woman anſwered, and ſaid, I have no huſband. Jeſus ſaid unto her, Thou haſt well ſaid, I have no huſband:

18 For thou haſt had five huſbands; and he whom thou now haſt is not thy huſband: in that ſaidſt thou truly.

19 The woman ſaith unto him, Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet.

20 Our fathers worſhipped in this mountain; and ye ſay, that in Jeruſalem is the place where men ought to worſhip.

Ver. 10. Jeſus anſwered,—if thou kneweſt the gift of God] "If thou kneweſt what an opportunity God hath put into thine hand, of receiving the greateſt bleſſing that ever was beſtowed, as well as who, and how great a perſon he is who ſpeaks to thee; inſtead of ſcrupling to grant him ſo ſmall a favour, thou wouldeſt ſurely have aſked Him: (for ſuch is the force of the original) and he, without objecting to thee on account of the people to whom thou belongeſt, would readily have given thee living water; far better than what thou art now drawing:" By which our Lord intimated his ability and readineſs to communicate thoſe influences of God's Holy Spirit, which afford the nobleſt refreſhment to the ſoul, and are therefore often deſcribed by water. It is certain that the phraſe living water, ſignifies in many good authors ſpring water, or running water, in oppoſition to that which ſtagnates; yet as our Lord elſewhere, in a remarkable paſſage recorded by this Evangeliſt, ch. vi. 51. calls himſelf Living Bread, becauſe by feeding upon him life is to be obtained,—it is proper to adhere literally to the original in the verſion; though there is no doubt that the woman underſtood our Lord, not of living, ſpiritual water, but of ſome fine ſpring water, which flowed ſo eaſily as not to need the pains of drawing, and was, on this account, at leaſt, preferable to that of Jacob's well; and our Lord's reply, ver. 13, 14. ſhews that the ſimile would hold in that reſpect. Our Lord, on this occaſion, demonſtrated the greatneſs of his condeſcenſion and benevolence; for though this woman was a perſon of an infamous character, and though he himſelf was preſſed with thirſt, he delayed refreſhing himſelf, that he might bring her, who was ſpiritually dead, to the water of life. See Elſner on the place, and comp. Gen. xxvi. 6. Lev. xiv. 6. Jer. ii. 13.

Ver. 11. Thou haſt nothing to draw with, &c.] Literally, Thou haſt no bucket. See ver. 28. and on ver. 6. In the dry countries of the eaſt, the inhabitants find themſelves obliged to carry with them great leathern bottles of water, which they fill from time to time as they have opportunity; but what is very extraordinary, in order to be able to do this, they, in many places, are obliged to carry lines and buckets with them. So Thevenot, in giving an account of what he provided for his journey from Egypt to Jeruſalem, tells us, "he did not forget leathern buckets to draw water with." Rauwolff goes farther, for he gives us to underſtand, that the wells of inhabited countries there, as well as in the deſarts, have no implements for drawing of water, but what thoſe bring with them who come thither; for, ſpeaking of the well or ciſtern of Bethlehem, he ſays, "It is a good rich ciſtern, deep and wide; for which reaſon, the people that go to dip for water, are provided with ſmall leathern buckets and a line, as is uſual in thoſe countries; and ſo the merchants, who go in caravans through great deſarts in far countries, provide themſelves alſo with theſe, becauſe in theſe countries you find more ciſterns or wells, than ſprings that lie high." In how eaſy a light, ſays the author of the Obſervations, doth this place the Samaritan woman's talking of the depth of Jacob's well, and her remarking, that ſhe did not obſerve our Lord had any thing to draw with, though he had ſpoken of preſenting her with water. See Obſerv. p. 207.

Ver. 12. Art thou greater than our father Jacob] "Are you a perſon of greater power, or more in favour with God, than our common father Jacob, that you can procure water for yourſelf by ſupernatural means?—He was obliged to dig this well for the ſupply of himſelf and his family; Can you create water?"—The mention of Jacob as a progenitor was highly proper in an addreſs to a Jew; who reverenced that patriarch in the higheſt manner, as well as the Samaritans, and could never be ſuſpected guilty of the leaſt diſreſpect to ſo venerable a name. See Macknight and Grotius.

Ver. 13, 14. Whoſoever drinketh of this water, &c.] "This water can allay the pain of thirſt only for a little while, becauſe though it be drank ever ſo plentifully, the appetite will return again; but whoſoever drinketh of the water that I ſhall give him, ſhall never thirſt; ſhall at no time be ſubject to any vehement painful ſenſations, ariſing from unmortified irregular appetites; but the water, &c. ſhall be in him a well of water, ſpringing up into everlaſting life; ſhall yield him divine ſatisfaction now, and ſhall be the ſource of his happineſs to all eternity in heaven; where he ſhall feel none of the bodily appetites or wants ſo troubleſome to men in this life." Thus Jeſus, under the image of living, or ſpring water, taken from the well beſide which he was ſitting, beautifully deſcribed, as his manner was, the efficacy of the influences of the ſpirit of God; for, as water quenches thirſt, ſo theſe, by quieting the agitation, and cooling the fervency of earthly deſires, beget an unſpeakable inward peace. By this image he alſo ſet forth the plenitude and perpetuity of the celeſtial joys, flowing from holy diſpoſitions, produced by the influences of the Spirit of God. For theſe, by an innate power, ſatisfying all the capacities and deſires of the ſoul, render it ſo completely happy, that it is not able to form a wiſh, or a thought of any thing better.

Ver. 15. Sir, give me this water] The woman, ſtill ignorant of his ſpiritual meaning, and underſtanding him only of natural water, ſays unto him with great reſpect, Sir, Κυριε, Lord,—I claim thy promiſe, Give me this water. The title which ſhe gives our Lord, though a Jew, and as ſuch eſteemed an inveterate enemy to her nation, indicates great humility and reverence; which indeed is viſible in her whole conduct.

Ver. 18. He whom thou now haſt is not thy huſband] This can imply no leſs than that ſhe was not married to the man ſhe now lived with; for Chriſt ſeems to have allowed the other five to have been huſbands, though her ſeparation from ſome of the former, and her marriage with the reſt, had probably been unlawful; which quite overthrows the argument Jerome would draw from hence, againſt the lawfulneſs of marrying more than once. See Heinſius on the place.

Ver. 19. I perceive that thou art a prophet] To find a perſon who was a perfect ſtranger, and who, on account of the national animoſity, could not be ſuſpected of having any intercourſe with her townſmen, or with the Samaritans in general, diſcovering, nevertheleſs, the moſt ſecret particulars of her life; made ſo ſenſible an impreſſion on her mind, that ſhe could not but confeſs ſuch a degree of knowledge more than natural; and conſequently, that the perſon poſſeſſed of it was a prophet, and had it communicated to him by divine inſpiration. It is worth our while to trace the gradual progreſs of this woman's conviction: She at firſt gives him the appellation of a Jew only; ſhe then wonders that he ſhould ſo far have laid aſide the prejudice of his nation, as to aſk a favour of a Samaritan; ſhe next calls him Sir, or Lord; ſhe then acknowledges his prophetic character; and, in conſequence of that perſuaſion, propoſes for his deciſion one of the moſt important queſtions in diſpute between the two nations. When the Phariſees were reproved by our Lord for their hypocriſy, they furiouſly rejoined, He was a Samaritan, and had a devil; but when the Samaritan woman heard her moſt ſecret ſins thus diſcovered, ſhe was ſo far from recriminating, that ſhe cries out, Lord, I perceive that thou art a prophet. See Eraſmus, and Doddridge.

Ver. 20. Our fathers worſhipped in this mountain] Who the woman meant by the appellation of fathers, is a point much diſputed; they who think that ſhe meant the Ephraimites, from whom the Samaritans pretended their deſcent, hold that the mountain on which they worſhipped was mount Ephraim, where was Shiloh, the ſeat of the tabernacle for ſeveral years. Another account, more generally adopted, is to this effect: Sanballat, by the permiſſion of Alexander the Great, had built a temple upon mount Gerizim, for Manaſſeh his ſon-in-law, who, for marrying Sanballat's daughter, was expelled from the prieſthood, and from Jeruſalem. See Neh. xiii. 28. This was the place where the Samaritans uſed to worſhip, in oppoſition 21 Jeſus ſaith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye ſhall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jeruſalem, worſhip the Father.

22 Ye worſhip ye know not what: we know what we worſhip: for ſalvation is of the Jews.

23 But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worſhippers ſhall worſhip the the Father in ſpirit and in truth: for the Father ſeeketh ſuch to worſhip him.

24 God is a Spirit; and they that worſhip him, muſt worſhip him in ſpirit and in truth.

25 The woman ſaith unto him, I know that Meſſias cometh, (which is called Chriſt): when he is come, he will tell us all things.

26 Jeſus ſaith unto her, I that ſpeak unto thee, am he.

27 And upon this came his diſciples, and marvelled that he talked with the wo-to Jeruſalem; and it was ſo near Sichem, the ſcene of this ſtory, that a man's voice might be heard from one to the other; Judg. ix. 7. Now as Gerizim was the mount which the woman meant, it will eaſily appear whom ſhe meant by the fathers who worſhipped there. It is generally known and acknowledged that the Samaritans, though a mixture of Jews and foreigners, pretended to derive their origin from the patriarchs, eſpecially from Abraham, Jacob, &c. Now it appears from Scripture, that Abraham and Jacob erected altars in this place, where alſo the bleſſings were pronounced in the time of Joſhua; and it is probable, likewiſe, that it had been a place conſecrated to religious worſhip by the inhabitants of Sichem. See Gen. xii. 6, 7. xxxiii. 18, 20. Deut. xi. 26. Joſh. viii. 33. Mede's works, p. 263. and Joſeph. Antiq. l. xi. c. 8. l. xiii. c. 9.

Ver. 21. Woman, believe me, &c.] To underſtand the force of our Lord's reply, it will be neceſſary to recur to the origin of this diſpute between the two nations. We ſhall firſt premiſe that Chriſt waves the deciſion of the queſtion put to him by the woman, and with good reaſon; for he was about to deſtroy all local worſhip, by introducing a religion ſuited to all climates, and to be obſerved in all nations of the world. To talk then of the preference of this or that mountain, would have been abſurd; and to decide the point in favour of either, would have been inconſiſtent with his doctrine. This premiſed, we obſerve, that at the time of the migration of the Hebrews from Egypt, the whole world was ſunk into idolatry; they alone were bleſſed with the knowledge of the true God; yet even they were perpetually relapſing into the abſurdities of idol worſhip. Hence that load of peculiar ceremonies was impoſed upon them; tending particularly, amongſt other wiſe purpoſes, to the keeping them pure from idolatry, to the ſeparating them from the worſhip of the pagan nations which ſurrounded them, and to the confirming them in that of the true God: To this end the temple was built, and the worſhip eſtabliſhed at Jeruſalem. Hither the whole nation was obliged to reſort at ſtated times, to prevent their relapſe into idolatry. The Samaritans, who had divided from the Jews, had built a temple, partly for the ſame ends, on mount Gerizim, where they periodically performed the ceremonies enjoined by the law. Theſe ceremonies, and this ſeparation of Jews from Gentiles, were deſigned by Providence to be continued till the coming of Chriſt, when a glorious change was to take place. The world was prepared by higher degrees of knowledge for the reception of the Goſpel. This was the hour appointed for the Sun of righteouſneſs to ariſe: Now was to be done away every circumſtance and ceremony tending to keep up the former ſeparation; nothing was to be eſtabliſhed, ſave what conduced to a general union of mankind; and the peculiar, the local, and periodical worſhip of Jeruſalem, was to be ſwallowed up in that more ſpiritual diſpenſation, which was deſigned to produce univerſal peace and love. In this view, we have only to read over the paſſage before us, to diſcover at once its meaning and propriety. See Brown's Sermon on Externals in Religion, p. 4, &c.

Ver. 22. Ye worſhip ye know not what] The Samaritans worſhipped the true God, and ſeem to have had as juſt notions of his perfections in general as the Jews; for they drew them from the five books of Moſes, the authority of which they acknowledged. If ſo, the meaning of the clauſe in the original can hardly be what our verſion has affixed to it, Ye worſhip ye know not what; but its proper tranſlation ſeems to be, Ye worſhip the deity whom ye do not know; viz. "by any revelation which he has made of himſelf to you,"—the words το θειον being underſtood, "Whereas we Jews worſhip the deity, whom we know; viz. by a revelation which he has made of himſelf to us;—for ſalvation is of the Jews:—What knowledge you have of ſalvation, as well as the Author of ſalvation, cometh, by your own confeſſion, from us;—You have your religion from us." If the reader thinks that this interpretation makes too great a ſupplement neceſſary, let him look to the following paſſages, as they ſtand in the common tranſlation, Mark vii. 4, 11. Luke vi. 22. John i. 8. ix. 1. xv. 25. and particularly John xviii. 28. where the original words αλλ' ινα φαγωσι το πασχα, muſt be rendered, But ſtood without that they might eat the paſſover. Theſe examples prove, that the elliptical ſtile is familiar to St. John; and the one laſt mentioned is no leſs harſh than that which may be ſuppoſed in the paſſage under conſideration. See alſo 2 Theſſ. ii. 3. where the words, that day ſhall not come, are neceſſarily ſupplied by our tranſlators. Some indeed give our Lord's words a more eaſy ſenſe, thus: "Since God has declared that Jeruſalem is the place of offering ſacrifices acceptably, ye worſhip him without juſt conceptions of him, when you fancy he has choſen Gerizim." Yet it may be doubted whether the error of the Samaritans concerning ſo ſmall a matter as the place of worſhip, would be reckoned by our Lord as a ſufficient reaſon for ſaying of them, that they worſhipped they knew not what. See Macknight. There are others who would paraphraſe the whole paſſage thus, "As you take me for a prophet, believe me, that the occaſion of this diſpute about the place of worſhip, will ſoon be removed; ſacrifices, now offered at both places, ſhall ere long ceaſe for ever; a new religion is to be eſtabliſhed, which will require the true diſciples of it to worſhip in all places; every where offering up their hearts to God, and diſpoſed to obey him in all things. When your anceſtors came into this land, they knew not the manner of God's worſhip; and indeed knew not God himſelf: And even you, though better inſtructed, are yet in both reſpects defective in your knowledge. Knowledge is more abundant with us, the people of the Jews; and from amongſt the Jews cometh ſalvation, by reaſon of the Meſſiah's birth amongſt them, who is to introduce this new religion, and to render a temple unneceſſary, either on Gerizim, or at Jeruſalem." See Kennicot's Diſſertation, vol. ii. Heylin, and Reland de Samaritanis.

Ver. 23. But the hour cometh] The thing you are chiefly concerned to know is, that a diſpenſation of religion is now beginning, under which all languages, countries, and places being ſanctified, men are to worſhip God, not in Jeruſalem, but in ſpirit; by offering the ſacrifice not of beaſts, but of themſelves; to love and obey him in all things, which is the truth of worſhip; the thing ſignified by every ſacrifice and ſervice enjoined in the law, and what alone was acceptable to the Father, even under the legal diſpenſation. See ch. i. 14, 17. This important ſentiment, as well as that in the next verſe, is well illuſtrated by many fine quotations from ancient writers in Grotius on the place, whoſe Commentary, in reſpect of theſe collections, is an invaluable treaſury. See alſo Wetſtein, who deſerves peculiar praiſe in this reſpect.

Ver. 24. God is a Spirit, &c.] As a further anſwer to the woman's queſtion, our great Teacher delivered a doctrine which may juſtly be called his own, as it exhibits an idea of the Supreme Being, and of the worſhip due to him far more ſublime than the beſt things which the philoſophers have ſaid on that ſubject. God is a Spirit, &c. "God is the ſupreme mind or intelligence, who by one act ſees the thoughts of all other intelligences, ſo may be worſhipped in every place. And the worſhip of God muſt partake of his nature; his nature is ſpiritual, his worſhip ſhould be ſo likewiſe. Faith and love, therefore, conſtitute the true ſpiritual worſhip which we owe to the Supreme Being, and which cannot but be acceptable to him, wherever offered." See Grotius and Macknight.

Ver. 25. I know that Meſſiah cometh] This, as well as ver. 29, and 42 plainly proves, both that the Samaritans expected the Meſſiah, and that they concluded he would be a prophet. The general expectation which now prevailed, that a great prince was to ariſe in Judea, together with Moſes's prophecy concerning him, conſtrained the Samaritans to a right faith with reſpect to the Meſſiah's nation; for though they contended that the true place of acceptable worſhip was in their country, they did not aſſume the honour of being progenitors of the Deliverer of mankind. They ſeem alſo to have formed juſt ideas of the Meſſiah's character; for his kingly dignity being chiefly deſcribed in the prophetical books, which they are ſaid to have rejected, they conſidered him only as a Saviour, ver. 42. and a prophet or teacher, according to Moſes' deſcription of him, Gen. xxii. 18. Deut. xviii. 18. ſee alſo Neh. vii. 65. Hence the woman, ſpeaking of the Meſſiah, ſaid, When he is come, he will tell us all things; and therefore while our Lord induſtriouſly avoided the title of Meſſiah among the Jews, he without ſcruple diſcovered himſelf to the Samaritans, becauſe he could do it with ſucceſs and ſafety; the meanneſs of his condition being no way inconſiſtent with the prophetical character. We may juſt obſerve, that the words which is called Chriſt ſhould be in a parentheſis, as we have printed them; they being the words of the Evangeliſt, not of the woman.

Ver. 26. I, that ſpeak unto thee, am he] That Chriſt was very cautious of acknowledging himſelf to be the promiſed Meſſiah, in his converſation with the Jews, is very apparent. The reaſon for that caution has been frequently explained in this commentary, and is intimated in the foregoing note, together with his reaſons for acting otherwiſe at preſent. But ſee Mr. Locke's Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, p. 59—77.

Ver. 27. Talked with the woman] As the article is wanting, many render this with a woman, which Dr. Lightfoot, by a great variety of man: yet no man ſaid, What ſeekeſt thou? or, Why talkeſt thou with her?

28 The woman then left her water-pot, and went her way into the city, and ſaith to the men, 29 Come, ſee a man which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Chriſt?

30 Then they went out of the city, and came unto him.

31 In the mean while his diſciples prayed him, ſaying, Maſter, eat.

32 But he ſaid unto them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of.

33 Therefore ſaid the diſciples one to another, Hath any man brought him aught to eat?

34 Jeſus ſaith unto them, My meat is to do the will of him that ſent me, and to finiſh his work.

35 Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harveſt? behold, I ſay unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harveſt.

36 And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal: that both he that ſoweth, and he that reapeth, may rejoice together.

37 And herein is that ſaying true, One ſoweth, and another reapeth.

38 I ſent you to reap that whereon ye beſtowed no labour: other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours.

39 And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him, for the ſaying of the woman, which teſtified, He told me all that ever I did.

40 So when the Samaritans were come unto him, they beſought him that he would tarry with them: and he abode there two days.

41 And many more believed, becauſe of his own word; of ſtrange paſſages from rabbinical writers, has endeavoured to prove was reckoned ſcandalous for a man of diſtinction amongſt the Jews; but the diſciples ſurely knew that Jacob and Moſes, and others of their greateſt and holieſt prophets had done ſo, and ſome of them in circumſtances remarkably reſembling this. The plain ſtate of the caſe is, that the wonder of the diſciples was raiſed by their Lord's talking with a Samaritan woman.

Ver. 34. Ch. vi. 38.—V. 35. Matth. ix. 37. Luke x. 2.

Ver. 28, 29. The woman then left her water-pot, &c.] When the woman heard Jeſus call himſelf the Meſſiah, ſhe ſet down her pitcher, and ran into the city, where ſhe publiſhed the news in the ſtreets, and deſired all ſhe met to go with her, and ſee him, aſſuring them that he had told her the principal occurrences of her life; ſo ſtrong an impreſſion had that circumſtance made upon the mind. The fulneſs of her conviction, and the haſte ſhe was in to communicate the joyful news to her countrymen, place her character in an amiable light. She was ſo certain that our Lord was the Meſſiah, that ſhe ran to call others, that they might be convinced likewiſe. What a contraſt is there between this woman and the Jews! So far were they from bringing others to him, that they hindered them from coming, when deſirous to do ſo. In this reſpect we ſhould imitate the Samaritan woman, and confeſs that the Samaritans were ſuperior to the Jews, though they have repreſented them as a ſet of execrable wretches.

Ver. 31—34. In the mean while his diſciples prayed him] While theſe things were doing, the diſciples ſet the meat which they had bought before their Maſter; but he regarded it not, though he then ſtood much in need of refreſhment. It ſeems he was wholly intent on the duties of his miſſion, preferring them to his neceſſary food. Hence, when his diſciples intreated him to eat, he told them, that he had meat to eat, which they knew nothing of; meaning the ſatisfaction he was about to receive from the converſion of the Samaritans; for meat is often uſed in the Jewiſh writings to ſignify that which ſatisfies the deſires of the ſoul, as well as the wants of the body. Hence alſo our Lord ſays, ver. 34. "My meat, my true ſatisfaction, and beſt refreſhment, is to do the will of him that ſent me,—and to finiſh his work as faſt as poſſible, in the converſion of ſouls, and in the propagation of his kingdom; and I with pleaſure can aſſure you, that it is now going on ſucceſsfully." See the next note.

Ver. 35. Say ye not, There are yet four months, &c.?] Whitby, Grotius, and many others underſtand this as if our Lord had ſaid, "It is a proverbial expreſſion for the encouragement of huſbandmen, that there are but four months between ſeed-time and harveſt." The author of the tranſlation of 1729, renders it, "You commonly ſay, The other four months, and the harveſt will come." And indeed the paſſage itſelf is an Iambic verſe, and ſhould be read thus:

Ἔτι τετράμηνόν, κ᾽ὁ θερισμὸς ἔρχεται:

Which, joined to the reaſons ariſing from the text, proves that the paſſage is proverbial. It is taken from the time which commonly intervenes between ſowing and reaping, and ſignifies, that after having uſed the means of procuring a thing, the effect muſt not be expected to follow all on a ſudden, but muſt be waited for with patience. Our Lord told his diſciples, that in the preſent caſe they could not apply that proverb, becauſe if they would lift up their eyes, they would ſee the fields white already to harveſt; that is, would ſee a multitude, coming in a fit diſpoſition to believe, (ſee ver. 39, 40.) notwithſtanding the ſeed had been ſown but an hour or two before; ſo that he had what was his proper food to eat,—a convenient opportunity of doing the will of him that ſent him, and of finiſhing his work. Probably when our Saviour ſaid, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, &c. he might ſtretch forth his hand, and point to the Samaritans, who were now coming from the city to him, on the report of the woman. This appears to be the true meaning of the paſſage, which is by no means to be taken in a literal ſenſe; and one would wonder that any commentators could not only have ſo underſtood and explained it, but alſo have ſuppoſed it a foundation for ſettling the chronology of Chriſt's miniſtry. The ſingle circumſtance of there being four months from the harveſt, and yet the fields being white already to harveſt, one would have thought muſt have led to the true interpretation of the paſſage; and the context and mode of expreſſion in the ſubſequent verſes evidently point out the ſpiritual turn of our Lord's diſcourſe.

Ver. 36—38. And he that reapeth, &c.] As the diſciples laboured together with our Lord in this ſpiritual harveſt, to encourage them he put them in mind of the reward. The paſſage ſhould be read as follows: "He that reapeth, and gathereth the fruit [of ſouls] unto life eternal; he that conducts others into heaven, (alluding to the gathering of reaped corn into barns) ſuch a perſon—receiveth wages; that both he that ſoweth, and he that reapeth may rejoice together; namely, in the reward beſtowed on them, the pleaſure of which will be increaſed by their joint participation of it." Our Lord then proceeds to apply another proverb, ver. 37. The words, whereon ye beſtowed no labour, ver. 38. mean, "no labour of ſowing;" Other men laboured, namely, in ſowing the ſeeds of piety and virtue among the Jews, and thereby expoſed themſelves to great perſecutions, (he meant the prophets of old;—) "and ye are entered into their labours,—into the field on which their labour hath been carefully employed;"—εις τον κοπον αυτων.—Comp. 2. Cor. x. 15. "Ye are employed to reap that, which they with great difficulty ſowed; for ye are gathering into the kingdom of heaven thoſe, who by the writings of the prophets having been imbued with a ſenſe of piety and virtue, are prepared for entering into it." This application of the proverb, one ſoweth, and another reapeth, doth not imply any diſcontent in the perſons who ſow without reaping, as it ſeems to do in common uſe; for the ſower and the reaper are repreſented as rejoicing together in the rewards of this ſpiritual huſbandry. See Macknight and Grotius.

Ver. 39, 40. And many of the Samaritans—believed] Many of the Samaritans had been ſo ſtruck with the account which the woman gave of Jeſus, that they believed him to be the Meſſiah on her teſtimony. Accordingly, being come to him, they begged him to take up his reſidence in their city. Jeſus, in compaſſion to their wants and deſires, complied ſo far as to ſtay with them two days; which was a proper medium between his intirely neglecting them, and the giving them ſo much of his time and company, as would have broken in upon the deſign of his journey into Galilee,—or might have given umbrage to the Jews. During the time of his ſtay, the diſcourſes which our Lord delivered were attended with great power, as appeared by their ſucceſs: for they brought many of the Sycharites to believe on him as the Meſſiah. See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 41, 42. And many more believed] This was the more extraordinary, as they not only had a natural prejudice againſt him as a Jew, but living near mount Gerizim, had a particular intereſt in maintaining the uſual worſhip there, which muſt have been very advantageous to the neighbourhood: Perhaps on this they would no longer worſhip there, which might irritate the reſt of the Samaritans, and 42 And ſaid unto the woman, Now we believe, not becauſe of thy ſaying: for we have heard him ourſelves, and know that this is indeed the Chriſt, the Saviour of the world.

43 Now after two days he departed thence, and went into Galilee.

44 For Jeſus himſelf teſtified, that a prophet hath no honour in his own country.

45 Then when he was come into Galilee, the Galileans received him, having ſeen all the things that he did at Jeruſalem at the feaſt; for they alſo went unto the feaſt.

46 So Jeſus came again into Cana of Galilee, where he made the water wine. And there was a certain nobleman, whoſe ſon was ſick at Capernaum.

47 When he heard that Jeſus was come out of Judea into Galilee, he went unto him, and beſought him that he would come down, and heal his ſon: for he was at the point of death.

48 Then ſaid Jeſus unto him, Except ye ſee ſigns and wonders, ye will not believe.

49 The nobleman ſaith unto him, Sir, come down ere my child die.

50 Jeſus ſaith unto him, Go thy way; thy ſon liveth. And the man believed the word that Jeſus had ſpoken unto him, and he went his way.

51 And as he was now going down, his ſervants met him, and told him, ſaying, Thy ſon liveth.

52 Then enquired he of them the hour when he began to amend: and they ſaid unto him, Yeſterday, at the ſeventh hour, the fever left him.

53 So the father knew that it was at the ſame hour in the which Jeſus ſaid unto him, Thy ſon liveth; and himſelf believed, and his whole houſe.

54 This is again the ſecond miracle that Jeſus did, when he was come out of Judea into Galilee.

Ver. 42. Ch. xvii. 8.—V. 44. Matth. xiii. 57. Mark vi. 4. Luke iv. 24.—V. 46. Ch. ii. 1, 11. Or, courtier, or ruler.—V. 48. 1 Cor. i. 22.

might in part excite the ill uſage which Chriſt afterwards met with in this country. Luke ix. 52, 53. It is obſervable that the Samaritan woman expreſſed her expectation of the Meſſiah; that Jeſus made a clear declaration to her of his being ſo; that ſhe believed him to be ſo; that ſhe went haſtily into Sychar, full of the intereſting diſcovery; that at the importunate requeſt of the inhabitants, Chriſt continued in the town at the foot of Gerizim for two days; and that many of the Samaritans were ſuch candid judges, ſo ingenuouſly diſpoſed to embrace the truth, that without the cogency of miracles, they confeſſed, We have heard him ourſelves, and know that this is indeed the Chriſt, the Saviour of the world; a confeſſion of faith higher by ſome degrees, as Dr. Lightfoot remarks, than the Jews common Creed concerning the Meſſiah; for they held him only for a Saviour of the Jewiſh nation: whence we may ſee how deeply and cordially theſe Samaritans had drunk in the water of life, ſo as to acknowledge Chriſt in his proper character. Probably the Samaritans might have collected from Gen. xlix. 10. that Chriſt was to be the Saviour of the world; that the Gentiles were to receive ſome benefit from the Meſſiah's coming, and one way or other to be ſubjected to him; and our Lord's diſcourſe might confirm that apprehenſion: But there is no reaſon at all to believe, that they perfectly underſtood the doctrine of the calling of the idolatrous Gentiles, which was ſo long a myſtery even to the Apoſtles themſelves. See Lightfoot, Doddridge, and Kennicott's Diſſertation, vol. 2.

Ver. 44. For Jeſus himſelf teſtified, &c.] Dr. Heylin and others read, although Jeſus, &c. But there is no need for this alteration; for it is plain that this is ſpoken as the reaſon why he rather choſe to travel into thoſe parts of Galilee, than to go directly to Nazareth, which is particularly called his own country, in diſtinction from Galilee, and even from Capernaum. Luke iv. 23. The time when Jeſus made the teſtimony in this verſe is not limited; for the tenſe of the verb ἐμαρτύρησεν, teſtified, is uſed in a vague ſenſe, and applied to things paſt, preſent, and future; the teſtimony therefore might have been given ſome time after, without the leaſt impeachment of the hiſtorian's order. See Matth. xiii. 57. and Chemnitz.

Ver. 45. Then—the Galileans received him] That is, treated him courteouſly, and attended his miniſtry with a diſpoſition to believe. See ch. ii. 23. iii. 2. and Luke iv. 14, 15.

Ver. 46. There was a certain nobleman] Though Herod was only Tetrarch of Galilee, yet he was commonly diſtinguiſhed by the title of king; and as Capernaum lay in his dominions, this perſon was probably a nobleman of ſome diſtinction belonging to his court; for this is the proper ſignification of the original βασιλικὸς, which the Syriac and Arabic verſions render, a miniſter or ſervant of the king; and many have conjectured, that the perſon who is here ſpoken of was Chuza, Herod's ſteward, whoſe wife is thought to have been converted on this occaſion, and to have become from henceforth an attendant upon Chriſt. See Luke viii. 3. and Calmet.

Ver. 47. He—beſought him that he would come down] Though this nobleman's faith in our Lord's miraculous power was certainly very great, for he came at leaſt a day's journey croſs the country to him,—which may be fairly inferred from ver. 52. as well as from the accounts the beſt geographers give us of the ſituation of Cana and Capernaum;—yet it is plain, that it was not equal to that of many others mentioned in the Goſpol; for he appears to have thought it neceſſary that Jeſus ſhould be perſonally preſent, if he were inclined to grant his petition, and perform the cure.

Ver. 48. Except ye ſee ſigns, &c.] Jeſus ſaid to him, and to them that were about him, "I perceive, that though the Samaritans ſhewed ſo great a regard to my word, as to believe without the cogency of miracles, (ſee on ver. 41.) yet unleſs you ſee with your own eyes ſome remarkable and repeated miracles, you will not believe;"—thereby juſtly reproving him and them for that mixture of ſuſpicion and ſlowneſs of faith which he diſcerned in their minds. See the preceding note. It ſeems neceſſary to ſuppoſe ſome ſuch reference, to illuſtrate the juſtice of this reproof; for in the general it was very reaſonable to expect that Chriſt ſhould work miracles, in proof of his divine miſſion, as he himſelf plainly intimates elſewhere. See ch. xv. 24. Poſſibly the perſon now applying to him might have made a declaration, that he would never believe ſuch things till he ſaw them with his own eyes. Chriſt might mean, by this reflection, to humble him, to ſhew him a ſpecimen of his extraordinary knowledge as well as power, and thus to give increaſe and ſtrength to his faith. See Doddridge and Chemnitz.

Ver. 49, 50. The nobleman ſaith unto him, &c.] Weak as his faith was, the nobleman urged only parental affection, determined to preſs the matter to the utmoſt; and therefore, without any explication or apology reſpecting our Lord's reproof, he intreats him to come down ere his child die; urging that the caſe was ſo extreme, that a delay might be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences; but not having an idea that Chriſt, as the Lord of life as well as of health, could as eaſily remedy thoſe conſequences as heal his ſon. Jeſus, upon this,—fully to convince the nobleman of his omnipotence, and to ſhew that it was not neceſſary for him, who could ſpeak, and it was done, to go in perſon to accompliſh the cure,—ſays to him, "Go thy way home; thy ſon liveth; at the inſtant I am ſpeaking to thee, he is recovered from his illneſs." There is ſomething remarkable and ſublimely ſtriking in our Lord's words: No doubt they had their influence upon this man's heart; for we read, that he believed the word which Jeſus ſpoke, and went away without any further importunity, though he had never ſeen or heard of a parallel caſe. It is indeed plain he had heard of Chriſt's miracles; but this is the firſt recorded in which he cured the patient at a diſtance, and probably was hitherto, in this reſpect, unequalled.

Ver. 52. Yeſterday, at the ſeventh hour, &c.] That is, it left him all of a ſudden; ſo that being reſtored to perfect health in an inſtant, the whole family knew that he was miraculouſly cured; and particularly the nobleman himſelf, who, by the time of the cure, perceived that it happened the very moment that Jeſus had pronounced it.

Ver. 54. The ſecond miracle] A ſecond. Waterland. Others render it, This ſecond miracle Jeſus performed when he came out of Judea; for it is manifeſt the words muſt be taken with this limitation, as Chriſt had wrought many miracles in other places.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CURE OF THE RULER'S SON, Ver. 46—54.

The bounty of God ſo exceedeth man's, that there is a contrariety in the exerciſe of it: We ſhut our hands, becauſe we opened them; God therefore opens his, becauſe he hath opened them; the divine mercies are as comfortable in their iſſue, as in themſelves; ſeldom or ever do bleſſings go alone: Where our Saviour ſupplied the bridegroom's wine, there he heals the ruler's ſon: He had not in all

CHAP. V.

Jeſus on the ſabbath-day cureth him that was diſeaſed eight and thirty years: the Jews therefore cavil, and perſecute him for it: he anſwereth for himſelf, and reproveth them; ſhewing by the teſtimony of his Father, of John, of his works, and of the ſcriptures, who he is:

AFTER this, there was a feaſt of the Jews; and Jeſus went up to Jeruſalem.

all theſe coaſts of Galilee done any miracle but there: To him that hath ſhall be given.

We do not find Chriſt often attended with nobility, here he is; It was ſome great peer, or ſome noted courtier, that was now a ſuitor to him for his dying ſon: Earthly greatneſs is no defence againſt afflictions: We men pay homage to the mighty; diſeaſe and death know no faces of lords or monarchs: Could theſe be bribed, they would be too rich: Why ſhould we grudge not to be privileged, when we ſee there is no ſpare of the greateſt?

This noble ruler liſtens after Chriſt's return into Galilee. The moſt eminent among men will be glad to hearken after Chriſt in their neceſſity: Happy was it for him that his ſon was ſick; he had not been elſe acquainted with his Saviour: His ſoul had continued ſick of ignorance and unbelief. Why elſe doth our good God ſend us pain, loſſes, oppoſition, but that he may be ſought to? Are we afflicted,—whither ſhould we go, but to Cana, to ſeek Chriſt? Whither but to the Cana of heaven, where our water of ſorrows ſhall be changed into the wine of gladneſs; to that omnipotent Phyſician, who healeth all our infirmities; that we may at once ſay, It is good for me that I was afflicted.

It was about a day's journey from Capernaum to Cana; thence hither did this courtier come for the cure of his ſon's fever. What pains even the greateſt can be content to take for bodily health!—No way is long, no labour is tedious to the deſirous. Our ſouls are ſick of a ſpiritual fever, labouring under the cold fit of infidelity, and the hot fit of ſelf-love; and we ſit ſtill at home, and ſee them languiſh unto death.

This ruler was neither faithleſs nor faithful; had he been quite faithleſs, he had not taken ſuch pains to come to Chriſt. Had he been faithful, he had not made this ſuit to Chriſt, when he was come, ver. 47, 49. Come down, and heal my ſon, ere he die.

"Come down;" as if Chriſt could not have cured him abſent;—"ere he die;"—as if that power could not have raiſed him being dead: How much difference was here betwixt the centurion (Matth. viii. Luke vii.) and the ruler? That came for his ſervant, this for his ſon. This ſon was not more above the ſervant, than the faith which ſued for the ſervant, ſurpaſſed that which ſued for the ſon: The one can ſay, Maſter, come not under my roof, for I am not worthy; only ſpeak the word, and my ſervant ſhall be whole. The other can only ſay, "Maſter, either come under my roof, or my ſon cannot be whole." Heal my ſon, had been a good ſuit; for Chriſt is the only Phyſician for all diſeaſes; but, come down, and heal him, was to teach God how to work.

It is good reaſon that he ſhould challenge the right of preſcribing to us, who are every way his own: It is preſumption to limit him to our forms. What expert workman can endure to be taught by a novice? How much leſs ſhall the all-wiſe God endure to be directed by his creatures. This is more egregious, than if the patient ſhould take upon him to give a recipe to his phyſician: That God would give us grace, is a becoming ſuit; but to ſay, "Give it me by proſperity," is a ſaucy motive.

As there is faithfulneſs in deſiring the end, ſo is there a modeſty and patience in referring the means to the author. In ſpiritual things God hath acquainted us with the means whereby he will work, even his own ſacred ordinances: Upon theſe, becauſe they have his own promiſe, we may call abſolutely for a bleſſing. In all others, there is no reaſon that beggars ſhould be chooſers. He who doth whatſoever he will, muſt do it how he will: It is for us to receive, not to appoint.

He who came to complain of his ſon's ſickneſs, hears of his own; Except ye ſee ſigns and wonders, (ver. 48.) ye will not believe. This nobleman, probably, was of Capernaum; there had Chriſt often preached; there was one of his chief reſidences; either this man had heard our Saviour often, or might have ſo done; yet, becauſe Chriſt's miracles came to him only by hearſay, (for as yet we find none at all wrought where he preached moſt) therefore the man believes not enough; but ſo ſpeaks to Chriſt, as to ſome ordinary phyſician, Come down, and heal.

Incredulity was the common diſeaſe of the Jews; which no receipt could heal, but wonders. A wicked and adulterous generation ſeeketh ſigns. Had they not been wilfully graceleſs, there was already proof enough of the Meſſiah: The miraculous conception and life of the forerunner, Zachary's dumbneſs, the atteſtation of angels, the appearance of the ſtar, the journey of the ſages, the viſion of the ſhepherds, the teſtimonies of Anna and Simeon, the prophecies fulfilled, the voice from heaven at his baptiſm, the divine words which he ſpake:—And yet, they muſt have all made up with miracles; which though he be not unwilling to give at his own time, yet thinks he much to be tied to, at theirs. Not to believe without ſigns, was a ſign of ſtubborn hearts.

It was a fond fault, and a dangerous one; Ye will not believe. What is it that ſhall condemn the world, but unbelief? What can condemn us without it? No ſin can condemn the repentant; repentance is a fruit of faith; where true faith is then, there can be no condemnation; as there can be nothing but condemnation without it. How much more foul in a noble Capernaite, who had heard the ſermons of ſo divine a teacher? The greater light we have, the more ſhame for us to ſtumble.

Oh what ſhall become of us, who reel and fall in the cleareſt ſunſhine that ever looked forth from heaven upon any church! Be thou merciful unto our ſins, O God, and ſay any thing of us, rather than, Ye will not believe.

Our Lord tells this nobleman of his unbelief: He feels not himſelf ſick of that diſeaſe: All his mind is on his dying ſon: As eaſily do we complain of bodily griefs, as we are hardly affected with ſpiritual.—Yet, O the meekneſs and mercy of this Lamb of God! When we might have looked that he ſhould have puniſhed this ſuitor for not believing, he condeſcends to him, that he may believe, ver. 50. Go thy way, thy ſon liveth. If we ſhould meaſure our hopes by our own worthineſs, there could be no expectation of bleſſings; but if we ſhall meaſure them by His bounty and compaſſion, there can be no doubt of prevailing. As ſome tender mother, who gives the breaſt to her unquiet child, inſtead of the rod, ſo deals the Saviour of ſinners with their perverſeneſſes.

How evidently doth God diſtinguiſh men according to no other conditions than of their faith! The centurion's ſervant was ſick, ſo was the ruler's ſon; the centurion doth not ſue to Chriſt to come; he only ſays, My ſervant is ſick of the palſy: Chriſt anſwers him, I will come and heal him. The ruler ſues to Chriſt, that he would come and heal his ſon; Chriſt will not go; he only ſays, Go thy way, thy ſon liveth: Outward things carry no reſpect with God; the image of that divine Majeſty ſhining inwardly in the graces of the ſoul, is that which wins love from him, in the meaneſt eſtate: The centurion's faith, therefore, could do more than the ruler's greatneſs; and that faithful man's ſervant hath more regard, than this great man's ſon.

The ruler's requeſt was, Come and heal, Chriſt's anſwer was, Go thy way, thy ſon liveth; our Saviour meets thoſe in the end, whom he croſſes in the way. How ſweetly doth he correct our prayers; and while he doth not give us what we aſk, he gives us better than we could hope to obtain.

Juſtly doth he forbear to go down with this ruler, leſt he ſhould confirm him in an opinion of meaſuring his power by conceits of locality and diſtance; but he doth that in abſence, for which his preſence was required with a repulſe: Thy ſon liveth; giving a greater demonſtration of his omnipotency than was craved: How often doth he refrain to hearken to our will, that he may hear us to our advantage! The choſen veſſel would be rid of temptations,—he hears of a ſupply of grace; the ſick man aſks releaſe, he receives patience; he ſupplicates for life, he receives glory: Let us aſk what we think beſt, let Him give what he knows beſt.

With one word doth Chriſt heal two patients; the ſon and the father; the ſon's fever, the father's unbelief: That operative word of our Saviour was not without the intention of a trial. Had not the ruler gone home ſatisfied with that intimation of his ſon's life and recovery, neither of them had been bleſſed with ſucceſs; now the news of performance meets him one half of the way; and he that believed ſomewhat ere he came, and more when he went, grew to more faith in the way; and when he came home, enlarged his faith to all the ſkirts of his family. A weak faith may be true, but a true faith is growing: He that boaſts of a full ſtature in the firſt moment of his aſcent, may preſume, but he doth not believe.

Great men cannot want clients; their example ſways ſome, their authority more: They cannot go to either of the other worlds alone: In vain do they pretend to power over others, who labour not to draw their families to God.

Chap. V. Ver. 1. There was a feaſt of the Jews] This, in all probability, was the feaſt of the paſſover, called the feaſt by way of eminence; and therefore it might be rendered, was The feaſt of the Jews. See Matth. xxvii. 15. Mark xv. 6. A further proof that this was the feaſt of the paſſover ariſes from hence, that immediately after it, we find the diſciples on the ſabbath in the fields, rubbing the ears, probably of barley, a kind of grain which was always fit for reaping at the paſſover. See Matth. xii. 1—8. and the Harmonies. Mr. Manne is of opinion, that the 5th and 6th chapters, beginning with the ſame words, have been probably tranſpoſed; and that the 6th ſhould come before the 5th. The end of the 4th chapter having left Jeſus in Galilee, the 6th deſcribes him going from thence again: Ch. v. 16—18. the Jews ſeek to kill him, while he is at Jeruſalem, and ch. vii. opens with his being returned to Galilee on that account.

Ver. 2. Now there is at Jeruſalem, &c.] Some are of opinion from this paſſage, that Jeruſalem was ſtanding when St. John wrote his Goſpel; but others, on the ſtrength of a different reading, controvert that opinion, rendering the verſe, Now there was, or There ſtood at Jeruſalem. But ſee the Argument. "At Jeruſalem, ſays Bp. Pearce, market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue, Beth-eſda, having five porches.

3 In theſe lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water.

4 For an angel went down at a certain ſeaſon into the pool, and troubled the water: whoſoever then firſt after the troubling of the water ſtepped in, was made whole of whatſoever diſeaſe he had.

5 And a certain man was there, which had had an infirmity thirty and eight years.

6 When Jeſus ſaw him lie, and knew that he had been now a long time in that caſe, he ſaith unto him, Wilt thou be made whole?

7 The impotent man anſwered him, Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another ſteppeth down before me.

Ver. 2. Or, gate.

Pearce, near the place called the ſheep-market, or ſheep-gate rather, which was built by Eliaſhib the high-prieſt, (Neh. iii. 1.) there was a bath, built for the uſe of ſuch of the common people as loved to ſwim and bathe themſelves in the water. This is the proper ſenſe of the original, κολυμβήθρα, from κολυμβαω, to ſwim, (Acts xxvii. 43.) rendered in the old Latin verſion, called the Italick, Natatoria, a a bath, or ſwimming-place; nothing was more common, or more uſeful than ſuch baths, in theſe warm climates, where the exceſſive heat was not only troubleſome, but noxious to health. Joſephus mentions ſome by this very name κολυμβήθρα, at Jericho, as uſed for the exerciſe and pleaſure of ſwimming; and it may reaſonably be preſumed, that this at Jeruſalem was built for the ſame purpoſe." That the ſheep to be ſacrificed were waſhed, or that all the blood of the ſacrifices ran into it, whence it gained a kind of medicinal virtue, is an hypotheſis not only void of all proof, but ſufficiently exploded by the learned Biſhop juſt mentioned, in his uſeful "Vindication of our Saviour's miracles," p. 8. This bath was called Beth-eſda, that is, the houſe, or place of mercy, not only for its ſingular uſefulneſs, but alſo for the extraordinary circumſtance attending it, recorded by the Evangeliſt. Around the bath, which ſeems to have been of a pentagonal form, were built five porches, a kind of cloiſters or porticos, Στοὰι, which ſerved to ſhelter both from the heat and cold thoſe who frequented the place; but which were more particularly ſerviceable to the infirm people, who crouded hither on account of the miraculous virtue of the waters. See the next verſe, and my 12th Sermon on the Miracles, p. 70.

Ver. 4. For an angel went down, &c.] Some imagine that this was a proper officer or meſſenger, as the word αγγελος primarily ſignifies; yet as it is moſt commonly uſed by the inſpired writers to ſignify a celeſtial being, employed by God, either for the ſervice or puniſhment of men, and as the circumſtances of this narrative import that the virtue communicated by the agitation of the waters, was not a natural quality inherent in them; our tranſlators ſeem very juſtly to have retained the word in a ſenſe which implies a miraculous operation. Κατα καιρὸν, rendered, at a certain ſeaſon, is underſtood by ſome to expreſs at that ſeaſon, the ſeaſon of the feaſt mentioned ver. 1. confining the miracle of the pool to this particuler feaſt. See Numb. ix. 6, 7. LXX: For, ſince the Evangeliſt does not ſay that the waters of Betheſda had their ſanative quality at any other feaſt, we are at liberty to make what ſuppoſition ſeems moſt convenient. The ſilence of Philo and Joſephus upon this miracle has inclined ſome to this opinion; but I cannot help thinking, that the mode of expreſſion, and the waiting of the multitude evidently imply that this event was frequent; as, if it had happened once only, it is not eaſy to account for this attendance and expectation of the multitude. And as to the ſilence of the writers above-mentioned, that can have no great weight, it being well known that they have omitted more important tranſactions, which they had as good an opportunity to know; I mean, that multitude and variety of miracles which our Lord performed in the courſe of his miniſtry. That the waters of Betheſda ſhould at this period have a miraculous effect, was without doubt in honour of the perſonal appearance of the Son of God on earth. Perhaps it was intended to ſhew, that Ezekiel's viſion of waters iſſuing out of the ſanctuary, (ch. xlvii.) was about to be fulfilled; of which waters it is ſaid, ver. 9. they ſhall be healed, and every thing ſhall live whither the river cometh. Grotius thinks, that the angel is ſaid to have deſcended, not becauſe he was ſeen to do ſo, but becauſe the Jews were perſuaded that God brought ſuch things to paſs by the miniſtration of angels; ſo that from the violent motion or agitation of the waters, and the cure following it, the preſence of an angel was with reaſon ſuppoſed. It is abundantly evident that this was no natural virtue, nor a virtue acquired from natural cauſes in theſe waters, from the following reaſons: 1. All manner of diſeaſes were healed by them. 2. Theſe cures were performed only at a certain ſeaſon. 3. One perſon only was healed. And that, 4. only after the troubling of the water; whereas, in general, medicinal waters are required to be calm, and not troubled, for the uſe of patients. I mention theſe particulars, to obviate the ſtrange hypotheſis of the very learned Dr. Hammond, hinted at in the preceding note. He thinks that this water had contracted a natural healing virtue by waſhing the carcaſſes and entrails of the ſacrifices in this pool, and that on ſtirring it up, that virtue exerted itſelf the more; ſo that a proper officer or meſſenger was appointed for the purpoſe; an opinion, which requires not many arguments to confute it. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that though this 4th verſe is not in Beza's MS. nor in one or two more of authority, (on which account ſome would reject it) yet it certainly was in ſome copy before Tertullian's time, and is now read in a great number of MSS. in the Syriac verſion, and all the reſt in the Polyglot Bible. And though it ſhould be rejected, the difficulty for which ſome would have it concealed ſtill remains, becauſe the 3d and the 7th verſes imply, that cures were performed in this pool; that one only at a time was cured; and conſequently that theſe cures were miraculous: If ſo, it is as eaſy to conceive that an angel, by the divine commiſſion, moved the water, and gave it its healing quality, as to fancy thoſe cures were performed miraculouſly any other way. And indeed, to remove this verſe would make ſuch a breach in the ſtory, as to render it very imperfect and unintelligible.

Such is the account which St. John gives us of this miraculous pool of Betheſda; with which if we will be content, reſting ſatisfied with his authority, we ſhall have no need to trouble ourſelves with the various inquiries men have made concerning it. Numberleſs queſtions have ariſen reſpecting the place, the time, and the nature of this pool; and as we have no mention of it particularly, either in the writings of the prophets, of apocryphal or Jewiſh authors, therefore theſe queſtions remain as doubtful as ever. As to the time when this miraculous effect firſt took place, nothing preciſely certain can be determined; but it ſeems almoſt univerſally agreed, that it could not be long before the coming of Chriſt, and that the miracle was intended to lead men to him: for the gift of prophecy and of miracles had now been withdrawn from the Jews for above four hundred years; therefore, to raiſe in them a more ardent deſire for the coming of the Meſſiah, and to an obſervation of the ſigns of his now almoſt univerſally-expected coming, God was pleaſed to favour them with this remarkable ſign of Betheſda; and becauſe in theſe laſt times the Jewiſh people lay open not only to the irruptions and tyranny of the Gentiles, but had wholly loſt their liberty; that they might not yet intirely deſpair of the fulfilling of the promiſes made to their fathers, nor intirely caſt off their allegiance to God, he favoured them with this eminent token of his regard, this wonderful pool, in a place near to the gate of victims, which were figures of the propitiatory ſacrifice of the Meſſiah. As this miracle then began, when the coming of the Meſſiah drew near, to adviſe them of the ſpeedy and near approach of that promiſed ſalvation, (wherefore alſo this gift of healing was without the temple,) ſo there can be no doubt that Chriſt entered theſe porches, and performed the following miracle, to ſhew what was the true inrent of this gift of healing, and to what it was deſigned by God to lead men; even to himſelf, the fountain opened for ſin, and for all uncleanneſs. The water was thus troubled only at this certain ſeaſon of the paſſover, or at whatever other ſtated period, and one only at each time was healed, to ſhew them at once the weakneſs of the law, and the great difference between that and the Goſpel diſpenſation; and to teach them, not to reſt in the corporal benefit only, as in the miniſtration of an angel, but to betake themſelves to a careful conſideration of the promiſes of HIS approaching advent, who, not at diſtant or ſtated periods of time, but every day, performed not a ſingle cure only, but healed whole multitudes reſorting to him.

Ver. 5. And a certain man was there] Among the crowds which lay in the porticos of Betheſda, there was one, who had an infirmity,—ἀσθενεία,—moſt probably a paralytic diſorder, which hardly ever gives way to medicine, though recently contracted: How much leſs curable muſt it have been, after having continued 38 years! The inveteracy of this man's diſorder muſt have been known to many, in the courſe of ſo long time; and the reality of his indiſpoſition, which was even prior to the birth of Chriſt, muſt have been equally notorious, and ſhewn the impoſſibility of any colluſion between them. The length and greatneſs of the man's affliction, well known to Jeſus, (as appears from ver. 6.) together with his poverty, (ver. 7.) were ſufficient reaſons for our Lord's making choice of him, to experience the mercy of his healing power; a power, infinitely ſuperior to the virtue of the waters. Had our Lord at this time reſtored none of theſe impotent folk to health, he would not have acted contrary to the general account which the Evangeliſts give of his goodneſs on other occaſions, namely, that he healed all who came to him; for ſuch diſeaſed perſons as left their habitations with a perſuaſion of his power and dignity, were fit objects of his mercy; while the ſick at Betheſda were no more ſo than the other ſick throughout the country, whom he could have cured barely by willing it, had he ſo pleaſed. They had no knowledge of him, or if they knew aught about him, they had no juſt idea of his power, and were expecting relief from another quarter. See Bp. Smallbrooke's Vindication, vol. p. 541. and Harle and Ader on the Scripture Diſeaſes.

Ver. 6. Wilt thou be made whole?] Our Lord propoſed this queſtion, that the man might have an opportunity of declaring his caſe in the hearing of the multitude; (ſee ver. 13.) becauſe ſuch a declaration tended to make the miracle more conſpicuous. It ſeems he deſigned to arouſe the attention of the inhabitants of the Capital; reſolving to lay the evidences of his miſſion before them in the diſcourſe which this miracle was to occaſion. See Macknight.

Ver. 7. Sir, I have no man, &c.] He complains for want of friends

8 Jeſus ſaith unto him, Riſe, take up thy bed, and walk.

9 And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: and on the ſame day was the ſabbath.

10 The Jews therefore ſaid unto him that was cured, It is the ſabbath-day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed.

11 He anſwered them, He that made me whole, the ſame ſaid unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk.

12 Then aſked they him, What man is that which ſaid unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk?

13 And he that was healed wiſt not who it was: for Jeſus had conveyed himſelf away, a multitude being in that place.

14 Afterward Jeſus findeth him in the temple, and ſaid unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: ſin no more, leſt a worſe thing come unto thee.

15 The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jeſus which had made him whole.

16 And therefore did the Jews perſecute Jeſus, and ſought to ſlay him, becauſe he had done theſe things on the ſabbath-day.

17 But Jeſus anſwered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.

18 Therefore the Jews ſought the more to kill him, becauſe he not only had broken the ſabbath, but ſaid alſo, that God was his Father, making himſelf equal with God.

19 Then anſwered Jeſus, and ſaid unto them, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, The Son can do nothing of himſelf, but what he ſeeth the Father do: for what things ſoever he doeth, theſe alſo doeth the Son likewiſe.

to help him in: "I have no man, no friend to do me that kindneſs." One would think ſome of thoſe who had been themſelves healed ſhould have lent him an hand: But it is common for the poor to be deſtitute of friends; no man careth for their ſoul. To the ſick and impotent, it is as true a piece of charity to work for them, as to relieve them; and thus the poor are capable of being charitable one to another. We may obſerve how mildly this man ſpeaks of the unkindneſs of thoſe about him;—a leſſon to all in misfortunes. See Henry.

Ver. 8, 9. Ariſe, take up thy bed, and walk] Though it was the ſabbath-day, and the doctors affirmed that the bearing of any burden was a profanation of the holy reſt, Jeſus ordered the man to carry his bed away, becauſe it was fit that the miracle ſhould be rendered indubitable by the ſuddenneſs and perfection of the cure, ſhewed in the vigorous exertion of the man's ſtrength. Beſides, when the people, who on the ſabbath ceaſed from working, met the man in their way, and reproved him for carrying his bed, he could not avoid telling them what had happened. It was therefore a very proper method of making ſo ſignal a miracle univerſally known. The Evangeliſt ſays, immediately the man was made whole; ſo that the cure being effectuated in an inſtant, while he was not expecting any ſuch favour, nor knew to whom he owed it, ver. 13. no body can pretend that the power of imagination contributed thereto in the leaſt degree. By the ſabbath here muſt be meant either the firſt holy convocation in the feaſt of unleavened bread, that is, the morrow after the paſſover ſolemnity, which was one of the greateſt ſabbaths, ch. xix. 31. or the ordinary ſabbath, happening in the paſſover-week, and conſequently the day on which the diſciples plucked the ears of corn. We may juſt obſerve, that our Saviour did not ſay to the impotent man, "Riſe, and ſtep into the pool," but riſe, and walk; to ſhew that he was himſelf all-ſufficient to do that for us, which the law could not do, and which he fulfilled, and ſo abrogated; thus manifeſtly declaring the full completion of this miraculous pool of Betheſda in himſelf.

Ver. 10. The Jews therefore ſaid unto him that was cured, &c.] It is remarkable, that the Jews who met the man did not converſe with him upon his cure,—though in all probability many of them knew he had been long infirm;—but upon the unlawfulneſs of carrying his bed. Such is the force of bigotry and ſuperſtition! See Jer. xvii. 21, 22.

Ver. 11. He that made me whole, &c.] "He that with a word reſtored my ſtrength in an inſtant, the ſame ſaid unto me, Take up thy bed and walk; and his injunctions certainly could not be ſinful, as being both a prophet, and a worker of miracles." Inſtead of the ſame ſaid unto me, it would be more emphatical if it was rendered agreeable to the original, even he, ſaid.

Ver. 12. What man is that who ſaid, &c.] The malignity of the Jews appears moſt flagrantly in this queſtion. They take no notice of the miracle, which demanded their moſt ſerious examination; they do not aſk him who it was that healed him; but they aſk him, with a malicious ſneer, who bad him take up his bed? Had they inquired into the miracle, it might have apppeared an action which deſerved applauſe; but this was contrary to their intention. The taking up his bed and carrying it, was a manifeſt violation of the ſabbath; this therefore they fix upon, and make the ſubject of their inquiry. See Grotius and Macknight.

Ver. 13. Had conveyed himſelf away] Caſaubon obſerves, that the word ἐξένευσεν, by which the Evangeliſt expreſſes Chriſt's eſcape, being a metaphor borrowed from ſwimming, ſignifies, that he glided through the multitude, leaving no trace behind him of the way he had taken. See his note.

Ver. 14. Jeſus findeth him in the temple] Jeſus found the man in the temple, whither probably he repaired, to return thanks to God for his ſignal recovery; when, to render the mercy he had beſtowed upon him complete, our Lord took that opportunity to put him in mind of his having brought the diſtemper upon himſelf by his wicked courſes; for he exhorted him to abſtain from ſinning for the future, leſt ſome heavier judgement ſhould be inflicted on him. See Calmet.

Ver, 15, 16. The man departed, &c.] Overjoyed to have diſcovered the author of his cure, the man went away, and innocently informed the Jews of it; perhaps becauſe he thought it his duty to give his benefactor the honour of the miracle, and believed the Jews would have been glad to ſee ſo great a prophet: But inſtead of that, they attacked Jeſus tumultuouſly in the temple, and it may be, tried him before the ſanhedrim, with a view to kill him, becauſe, as they imagined, he had profaned the ſabbath, by performing a cure upon it, and by ordering the perſon cured to carry away his bed. It ſeems plain from ver. 33. that by the Jews, ver. 16. we are to underſtand the rulers; for the meſſengers who were ſent to John, we are told, ch. i. 19. were prieſts and Levites, perſons of character, who would not have undertaken the office, unleſs by the appointment of the rulers, called on that occaſion as well as here the Jews. Moreover, the apology which Jeſus now made for himſelf, is ſuch as was proper to be pronounced before the moſt capable judges, the chief prieſts, the ſcribes, and the elders; for it is the moſt regular defence of his character and miſſion, that is any where to be found in the Goſpels, comprehending the principal arguments in behalf of both, and ſetting them forth with the greateſt ſtrength of reaſon, clearneſs of method, and conciſeneſs of expreſſion. See Macknight, and Fleming's Chriſtology, vol. ii. p. 296.

Ver. 17. My Father worketh hitherto] Jeſus began his defence with ſhewing the rulers the unreaſonableneſs of their diſpleaſure with him, becauſe he had reſtored the infirm man to health on the ſabbath-day. He told them, that in performing cures on the ſabbath-day, he only imitated his Father, who wrought every day of the week in doing good to men by his unwearied Providence; for on the ſabbath, as on other days, through the inviſible operation of his power, God Almighty ſupports the whole frame of nature, and carries on the motion of the heavens, upon which the viciſſitudes of day and night, and of the ſeaſons depend; ſo neceſſary to the production of food, and the other means of life. As the Jews built their obſervation of the ſabbath upon God's having reſted thereon from the works of creation, this argument was deciſive. Some render it, My Father worketh even till now. See Grotius, Doddridge, and Clarke's Serm. 3. vol. x.

Ver. 18. God was his father] Our Lord's apology offended the Jews exceedingly, as he claimed a peculiar and proper relation to God, and by aſſerting that he acted like God, ſet himſelf on a level with God. The original πατέρα ἴδιον, is emphatical, and ſhould be rendered his own father;—his father in a peculiar manner, as Heylin reads it. The whole nation of the Jews thought God their father. chap. viii. 41. They could not therefore have accounted it blaſphemy in Chriſt to uſe the ſame phraſe, had they not interpreted it in ſo high and appropriating a ſenſe.

Ver. 19. Then anſwered Jeſus] Jeſus did not deny the concluſion in ver. 18. but ſhewed that in all things he acted agreeably to the will of God, and that he was equal in power to God, doing whatever he ſaw the father do; an honour which flowed to him from the immenſe love of the father, and which was a clear and convincing proof of the father's love. The ſon can do nothing of himſelf, means "nothing in oppoſition to the œconomy of the father, or nothing which he is not commanded to do, or has not ſeen him do."

20 For the Father loveth the Son, and ſheweth him all things that himſelf doeth: and he will ſhew him greater works than theſe, that ye may marvel.

21 For as the Father raiſeth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even ſo the Son quickeneth whom he will.

22 For the Father judgeth no man; but hath committed all judgement unto the Son:

23 That all men ſhould honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father which hath ſent him.

24 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that ſent me, hath everlaſting life, and ſhall not come into condemnation; but is paſſed from death unto life.

25 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead ſhall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear ſhall live.

26 For as the Father hath life in himſelf, ſo hath he given to the Son to have life in himſelf;

27 And hath given him authority to execute judgement alſo, becauſe he is the Son of man.

28 Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves ſhall hear his voice,

29 And ſhall come forth; they that have done good, unto the reſurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the reſurrection of damnation.

30 I can of mine own ſelf do nothing: as I hear, I judge: and my judgement is juſt; becauſe I ſeek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath ſent me.

It is doubtful whether the phraſe unleſs he ſee the Father doing it, (for ſo it ſhould be read) means in the general, unleſs he ſee it to be correſpondent to the Father's ſcheme; or whether it refers to any peculiar divine impulſe, which our Lord ſometimes felt upon his mind, leading him to exert his miraculous power in this or that inſtance; Elſner has ſhewn in a variety of inſtances, that the later heathen writers appear to have aſcribed to Minerva, as the daughter of Jupiter, many things which our ſacred Scriptures ſpeak of Chriſt, as the Son of God. See his Obſervations, vol. i. p. 307, &c.

Ver. 20. Sheweth him] The word δείκνυσιν, rendered ſheweth, ſignifies to teach, or form to any thing, as a maſter forms his ſcholar to do what he himſelf doth, and teaches him the ſecrets of his art or profeſſion; and it ſeems to have a reference here to the ample and comprehenſive knowledge, which the Son has of the whole plan of the Father's counſels, in all their mutual relations and dependencies. Whereas the prophets and the apoſtles too, had in compariſon of this but very limitted and contracted views. He will ſhew him greater works than theſe, means, "Will enable him to do greater miracles, than any he has done hitherto, and which, though they may not convince, will certainly aſtoniſh you, and make it impoſſible for you to gainſay him, at leaſt with any ſhew of reaſon." See Whitby and L'Enfant.

Ver. 21—23. For as the Father raiſeth up the dead] "You have now ſeen the cure of one who had been long diſabled by a diſeaſe, but I have not yet raiſed any from the dead: however, you ſhall quickly ſee that it is not for want of power, for, as the Father whenever he pleaſes, raiſes up and animates the dead, ſo alſo you ſhall have ſufficient evidence, that the Son animates whom he will; nor is it to be wondered at, that he ſhould have ſo great a power lodged in him, for the Father now in his own perſon judges no man, but has given the adminiſtration of all judgement unto the Son, before whom all men are at laſt to appear, and by whom they are to be aſſigned to their final and eternal ſtate; and this important power God has committed to me, that notwithſtanding the humble form in which I now appear, all may be engaged to honour the Son, even as they honour the Father himſelf; yielding an unreſerved homage and obedience to him, as what is neceſſary to approve their duty and fidelity to God; for he that in ſuch a circumſtance, and on ſuch a diſcovery, honoureth not the Son, as worthy of the higheſt veneration, honoureth not the Father who ſent him; but affronting him in the perſon of ſo dear and great an ambaſſador, muſt expect to be treated as an enemy and a rebel." Our Saviour here riſes in his diſcourſe, and opens ſuch a ſcene of glory to his auditors, as muſt have filled them with aſtoniſhment: to poſſeſs the power of raiſing the dead argued great dignity; but our Lord claims a greater, in aſſerting that he was inveſted with a power of judging the world. The power of judging the world implies the executing judgments temporal and eternal. This power was committed to our Lord, that all men ſhould honour him even as they honour the father; where the power is the ſame, the honour ſhould be the ſame likewiſe. Men were therefore to honour the Son, as the maker and governor of the world, by yielding to him the homage of faith, love, and obedience, that they might be rewarded with everlaſting life:" So that being appointed of the Father univerſal Judge, they who did not honour him, did not honour the Father. He who treats an ambaſſador ill, affronts his maſter; he who honours not the Son, who is the beloved of the Father, honoureth not the Father, who ſent him for this purpoſe, that he might be honoured in him. He who believeth not the Son, believeth not the Father likewiſe, by whom he was ſent into the world, and by whoſe will and command he doeth whatſoever he doeth, and by whom the Father ſpeaketh. See ch. i. 3. Eraſmus, and Waterland's Importance of the Trinity.

Ver. 24. Hath everlaſting life] He is already intitled to it; yea, it is already begun in his ſoul; and he ſhall ſhortly poſſeſs it in its full perfection, and ſhall not come into condemnation for any former offences; but he hath paſſed from that ſtate of death in which men naturally are, to a ſtate of life, ſecurity, and felicity. See Doddridge."

Ver. 25. Verily, verily, I ſay unto you] Theſe repetitions of this ſolemn aſſeveration are by no means vain, conſidering the vaſt importance of the truth; and how incredible it would appear, that he, who ſtood before them in ſo humble a form, was in reality the Lord of Life, and univerſal Judge. "The ſeaſon cometh, ſays our Lord, and is now juſt at hand, when the dead ſhall hear the voice of the ſon of God, and they that hear it ſhall immediately live; for within theſe few months there ſhall be ſome dead bodies raiſed to life by the word of his power, (ſee Mark v. 41. Luke vii. 14. John xi. 43. and comp. Matth. xxvii. 52, 53.) and many ſouls that are dead in ſin, ſhall by his grace be quickened, and made ſpiritually alive." We explain the paſſage thus, becauſe it is doubtful whether it may not have this joint reference. It is well known that ſinners are often repreſented in Scripture as dead; Matth. viii. 22. Epheſ. ii. 1. v. 14. 1 Tim. v. 6. and if the expreſſion οἱ ἀκούσαντες, is to be taken as we render it, with the moſt literal exactneſs, for they that hear, or they, and they alone, that ſo attend to the voice of Chriſt as to believe in him, it will then limit it to this ſenſe; which ſeems alſo favoured by ver. 24. where death plainly ſignifies a ſtate of ſin and condemnation. See Grotius, Clarke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 26. So hath he given to the Son, &c.] "Hath beſtowed this honour upon him to quicken, or raiſe, (ver. 21.) what dead perſon he pleaſeth, and that by his own power;" in which reſpect our Lord differed from the prophets, and all the other meſſengers of God, who raiſed the dead neither at their own pleaſure, nor by their own power. See my Sermons on the Miracles, vol. ii. p. 500.

Ver. 27. And hath given him authority, &c.] This may refer not only to the future and final judgement upon the ſons of men, but alſo to the inflicting of temporal judgements; and poſſibly our Lord had the deſtruction of Jeruſalem more particularly in his eye,—an exerciſe of judgement which he conſtantly aſcribed to himſelf. See Philip. ii. 9, 11. and the next note.

Ver. 28—30. Marvel not at this] "Be not ſurprized at my ſaying that the Son has power to raiſe a few particular perſons from the dead, and authority to inflict judgement on ſome particular offenders; a far greater power is committed to him, even that of raiſing all men at the laſt day, and of judging and rewarding them according to their works. Now in this judgement I will not act abſolutely or arbitrarily, but according to the laws of equity, unalterably eſtabliſhed by my Father. So that I ſhall not act therein ſo properly by my own, as by my Father's authority. I can of mine own ſelf do nothing; as I hear I judge, ver. 30." In alluſion to human courts, where the judges found their ſentences upon the teſtimony of witneſſes, and the laws of their country; yet the expreſſion by no means implies that our Lord, at the great day, ſhall receive information from any one whatſoever, concerning the perſons he is to judge: Having been himſelf privy to their actions, he needs no evidence; but knows all things that ever were thought, ſaid, or done by mankind, from the beginning to the end of time, fully and certainly:

31 If I bear witneſs of myſelf, my witneſs is not true.

32 There is another that beareth witneſs of me, and I know that the witneſs which he witneſſeth of me is true.

33 Ye ſent unto John, and he bare witneſs unto the truth.

34 But I receive not teſtimony from man: but theſe things I ſay, that ye might be ſaved.

35 He was a burning and a ſhining light: and ye were willing for a ſeaſon to rejoice in his light.

36 But I have greater witneſs than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to finiſh, the ſame works that I do, Ver. 31. Ch. viii. 14.—V. 32. Matth. iii. 17. xvii. 5.—V. 33. Ch. i. 15, 19, 27.—V. 35. 2 Pet. i. 19. See Matth. xiii. 20. V. 36. 1 John v. 9. Ch. x. 25.

tainly. He goes on, "And my judgement is juſt; not only becauſe it is thus a judgement according to truth and equity, but likewiſe becauſe I ſeek not mine own will, &c. I have no intereſts to purſue, no inclination to fulfil, different from that of my Father." See Heb. x. 9, 10. Matth. xxvi. 39.

Ver. 31. If I bear witneſs of myſelf] Theſe certainly were very grand aſſertions, which our Lord made of his own dignity. But he did not require his hearers to believe them, merely on the authority of his own teſtimony; a circumſtance by which Jeſus Chriſt, the only Son, and greateſt Meſſenger of the true God, is diſtinguiſhed from Mahomet and every other impoſtor. He told them that he had the teſtimony of John given him in the hearing of their own deputies, but at the ſame time he obſerved, that the truth of his miſſion did not depend merely on human teſtimony, though it was given by one who was a burning and ſhining Light, and in whom they greatly rejoiced, becauſe the prophetic ſpirit which had ſo long ceaſed ſeemed to be again revived in him. See ver. 35. The preſent verſe ſhould be read and underſtood thus, If I alone bear witneſs of myſelf, my teſtimony is not to be admitted as true; by which means the paſſage is reconciled with ch. viii. 14.

Ver. 32, 33. There is another that beareth witneſs, &c.] This proof, taken from the teſtimony of John the Baptiſt, though our Lord ſeems to ſpeak ſlightingly of it, when he compares it with the proof drawn from his own miracles, yet was an argument of particular force to the Jews, and could not fail to convince and confound them; for, as we read in another place, they durſt not openly ſpeak againſt John, becauſe the people generally had him in eſteem, and thought him a prophet. A proof therefore, from his teſtimony, would either remove their doubts, or reduce them to ſilence. The following obſervations will prove that the teſtimony of John ought to be received. He affirms that he knew Jeſus to be the Meſſiah, and this knowledge he acquires, not by any obſervations which he made upon the life and behaviour of Chriſt, nor from comparing his actions with the prophecies relating to the Meſſiah; for it appears, that at the time he gave his teſtimony, Chriſt had not diſcovered his divine miſſion, and was but juſt entering into his office; nor does it appear that Chriſt had declared any thing of it to him. He is not guided by conjectures, but by immediate revelation, and by a voice from heaven, declaring Chriſt to be the Son of God. He aſſures us, that God diſcovered to him that Chriſt was the Meſſiah. His record therefore depends on his veracity; and his veracity ſeems unqueſtionable. From the teſtimony which John gave, and from the manner in which he gave it, we may diſcover the character of a great and a good man. We ſee in him the auſterity of life, ſelf-denial, contempt of the pleaſures and vanities of the world, an active yet diſcreet zeal, a courage and conſtancy ariſing from true piety; and a ſincere modeſty and humility. He flattered not the Phariſees and Sadducees; he aſſumed no honours, which belonged not to him; he ſaid leſs of himſelf than he might have ſaid with truth. When his diſciples were afraid that Chriſt would draw all men after him, and leſſen the reputation of their maſter, he was not to be moved by ſuch improper motives; nor did he ceaſe to bear teſtimony to Chriſt, and acknowledge his own inferiority. Appointed of God, to exhort and reprove, he reproved even Herod, though he could not be ignorant of the danger to which he expoſed himſelf. By his blameleſs and upright behaviour he gained the eſteem of the Jews; and after his death was ſpoken of with the greateſt veneration. He was a man who practiſed the auſterities he preached, appeared ſeverely virtuous, exhorted all men to righteouſneſs, and lived ſuitably to his own doctrine. He could not act this part with a view to any worldly profit, and to enrich himſelf; he ſought no ſuch advantages; and if he had ſought them, he would never have obtained them by pretending to ſlight them, by dwelling in a wilderneſs, and by exhorting men to virtues of which he had not ſet them an example. Nothing therefore can be thought to have influenced him, unleſs religion, vanity, and the love of fame. If he was guided by ambition, he had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his ſucceſs; all Jeruſalem was moved at his preaching. They had ſo good an opinion of him, that they thought him certainly one ſent from God, perhaps one of the old prophets returned into the world; perhaps the Meſſiah himſelf. What uſe did he make of this favourable diſpoſition of the people? He ſpake of himſelf with much lowlineſs and modeſty, and exhorted them to acknowledge Chriſt as the Meſſiah. If he had been a proud and ambitious man, he would not have ſet Jeſus above himſelf; he would at leaſt have been ſilent, and have left the Jews to judge for themſelves. We may therefore affirm, that he was what he ſeemed to be, a good man and a lover of truth; and that he would not have deceived the people in any caſe; above all, not in a caſe ſo important. He decided a queſtion, not of ſmall importance, but concerning the Meſſiah foretold by the prophets, expected at that time, to whom the nation was bound to pay obedience, who ſhould be a ruler, a deliverer, and the founder of an everlaſting kingdom. If we ſuppoſe him capable of deceiving the people in this point, we muſt ſuppoſe him to be wicked to the higheſt degree; one who feared not God, nor regarded man, who endeavoured to lead into a fatal error his own nation, by whom he was honoured and reſpected. But it is unreaſonable to ſuppoſe him guilty of ſo foul a crime. We may alſo conclude, that he could not have borne teſtimony to one whom he did not well know to be the Meſſiah, becauſe common prudence would have kept him from throwing away, ſo fooliſhly, his good name and reputation. The character of the Meſſiah could not be long perſonated by the moſt artful impoſtor. He was to be a teacher of truth; in him the prophecies were to be accompliſhed, and by him many miracles were to be performed. If therefore John had directed the Jews to a falſe Meſſiah, to one in whom none of theſe characters appeared, his fraud or his error would have been diſcovered; he would have expoſed himſelf to the puniſhment of a falſe prophet; at leaſt, he would have loſt the eſteem and favour of the Jews, and the fair and unblemiſhed reputation, which till then he had preſerved, and would have been the object of Jewiſh contempt and hatred. Nothing can make us ſuſpect that he would have acted a part ſo inconſiſtent and extravagant, or hinder us from believing that he ſpake as he was directed by the ſpirit of God. Nor is it leſs evident, that he acted on this occaſion from no motives of intereſt or partiality. It was of no advantage to him; on the contrary, he ſaw that if Chriſt were acknowledged to be the Meſſiah, he would be no longer followed and admired. Nor can we ſuppoſe him to have been partial out of friendſhip, for there appears not to have been any intimacy between him and Chriſt. We may obſerve, that John was a perſon of eminent virtue, that he had borne witneſs to Chriſt, that he was related to him, and that, upon all theſe accounts, he ſeemed to deſerve diſtinguiſhing marks of his favour. But Chriſt, as far as we can learn from the Evangeliſts, ſeldom converſed with him; the reaſon for which probably was, that the teſtimony of John might appear of more weight, where none could ſuſpect him prejudiced for his friend and relation. But ſtill it may be alledged againſt his teſtimony, that he was an enthuſiaſt. Some of the Jews in the days of our Saviour ſaid, that John the Baptiſt had loſt his ſenſes, becauſe they had nothing elſe to ſay againſt him. The accuſation is groundleſs; his diſcourſes and his reputation ſufficiently confute it; his prophetic character proves it to be falſe. He foretold the appearing of the Meſſiah, the calamities which ſhould befal the unconverted Jews, the death of Chriſt, and the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt. Enthuſiaſm may make a man fancy extraordinary communications with the deity, and it may lead him to auſterities and ſelf-denial; but it will not enable him to declare future events.—If we put all theſe things together, we may conclude as we ſet out, that the Baptiſt's veracity in the teſtimony he gave of Chriſt, is unqueſtionable. See Jortin on the Chriſtian Religion, diſc. v. p. 188, &c.

Ver. 34. But I receive not teſtimony from man] "I ſtand in no need of the teſtimony of John, or of any other man; nor do I ſeek after ſuch kind of evidence with any anxiety. But I ſay theſe things to you, on your own principles, out of a tender and paſſionate concern for your conviction; that you who are now conſpiring againſt my life, may be ſaved from that deſtruction which he foretold, as the portion of thoſe who ſhould reject me, and which the greateſt of them ſhall not be able to eſcape. See Matt. iii. 10. and Jortin, as above."

Ver. 35. He was a burning and a ſhining light] This is the character given of Elias, Ecclus. xlviii. 1. and is properly applied by our Lord to John, who came in the ſpirit and power of Elias, being both a ſhining light, as he revealed the myſteries of heaven, and a burning light, as he reproved the vices of the Jews with great warmth and zeal. Some from the latter clauſe of this verſe infer, that the Baptiſt was now dead: yet he does not ſeem to have been killed till a little before the third paſſover, for this reaſon. The miracle of the loaves performed in the deſarts of Bethſaida, immediately after word was brought of John's death, is ſaid to have happened a little before the paſſover, ch. vi. 4. If ſo, our Lord's meaning is, that John was a burning and ſhining light, an illuſtrious prophet, not while he lay in priſon, but while his miniſtry laſted; for during his impriſonment his light may be ſaid to have been extinguiſhed: accordingly it is added, ye were willing to rejoice in his light for a ſeaſon, πρὸς ὥραν, for the hour; for a very ſhort time, ye hearkened to him with pleaſure, till his credit was impaired in your eſtimation by his impriſonment. See chap. i. 5, 6. Macknight, Grotius, L'Enfant.

Ver. 36. But I have greater witneſs] Our Lord told them that he had the teſtimony of one infinitely greater than John; even the teſtimony of the father, who was continually bearing witneſs to him bear witneſs of me, that the Father hath ſent me.

37 And the Father himſelf which hath ſent me, hath borne witneſs of me. Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor ſeen his ſhape.

38 And ye have not his word abiding in you: for whom he hath ſent, him ye believe not.

39 Search the ſcriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which teſtify of me.

40 And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life.

41 I receive not honour from men.

42 But I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you.

43 I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another ſhall come in his own name, him ye will receive.

44 How can ye believe, which receive honour one of another, and ſeek not the honour that cometh from God only?

45 Do not think that I will accuſe you

Ver. 37. Matth. iii. 17. xvii. 5. Ch. viii. 18. Deut. iv. 12. 1 Tim. i. 17. 1 John iv. 12.—V. 39. Iſai. viii. 20. xxxiv. 16. Luke xvi. 29. Acts xvii. 11. Deut. xviii. 15, 18. Luke xxiv. 27. Ch. i. 45.—V. 41. 1 Theſſ. ii. 6.—V. 44. Ch. xii. 43. Rom. ii. 29.

by the miracles which he impowered him to perform, and who had given him a peculiar and direct teſtimony at his baptiſm, by declaring from heaven in a grand, audible, articulate voice, that he was his Beloved Son; which voice many then living had heard, and no doubt remembered. See the beginning of ver. 37. the note on ch. iii. 2. and Conybeare's Sermon on Heb. ii. 4. p. 24.

Ver. 37, 38. Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, &c.] The proper tranſlation of this paſſage ſeems to be interrogative, Have ye never at any time heard his voice, or ſeen his ſhape? The word ειδος rendered ſhape, ſignifies any thing in a perſon that appears to the eye, by which he is diſtinguiſhed from others; and therefore the form of his countenance, as well as the ſhape of his body. Many of the ancient Jews had heard the voice of God at Sinai, when the law was given; Deut. iv. 12, 33. and though it is there ſaid that they ſaw no ſimilitude, [Ομοιωμα, LXX.] the meaning is not, that they ſaw no corporeal appearance, for they ſaw fire and ſmoke; but that they ſaw no reſemblance, no figure or likeneſs of any thing in heaven, earth, or water, which the heathens worſhipped as God. This fire which the Iſraelites ſaw on Sinai, was the ſymbol of the divine preſence, as were the pillar of fire, and cloud of ſmoke which attended them in their journeyings through the wilderneſs; hence, becauſe Moſes was often permitted to a clear and near view of this fire, he is ſaid to have beheld the ſimilitude of the Lord, and to have ſpoken with God mouth to mouth; even apparently,—εν ειδει, Numb. xii. 8. By parity of reaſon, as often as God manifeſted his preſence in the ſymbol of light or fire, as at Chriſt's baptiſm, that light might be called his ſhape or ſimilitude, ειδος αυτȣ, and all who beheld that glorious appearance, as the multitude at Chriſt's baptiſm, might be ſaid to have ſeen the ſimilitude of God. And as for hearing the voice of God, that was no impoſſible thing, the whole nation having heard God ſpeak at Sinai. However, it was not this which our Lord had now in his eye, but the voice of God uttered at his baptiſm. See the laſt note. He goes on, Yet ye have not his word remaining in you, ver. 38. for ſo the tranſlation ſhould run; the ſenſe being this, "Though God ſpake to you from heaven concerning me at my baptiſm, and in order to impreſs you the deeper with what was ſaid, ſhewed you his ſimilitude, yet you are not duly affected with what he ſaid, neither do you entertain it in your minds as you ought to do. For you do not believe on him whom he hath ſent. In this paſſage therefore, there is a plain alluſion to the deſcent of the ſpirit on our Lord at his baptiſm, and to the voice from heaven; which, with a thundering noiſe ſounding through the ſky, declared him, with great majeſty, to be God's Beloved Son, in whom he was well pleaſed. See Macknight. There are others who underſtand and paraphraſe this paſſage thus, "Nor have you any reaſon to diſpute the teſtimony which the Father hath thus given me, though you have never heard his voice, nor ſeen his form; as being one whom no man hath ſeen nor can ſee. For he has teſtified the ſame concerning me in his word, where he has ſpoken of me in the cleareſt manner. But notwithſtanding the ſubmiſſion you profeſs to his authority, you will not be perſuaded to receive the teſtimony he has given; and after all, that he has ſaid, it is ſtill evident that you have not his word cordially abiding in you; nor do you ſhew a due regard even to thoſe former revelations which you acknowledge as divine; for, notwithſtanding all the reaſons which are there given to induce you to it, you do not believe him, whom he hath ſent, with a much fuller and clearer diſcovery of himſelf than any of his former meſſengers have brought." See Doddridge. Mr. Locke would read the beginning of the 38th verſe, You have not his Logos, i. e. Me, reſiding among you for any continuance of time, and he refers it to Chriſt's making ſo ſhort an abode in Jeruſalem, but the ſenſe ſeems forced and unnatural. See his Reaſ. of Chriſtianity, p. 65.

Ver. 39. Search the Scriptures] Becauſe the Jews were exceedingly averſe to acknowledge Jeſus for their Meſſiah, notwithſtanding the evidences of his miſſion were ſo unexceptionable; he deſired them, for further proof to ſearch their own Scriptures, and particularly the writings of the prophets; which, ſays he, is certainly your duty, becauſe thoſe writings, as you juſtly ſuppoſe, contain the knowledge of eternal life, and therefore the knowledge of the Meſſiah; and I can with confidence refer you to them, knowing that they confirm my pretenſions in the moſt ample manner, the characters of the Meſſiah pointed out by them being all fulfilled in my perſon. The word ἐρευνᾶτε, rendered ſearch, implies the moſt diligent attention and ſcrutiny into the meaning of the Scriptures. Several great writers contend that this verb is in the preſent tenſe; and that the paſſage ſhould be rendered, Ye ſearch the Scriptures, becauſe you apprehend that you have eternal life in them: i. e. the directions of heaven for obtaining it; Now theſe are they, the very writings, which teſtify of me; yet, ver. 40. Ye will not come unto me, that ye may have life. The words which expreſs their high opinion of the Scriptures, ſeem rather to ſuit this tranſlation; and it is highly probable, that at a time when the Phariſees were ſo impatient of the Roman yoke, they would with great diligence ſearch the ſacred oracles, for predictions relating to the Meſſiah; though it is too plain, they had an unhappy biaſs on their minds, which prevented the good effects which might have been expected from that inquiry, had it been impartial. It is alſo well known, that refined criticiſm on the ſacred writings made the moſt faſhionable branch of learning among the Jews, in compariſon of which, profane literature was held in great contempt, and indeed by many of the zealots in great abhorrence. See Doddridge. Dr. Rutherford would read the verſe interrogatively, as by way of reproach; Do you ſearch the ſcriptures,—and yet will not come to me? See his Moral Virtue, p. 368.

Ver. 41, 42. I receive not honour from men] "Though I ſpeak of your coming to me, let me remind you that it is not out of an ambition of drawing multitudes about me, to follow and applaud my teaching; for the whole of my conduct proves, that I receive not glory from men." Our Lord inſinuated that the proofs of his miſſion, were as full and clear as poſſible, being ſupported by the actions of his life, which in all points agreed with his doctrine; for in no one inſtance whatever did he ſeek the applauſe of men, or affect ſecular power; but was always innocent and humble, though he knew theſe qualities rendered him little in the eyes of perſons void of the love of God, who expected to ſee their Meſſiah adorned with great ſecular glory; and therefore addreſſing himſelf to men of this character, our Lord ſays very emphatically, I know you. The whole ſeries of his diſcourſe excellently ſhews how far our Lord was from ſoothing the vanity of men in place and power, to obtain their favour.

Ver. 43. I am come in my Father's name] This humility of ſpirit, and conformity of life with his doctrine, as well as the other evidences of his miſſion, our Lord juſtly termed a coming to the Jews in his Father's name, or agreeably to his will, ſignified anciently in the Scripture by the prophets: neverthelefs, becauſe ſuch a Meſſiah was by no means the object of their expectation, they would not receive him. Whereas, if any other perſon came to them in his own name, i. e. without a commiſſion from God, they would joyfully embrace him, provided he aſſumed the majeſty of a king, and promiſed temporal bounties to his followers. The Jews gave many ſignal proofs of this infatuation, during their wars with the Romans, and a little before the deſtruction of their city; for then many impoſtors aroſe, pretending to be the Meſſiah, and promiſſing them deliverance, by which they drew away great multitudes, as their own hiſtorian Joſephus informs us, and as we have obſerved in the note on Matt. xxiv. 26. See alſo Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. lib. iv. cap. 6.

Ver. 44. How can ye believe, &c.] Our Lord obſerves that this infidelity of the Jewiſh rulers, (ſee on ver. 15.) was owing in a great meaſure to their pride. They who had all along preached glorious things concerning the empire and grandeur of the Meſſiah, would not aſcribe that auguſt character to a mere teacher, who was deſtitute even of the ordinary advantages of birth, fortune, and erudition; becauſe it would have been ſuch a confeſſion of ignorance and unſkilfulneſs in the ſcriptures, as muſt have expoſed them to the contempt of thoſe whom they had miſled. How can ye believe, &c. "How can ſuch perſons as you believe in me, whoſe character and ſtation are entirely different from what you have all along told the people, that the Scriptures teach concerning the Meſſiah? This confeſſion of your own ignorance is not to be expected from you, who in all your actions ſeek the praiſe of men, (Matth. xxiii. 5.) and not the praiſe of God; which is the only true praiſe, and is to be obtained by a ſteady regard to truth and virtue, in oppoſition to all earthly paſſions whatſoever." See Macknight and Chemnitz.

Ver. 45. Do not think, that I will accuſe you, &c.] Do you think, &c.? Syriac. Our Lord told them in concluſion, that they were not to imagine that in rejecting him, they ſinned againſt no perſon but him, and that he alone would accuſe them to the Father for their infidelity. Moſes, through whoſe law they truſted to have ſalvation, to the Father: there is one that accuſeth you, even Moſes, in whom ye truſt.

46 For had ye believed Moſes, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me.

47 But if ye believe not his writings, how ſhall ye believe my words?

Ver. 45. Rom. ii. 12.—V. 46. Gen. iii. 15. xii. 3. xviii. 18. xxii. 18. xlix. 10. Deut. xviii. 15, 18. Acts xxvi. 22.

was likewiſe diſhonoured by it; inaſmuch as he wrote of him under the names of the Seed of Abraham,—Shiloh,—A prophet like to himſelf, &c. Wherefore, ſeeing they refuſed to believe on him, Moſes would accuſe them, as guilty of diſbelieving his writings. This is one of the moſt expreſs paſſages that can be imagined, in which Moſes, their great law-giver, is repreſented as looking down with indignation upon theſe elders, who gloried in being the moſt diſtinguiſhed of his diſciples: And ſeeing how injuriouſly they treated Jeſus, the great prophet, turning himſelf to God with a ſevere accuſation againſt them, and urging his own predictions as an aggravation of their inexcuſable infidelity. See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 46, 47. For he wrote of me] "Had you believed the writings of Moſes, which are daily read in your ſynagogues, you would have believed me; for theſe writings deſcribe me, as by a variety of ſtriking types and figures, ſo likewiſe by many ſtrong and direct prophecies: ſee the laſt note: But if ye believe not his writings, how ſhall ye believe my words? If you do not believe the teſtimony of your own law-giver, I have no reaſon to be ſurpriſed that you do not credit me upon my teſtimony." Thus Jeſus aſſerted his own perſonal dignity, as the Son of God, and Judge of the world; at the ſame time he propoſed the evidences of his miſſion from God with ſuch ſtrength of reaſon, perſpicuity, and brevity, as nothing can equal. See Macknight, and Henry.

REFLECTIONS ON THE MIRACLE OF BETH-ESDA.

It is very pleaſing to obſerve that the Son of the moſt high God, when, as the Lord and Ruler, the great Meſſenger of the covenant, he ſuddenly came to his temple, and when he was about to deliver the moſt ſublime diſcourſe concerning his equality with the Father, ſhould, on the Sabbath-day, enter as a phyſician, thoſe five porches, which were a kind of hoſpital, where there lay ſo great a multitude, ſo ſad a ſpectacle of the wretched and ſuffering children of Adam!

This ſerves to aſſure us, that Chriſt, though now reigning in equal power and glory with the Father, doth not therefore diſregard our miſeries; but exerts the office of a loving Mediator in this world, as a great hoſpital, aſſiſting by his grace and ready help the afflicted in ſoul, as well as body, and not forgetting to extend continually his rich mercy and compaſſion towards both.

Nay, if he condeſcended to leave thoſe glories, of which he was poſſeſſed from eternity, to come down into this wretched world, this place of miſery and woe, and to open from his moſt precious heart a fountain for all our uncleanneſs; can we doubt of his fatherly care over us? Can we doubt his tender regard for us?—We muſt neceſſarily be dear to Him, who, of his own free love, paid ſo ineſtimable a price for us? Let us learn from hence, with full and humble confidence to repoſe ourſelves upon him, and in all our miſeries and neceſſities, to commend ourſelves into the hands of this faithful Redeemer; to wait upon him in all thoſe means, which he himſelf hath ordained and appointed, and wherein he hath promiſed to meet and refreſh our longing ſouls!

What a bleſſing was this pool of Beth-eſda, endowed with this miraculous virtue, to the Jewiſh people! You ſee how they thronged it; the five porches were full; all were wiſhing and ſtriving to enjoy its advantages. Was there ſuch a miraculous bath in this nation, there would be no leſs crowding thither. Each would be preſſing towards it, when labouring under diſeaſes; all deſirous of ſtepping in firſt, that they might be made whole.

How amazingly do men, by their own conduct in temporal things, delude and condemn themſelves in ſpiritual! Such a pool, ſuch a fountain there is for the ſoul, a fountain opened for ſin, and for all uncleanneſs; a fountain, in which whoſoever will, may come, waſh, and be clean. Such a fountain is the moſt precious blood of Jeſus Chriſt, ſtreaming forth in all his divine ordinances!—Thoſe waters of life, by which ſpiritual maladies are healed, and vigour is reſtored to our enfeebled ſouls!

And yet, how little are they thronged by men, wiſhing and earneſtly ſtriving to be healed; how few are there who come to them with a full ſenſe of their ſpiritual impotency, and a reſolution to ſtep in that they may be made whole! Multitudes were continually attending at this pool; and why then is the houſe of God forſaken? Where not one alone, but many, at the ſame moment may receive ſpiritual ſight and ſtrength, yea, and life from the dead? But, alas! under the diſeaſes of the ſoul, how few deſire to be made whole. Bleſſed Jeſus! if thou haſt awakened that deſire in us, we would adore thee for it, as a token for good; and would lift up our believing eyes to thee, in humble expectation that thou wilt graciouſly fulfil it.

How many are there who never come to the ordinances of God at all; who have either found out ſome new methods of ſpiritual cure; or proud in heart, who will confeſs no ſpiritual infirmities, and deſpiſe the weakneſs of their proffered cure; or, wiſe in their own inventions, who have too much ſenſe to believe the Goſpel. God grant they may all underſtand in time how fearful a thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God! More eſpecially when ſo much grace, when ſo much goodneſs, when ſo much mercy hath been long and obſtinately rejected; the grace, the mercy, the goodneſs of an eternal Saviour, who, unbounded in his voluntary love, hath endured ſufferings unſpeakable, to procure ſo divine a remedy for all our evils; a remedy infallible! All ſickneſſes, all diſorders, however complicated, however inveterate, are here removed by one hand, and one water: None ever were, none ever will be ſent empty away, who come deſirous of relief; nor is that relief confined to the firſt only who ſteps in; it is a fountain flowing plenteouſly unto every draught!

And thus may all be cured; but their own will muſt concur: Chriſt firſt aſked the man, Wilt thou be made whole? ver. 6. before he bid him ariſe and walk. There could be no doubt of his deſire to be cured, who waited at the pool for this very purpoſe; and you, reader, muſt ſhew your will and deſire to be cured in this ſame way; you muſt wait at the pool,—muſt wait for Chriſt in thoſe general ordinances, which himſelf hath enjoined; in the ſacraments, in prayer, and the word: And if, with hope, duly ſenſible of your weakneſs and miſery, you thus wait upon him, you need not fear but he will perfect the cure of all your ſpiritual maladies, and enable you to walk and glorify him.

But if you attend at the pool, frequent the ordinances of the Goſpel, the ſacraments, and the church, with any other motive than a real deſire to meet there the Saviour of your ſouls, and to be healed of all your infirmities by his blood; be aſſured you will frequent them in vain, and never find them, what they are to the contrite and humble, means of grace, and channels of heavenly life and ſupport to the ſoul.

Should you frequent them, and ſtill find them not efficacious, yet muſt you not therefore ceaſe to frequent them. The man before us, was thirty-eight years in his infirmity, ver. 5. and yet perfectly healed by the power of Chriſt at the laſt. God often delays his mercies to make them more ſignal and acceptable; and when we have no man to put us into the pool, when none is able or willing to help, He ſpeaks the word, and they are delivered. Beth-eſda muſt be waited on; he is worthy of his crutches, who will not ſtay God's leiſure for his cure: There is no virtue, no ſucceſs without patience; and here we all have need of it. One is ſick of an overflowing of the gall,—the jaundice of malice; another of the ſwelling of pride; another of the fever of concupiſcence; another of the vertigo of inconſtancy; another of the choaking quinſey of curſes and blaſphemies; another of the dropſy of covetouſneſs; another of the pleuretical pangs of envy: One is conſumed with emulation; another rotten with corrupt deſires; and all are ſo much the ſicker, if they feel not theſe diſtempers.

We work hard, and we endure much for the body; what toil do we take, that we may toil yet a little longer! We endure many certain pains, for the addition of a few uncertain days. Why will we not do thus for the ſoul, for the immortal, the better part, when we know that our waiting will not be unſucceſsful; and when we know that our waiting here, ſhall procure for us eternal reſt hereafter? O wait then upon the Lord in all the means of grace, in all the paths of duty; come by theſe means, duly ſenſible of your ſpiritual evils; lay them before the Lord, confeſs your ſins to him, and with earneſt deſire to be delivered from the body of this death, cry to him, and he will at length give you the victory, and by his grace enable you to riſe, take up your bed, and walk; to leave ſin, and all the occaſions of it, and to ſerve him in holineſs and newneſs of living.

The ſure evidences of a ſpiritual cure are theſe: 1. A forſaking of our former ſins: 2. A laying aſide the marks and occaſions thereof: And 3. a performing the contrary actions; particularly the duties of praiſe and thankſgiving to God, as this infirm man did, who languiſhing as he was lately on the couch, we quickly after ſee found by Jeſus in the temple, ver. 14. And where indeed ſhould they be found, who have been raiſed up from beds of weakneſs, and brought out from chambers of ſorrow and confinement, but in the ſanctuary, rendering their praiſes to the God of their mercies? It was here that Chriſt ſaid to him, for a leſſon to us all, Behold, thou art made whole; ſin no more, leſt a worſe thing come unto thee; hereby ſhewing us, that diſeaſes and ſickneſs are the puniſhment of ſin, and that of conſequence the beſt remedy we can apply for their cure, is ſincere repentance and converſion.

Sin no more, leſt a worſe thing come unto thee. To deter from relapſes into ſin, Chriſt ſhews the danger of them. It was bad enough, God knows, to lie thirty and eight years bound by a terrible diſeaſe: But it is worſe, infinitely worſe, than pen can deſcribe, or thought conceive, to lie bound in flames of ever-during fire, not for thirty-eight, or thirty times thirty-eight years, but for ever and ever!—Let them remember this admonition of our Lord, who have made upon ſick beds good reſolutions, and determined to turn and amend their lives, when the hand of God hath been ſore upon them; but have forgotten all, when to prove their ſincerity, he hath ſaved them a while from the jaws of death! O let ſuch remember, how fearful a woe hangs over their heads, who, having been made whole, have yet indulged as uſual in the practice of ſin; and leſt a worſe thing, even eternal miſery, come unto them, let them make haſte, with broken hearts and humbled ſouls, to the heavenly pool of Beth-eſda, the blood of Chriſt, the fountain opened for ſin and for uncleanneſs.

Sin is the fruitful parent of all human evils, and till the body reſts in the ſilent grave, the temptations to ſin will never ceaſe: So that we have continual need to be upon the watch, and to remember our

CHAP. VI.

Chriſt feedeth five thouſand men with five loaves and two fiſhes. Thereupon the people would have made him king. But withdrawing himſelf, he walketh on the ſea to his diſciples: reproveth the people flocking after him, and all the fleſhly hearers of his word: declareth himſelf to be the bread of life to believers. Many diſciples depart from him. Peter confeſſeth him. Judas is a devil.

AFTER theſe things Jeſus went over the ſea of Galilee, which is the ſea of Tiberias.

2 And a great multitude followed him, becauſe they ſaw his miracles which he did on them that were diſeaſed.

3 And Jeſus went up into a mountain, and there he ſat with his diſciples.

4 And the paſſover, a feaſt of the Jews, was nigh.

5 When Jeſus then lifted up his eyes, and ſaw a great company come unto him, he ſaith unto Philip, Whence ſhall we buy bread that theſe may eat?

6 (And this he ſaid to prove him: for he himſelf knew what he would do.)

7 Philip anſwered him, Two hundred penny-worth of bread is not ſufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little.

8 One of his diſciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, ſaith unto him,

9 There is a lad here which hath five barley-loaves, and two ſmall fiſhes: but what are they among ſo many?

10 And Jeſus ſaid, Make the men ſit down. (Now there was much graſs in the place.) So the men ſat down, in number about five thouſand.

11 And Jeſus took the loaves; and when he had given thanks, he diſtributed to the diſciples, and the diſciples to them that were ſet down; and likewiſe of the fiſhes, as much as they would.

12 When they were filled, he ſaid unto his diſciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be loſt.

13 Therefore they gathered them together, and filled twelve baſkets with the fragments

Ver. 1. Matth. xiv. 15. Mark vi. 35. Luke ix. 12.—V. 4. Lev. xxiii. 5, 7. Deut. xvi. 1.—V. 5. Matth. xiv. 14. Mark vi. 35. Luke ix. 12.—V. 7. See Numb. xi. 21, 22.—V. 9. 2 Kings iv. 43.

Lord's warning. The only method to ſecure us from which, is a full dependance upon the almighty grace of God, ſought for with ſincerity and humility in all the means appointed, by a regular attendance on the Goſpel ordinances; a holy, and conſcientious walking, and a ſtrict watchfulneſs over all our thoughts, words, and actions. If endeavouring thus to wait, and thus to act, we ſhall find God's grace ſufficient for us; if thus Chriſt find us in the temple, paying our grateful tribute of praiſe and adoration, he will enable us boldly to confeſs him before men, as this man did before the Phariſees; and and if we do ſo, we have His infallible promiſe that He will alſo confeſs us before his Father, and all the holy angels, in the realms of glory and immortality. See Matth. x. 32, 33.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. After theſe things] That is, ſome time after: for St. John paſſes by a great many tranſactions related by the other Evangeliſts, and perhaps would not have given this narrative, had it not been for preſerving a remarkable diſcourſe of our Saviour, which, though of great importance, hath been omitted by the other hiſtorians. See Matt. iv. 18. and the parallel places.

Ver. 4. The paſſover, a feaſt of the Jews] This is generally ſuppoſed to be the third paſſover of our Lord's public miniſtry. The Evangeliſt probably mentions this to ſhew the time of the year, &c.

Ver. 5. He ſaith unto Philip] Our Lord addreſſes himſelf to Philip particularly, becauſe he was a native of Bethſaida, and beſt acquainted with that country. See chap. i. 14. and on Luke ix. 10.

Ver. 6. This he ſaid to prove him] To try what idea he might have conceived of his divine power; as well as to give him an opportunity of obſerving what followed more attentively.

Ver. 7. Two hundred pennyworth of bread] As much as could be purchaſed for 200 denarii, which amounts to about ſix pounds five ſhillings of our money. The mention of that ſum ſeems to intimate that their whole ſtock amounted to no more. See Mark vi. 37.

Ver. 10. Now there was much graſs] This circumſtance of the graſs ſhews, that the miracle of the loaves happened in the months of February or March, when the graſs is in its perfection in Syria; and to this agrees what we are told ver. 4. It is obſervable, that in computing the number of perſons fed at this meal, the Evangeliſts mention none but the men, and of them only ſuch as were of age; and they all agree that there were about 5000. In this they do not ſpeak by gueſs; for the diſpoſition of the multitude in ranks of a determinate number, (ſee on Mark vi. 39.) enabled them to make the computation with certainty. If they were not five thouſand preciſely, one of the ranks incompleat will make them leſs; and an additional rank or part of a rank, will make them more: but beſides the men, there were women alſo, and children, who, we may ſuppoſe were not inferior in number to the men; and who, if they were not fed with the men, as ſeems probable from this verſe, muſt have been ſet down by themſelves to a ſeparate meal; ſome of the diſciples being appointed to wait on them and ſerve them. St. John gives us the reaſon why ſo great a crowd was now with Jeſus, the paſſover was at hand, ver. 4. conſequently numbers from every quarter being on the road to Jeruſalem, they might have been drawn round Chriſt by the fame of his miracles, of which they deſired to be eye-witneſſes. See Macknight's Jewiſh Antiquities, diſcourſe 6. the Reflections on Matth. xiv. and my Diſcourſes on the Miracles, vol. ii. p. 300.

Ver. 11. And when he had given thanks] St. Matthew and St. Mark ſay ſimply that he bleſſed, ευλογησε, which moſt commentators refer to the loaves and fiſhes, becauſe St. Luke ſays expreſly, ευλογησε αυτȣς; he bleſſed them. Some, however, put a different ſenſe upon the words, becauſe they think that meat is not capable of being bleſſed. Further they apprehend, that our Lord's looking up to heaven, when he bleſſed, mentioned by St. Luke himſelf, ſhews, that this bleſſing was directed to God, and that it imported a thankſgiving for his great goodneſs. Accordingly St. John expreſſes it by the word ευχαριςησας, which St. Luke, in his account of the inſtitution of the ſacrament, has ſubſtituted for the idea which St. Matthew and St. Mark expreſs by ευλογησε. For theſe reaſons they conclude that the words τον Θεον δια, are ſuppreſſed by St. Luke, which being joined with αυτȣς, make this ſenſe, he bleſſed God for them; namely, the loaves and the fiſhes. The reader, however, will remember, that the word in diſpute has a ſenſe which favours the common interpretation of this paſſage, Pſalm lxv. 10. thou bleſſeſt the ſpringing thereof, i. e. of the corn. It is not to be ſuppoſed, that twelve perſons could put firſt a piece of bread, and then a piece of fiſh into the hands of 5000 men, beſides women and children, who were all fed with ſuch expedition, that notwithſtanding the thing was not ſo much as propoſed to the diſciples till about three, all appears to have been over by five in the afternoon. See on ver. 16. Wherefore it is natural to conclude that in diſtributing the meat, the diſciples uſed the moſt expeditious method: putting, by their maſter's directions, the bread firſt, and after that the fiſh, into the hands of thoſe only who ſat at the ends of the ranks; with orders to give it to their companions. On this ſuppoſition the food muſt have extended its dimenſions not in our Lord's hands only, but in the hands of his diſciples, and of the multitude likewiſe; continuing to ſwell till there was a greater quantity than they who held it could make uſe of; ſo that breaking off what was ſufficient for themſelves, they gave the remainder to the perſons next to them, who in like manner ſaw the bread and fiſh ſwell in their hands, till they alſo had enough and to ſpare. See particularly the note on Mark vi. 39, 40.

Ver. 12. Gather up the fragments] Though Jeſus was entirely free from worldly cares, and from all anxiety about futurity, he did not think it unworthy of him, on this occaſion, to order his diſciples to take care of the broken pieces of meat left by the multitude. The reaſon mentioned by him for their doing ſo, namely, that nothing might be loſt, deſerves our notice: For it ſhews us, that he to whom the earth and the fulneſs thereof belong, willeth every man to take due care of all the goods he poſſeſſes; and that if he waſtes any thing by careleſſneſs or profuſion, he is guilty of ſin; namely, the ſin of deſpiſing the creatures of God, which, by ſo admirable a contrivance as the frame of the world, God hath produced for his uſe. Wherefore, as by feeding ſo many, Jeſus hath ſet us an example of liberality; ſo by taking care of the fragments, he hath taught us frugality; and by joining the two together, he has ſhewn us that charity and frugality ought always to go hand in hand; and that there is great difference between the truly liberal and the laviſh man. See the Chriſtian's Magazine, vol. iii. p. 312, &c.

of the five barley-loaves, which remained over and above, unto them that had eaten.

14 Then thoſe men, when they had ſeen the miracle that Jeſus did, ſaid, This is of a truth that prophet that ſhould come into the world.

15 When Jeſus therefore perceived that they would come and take him by force, to make him a king, he departed again into a mountain himſelf alone.

16 And when even was now come, his diſciples went down unto the ſea.

17 And entered into a ſhip, and went over the ſea towards Capernaum. And it was now dark, and Jeſus was not come to them.

18 And the ſea aroſe, by reaſon of a great wind that blew.

19 So when they had rowed about five and twenty, or thirty furlongs, they ſee Jeſus walking on the ſea, and drawing nigh unto the ſhip: and they were afraid.

20 But he ſaith unto them, It is I; be not afraid.

21 Then they willingly received him into the ſhip: and immediately the ſhip was at the land whither they went.

22 The day following, when the people which ſtood on the other ſide of the ſea, ſaw that there was none other boat there, ſave that one whereinto his diſciples were entered, and that Jeſus went not with his diſciples into the boat, but that his diſciples were gone away alone;

23 (Howbeit there came other boats from Tiberias, nigh unto the place where they did eat bread, after that the Lord had given thanks:)

24 When the people therefore ſaw that Jeſus was not there, neither his diſciples, they alſo took ſhipping, and came to Capernaum, ſeeking for Jeſus.

25 And when they had found him on the other ſide of the ſea, they ſaid unto him, Rabbi, when cameſt thou hither?

26 Jeſus anſwered them and ſaid, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Ye ſeek me, not becauſe ye ſaw the miracles, but becauſe ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled.

Ver. 14. Deut. xviii. 15, 18. Ch. i. 21. vii. 40.—V. 16. Matth. xiv. 23. Mark vi. 47.

Ver. 14. Then thoſe men, when they had ſeen, &c.] This vaſt multitude of people finding their hunger removed, and ſpirits recreated, as well as their taſte delighted by the meal, were abſolutely ſure it was no illuſion: As St. John expreſſes it very properly, they had ſeen the miracle, ſo could not entertain a doubt, or form an objection.

In this manner did he, who is the bread of life, feed upwards of ten thouſand people with five loaves and two ſmall fiſhes, giving a magnificent proof not only of his goodneſs, but of his creating power; for, after all had eaten to ſatiety, the diſciples took up twelve baſkets full of the broken pieces of meat, each diſciple a baſket, in which, as every one of the multitude may be ſuppoſed to have left a little, there muſt have been much more than the quantity at firſt ſet before the Lord to divide. This ſtupendous miracle therefore, without all doubt, was conſpicuous, not to the diſciples only, who, carrying each his baſket in his hand, had an abiding ſenſible demonſtration of its truth, but to every individual gueſt at this divine feaſt, who had all felt themſelves delighted, filled, refreſhed, and ſtrengthened by the meal. Anciently Eliſha fed an hundred men with twenty barley loaves, 2 Kings iv. 42. but the quantity of the food divided was greater, and the people fed therewith incomparably fewer than at our Lord's miracle. Beſides, though ſomething was left at Eliſha's feaſt to ſhew that the men were filled, it was but a trifle in compariſon of the quantity left by the great multitude whom our Lord fed. We may juſt obſerve, that the expreſſion the Prophet who ſhould come into the world, was the uſual characteriſtic by which the Jews deſcribed their Meſſiah. See Macknight, and the Reflections on this chapter.

Ver. 15. When Jeſus therefore perceived] The people thus fed by miracle were unſpeakably aſtoniſhed; for indeed it was wonderful to ſee the food extending itſelf among their hands. In the height of their tranſport, they propoſed to take Jeſus by force, and make him a king, i. e. to conſtrain him to aſſume the title of Meſſiah without further delay. Anciently it was uſual for great men, who courted the favour of the populace, to give public feaſts, at which they invited all the inhabitants of a town or city. Le Clerc therefore fancies that the multitude took the miracle of the loaves for a thing of this kind; and that they expreſſed their gratitude to Jeſus, by offering to aid him in what they ſuppoſed was his purpoſe. It is, however, full as probable, if not more ſo, that in this they fulfilled their own inclinations, which led them to wiſh for the coming of the Meſſiah's kingdom, wherein they all expected to enjoy great ſecular advantages; for, to ſay the truth, they might very naturally imagine that He, who with five loaves and two fiſhes, could feed ſo many thouſands, was in a condition to ſupport armies any length of time he pleaſed. See the note on Matth. xiv. 22. Into a mountain ſhould rather be rendered into the mountain, mentioned above, ver. 3. Before Jeſus went into this mountain, ſeveral things happened, which the other Evangeliſts have related, and to which we refer.

Ver. 16. And when even was now come] We obſerved on ver. 11. that the whole of this miraculous tranſaction was over by five o'clock in the afternoon, which may be collected from the circumſtance here mentioned, namely, that when the diſciples departed ſome time after the dinner, the ſecond evening approached; that is, it was a little before ſun-ſetting, at which time the ſecond evening began: But at that ſeaſon of the year the ſun ſet before ſix o'clock in the afternoon; for the paſſover, and conſequently the vernal equinox, was not come: Beſides, they were in the midſt of the lake by the time that the ſun was ſet. See Matth. xiv. 23. Mark vi. 47.

Ver. 17. And entered into a ſhip] Chriſt's order was, that the diſciples ſhould go to Bethſaida, as St. Mark informs us; but the wind becoming contrary, as we ſhall ſee immediately, they were obliged to ſail towards Capernaum. St. John therefore deſcribes the voyage, not as it was intended, but as it actually happened. The Evangeliſts have not told us how the twelve baſkets full of fragments were diſpoſed of; probably the diſciples carried them with them into the boat; ſo that having before their eyes this convincing evidence of the miracles, they no doubt diſcourſed about it among themſelves as they ſailed, and deliberately reflected on every circumſtance which had accompanied it. The people perceiving that Jeſus intended to ſtay, made no ſcruple to let the diſciples go: Perhaps they imagined he was ſending them away to provide ſuch things as he had need of, in order to the expedition; neither did they refuſe to diſperſe when he commanded them, propoſing all to return next morning, as they actually did; a circumſtance which proves that they did not go far away. See on Matth. xiv. 24.

Ver. 19. So when they had rowed, &c.] Probably when they found the wind ſo violent, they were afraid of being ſhipwrecked, if they came near the ſhore; and therefore, having perhaps ſailed a while before the wind, they now rowed out to ſea; for as they muſt have been ſeveral hours at ſea, one can hardly imagine, that, with ſo briſk a gale, they made no more way in all this time than a little above a league, unleſs we impute it to their having laboured all they could to avoid croſſing the ſea, and to get to Bethſaida. See Doddridge, and on Matth. xiv. 24.

Ver. 22—24. The day following, &c.] Notwithſtanding Jeſus had ordered the people to go home after he had ſent his diſciples away, they did not leave the deſart mountain. It ſeems they took notice that no boat had come thither, but the one belonging to the diſciples; and becauſe Jeſus did not go with them, they concluded that he had no deſign to leave his attendants; wherefore, though by withdrawing into the mountain, he modeſtly declined the dignity which they had offered him, they perſuaded themſelves he would be prevailed upon to accept it next day, eſpecially as they might fancy the diſciples were diſpatched to prepare matters for that purpoſe. In this hope, as ſoon as the morning was come, the people returned, deſigning to wait on Jeſus; but not finding him, they began to think he had gone off in one of the boats belonging to Tiberias, which during the ſtorm had taken ſhelter in ſome creek or other at the foot of the mountain. The moſt forward of the multitude therefore entering thoſe boats, ſailed to Capernaum, the known place of our Lord's reſidence, where they found him in the ſynagogue, teaching the people. See Macknight, and ver. 59.

Ver. 26, 27. Ye ſeek me, not becauſe ye ſaw the miracles, &c.] "Ye are not come after me, becauſe ye were convinced by my miracles of the truth of my miſſion, and are now diſpoſed to hearken to my doctrine, but becauſe ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled. Having been once fed, you expect that I will feed you frequently by miracle; and the ſatisfaction you found in that meal has made you conceive great hopes of temporal felicity under my adminiſtration. Theſe are the views with which you are following me: but you are intirely miſtaken in them; for your happineſs doth not conſiſt in the meat that periſheth, neither is it that ſort of meat which the Meſſiah will give you: wherefore you ought not to labour ſo much for the meat which periſheth, ver. 27. which nouriſhes and delights the body only, as for the meat that endureth to everlaſting life;—divine knowledge and grace, which by invigorating all the faculties of the ſoul, makes it incorruptible and immortal. Neither ought you to follow the Son of man, the Meſſiah, with a deſign to obtain the meat that periſheth, but in expectation of being fed with the meat that endureth unto everlaſting life; for it is that meat which the Son of man will give you; for him hath God the Father ſealed. By the miracle of the loaves, God the Father ſhews you, that he hath enabled and authorized me, the Son of man, to bleſs you with the meat enduring to everlaſting life, the food of your ſouls." The epithet of Father is elegantly given to God in this paſſage, as it expreſſes the relation he ſtands in to the perſon who in the preceding clauſe is called the Son of man. Some have ingeniouſly conjectured, that this clauſe alludes to a cuſtom amongſt princes, when making grand entertainments, to give a commiſſion under their hand and ſeal, or perhaps to deliver a ſignet to thoſe, whom they appointed to preſide in the management of them; though it may poſſibly be ſufficient to ſay, that to ſeal is a general phraſe for authorizing a perſon by proper credentials, whatever the purpoſe be for which they are given; or for marking a perſon out as wholly devoted to the ſervice of him whoſe ſeal he bears. See Elſner's Obſervat. vol. 1. Calmet, and Le Clerc.

Ver. 28. Then ſaid they—What ſhall we do, &c.?] The metaphors of meat and drink being very familiar to the Jews, and frequently uſed in their writings to ſignify wiſdom, knowledge, and grace, (ſee Prov. ix. 1—5. Iſai. lv. 2, 3.) they might eaſily have underſtood what Jeſus meant by the meat enduring to everlaſting life. Nevertheleſs, they miſtook him altogether, imagining that he ſpake of ſome delicious, healthful, animal food, which ſhould make men immortal, and which was not to be had, but under the Meſſiah's government. Accordingly, being much affected with his exhortation, they aſked him, What they ſhould do to work the works of God; they meant to erect the Meſſiah's kingdom, and to obtain that excellent meat, which Jeſus ſaid God had authorized the Meſſiah to give them. Works, which they imagined were preſcribed them by God, and would be moſt acceptable to him. It is proper to obſerve, that great part of the energy of this queſtion is loſt in our tranſlation, by rendering the word εργαζεσθε, ver. 27. labour; it ſhould be rendered work, as it is in this verſe, and in ver. 30. for the Greek word is the ſame in all theſe places, and the propriety of the queſtions and anſwers depends upon it.

Ver. 29, 30. This is the work of God] The Jews having their minds filled with the notion of the great empire which the Meſſiah was to erect, expected, no doubt, that Jeſus would have bidden them firſt riſe againſt the Romans, and vindicate their liberties, and then by the terror of fire and ſword, eſtabliſh the Meſſiah's authority in every country. Wherefore, when he told them that the whole work which God required of them towards erecting the Meſſiah's kingdom, was, that they ſhould believe on the Meſſiah, whom he had now ſent unto them, they were exceedingly offended, thinking that he could not be the Meſſiah promiſed in the law and the prophets; and ſome, more audacious than the reſt, had the confidence to tell him, that ſince he pretended to be the Meſſiah, and required them to believe in him as ſuch, (notwithſtanding his character appeared to them entirely different from that of the great deliverer whom they expected, being ſo humble and peaceable as to refuſe the crown, which of right pertained to the Meſſiah, and which they had offered him,) it would be proper that he ſhould ſhew greater miracles than their law-giver had performed, otherwiſe they could not be to blame, if, believing Moſes and the prophets, they perſiſted in their ancient faith concerning the Meſſiah, and concerning the duty which they owed him. The ſentiments of thoſe who ſpeak to Chriſt in this diſcourſe are ſo various, (comp. ver. 34, 41, 42.) and the Evangeliſt ſo expreſly declares that there was a debate between them, ver. 52. that it would be wrong to imagine the ſentiments in the 30th verſe to have been thoſe of the whole multitude, who had followed Chriſt with ſo much eagerneſs from place to place for ſeveral days. See the the following note, and particularly the notes on ver. 63. and on Matth xii. 38, 39.

Ver. 31—33. Our fathers did eat manna, &c.] By extolling the miracle of the manna, by calling it bread from heaven, and by inſinuating that it was Moſes's miracle, the Jews endeavoured to diſparage Chriſt's miracle of the loaves, which they affected to deſpiſe as no miracle, in compariſon of the former. It was only a ſingle meal of terreſtrial food, at which 9 or 10,000 had been fed; whereas Moſes with celeſtial food fed the whole Jewiſh nation, in number upwards of two millions; and that not for a day, but during the ſpace of 40 years in the wilderneſs: Wherefore, as if Jeſus had done no miracle at all, they ſaid to him, What ſign ſheweſt thou?—What doſt thou work?—And Jeſus replied, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Moſes gave you not the bread,—τον αρτον,—from heaven. "It was not Moſes, who in ancient times gave you the manna, neither was the manna bread from heaven; for it dropped from the air only, and is ſo called by the pſalmiſt, on account of the thing which it typified: But my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. By the miracle of the loaves, my Father has pointed out to you the true ſpiritual heavenly bread, which he himſelf giveth you, of which the manna was only a ſymbolical repreſentation, which is ſufficient to ſuſtain not a ſingle nation only, but the whole world; ver. 33. for the bread of God is that which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. The paſſage ſhould be read in this ambiguous manner, or the explication which our Lord gives in ver. 35. is intirely ſuperſeded. The purport of it is, "The manna which dropped from the air, and kept thoſe who made uſe of it alive only for a day, cannot be called the bread of God; but that is the bread of God which cometh down from God, and maketh the eater holy, happy, and immortal like God." See Macknight, Le Clerc, and on ch. i. 9.

Ver. 34, 35. Lord, evermore give us this bread] It is reaſonable to imagine, as we have obſerved a little before, that the people who now heard our Lord were of different characters: many of them, no doubt, were obſtinately perverſe, heard him with prejudice, and wreſted all his words; but others of them might be men of honeſt diſpoſitions, who liſtened to his doctrine with pleaſure, and were ready to obey it. This latter ſort, therefore, having heard him deſcribe the properties of this celeſtial bread, were greatly ſtruck with the thoughts of it, and expreſſed an earneſt deſire to be fed with it always. To theſe our Lord replied, in words of boundleſs comfort, "I am the Bread of Life,—the Bread of God, which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. He that cometh to me, and makes his application to me, ſhall never hunger; and he that believeth on me ſhall never thirſt, but may depend upon it that he ſhall find the moſt reſtleſs deſires of his ſoul ſatisfied; and, conſcious of the nobleſt refreſhment and nouriſhment already received, ſhall grow up to a ſtate of everlaſting complete ſatisfaction and enjoyment." The reader will obſerve, that coming to Chriſt, and believing on him, are correſponding terms explaining each other. Thus our Lord aſſigned one of the many reaſons why he called himſelf the Bread of Life. See ver. 47, 48, 51. The concluſion from this part of his diſcourſe is ſo evident, that he left his hearers to draw it for themſelves. It was this: "Since matters are ſo, I am manifeſtly greater than Moſes, even in reſpect of that for which you extol him moſt. He gave your fathers manna, which was a bodily food only, and nouriſhed nothing but the natural life; but I am myſelf the bread of life, the food of the ſoul, making men both happy and immortal." See on ch. iv. 14. Macknight, and Clarke's twelve Sermons.

Ver. 36, 37. But I ſaid unto you] He next turned his diſcourſe to thoſe of his hearers, who did not poſſeſs that goodneſs of heart which come to me; and him that cometh to me, I will in no wiſe caſt out.

38 For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that ſent me.

39 And this is the Father's will which hath ſent me, that of all which he hath given me, I ſhould loſe nothing, but ſhould raiſe it up again at the laſt day.

40 And this is the will of him that ſent me, that every one which ſeeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlaſting liſe: and I will raiſe him up at the laſt day.

41 The Jews then murmured at him, becauſe he ſaid, I am the bread which came down from heaven.

42 And they ſaid, Is not this Jeſus, the ſon of Joſeph, whoſe father and mother we know? how is it then that he ſaith, I came down from heaven?

43 Jeſus therefore anſwered and ſaid unto them, Murmur not among yourſelves.

44 No man can come to me, except the Father which hath ſent me, draw him: and I will raiſe him up at the laſt day.

which the former had expreſſed: "You aſk me to ſhew you a ſign, that you may ſee and believe me, ver. 30. but I muſt inform you, that you have ſeen me,—ſeen my character and miſſion in the miracles which I have performed already; i. e. you have ſeen me perform many ſigns ſufficient to convince you that I am the Meſſiah; nevertheleſs, you do not believe that I am he, but reject me as an impoſtor. Therefore your infidelity proceeds not from want of evidence, as you pretend, ver. 30. but from the perverſeneſs of your own diſpoſition, which perhaps in time may be overcome. For all that the Father giveth me, ver. 37. ſhall come to me; that is, ſhall believe on me. ver. 35. There have been many diſputes about the meaning of the Father's giving men to Chriſt; Our Lord himſelf ſeems to have determined it by the parallel expreſſion, ver. 44. No man can come unto me, except the Father draw him. To give men to Chriſt, therefore, is to draw men to Chriſt; if ſo, the ſenſe of the paſſage is, "all that the Father draweth to me, (ſee on ver. 44.) ſhall believe on me, however obſtinate they may be for a ſeaſon." This was fit matter of comfort to Jeſus, under the preſent infidelity of the Jews; by this likewiſe he encouraged his diſciples who had already believed on him. In the mean time he invited thoſe who were diſpoſed to believe, from the conſideration that he would not reject them, however low their circumſtances might be, however vile they might appear in their own eyes, or however greatly they might have injured him, by ſpeaking evil of him, and oppoſing him; him that cometh to me, I will in no wiſe caſt out. The expreſſion ὀ μὴ ἐκϐάλω ἔξω, is extremely beautiful and emphatical: It repreſents an humble ſupplicant, as coming into the houſe of ſome prince, or other great perſon, to caſt himſelf at his feet, and to commit himſelf to his protection and care. He might fear his petition would be rejected, and he thruſt out of doors; but our Lord aſſures him to the contrary. His houſe and heart are large enough to receive, ſhelter, and ſupply all the indigent and diſtreſſed. How comfortable, how glorious an Idea! No doubt many thouſand ſouls have been ſenſibly ſupported by theſe moſt gracious words.

Ver. 38. I came down from heaven, &c.] "I came not to act according to the bent of human paſſions, which lead men to return whatever injuries are done them, and therefore I will not inſtantly leave off exhorting thoſe who at firſt reject me. Neither will I inflict immediate puniſhment on them; but I will bear with them, and try all poſſible means to bring them to repentance, that they may be ſaved; for I am come to do the will of him that ſent me."

Ver. 40. Every one which ſeeth the Son, &c.] "Seeth the character and miſſion of the Son in the miracles which he worketh; and in the other evidences wherewith his miſſion is attended, as is plain from ver. 36. Dr. Heylin tranſlates it, who recognizes the Son,—ſees, ſo as to know, ὁ θεωρῶν. Comp. Matth. xxvii. 55. Luke x. 18. xxi. 6. John xvii. 24. Acts iii. 16. and Heb. vii. 4.

Ver. 41, 42. The Jews then murmured, &c.] Thus Jeſus placed the character of the Meſſiah in a light very different from that wherein his hearers had been accuſtomed to view it; and taught them, that inſtead of the temporal bleſſings which they expected from him, they were to receive none but ſpiritual benefits. Hence, as the diſpoſitions of the greateſt part of them were carnal, his doctrine offended them; eſpecially his affirming that he was the Bread of Life, and that he came down from heaven. The Jews did not find fault with Jeſus for inſinuating that the Meſſiah ſhould come down from heaven; that was a point univerſally believed; but they were diſpleaſed becauſe he ſaid, that he had come down from heaven: a thing which they could by no means believe, in regard they were acquainted with his father and mother. Dr. Wells argues from this paſſage, that Joſeph was yet alive; but its plain meaning appears to be only, "we know who were his father and mother." It ſeems however very certain that Joſeph was dead quickly after; for if he had been living, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that Jeſus, when dying on the croſs, would have conſigned his mother to the care of St. John.

Ver. 44, 45. No man can come unto me, except the Father—draw him, &c.] In explaining this paſſage, we will, firſt, ſhew the propriety of our Lord's anſwer; ſecondly, give a plain and full explication of it; and thirdly, confirm that explication by ſome remarks: I. There is ſome difficulty in perceiving the propriety of the anſwer which Jeſus here makes. The objection of the Jews was, "How can he ſay that he came down from heaven, when he was born of earthly parents, whom we know? Our Lord's anſwer to this is ſomewhat indirect; the violence of their prejudices made it neceſſary that it ſhould be ſo; but it tended to warn thoſe who were prejudiced, without exaſperating them: for, 1ſt, when we conſider the anſwer in the moſt general view, the aſſertion that divine teaching was neceſſary for their receiving him as the Meſſiah, and the quotation of a paſſage from the Old Teſtament in which this teaching had been foretold, implies a plain inſinuation, that it would not be altogether ſo eaſy to diſtinguiſh the Meſſiah as they imagined; and that ſince they ought to expect ſome difficulty, they ſhould not be poſitive that he did not come down from heaven, merely becauſe they knew not exactly in what manner he did ſo. But, 2dly, it had a ſtill more immediate reference to their objection. They expected that the Meſſiah ſhould deſcend from heaven in a viſible and glorious manner, and this was the ſign they demanded, ver. 30. (ſee on ver. 63.) but this ſign was ſo accurately determined, and ſo minutely deſcribed by their doctors, that if it had truly belonged to the Meſſiah, they muſt have known him inſtantly; There could have been no room for doubt, and conſequently no need of divine teaching. By aſſerting therefore the neceſſity of this teaching, he intimated, that they were miſtaken concerning the nature of the ſign, that is, concerning the manner of the Meſſiah's deſcent from heaven; that no ſuch deciſive mark as they expected would attend him, and that on this account they could not conclude from what they knew of the nativity of Jeſus, that he was not truly the Meſſiah. 3dly, To be drawn by the Father, is commonly and properly underſtood of men's being enlightened and convinced by the immediate influence of the Divine Spirit; but it likewiſe naturally implies their being taught by the ancient revelations which God had given. According to this ſenſe of the expreſſion, the general import of Chriſt's anſwer is, "You cannot perceive me to be the Meſſiah, or to have come down from heaven, except ye underſtand the intimations of his character, which God hath already given by the prophets; except ye apprehend the true meaning of the predictions concerning him, you miſtake their meaning in the particular to which your preſent objection refers, as well as in many others: you ought therefore to ſtudy them the more carefully; by doing this you will attain the knowledge of the real character of the Meſſiah. For it is predicted, that in his time God will teach all who are diſpoſed to learn, and then you will eaſily get over the difficulties which now perplex you: for every man that hath, in this manner, heard and learned of the father, will diſcern me to be the Meſſiah, and come unto me."

II. The propriety of our Lord's anſwer being thus ſhewn, we proceed to give a plain and full explication of it. Our Lord replies to the murmurs of the Jews, "You cannot object my birth on earth, and the meanneſs of my relations, as things inconſiſtent with an heavenly extraction; for I aſſure you, that while you believe your teachers, who have greatly corrupted divine revelation; while you entertain the prejudices wherewith they have filled your minds; and follow the ſenſual inclinations which have hitherto governed you, you cannot believe on me; for no man can do this except the father draw him, that is, teach, convince and perſuade him. You need not be ſurprized when I tell you that no man can believe on the Meſſiah except the Father draw him; for tho' you may imagine that all men will flock with great chearfulneſs to him, and yield themſelves his willing ſubjects, without any extraordinary means made uſe of to perſuade them; yet the prophets inſinuate the contrary, when they promiſe, that under the diſpenſation of the Meſſiah, men ſhall enjoy the teaching of the Father, in a far more eminent manner than under any preceding diſpenſation. See Iſa. liv. 13. Jer. xxxi. 34. Micah iv. 2. Before the advent of Chriſt, the Father ſpake to the world concerning him by the prophets; and when he appeared in the human nature on earth, he demonſtrated the truth of his miſſion by the teſtimony of John, and by voices from heaven, declaring him to be his beloved ſon, and commanding all men to hear him. He did the ſame likewiſe by the doctrines which he inſpired Jeſus to preach, by the miracles which he gave him to perform, and by the influences of the ſpirit, which he empowered him to diſpenſe. Every one, therefore, who hath heard and underſtood what the Father has ſaid concerning the Meſſiah, whether by the prophets, by John the Baptiſt, by the voices from they ſhall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me.

46 Not that any man hath ſeen the Father, ſave he which is of God, he hath ſeen the Father.

47 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, He that believeth on me hath everlaſting life.

48 I am that bread of life.

49 Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderneſs, and are dead.

50 This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die.

51 I am the living bread, which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he ſhall live for ever: and the bread that I will give, is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world.

52 The Jews therefore ſtrove amongſt themſelves, ſaying, How can this man give us his fleſh to eat?

53 Then Jeſus ſaid unto them, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Except ye eat the heaven, or by Chriſt's doctrine, miracles, and ſpirit, and has learned thereby to form a juſt notion of the Meſſiah, will come to, or believe on Jeſus, as the Meſſiah."

III. Such appears to be the exact meaning of this difficult paſſage. We obſerve further upon it, that Le Clerc, and ſome other ingenious expoſitors, think the metaphor of drawing men to Chriſt, is taken from the practice of leading cattle about, with cords faſtened to their heads or necks; but, applied to reaſonable agents, the expreſſion does not import any force or conſtraint, as is plain from Jer. xxxi. 3. where God ſays to Iſrael, with loving kindneſs have I drawn thee; that is, "by the manifold benefits I have beſtowed on thee, and particularly the revelation of my will committed to thee, I have prevailed with thee to obey me." Thus alſo our Lord uſes the expreſſion, chap. xii. 32. if I be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me; i. e. being put to death on the croſs, and raiſed from the dead, exalted into heaven, and preached through the world, I will by my word and ſpirit convince and perſuade many to follow me. See alſo Solomon's Song i. 4. and Hoſea xi. 4. Wherefore, by the Father's drawing men to Chriſt we may well underſtand, as explained above, his perſuading them to believe on him, by the ſeveral proofs wherewith he has ſupported the miſſion of his ſon; accordingly, in the following verſe, the effect which the Father's drawing hath upon men, is deſcribed by their hearing and learning of the Father. What confirms this interpretation is, that our Lord himſelf aſcribes the whole of the evidences of his miſſion to the Father: for he calls his doctrine the word which his Father had given him, chap. xvii. 8. and ſays expreſly, that his miracles were done by the Father chap. xiv. 10. Nevertheleſs, in the Father's drawing men to Chriſt, we ſhould at all times remember, that there is more included than merely eſtabliſhing the miſſion of his ſon, by ſufficient evidence; for in this ſenſe, he has as really drawn thoſe who do not believe as thoſe who do; contrary to the text, which ſays, that every man who hath heard and learned of the Father, that is, who is drawn by him, cometh to Jeſus. It is plain therefore, that by the Father's drawing men, we are likewiſe to underſtand his ſupplying whatever influences of his ſpirit and grace are neceſſary, to impreſs the evidences of religion on mens minds, in ſuch a manner as to work conviction. To conclude, a conviction ſuppoſes teachableneſs of diſpoſition, and a love of truth. His drawing men to Chriſt muſt imply, his beſtowing on them diſpoſitions and affections which qualify them for being drawn by him. See ver. 65. Macknight, and Gerard's Diſſertations, p. 194.

Ver. 46—48. Nott hat any man hath ſeen the Father] "When I ſpeak of mens hearing and learning of God, I do not mean that they can ſee God perſonally, and be taught of him in the manner, that a ſcholar is taught of his maſter. No man hath ſeen the Father perſonally, except the Son, whom the Father hath ſent, and whoſe peculiar privilege it is, to have been taught immediately by the Father the doctrine which he preaches to men. In virtue, therefore, of the ample inſtructions which I have received from him, I teſtify it as a moſt ſure and important truth, that this is the only method of ſalvation, and that it is he, and he alone, who believes in me, and repoſes himſelf on me, that hath everlaſting life. (ver. 47.) Remember therefore, that it is in this reſpect I tell you, I am the bread of life; not only as a teacher of truth, and a meſſenger from God to men, but as the great Redeemer whom you muſt receive into your hearts, and on whom you muſt as it were feed by faith, if you would indeed have your ſpiritual life to be ſupported and ſecured." Thus our Lord explained the nature of the dignity which he had aſſumed to himſelf, in the foregoing part of his diſcourſe, ver. 33, 35, 40. and demonſtrated that it really belonged to him. See Doddridge, Grotius, Clarke.

Ver. 49, 50. Your fathers did eat manna] Our Lord next drew a compariſon between Himſelf, conſidered as the bread from heaven, and the Manna which Moſes provided for their fathers in the deſart, and which they admired ſo greatly. "Thoſe who thus regard me, ſaid he, as the bread of life, will receive far more important bleſſings than Moſes, of whom you have now been boaſting, could poſſibly give: for though indeed your fathers, under the conduct of that illuſtrious prophet, did eat manna in the wilderneſs, yet it was not ſufficient to maintain their ſpiritual or temporal life; they are long ſince dead: But this of which I now ſpeak, is the true bread which cometh down from heaven, and is of ſuch a nature, that any one may eat of it, and have his life ſo nouriſhed and ſupported by it, that he ſhall not die, but be aſſuredly delivered from the condemnation and ruin to which the breach of God's righteous law has ſubjected every offender." The oppoſition between καὶ ἀπέθανον, in ver. 49, and μὴ ἀποθάνη, is elegant, and ſhews that in the former the ſpiritual death is meant, as well as in the latter. See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 51. I am the living bread] Becauſe it was a matter of infinite importance to his hearers, that they ſhould form a juſt notion of his ability to ſave them, and believe in him as the Redeemer of the world, our Lord affirmed the third time, that he was himſelf the living bread which came down from heaven, to give and to preſerve immortality; and that all who did eat of it ſhould live for ever, becauſe he was about to give them his fleſh to eat, by making it an expiation for the ſins of the world. The word Αρτος rendered bread in this diſcourſe, might be better tranſlated, according to the Hebrew idiom, the meat, and particularly in this verſe. There is a beautiful gradation obſervable in our Lord's diſcourſe. The firſt time that he called himſelf the bread of life, ver. 35, he aſſigned the reaſon of the name ſomewhat obſcurely; He that cometh to me ſhall never hunger, and he that believeth on me ſhall never thirſt. The ſecond time that he called himſelf the bread of life, ver. 47, 48. he ſpake to the ſame purpoſe as before, but more plainly; he that believeth on me hath everlaſting life, therefore I am the bread of life; and by connecting this with his affirmation, ver. 46. that he was the only teacher of mankind who had ever ſeen, and been perſonally taught by the Father, he inſinuated that he gave life to men by his doctrine, being on that account alſo the bread of life. The third time he called himſelf bread, he added to the name the epithet of living, not only becauſe he gives ſpiritual life to men, raiſes them from the dead, and makes them eternally happy, but becauſe he gives them this life by means of his human nature, which was not an inanimate thing, like the manna, but a living ſubſtance; for he told them plainly, that the bread or meat which he would give them, was his fleſh, which he would give for the life of the world; and ſpake of men's eating it, in order to its having that effect: but to the meaning of this expreſſion he had before directed them, when in calling himſelf the bread of life, he always joined the believing on him, as neceſſary to men's living by him; wherefore to eat, in the remaining part of this diſcourſe, is to believe. There appears another beautiful gradation in this verſe, compared with ver. 31. The Jews had inſinuated, that feeding a few thouſands with the five loaves was an inconſiderable thing, when compared with what Moſes did; but our Lord declares the purpoſes of his grace and bounty to be far more extenſive, as reaching tothe whole world, and giving life, immortal life, to all that ſhould believe in him, the great atoning ſacrifice for all mankind.

Ver. 52. The Jews therefore ſtrove] All the terms made uſe of by our Lord, on this occaſion, were ſuch as the Jews had been accuſtomed to interpret figuratively; for which reaſon they might eaſily have underſtood them: Nevertheleſs, taking them in a literal ſenſe, they were aſtoniſhed beyond meaſure, and fell into keen diſputes,—ἐμάχοντο,—about the meaning of them: They debated ſtrongly, ſome being inclined to believe, others to reject this doctrine. Obſerve the degrees, the Jews are to be tried here, the diſciples ver. 60, 66. the apoſtles ver. 67.

Ver. 53. Then Jeſus ſaid, &c.] Dr. Clarke obſerves here that Jeſus, knowing how unreaſonable his hearers were, did not think fit to explain himſelf more particularly at this time; but perſiſting in the ſame figurative way of expreſſing himſelf, he repeated and affirmed more earneſtly what he had aſſerted before. His meaning appears to be, "Except you be entirely united to me, by a hearty belief and practice of my doctrine, and partake of the merit of that ſacrifice which I ſhall offer for the ſins of the world, continue in the communion of my religion, and receive ſpiritual nouriſhment by the continual participation of thoſe means of grace which I ſhall purchaſe for you by my death,—you can never attain eternal life." The fleſh of Chriſt ſeems to be put here for the whole of his human nature; ſee ver. 51. as it is elſewhere in Scripture; ch. i. 14. Rom. i. 3. Wherefore, by eating his fleſh, and drinking his blood, is not meant any corporeal action, but men's receiving with thankfulneſs thoſe bleſſings, to confer which our Lord aſſumed the human nature; and conſequently, their believing the revelation he came to make concerning the merciful counſels of God; or, as he himſelf expreſſes it, ver. 63. The words that he ſpake unto them; eſpecially concerning his incarnation, fleſh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.

54 Whoſo eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raiſe him up at the laſt day.

55 For my fleſh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed.

56 He that eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him.

57 As the living Father hath ſent me, and I live by the Father: ſo, he that eateth me, even he ſhall live by me.

58 This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread, ſhall live for ever.

59 Theſe things ſaid he in the ſynagogue, as he taught in Capernaum.

60 Many therefore of his diſciples, when they had heard this, ſaid, This is an hard ſaying; who can hear it?

Ver. 54. Ver. 27. Ch. iv. 14.—V. 58. Ver. 50, 51.

incarnation, and his dying to make atonement for ſin. Theſe articles of the Chriſtian faith being particularly underſtood here, give propriety to the metaphors of eating Chriſt's fleſh, and drinking his blood, by which the whole of that faith is denominated. The reaſon is, Of all the diſcoveries made by Chriſt, thoſe concerning his incarnation, and the nature and ends of his own death, received and meditated upon by a lively faith, afford ſovereign and ſalutary nouriſhment to the minds of ſinners. They are as effectual for ſuſtaining the ſpiritual life in the ſoul, as fleſh, fitly prepared, is for nouriſhing the animal life in the body. Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that the phraſe before us, except ye eat, &c. naturally expreſſes a lively and habitual regard to Chriſt, as the great ſupport of the ſpiritual life. The mention of his blood as naturally leads to the thought of his atonement; for we are elſewhere told, that we have redemption through his blood, Epheſ. i. 7. and boldneſs to enter into the holieſt by the blood of Jeſus, Heb. x. 19. The ſacrament of the Euchariſt is plainly intended to affect our minds with a ſenſe of theſe important truths; and our Lord might very probably think of that intended inſtitution while he ſpoke. But as this was a future thing, and utterly unknown to his hearers, it ſeems to me unwarrantable to interpret this text, as chiefly referring to that ordinance; and nothing can be more precarious than many conſequences which have been drawn from it in that view, though ſome of them be authorized by very great names. See Waterland's Treatiſe on the Euchariſt, and Ridley's Sermons on the Sacrament.

Ver. 54, 55. Whoſo eateth my fleſh] "Whoſo thus feedeth upon me by faith, hath the principle of eternal life implanted in him, and ſhall enjoy it, becauſe I will raiſe him up at the laſt day; For my fleſh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed; [or, according to Dr. Waterland, "My fleſh is really meat, and my blood is really drink, not typically, as the manna."] They are the true nutriment of the ſoul; they feed it, and make it to grow. They give vigor to all its faculties, preſerve it continually alive, and make it fit for heaven." See ver. 32. ch. i. 19. xv. 1.

Ver. 56. Dwelleth in me, and I in him] "We are moſt intimately connected together in the cloſeſt friendſhip; and therefore whatever bleſſings I can beſtow, whether by my own power, or by my intereſt with the Father, or by the influences of my Spirit; my friends ſhall enjoy them in full perfection." The expreſſion of perſons dwelling in each other, occurs frequently in St. John's writings, and denotes the cloſeſt union of affections and intereſts: Wherefore, according to the grand figure made uſe of by St. Paul, it ſignifies that he who truly believes on Chriſt, is ſo united to him, as to be a member of his body, and conſequently a partaker with him of his life and immortality, and of all the happineſs which he himſelf enjoys, or is able to communicate. The Cambridge manuſcript, and one of Stephens's, adds after this verſe, As the Father is in me, and I in the Father, verily, verily, I ſay unto you, except ye receive the body of the Son of man as the bread of life, ye have no life in you; but the paſſage appears evidently to be ſpurious. See Whitby's Examen Millii. p. 49. Wetſtein, and Wolfius,

Ver. 57. As the living Father hath ſent me] "As it is my meat and drink to do the will of the Father, who is the author of life and happineſs; as I nouriſh and delight my mind with the punctual execution of all the orders he gave me, when he ſent me into the world; ſo he that eateth me, he that believes my doctrine, and obeys my precepts, ſhall find therein perpetual nouriſhment and refreſhment to his ſoul." Or the meaning may be, "As I ſhall live, after I am put to death, becauſe I am ſent by the Father, the Author of life; and becauſe he dwells in me, and I in him; ſo he that eateth me, and thereby has me dwelling in him, ſhall, after he dies, be raiſed again by me." See Macknight. Some think that the expreſſion, I live by the Father, refers to the Father's providential care and protection; and they obſerve, that the human and derived nature of Chriſt, had, no doubt, the ſame dependance on the providence and influence of God, that other creatures have; and though Chriſt, as Mediator, has life in himſelf, (ch. v. 26.) yet was it given him of the Father; and it is he that qualifies Chriſt by his Spirit for the great work, for which he ſent him into the world: and he accordingly is elſewhere repreſented as upholding him in it; Iſai. xlii. 1. comp. ch. viii. 29. xvi. 32. and ſee Doddridge, Chemnitz, and Le Clerc.

Ver. 58. This is that bread which came down, &c.] "If you attend to theſe important hints which I have given, you may in general know what I meant, by ſaying, as I have done, This is the bread that came down from heaven; a kind of bread, infinitely ſuperior to the manna, both in its nature and efficacy; for it is to be eaten by you, not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: it is neither to be eaten the ſame way that your Fathers did eat the manna, nor with the ſame effect; but he that eateth of this bread, ſhall live for ever." See ver. 50. Grotius would read the clauſe, not as your fathers, &c. thus, Not like that manna which your fathers did eat, and are dead: The paſſage is elliptical, and the explication given above ſeems to expreſs its true ſenſe. A brief analyſis of this paſſage, reſpecting the bread of life, will perhaps make the whole more clear. We have heretofore obſerved, that it was cuſtomary with our Lord to accommodate his diſcourſes to the occaſions which gave riſe to them, and to draw inſtructions and reflections from the objects which preſented themſelves. See on Matth. v. 2. The tenor of the preſent diſcourſe, conſidered in this view, will appear more beautiful. We are told, ver. 26. that the Jews followed our Lord becauſe of the miracle of the loaves, and in expectation of further ſupport. He reproves them on that account, ver. 27. and exhorts them to deſire and ſeek that bread, which endureth to everlaſting life; that divine knowledge and grace, which was the proper food of the ſoul, and which, being received by faith in him, would bring them to immortality. They then aſk him, how they ſhould do this; and in reply he tells them plainly, ver. 29. by believing on him: On this they declare, that they will not believe, unleſs he give them ſome ſign, ſome eminent miracle, ver. 30. and they mention Moſes as having brought them manna from heaven, and intimate that they would expect no leſs a miracle from him, ver. 31. Upon this he compares himſelf with the manna; ſhews how much he ſurpaſſed it, and continues the compariſon between himſelf and bread, ver. 33. This compariſon, wherein he aſſerts, that He was the bread which came down from heaven, offends the Jews, ver. 41. Chriſt therefore reſumes the ſubject, and confidently aſſerts, I am that bread of life, ver. 48. That is, "that ſpiritual food, which will bring men to everlaſting life." And this bread, ſays he, is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world; that is, "I will die, as an atoning ſacrifice, to bring men to life eternal." As if they had not underſtood him all this while, though he had at firſt ſpoken to them in plain terms, and expreſſed the whole of his meaning by believing on him, ver. 29 and 35. and only made uſe of this figurative method in anſwer to their propoſals, —they pervert his meaning, and aſk, How can this man give us his fleſh? ver. 52. In anſwer to which he replies, ver. 53. Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, except ye eat, &c. ſtill meaning what he had meant all this while, in oppoſition to the manna, that his doctrine, for the preaching whereof he was ſent down from heaven, and that grace which ſhould be purchaſed for them by his death, was the moſt excellent food for their ſouls; which would maintain their ſpiritual and eternal life, and be to them the ſource and fountain of perpetual exiſtence and happineſs, ver. 54—58. From this analyſis we learn, that the amount of the foregoing diſcourſe is, that Chriſt,—the mortal, deſpiſed, and crucified Chriſt, who took our fleſh, came down from heaven, lived and died among us, to reveal his father's will, and work belief in us, is the food of our ſouls; the believing and obeying of whom will ſupport our ſpiritual life, as food ſuſtains the animal life: and we may infer from hence what our faith is, which Chriſt repreſents as ſo highly neceſſary, and which can be no leſs than ſuch a belief of the great doctrines of Chriſtianity, as ſhall influence our lives and practice. Our Lord's comparing himſelf to bread in this ſenſe, is no more than his comparing himſelf to a ſower, and his doctrine to ſeed, in another place. See Grotius, and Hammond.

Ver. 59. Theſe things ſaid he in the ſynagogue] It is very probable that theſe diſcourſes were introduced after prayer, and the reading of the law. We are not to wonder at the dialogue which paſſed here; there are many other inſtances of diſputes which Chriſt and his apoſtles had with the Jews in their ſynagogues. See Matth. xii. 9. Luke xiii. 10. Acts xiii. 44. and xvii. 17.

Ver. 60. Many therefore of his diſciples] Moſt of the metaphors in this diſcourſe, and particularly that of food, to ſignify doctrine, and of eating and drinking to ſignify believing, were abundantly eaſy, and might have been underſtood at the very firſt by the Jews, being found in their Scriptures, and uſed in their ſchools: Only, not being able to comprehend what he meant by his fleſh, they took the whole literally, and were ſo offended at the thought of eating his fleſh and drinking his blood,—a thing not only prohibited by the law of Moſes, but repugnant to the cuſtoms of all civilized nations,—that many of them who were his diſciples, when they heard it, ſaid, "This is an hard ſaying; a very ſtrange and difficult, if not an unintelligible and abſurd expreſſion; Who can hear it? Who can believe and obey it?" See Macknight, and Grotius.

61 When Jeſus knew in himſelf, that his diſciples murmured at it, he ſaid unto them, Doth this offend you?

62 What and if ye ſhall ſee the Son of man aſcend up where he was before?

63 It is the ſpirit that quickeneth; the fleſh profiteth nothing: the words that I ſpeak unto you, they are ſpirit, and they are life.

64 But there are ſome of you that believe not. For Jeſus knew from the beginning, who they were that believed not, and who ſhould betray him.

65 And he ſaid, Therefore ſaid I unto you, that no man can come unto me, except it were given unto him of my Father.

66 From that time many of his diſciples went back, and walked no more with him.

67 Then ſaid Jeſus unto the twelve, Will ye alſo go away?

68 Then Simon Peter anſwered him, Lord, to whom ſhall we go? thou haſt the words of eternal life.

69 And we believe, and are ſure that thou art that Chriſt, the Son of the living God.

Ver. 62. Ch. iii. 13. Acts i. 9. Epheſ. iv. 8.—V. 63. 2 Cor. iii. 6.—V. 64. Ch. ii. 24, 25. xiii. 11.—V. 65. Ver. 44, 45. V. 68. Acts v. 20.—V. 69. Matth. xvi. 16. Ch. i. 49. xi. 27.

Ver. 61, 62. Doth this offend you?] "Are you offended becauſe I ſaid my fleſh is bread, and that it came down from heaven, and that you muſt eat my fleſh and drink my blood, in order to your having eternal life?—What if ye ſhall ſee me aſcend up into heaven bodily, where I was before? will not that convince you of the truth, of my having come down from heaven? Will it not ſhew you likewiſe, that I never intended you ſhould eat my fleſh in a corporal manner, and conſequently that my diſcourſe is to be taken in a figurative ſenſe?" See the next verſe.

Ver. 63. It is the Spirit that quickeneth] As a key to his former diſcourſe, our Lord added, "As in the human frame, it is the indwelling ſpirit which quickens every part of it; and the fleſh, how exactly ſoever organized and adorned, if ſeparate from that, profits nothing, but is an inſenſible and inactive corpſe; ſo alſo the words which I ſpeak unto you are ſpirit; i. e. they are to be taken in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and then you will find they are life to your ſouls. Whereas, to take them in a literal ſenſe, would be moſt unprofitable and monſtrous. It is indeed ſtrange that you ſhould think of it in this ſenſe; but I know there are ſome of you who believe not, and would ſhelter your infidelity under theſe mean and diſingenuous cavils."

We will here, as promiſed on ver. 30. conſider our Saviour's diſcourſe in reference to the ſign which the Jews aſked of him. The day after our Lord had firſt miraculouſly fed the great multitude, while he was teaching them in expreſſions borrowed from that miracle, and urging them to believe on him. They ſaid, What ſign ſheweſt thou, &c. ver. 30. thus intimating, that it would be ſoon enough to receive him as the Meſſiah, when he aſſumed the kingdom in the manner which they imagined was fixed by Daniel's prediction. See Dan. vii. 13, 14. and on Matth. xii. 38. That without this no miracles of another ſort could prove his claim; and they particularly inſinuated, that his having given one meal to a multitude by miracle was nothing extraordinary, but far inferior to Moſes' having fed many more for a longer time with manna from heaven, His diſcourſe on this occaſion is much larger, and more complex, than any of the anſwers which he gave to the ſame demand at other times. There are many reaſons for this; they expreſſed their contempt of the miracle of the loaves, as well as aſked a ſign; He ſpake figuratively, in alluſion to that miracle, on purpoſe to inculcate its fitneſs for proving, that he was impowered to beſtow eternal life. Several particular difficulties were moved in the courſe of his ſermon; ſo that his anſwer to the demand of a ſign is interſperſed with a variety of other ſubjects; many things however which he ſaid, tend directly to ſhew them that they were miſtaken in the nature of the ſign which they expected, and to lead them into right apprehenſions of the manner and purpoſe of the Meſſiah's coming. Thus, though he came not down in the manner which they imagined Daniel had foretold, he aſſures them ſeveral times that he actually came down from heaven, ver. 32, 33, 35, 38, 58. Particularly, when they inſinuated that this could not be, becauſe he was deſcended of earthly parents, he affirms very expreſsly, that notwithſtanding this he did come down from heaven, and intimates, that according to the ancient prophets, the Meſſiah ought not to come from heaven in ſuch a manner as they expected, which would have made the Jews flock to him eagerly, without the need of any extraordinary means. See ver. 41 to 51. Our Lord uſes ſuch expreſſions as may at the ſame time imply, that they exaggerated the miracle of the manna moſt extravagantly. In order to lead them to rectify their miſtake, he further informs them plainly, that the ſalvation and life which he would beſtow, were very different from the temporal deliverance and proſperity which they expected under the Meſſiah. Whence they might eaſily collect, that the manner of the Meſſiah's appearance would likewiſe differ from their notion, which ſuited only a temporal king. He conſtantly repreſents what he promiſes, as ſalvation and life, which would be given only at the laſt day, in conſequence of their being raiſed again from the graves; and therefore, obviouſly, as wholly ſpiritual and eternal. He ſeems even anxiouſly to keep this in view; (ſee ver. 39, 40, 44, 47, 50, 51, 54, 58.) nay, he tells them expreſly, that far from being ſuch a triumphant Meſſiah as they looked for, he was to die, and that the bleſſings which he promiſed would reſult from his death. The meat that I will give is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world, ver. 51. He aſſures them likewiſe, that he would aſcend again into heaven, What and if ye ſhall ſee the Son of man aſcend up where he was before? ver. 62. This is equivalent to the mention of his reſurrection on ſimilar occaſions: it is an intimation that he would be proved to be the Meſſiah by an appearance as remarkable as the ſign which they demanded; and it is an intimation of the true nature of his kingdom, and of the manner of his entering of it. Finally, to this intimation he ſubjoins the caution in the preſent 63d verſe, It is the ſpirit, &c. which certainly implies a warning that his preſent diſcourſe was deſignedly figurative, and therefore ought not to be groſsly interpreted; but it may likewiſe imply a hint, that theſe miſtakes about the Meſſiah, and particularly their expectation of what they called a ſign from heaven, proceeded from their underſtanding the figurative expreſſions of the ancient prophecies in too ſtrict and literal a ſenſe, and that his account of himſelf and his kingdom was really agreeable to the ſpirit and true meaning of them. Thus the ſubſtance of our Lord's diſcourſe on this occaſion is the ſame with that of his anſwer to the demand of a ſign at all other times, though the form be different; and it has the directeſt tendency to ſhew them that they were miſtaken; to warn them againſt ſuſpending their faith on a ſign, the expectation of which had no foundation except in their own imaginations; and againſt rejecting him, in oppoſition to the ſtrongeſt evidence, merely becauſe this fancied ſign attended him not. See Gerard's Diſſertations, p. 191, &c.

Ver. 64. For Jeſus knew from the beginning] Our Lord inſinuates, that he knew who would believe in him, among the vaſt multitude of his auditors; and more particularly, that he knew who would continue his diſciples among thoſe who had profeſſed themſelves ſuch even from their firſt attending him; and that even amongſt his apoſtles he knew who was to betray him; and that conſequently, in chooſing him he was guilty of no indiſcretion, as in continuing him amongſt the apoſtles, he ſhewed he did nothing in his greateſt privacies which was culpable. It is plain from this verſe, that God foreſees future contingencies;

> But his foreknowledge cauſes not the fault,
> Which had no leſs proved certain, unforeknown.

See on ver. 71, and Grotius.

Ver. 65. Therefore I ſaid unto you] "Becauſe I know perfectly the inward frame of your minds, therefore I told you, that no man can believe on me, except an opportunity of knowing the evidence of my miſſion, a capacity to judge of it, and ſuch a hearty love of the truth, as will prompt him to uſe the means proper for diſcovering it, and when diſcovered, diſpoſe him chearfully to receive it, are given him of my father. The words of this verſe, with thoſe of ver. 37. are our Lord's own paraphraſe of that difficult expreſſion ver. 44. no man can come unto me, except the Father draw him; wherefore the explication given of it above muſt be juſt, conſequently the gloſs of Dr. Clarke and others, is far from expreſſing the true and determinate ſenſe; for they aſſert its meaning to be, that no man can effectually believe in Chriſt, except he firſt believe in God; natural religion being the beſt preparative for the reception of the Doctrines of Chriſt. See Clark's Sermons, vol. 3.

Ver. 66. From that time many of his diſciples, &c.] This ſermon was in all its different branches ſo offenſive to the Jews, that many of them, who till now had been our Lord's diſciples, finding by the general ſtrain of it, that their ambitious carnal views were to be utterly diſappointed, went out of the ſynagogue in diſguſt, and never came to hear our Lord more. See Macknight.

Ver. 67—69. Then ſaid Jeſus unto the twelve] The doctrine of our Saviour had given ſuch offence to his hearers, that many, even of his diſciples, went back, and walked no more with him. Upon which occaſion he put this queſtion to the twelve, Will ye alſo go away? To which St. Peter, in the name of all, made anſwer, Lord, to whom ſhall we go? Thou haſt the words of eternal life. In alluſion to, and acknowledgment of what Jeſus had ſaid concerning his fleſh, namely, that it was the bread of life; he adds, And we believe, and are ſure, that thou art the Chriſt, &c. In this anſwer there are three things expreſſed or implied, as the ground of their conſtancy and adherence to Chriſt. The firſt is, the miſerable condition they ſhould be in, if they did forſake him, having no other in whom they could 70 Jeſus anſwered them, Have not I choſen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?

Ver. 70. Luke vi. 13. Ch. xiii. 27.

could truſt; Lord, to whom ſhall we go? The ſecond is, the excellency of his religion, and the certain means it afforded of obtaining that which is the great end of religion, a bleſſed life after this; thou haſt the words of eternal life. The third is, the authority and divine commiſſion of Chriſt, upon which their faith and confidence was built; we believe and are ſure, &c. To believe, becauſe we have ſufficient reaſon to determine our belief, is a rational faith; and this is what is meant by the word εγνωκαμεν, we are ſure; "we believe, becauſe from the things we have heard and ſeen of thee, we have determined with ourſelves, that thou art that Chriſt the Son of the living God;" thus expreſly declaring, that he was of a different opinion from thoſe who called Jeſus the ſon of Joſeph, ver. 42. Theſe three reaſons which Peter gives for adherence to Chriſt, refer to as many general principles or maxims; as firſt, that religion is the only means by which men can arrive at true happineſs, by which they can attain to the laſt perfection and dignity of their nature, and does not in the preſent circumſtances of the world, depend on human reaſonings or inventions; for was this the caſe, we need not to go from home for religion, or to ſeek further than our own breaſt, for the means of reconciling ourſelves to God, and obtaining his favour; and in conſequence of it, life eternal. Upon ſuch ſuppoſition St. Peter would have argued very weakly in ſaying, to whom ſhall we go? for to whom need they go to learn that which they were able to teach themſelves? The ſecond principle referred to is, that the great end of religion is future happineſs, and conſequently the beſt religion is that which will moſt ſurely direct us to eternal life; upon this ground St. Peter prefers the goſpel of Chriſt; Thou haſt the words of eternal life. The third principle is, that the authority and word of God is the only ſure foundation of religion, and the only reaſonable ground for us to build our hopes on. Thus St. Peter accounts for his confidence in the religion which Chriſt taught; we know and are ſure, that thou art that Chriſt, the Son of the living God. See Biſhop Sherlock's Diſcourſe 1. vol. i.

Ver. 70. Jeſus anſwered—have I not choſe you twelve, &c.?] "The opinion of my character and miſſion, which thou, O Peter, haſt expreſſed in thine own name, and in the name of thy brethren, is juſt: however, I am ſenſible that you are not all agreed in this confeſſion; for one of you is a devil, a malicious informer, and ſo very bad a man, that he will betray me. It is true, I made choice of this very perſon equally with the reſt, to be my apoſtle and companion; but from what I now tell you will happen, I hope you are convinced I did not pitch upon ſo unworthy a perſon through ignorance of his wicked diſpoſition. I was intimately acquainted with the character and diſpoſitions of all of you, and in my choice of you had it in view to make each of you aſſiſt me, according to his qualities, whether good or bad, in carrying on the grand deſign I am come to execute. By this argument, therefore, you may know that I am the Meſſiah, the Son of the living God, and that your faith is well founded on me." According to Mr. Locke our Lord intimates, that the reaſon why he had not more plainly declared himſelf to be the Meſſiah, was becauſe he knew Judas would have accuſed him of rebellion againſt the Romans; for the word Διαβολος does ſometimes ſignify a falſe accuſer. See 1 Tim. iii. 4. 2 Tim. iii. 3. and Titus ii. 3. But there does not appear to be any proof that Judas from the beginning intended to betray Chriſt. It is more than probable that he had firſt engaged with him in expectation of ſecular advantages, and finding thoſe views diſappointed, he might now begin to form that deteſtable ſcheme which he afterwards executed. If this was the occaſion on which he firſt entertained the thought, as appears highly probable, one would imagine that ſuch an intimation of his ſecret wickedneſs muſt have ſtruck him to the heart. See Doddridge, and Locke's Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity.

Ver. 71. He ſpake of Judas Iſcariot] Though our Lord did not at that time think fit to mention Judas, the Evangeliſt adds this gloſs, to ſhew, that no other diſciple was ſuſpected. Jeſus called Judas a devil, becauſe he was to be an apoſtate and traitor: ſo likewiſe in refuſing St. Peter, who had expreſſed an utter averſion to our Lord's ſuffering at Jeruſalem, He called him Satan, on account of that one act by which he oppoſed the great deſign of his coming into the world: wherefore he might much more give Judas the name of devil, who reſembled Satan ſo nearly in the wickedneſs of his diſpoſitions and actions. Some would render the ſecond clauſe, for he had thoughts of betraying him, though he was one of the twelve; for had not this been the caſe, they think that Chriſt would not have ſaid he is a devil, but rather that he would become one. In fine, our Lord by declaring that he had knowingly made choice of a traitor to be one of the twelve who conſtantly attended him, inſinuated that in his moſt retired hours and ſecret actions he was not afraid of the eyes of his enemies; wherefore, having initiated a perſon of this character into all the myſteries of his fellowſhip, no man can ſuſpect that he was carrying on a plot to deceive the world; for if he had, Judas, when he deſerted and betrayed him to the prieſts, would not have failed to diſcover the impoſture. See Macknight, Calmet, Grotius.

REFLECTIONS ON THE MIRACLE OF THE LOAVES AND FISHES, Ver. 5—14.

It is a misfortune that truth, often preſented to the mind in the ſame view, loſes its force by repetition. According to reaſon, the more we are aſſured of it, the more we ſhould be affected: but we find by experience that the moſt important truths, by being often repreſented after the ſame manner, become gradually leſs affecting; they grow familiar, they grow inſipid, and at laſt nauſeous. The divine wiſdom and goodneſs has therefore in the holy Scripture diverſified the ſame truths with an almoſt infinite variety of circumſtances, exhibiting duty in new lights, proper to awaken attention, and perſuade obedience with ſuch efficacy, as is natural, where novelty exerts its uſual force to make impreſſions on us.

That we are continually maintained by the Providence of God, is a notorious truth; yet grown ſo trite that it rarely moves our gratitude: but the portion of Scripture now before us, may ſerve to enliven it with the new circumſtances, in which it repreſents our obligations to God for our daily food; which is as verily his gift to us, as the loaves and fiſhes miraculouſly encreaſed to feed thouſands, were the gift of Chriſt to that multitude.

Had we been preſent at that wondrous feaſt, and ſeen the creating hands of our Lord actually producing food, encreaſing the ſmall pittance of bread and fiſh to a quantity ſufficient to feed ſo many thouſands; with what pleaſing wonder and awe ſhould we have felt ourſelves ſeized! with what devout thankfulneſs ſhould we have received our portion of the miraculous entertainment!

Now, every meal we eat is in reality as much the gift of our Lord, as was that amazing banquet. His power created, and his goodneſs beſtows our every morſel. The whole world indeed is his family, for which he daily provides, and gives to every creature his food in due ſeaſon. He cauſeth the graſs (ſaith the Pſalmiſt) to grow for the cattle, and herb for the ſervice of man, that he may bring forth food out of the earth. Thus are all things living in the earth, air, and ſea ſubſiſted by God: and as they are ſo ſubſiſted chiefly for the ſake of man, and ſubjected to his dominion; he, as the prieſt of this lower world, muſt pay their homage and ſervice to the common Lord. God has made man to have dominion over his other works, giving him a kind of property in them: and it is therefore highly reaſonable that man ſhould pay their tribute of praiſe, they themſelves not being capable of knowing their dependance on God. The young lions are ſaid to ſeek their meat from God, and the young ravens to cry unto him; yet theſe are only the complaints of languiſhing nature, heard and relieved by the God of nature, but not directly addreſſed to him. Man alone is capable to hold ſuch communion with God, to know his goodneſs, and celebrate his praiſe. Yet moſt men live as inſenſible of their obligations to him as the meaneſt animals, who have no capacities to apprehend them. Though they receive their daily ſuſtenance from God, yet make they no returns of praiſe or thankſgiving. And the reaſon is, becauſe their ſuſtenance comes naturally, i. e. by the miniſtry of ſecond cauſes: for nature is the eſtabliſhed method by which God produces it. But ſecond cauſes do not derogate from the firſt; though to the great reproach of human reaſon they too often obſcure it. And therefore our Lord, in the caſe before us, acted without them; producing food immeately by his creative power, and ſhewing, without a veil, to whom we owe it. This is the ſentiment which I purpoſe, with Gods bleſſing, now to inculcate, after briefly re-conſidering the ſtory upon which it is grounded.

Great multitudes had followed our Lord from the neighbouring cities and villages into the wilderneſs. Their attention to his doctrine, and admiration of his miracles, had ſuſpended the call of natural appetite; and a holy care for their ſouls had made them, for a while, neglect their bodies:—a happy and a glorious neglect, which ſometimes devout ſouls fall into, when, hungering and thirſting after righteouſneſs they faſt, and deny themſelves more than their bodily ſtrength will bear: an error indeed, but ſuch as rather moves the compaſſion than the anger of our merciful Redeemer. For it is ſaid, that He called his diſciples, and ſaid unto them, I have compaſſion on the multitude, becauſe they have now been with me three days, and have nothing to eat. And if I ſend them away faſting to their own houſes, they will faint by the way,—for many of them came from far. And his diſciples anſwered him, From whence can a man ſatisfy theſe men with bread here in the wilderneſs? The place indeed was a wilderneſs, a barren deſart;—but Chriſt was there: he who furniſhed a table in the wilderneſs for their forefathers; he who gives the fruitful vallies their fertility, and whoſe open hand filleth all things living with plenteouſneſs. He was there; and could immediately have created food for their preſent ſupply, as he did the world out of nothing. Why then did he enquire for the ſeven loaves?—ſeven ſtones, or ſeven clods of earth were as ſufficient in his hand to have fed his many thouſand gueſts. All things were equally poſſibly to his power, but not equally agreeable to his wiſdom. He was to teach in every action, and ſet an example in all he did. And therefore, though poſſeſſed of the inexhauſtible ſtores of Omnipotence, he extended his power only in ſuch degree as the preſent occaſion called for. Seven loaves he had, and thoſe he uſed: but ſeven were not ſufficient, and therefore he produced a miraculous ſupply.—He uſed the ordinary means as far as they would go, and had recourſe to the extraordinary only as a ſupplement to their deficiency. A great leſſon to us, as on the one hand not to tempt God with vain and preſumptuous expectations of aſſiſtance, when the abilities already given are ſufficient, if we duly exert them: ſo on the other hand, to rely with a ſteady aſſurance upon his goodneſs, after we have uſed our utmoſt endeavours, and done the beſt we can.

To inſtruct us in this, our Lord took the ſmall pittance that was Jeſus reproveth the ambition and boldneſs of his kinſmen: goeth up from Galilee to the feaſt of tabernacles: teacheth in the temple. Divers opinions of him among the people. The Phariſees are angry that their officers took him not, and chide with Nicodemus for his taking Chriſt's part.

at hand, the ſeven loaves and few ſmall fiſhes —For theſe He gave thanks (ſeeing theſe were all) and he brake them, and gave to the diſciples, and the diſciples to the multitude: and they did all eat, and were filled; And at the ſame time, doubtleſs, their minds were affected with reverence, and the warmeſt emotions of gratitude. For we read that thoſe who ſaw and partook of it, were ſo ſenſibly affected, that they immediately profeſſed their faith in him as the great Meſſias: and in the ſudden tranſports of their zeal they would have made him their King, and at length grew ſo importunate, that they would by violence conſtrain him to accept that office: for the Evangeliſt adds, that when Jeſus therefore perceived that they would come and take him by force, to make him a King, he departed again into a mountain himſelf alone. He fled from offered royalty, for he came into the world for a far higher end, than to wear its crowns. He was indeed a King, and to this end was he born, (as he declared before Pilate) and for this cauſe came he into the world, that he ſhould bear witneſs to the truth of his being ſo. But his dominion was not of this world; it was a ſpiritual dominion, a rule over ſouls, an everlaſting kingdom of ſaints. All other empire was unworthy him, and far beneath his innate ſupremacy.

The people therefore were miſtaken in offering him a temporal crown: but though they erred in that particular, through the groſsneſs of their apprehenſions, yet they judged true in the main, that ſuch obligations required the utmoſt efforts of gratitude: that the power which created their food had a rightful claim to their ſubjection; that the goodneſs which beſtowed it deſerved their obedience; that they ought to be wholly devoted to his ſervice who maintained them; and in a word, that they ſhould live for him, by whom they live.

This concluſion was moſt juſt and rational. Why then do not we agree in it? They would have made Chriſt their King for one meal thus beſtowed. We receive our daily ſuſtenance from him, yet the greater part make no ſuch return of homage and obedience. And why are we leſs affected than that multitude? The cauſe lies only in the manner, nor the matter of the obligation; it is becauſe we receive it by the mediation of natural cauſes, which proceed in a regular uninterrupted courſe, according to the wiſe appointment of the God of nature.

That we call the courſe of nature, is truly the will of God, and a continual exertion of his Providence. St. Paul ſays that God gives us rain from heaven, and mankind naturally ſeek to him for it in their want. Yet rain proceeds from natural cauſes, but is not leſs the gift of God, becauſe beſtowed by means that are ordinary and eſtabliſhed. So our Lord in that part of his ſermon on the mount which concerns Providence, ſaith, that God feedeth the ravens: and God does as verily feed them, as they by his appointment fed his prophet Elijah at the banks of Kidron. Yet no man doubts but they are fed by the ordinary courſe of nature, which is not leſs providential, becauſe conſtant and regular.

Nature is the ſervant of God, and miniſters our food, as the diſciples did the loaves multiplied by our Lord: and our gratitude ſhould terminate in him, as theirs did, when they would have made him their king. But our minds are not affected with things that happen often: we contract a certain familiarity with common events, and the daily wonders of nature grow cheap and unaffecting by their frequency. Things which rarely happen, ſtrike; whereas frequency leſſens the admiration of things, though in themſelves ever ſo admirable. This miracle of the multiplied loaves has only its novelty to recommend it, the others as much deſerve our devout acknowledgments.

We may beſt judge of this by ſome other inſtances. Is it more ſtrange that the rod of Aaron ſhould bud, than that ten thouſand woods and foreſts, ſtripped by the froſts, ſhould in the ſpring ſhoot forth buds innumerable, and make new ſhades with returning leaves and bloom? Or that food ſhould deſcend nightly from heaven, as the manna did upon one certain ſpot where the Iſraelites were encamped,—is this more ſtrange, than that food ſhould ſpring, as it does yearly, and all the world over, out of the ground? God is alike the Author in both caſes, and man's obligations are the ſame: but when his productions appear frequent, and after the ſame manner, we heedleſsly paſs them by as natural: and when they appear in a manner new and unuſual, then we cry miracle and prodigy! The ſtrangeneſs of the thing, as it were, alarms us, and makes us raiſe our eyes to the hand that cauſed it.

In condeſcenſion therefore to our weakneſs and inadvertency Almighty God has vouchſafed, upon ſome extraordinary occaſions, to divert his power out of the common channel of nature, and ſhew it in ſome other manner that is new and ſurprizing. In the caſe before us he quite threw off the diſguiſe of ſecond cauſes, and viſibly and in perſon exerted that power, from which the earth gives its increaſe, and the fountains flow with perpetual ſtreams.

His operations in nature proceed very leiſurely from ſmall and ſeemingly deſpicable beginnings, paſſing through various ſucceſſive changes, and advancing by juſt degrees, they attain at laſt their due perfection. Thus a grain of corn, ſown in the earth, and periſhing there, by a virtue which God has implanted in it, communicates we know not what fecundity to the glebe. From that ſecret ſpark of vegetative life the tender roots ſpread, and the green blade ſprings forth, which after a revolution of various ſeaſons, with the concurrence of froſt, and rain, and ſnow, and dew, and ſunſhine, diſplays the ear, firſt green, with little cells full of a milky ſubſtance, which ripens and hardens in the ſun, till the grain perfected and ready for the labours of men, is gathered, and after various operations, becomes proper for our nouriſhment. So long a progreſs through natural cauſes, with diverſe arts and labours of men, is neceſſary to make a piece of bread. But the Lord of nature might, and did go a nearer way to work. It was corn in its maturity, it was bread in its perfection, at once, in his creating hands.

The ordinary method of producing food is in general the moſt proper, as it employs the time, quickens the induſtry, and exerciſes the ingenuity of men: the extraordinary way was fit only for thoſe particular occaſions whereon our Lord uſed it, and wherein he had particular views and deſigns. A principal thing he had regard to, was to remind us in that ſenſible manner of our obligations to him for our daily bread; to teach us to reflect, that however wonderful the ſudden increaſe of loaves may appear, yet every harveſt renews the miracle for the ſubſiſtance of all the world.

I add one or two inſtances more of the ſame nature, becauſe I am deſirous to inculcate this ſentiment ſo often, as may render it familiar, that our minds may readily enter into it upon all occaſions; and as often as we partake of the gifts of God, we may at the ſame time ſee the hand that beſtows them.

Had we fed upon the miraculous quails with the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, and quenched our thirſt at thoſe ſudden ſtreams into which the rock melted at the ſtroke of Moſes, how ſhould we have been tranſported with a ſenſe of God's goodneſs! would not ſuch a meal, while it fed our body, alſo entertain our mind with holy wonder, praiſe, and thankſgiving? would not every morſel have renewed our gratitude, and excited perhaps a more ardent devotion than that wherewith we now attend the altar to partake of its holy myſteries?

And what difference is there between the food wherewith God fed the Iſraelites in the deſart, and that wherewith he feeds us in this land of plenty? None in reſpect of the Author;—none in reſpect of our obligations to him. The food he rained from heaven, and the corn he produces out of the earth, are both alike his creatures; and he that furniſhed that table in the wilderneſs, is the ſame that furniſhes our table every day.

There is no room for argument upon this occaſion. We all know that our food is the creature of God, that his power made, and his goodneſs beſtows it, as verily as they did the food that fed theſe thouſands. Yet many men make no returns to this univerſal Benefactor. How juſt therefore is that expoſtulation of the prophet, Do you thus requite the Lord, O fooliſh people and unwiſe? is not he thy Father, that created, and fed thee? That gave thee all thy faculties, and all the objects wherewith they are gratified? Why have men reaſon wherewith to trace effects to their cauſes? Why have they lively apprehenſions of benefits, and capacities for grateful ſentiments, if they do not exert theſe faculties in the cauſe that moſt requires, that beſt deſerves them? if receiving daily obligations, they continue as void of grateful reflections, as beaſts grazing in the fields, or feeding in the ſtalls, who have no underſtanding? Yet even theſe, from the blind inſtincts of nature expreſs ſomething like an acknowledgement of favours. The ox knoweth his owner, and the aſs his maſter's crib, ſaith God, but Iſrael doth not know, my people doth not conſider.

How juſtly might God puniſh the ingratitude of men by withdrawing the bleſſings they have long abuſed? He ſometimes does ſo even in this life: and many, who have not been thankful for their daily bread, have lived to want it. But, generally ſpeaking, the caſe is otherwiſe; and God maketh the ſun to ſhine, and his rain to fall, and food to grow, for the evil and the good, the thankful and the unthankful, as long as this life laſts: and then the ſcene will be changed, and his bleſſings be no more beſtowed promiſcuouſly; but they who have not acknowledged his bounty, ſhall learn how great their obligations were, by the want of it; and as a juſt puniſhment of their unthankfulneſs, be reduced to that ſad ſtate, in which they ſhall have nothing left to be thankful for.

Chap. VII. Ver. 1. After theſe things] That is, after the miracle of the loaves, and the converſation in the ſynagogue of Capernaum. Sir Iſaac Newton thinks, that theſe words intimate that our Lord did not celebrate the third paſſover at Jeruſalem, (ſee ch. vi. 4.) and it muſt be owned that the Evangeliſts do not ſay expreſſly that Jeſus went up to it; neverthelеſs, if we may judge of him from the religious regard which he conſtantly ſhewed to all the divine inſtitutions, and from his behaviour on other occaſions of a like nature, we may ſafely believe, that he went not only to this, but to all the feaſts

2 Now the Jews feaſt of tabernacles was at hand.

3 His brethren therefore ſaid unto him, Depart hence, and go into Judea, that thy diſciples alſo may ſee the works that thou doeſt.

4 For there is no man that doeth any thing in ſecret, and he himſelf ſeeketh to be known openly. If thou do theſe things, ſhew thyſelf to the world.

5 (For neither did his brethren believe in him.)

6 Then Jeſus ſaid unto them, My time is not yet come: but your time is alway ready.

7 The world cannot hate you; but me it hateth, becauſe I teſtify of it, that the works thereof are evil.

8 Go ye up unto this feaſt: I go not up yet unto this feaſt: for my time is not yet full come.

9 When he had ſaid theſe words unto them, he abode ſtill in Galilee.

10 But when his brethren were gone up, then went he alſo up unto the feaſt, not openly, but as it were in ſecret.

11 Then the Jews ſought him at the feaſt, and ſaid, Where is he?

12 And there was much murmuring among the people concerning him: for ſome ſaid, He is a good man: others ſaid, Nay; but he deceiveth the people.

13 Howbeit, no man ſpake openly of him, for fear of the Jews.

14 Now about the midſt of the feaſt, Jeſus went up into the temple, and taught.

15 And the Jews marvelled, ſaying, How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?

feaſts which the Jewiſh males were obliged by law to attend; Deut. xvi. 16. Numb. ix. 13. and it ſeems that the many cities and villages which our Lord is ſaid to have viſited, Mark vi. 56. was on his journey to this paſſover; a conjecture which appears to be favoured by the preſent paſſage; for it implies, that after the miraculous dinner, Jeſus had been in Jewry, where an attempt was made upon his life, which made it dangerous for him to continue there any longer at that time. But if any attempt was made upon our Lord's life in Jewry about this time, no ſcene was ſo fit for it as Jeruſalem; no time ſo proper as the paſſover, which happened during this period; and no actors ſo likely to be engaged in it, as the haughty prieſts, the ſcribes, and Phariſees, who were aſſembled at the feaſt. Perhaps Chriſt's diſciples alſo, who were offended by the ſermon in the ſynagogue of Capernaum, had joined his enemies in the metropolis when they came up to the feaſt, and inſenſed them anew by rehearſing, with the uſual aggravations of fame, the miracle of the loaves performed, to the conviction of every individual preſent. See Macknight's ſecond Prelim. Obſervat.

Ver. 3—5. His brethren therefore ſaid, &c.] By brethren we are to underſtand only couſins-german, or kinsfolks. As they did not believe on him, they condemned him in their own minds, and ſaid that he acted altogether abſurdly, in paſſing ſo much of his time in Galilee, and other remote corners of the country, while he pretended to ſo public a character as that of the Meſſiah: that it would be much more for his intereſt to make diſciples in Judea and Jeruſalem; and that he ought to work his miracles there as public as poſſible, before the great and learned men of the nation, whoſe deciſion in his favour would have great influence to induce others to believe on him. The word rendered openly, ver. 4. παῤῥησία, has a variety of ſenſes; it ſignifies intrepidity, or fearleſſneſs of danger;—freeneſs of ſpeech, as oppoſite to reſtraint and reſerve;—perſpicuity or plainneſs of ſpeech, diveſted of figures or allegories;—ſpeaking in public, in the character of an orator; and laſtly, authority, conſiſting in popularity, dignity of character, and civil power; perhaps the laſt ſenſe is that which belongs to this verſe. The preſent paſſage ſeems to be a very invidious and groundleſs inſinuation, as if our Lord was actuated by oſtentatious views; the contrary to which appeared ſo evidently from the whole of his conduct, that nothing but the meaneſt envy could ſuggeſt ſuch a charge. It is aſtoniſhing that theſe relations of Chriſt, who muſt have had ſo many opportunities of ſeeing the glory both of his character and miracles, which laſt they here expreſly acknowledge, ſhould continue in unbelief. But they unhappily laid it down as a firſt principle, that the Meſſiah muſt be a temporal prince; and finding this mark of his miſſion wanting, and ſeeing more ſtrongly than others could do, (who were not ſo intimately converſant with him,) his averſion to any ſuch ſcheme, they would yield to no other proofs, and are, it is to be feared, on the fatal liſt of thoſe who periſhed, as thouſands now do, by oppoſing hypotheſis to fact. However, this circumſtance ſerves to illuſtrate the character of our Saviour; for had his relations been unanimous in owning his claims, it might have been objected by infidelity, that the pretenſion which Jeſus made to the character of Meſſiah was an an impoſture carried on by him and his family to deceive mankind; but when we find that he did not owe his ſucceſs to their concurrence, but that they were rather obſtacles in his way, all ſuſpicion of colluſion is removed, and the divinity of his miſſion ſhines forth with redoubled luſtre. See Hammond, Locke, Ward's Diſſertations, p. 85. and Sykes on the Truth of Chriſtianity, p. 128.

Ver. 6, 7. Then Jeſus ſaid—My time is not yet come] Jeſus, knowing the malice of the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, did not incline to be among them longer than was abſolutely neceſſary, knowing that they would take every opportunity to perſecute and deſtroy him; but the time pre-determined for his death was not yet come. "It is not proper for me, ſays he, to go up yet to this feaſt; but you may go up at any time you pleaſe, ſince you have done nothing to make the Jews unfriendly to you, as I have done, who, by the purity of my doctrine and the freedom of my reproof, have provoked their malice to the higheſt pitch." The words, the world cannot hate you, contain a moſt aweful inſinuation, that theſe kinſmen of our Lord were perſons governed intirely by carnal views, and therefore deſtitute of the love of God, and all well-grounded hope from him. See Doddridge and Clarke.

Ver. 8. I go not up yet unto this feaſt] Many commentators doubt whether the word yet, οὔπω, in this paſſage is genuine; and this doubt ariſes not merely from Porphyry's objecting againſt this as a falſhood in our Lord, (for frequent experience has taught us how little the enemies of Chriſtianity are to be truſted in their repreſentations of Scripture;) but from our obſerving that Jerome, and the other moſt ancient fathers who reply to that objection, do not found their anſwer on his citing the paſſage wrong, but, as they juſtly might, on the intimation our Lord gave of his intending ſhortly to go up to the feaſt in that expreſſion, my time is not yet fully come. It is a glorious teſtimony to the unblemiſhed integrity of our Lord's character, that ſo cunning and inveterate an enemy as Porphyry was forced to have recourſe to ſuch mean and ridiculous methods of aſperſing it. See Mill and Wetſtein on the text, and Le Clerc de Arte Critica, pars. iii. p. 232.

Ver. 10. Not openly] This ſuggeſts another reaſon for our Lord's delay. Had he taken his journey at the uſual time, the multitudes who were on the road gathering round him, and accompanying him to Jeruſalem, might have given freſh matter of offence to his enemies; for which reaſon he did not ſet out till the greater part of the people were gone, and then he went up not publickly, but as it were in ſecret; that is, he neither preached nor wrought miracles by the way, nor had any crowd attending him.

Ver. 11—13. Then the Jews ſought him] Jeſus did not appear publickly immediately on his arrival in Jeruſalem, which occaſioned many doubts concerning his character: Some affirmed, that he was a true prophet, and that his not attending the feaſt might be owing to ſeveral accidents. Others affirmed, that he was a deceiver, who paid no regard to the divine inſtitution. Howbeit, his friends defended him only in private, not daring to ſpeak openly on his behalf, for fear of the inhabitants of Jeruſalem.

Ver. 14, 15. Now about the midſt of the feaſt, &c.] About the middle of the feaſt (which laſted eight days) Jeſus came into the temple, and preached many important doctrines with ſuch ſtrength of reaſon, clearneſs of method, and elegance of expreſſion, that his enemies themſelves were aſtoniſhed, knowing that he had never had the advantage of a liberal education. What is here more particularly meant by letters, appears from the Greek word Γράμματα, from whence is derived that which ſignifies a Scribe. The learning of the Scribes conſiſted in the explication of the ſacred writings of the Old Teſtament; ſo that theſe words moſt probably refer to our Lord's great acquaintance with the Scriptures, and the judicious and maſterly manner in which he taught the people out of them, with far greater majeſty and nobler eloquence than the Scribes could attain to by a learned education. Compare Mark i. 22. and Matth. vii. 29. The verſion of 1729 renders it well, How came he acquainted with the Scriptures,—a man of no education?

16 Jeſus anſwered them, and ſaid, My doctrine is not mine, but his that ſent me.

17 If any man will do his will, he ſhall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I ſpeak of myſelf.

18 He that ſpeaketh of himſelf, ſeeketh his own glory: but he that ſeeketh his glory that ſent him, the ſame is true, and no unrighteouſneſs is in him.

19 Did not Moſes give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me?

20 The people anſwered and ſaid, Thou haſt a devil: who goeth about to kill thee?

21 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, I have done one work, and ye all marvel.

22 Moſes therefore gave unto you circumciſion, (not becauſe it is of Moſes, but of the fathers) and ye on the ſabbath-day circumciſe a man.

23 If a man on the ſabbath-day receive circumciſion, that the law of Moſes ſhould not be broken; are ye angry at me, becauſe I have made a man every whit whole on the ſabbath-day?

24 Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgement.

25 Then ſaid ſome of them of Jeruſalem, Is not this he whom they ſeek to kill?

Ver. 16. Ch. iii. 11. viii. 28. xii. 49. xiv. 10, 24.—V. 17. Eccleſ. xxi. 11. Ch. viii. 43.—V. 18. Ch. v. 41.—V. 19. Exod. xxiv. 3. Acts vii. 35, &c. Ch. v. 16, 18. x. 39. xi. 53.—V. 20. Ch. viii. 48, 52. x. 20.—V. 22. Lev. xii. 3. Gen. xvii. 10. V. 23. Or, without breaking the law of Moſes. Ch. v. 8, 9.—V. 24. Deut. i. 16. Prov. xxiv. 23.

Ver. 16, 17. Jeſus anſwered] "The doctrine which I teach you is not the product of human wiſdom; I have neither been taught it by maſters, nor have I acquired it by my own ſtudy; but it is the doctrine of God, who hath inſpired me with it, becauſe I am his meſſenger." He told them likewiſe that they could be at no loſs to know from whence he or any teacher derived his doctrine, provided they were themſelves virtuous perſons, and laid aſide their prejudices, and were reſolved to do the will of God, how contrary ſoever it might prove to their own inclinations: If any man may be determined, or is deſirous to do his will, θελη το θελημα ποιειν,—he ſhall know, &c. Good men can eaſily judge of any teacher, whether he and his doctrine come from God, not only becauſe the divine wiſdom and goodneſs are intereſted to ſecure ſuch from capital errors, but becauſe they themſelves have no predominant evil inclinations, to prejudice them againſt the truth when it appears, and becauſe they can diſcern how far any doctrine is conformable to the principles of virtue which they poſſeſs.

This important paſſage ſeems an expreſs declaration, that every upright man to whom the Goſpel is propoſed will ſee and own the evidence of its divine authority, which indeed might reaſonably have been concluded from the aweful judgement denounced on thoſe who preſume to reject it. See Doddridge and Elſner.

Ver. 18. He that ſpeaketh of himſelf] If a perſon teaches what makes for the advancement of his own worldly intereſt, or for the gratification of his pride, or any other evil paſſion, the doers of the will of God will immediately know that ſuch a teacher is an impoſtor; whereas, if a prophet propoſes doctrines which have a tendency to reform men, and to advance the glory of God, without regard to the opinion of the world, or to his own intereſt, he muſt certainly be ſent of God, and ſhould not by any means be ſuſpected of impoſture; for ſo the word αδικια, in oppoſition to αληθης, true, muſt certainly ſignify.

Ver. 19. Did not Moſes give you the law] There is a remarkable beauty in this ſudden turn of the ſentiment. Some of the Jews called Jeſus a falſe prophet, becauſe he had healed the paralytic at Beth-eſda on the ſabbath-day, ſee ver. 21. pretending that it was a groſs violation of the law of Moſes, which no good man, much leſs a prophet, would be guilty of. In anſwer to theſe evil ſurmiſes, he told them plainly, that however much they pretended to reverence the authority of Moſes in the law, they made no ſcruple to violate the moſt ſacred of his precepts. They had formed a reſolution of murdering him directly, contrary to every law of God and man; and for the ſame end were laying ſecret plots againſt his life. This reproof came in with ſingular propriety and force immediately after Jeſus had proved his commiſſion from God by the moſt convincing arguments. See Macknight.

Ver. 20. The people anſwered, and ſaid, Thou haſt a devil] It is ſaid, ch. x. 20. He hath a devil, and is mad; which plainly ſhews, as many have obſerved, that they thought ſome of the worſt kinds and degrees of lunacies proceeded from the agency of ſome demon, as many conſiderable Greek writers plainly did: but it can never be argued from hence, that poſſeſſion and lunacy are univerſally ſynonimous terms. When joined together, they ſeem to ſignify different things, the former being put for the cauſe, the latter for the effect. See Bos's Exercit. p. 41. and the note on ch. viii. 48.

Ver. 21, 22. I have done one work, &c.] It is plain the miracle of Beth-eſda here referred to, was wrought a year and a half before this feaſt; but they made uſe of it as a pretence to deſtroy him, becauſe he had done it on the ſabbath-day. The words δια τουτο at the beginning of verſe 22. ſhould be joined with the laſt words of ver. 21. if we may truſt the judgement of ſome of the moſt learned critics, I have done one work, and ye all marvel at it. And it muſt be acknowledged, that we have preciſely the ſame conſtruction Mark vi. 6. All the verſions, however, retain the common pointing, and if we do ſo, the tranſlation of ver. 22. muſt run thus: Becauſe that Moſes gave you the precept concerning circumciſion, ye circumciſe a man even on the ſabbath-day. But the correction juſt propoſed makes the ſenſe more clear and elegant thus: Moſes gave you the law of circumciſion, and on the ſabbath ye circumciſe a man, not becauſe it is a precept of Moſes only, but of the Fathers. Jeſus being charged by the Jews as a tranſgreſſor of the law of Moſes for having cured a man on the ſabbath-day, thus expoſtulates with his accuſers: "You wonder and object that I ſhould cure a man, and order him to carry his couch on the ſabbath-day; yet a little reflection might convince you, that your cavil is very unreaſonable, even on your own principles; for to inſtance in circumciſion, which Moſes enjoined you to obſerve, and not to omit the performance of it on the eighth day; now if this happen to fall on the ſabbath, you interrupt its holy reſt, by performing the rite without ſcruple on this day, becauſe you will not break the law of Moſes, which hath marked out a certain day for this work of charity; are you therefore angry at me for performing a work of equal charity on the ſabbath-day, ver. 23. and that with far leſs bodily labour than you perform the ceremony of circumciſion. But you will aſk, Why it is ordered by the law that either the precept for circumciſion, or that for the ſabbatical reſt, muſt needs be frequently tranſgreſſed? I anſwer, That though Moſes, as I ſaid, gave you circumciſion; yet the rite was not only generally of Moſes, but of the fathers, Abraham, Iſaac, &c. Now the fathers enjoined it to be performed on the eighth day, Moſes enjoined that the ſeventh day ſhould be a day of reſt, conſequently the day of reſt and the day of circumciſion muſt needs frequently fall together. Moſes found circumciſion inſtituted by a previous covenant, which his law could not diſannul; Gal. iii. 17. but had he originally inſtituted both, it is probable he would have contrived that the two laws ſhould not have interfered." This appears to be the ſenſe of the parentheſis (not becauſe it is of Moſes, &c.) and the force of our Saviour's reaſoning upon it. See Mill, Wetſtein, Beza, and Div. Leg. vol. 3.

Ver. 23. Becauſe I have made a man every whit whole] Becauſe I have wrought the total cure of a man, both in mind and body, as may be colllected from ch. v. 14. Heylin.

Ver. 24. Judge not according to the appearance] There may be many wrong judgements of the ſame matter; but the right can be but one: therefore the latter clauſe ſhould be rendered, But make the right judgement.—"Judge impartially,—diveſt yourſelves of your prejudices, and conceive not an ill opinion of me, on account of the meanneſs of my birth, appearance, &c." See Heylin.

Ver. 25—28. Then ſaid ſome of them] The inhabitants of Jeruſalem always Chriſt's bitter enemies aſked with ſurprize and irony, if our Lord's boldneſs, and the ſilence of the rulers, proceeded from their having acknowledged him as the Meſſiah; at the ſame time, in deriſion of his pretenſions they added, howbeit, we know this man whence he is, i. e. we know his parents and relations, (chap. vi. 42.) but when Chriſt cometh, no man knoweth whence he is; alluding to the obvious popular ſenſe of Iſa. liii. 8. who ſhall declare his generation? The Greek phraſe ποθεν εστι rendered whence he is, ſignifies in the Helleniſtic Greek of the Old Teſtament, who is his father. Thus 2 Sam. i. 13. David ſays to the young man, whence art thou? and he anſwered, I am the ſon of a ſtranger, an Amalekite. If we judge of this queſtion by the anſwer, to aſk whence art thou? is as much as to aſk "of what father, ſtock and family do you come? of whom was you born?" Take the Jews ſpeech in this ſenſe, and their confeſſion is in point: we know this man whence he is, that is, "who is his father;" as they ſaid before, chap. vi. 42. but when Chriſt cometh, no man knoweth whence he is, i. e. who is his father? How could they ſay then, that the Meſſiah was to be born in Bethlehem, and that they knew he was to be a deſcendant of David? David was his remote anceſtor, and they knew by father or mother Chriſt muſt deſcend from him, but who was his immediate father, if he was born of a virgin, they muſt own they were ignorant; but whatever they pretended, Jeſus would not allow that they knew his father, or whence he came; thereby intimating, that they wanted not this character of the Meſſiah in him, ver. 28. The words ſhould have been rendered interrogatively thus, "Do you indeed know me, and whence I am? No; ye do not,"—as Tertullian reſolves the queſtion negatively, 26 But lo, he ſpeaketh boldly, and they ſay nothing unto him. Do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Chriſt?

27 Howbeit, we know this man whence he is: but when Chriſt cometh, no man knoweth whence he is.

28 Then cried Jeſus in the temple as he taught, ſaying, Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am: and I am not come of myſelf, but he that ſent me is true, whom ye know not.

29 But I know him: for I am from him, and he hath ſent me.

30 Then they ſought to take him: but no man laid hands on him, becauſe his hour was not yet come.

31 And many of the people believed on him, and ſaid, When Chriſt cometh, will he do more miracles than theſe which this man hath done?

32 The Phariſees heard that the people murmured ſuch things concerning him; and the Phariſees and the chief prieſts ſent officers to take him.

33 Then ſaid Jeſus unto them, Yet a little while am I with you, and then I go unto him that ſent me.

34 Ye ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall not find me: and where I am, thither ye cannot come.

35 Then ſaid the Jews among themſelves, Whither will he go, that we ſhall not find him? will he go unto the diſperſed among the Gentiles, and teach the Gentiles?

36 What manner of ſaying is this that he ſaid, Ye ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall not find me: and where I am, thither ye cannot come?

37 In the laſt day, that great day of the feaſt, Jeſus ſtood and cried, ſaying, If any man thirſt, let him come unto me, and drink.

negatively; and then, concealing his true original, as his manner was; that they might not ground an accuſation on what he had ſaid before the time, he paſſes to his works, which were the proofs of his divine miſſion, yet ſo as to leave room to infer from his diſcourſe, that he was the Son of God, and not the ſon of Joſeph: and, or yet, I came not of myſelf, but he is true that ſent me, whom ye know not; that is, "God is my true Father; whom you know not, though you ſay ye know whence I am, and who is my father; and this you may be aſſured of, from my doing the works of God." It might be with reſpect to his extraordinary birth of a virgin that the Jews at firſt ſpoke of the Meſſiah as the Son of God; and their aſſerting, that when Chriſt COMETH, or is born, none knoweth whence he is, might be an alluſion to Iſai. liii. 8. above-mentioned. But be this as it may, this doctrine is expreſſed in the traditionary writings of the Jews to this effect, in Bereſh. Rab. on Gen. xxxvii. 2. "The Meſſiah is the ſeed that ſhall come from another place:" by which they mean, that he ſhall have another principle of generation, as appears by the different ways of their varying the phraſe in other places. Thus from rabbi Berachia, in the ſame book we are told, that "the birth of the Meſſiah alone ſhall be without defect;" which could not be, if he was born as other men are. Jarchi cites the following paſſages from the ſame place: "His birth ſhall not be like that of other creatures. None ſhall know the Father, before he tells it. The Redeemer that ſhall come, ſhall be without father." And in Berachoth, is the following remarkable paſſage: "The birth of the Meſſiah ſhall be like the dew from the Lord,—as drops upon the graſs, expect not labour (or action) of men." It would be endleſs to enumerate all that has been ſaid by the rabbinical writers to this purpoſe; what has been produced is ſufficient to prove, that it was a Jewiſh opinion that the birth of the Meſſiah ſhould be extraordinary, if not miraculous; and that his father ſhould not be known, whatever his mother might be. See Bp. Chandler's Defence, p. 251, &c.

Ver. 29. But I know him, &c.] "Were you acquainted with what the prophets have ſaid concerning the Meſſiah, as you pretend to be, you would know this to be one of his principal characters, That he is to underſtand the perfections and will of God, and to explain them unto men more clearly than any meſſenger from God ever did before. Withal, by conſidering the nature of my doctrine, you would ſee this character remarkably fulfilled in me, and thereby be ſenſible that I am from God, and that he hath ſent me." See L'Enfant, and Archbp. Tillotſon, vol. 2.

Ver. 30—32. Then they ſought to take him.] The defence made by our Lord did not pacify his enemies; for ſome of them would gladly have apprehended him: However, none of them had the courage to lay hold of him, being reſtrained by Providence, becauſe the ſeaſon of his ſufferings was not yet come. In the mean time, the miracle which he had lately performed on the infirm man was ſo great, and ſo well known, and this defence by which he juſtified himſelf ſo clear, and ſo convincing, that many of the people believed on him, publickly affirming that he was the Meſſiah, ver. 31. This attachment of the common people to Jeſus greatly incenſed the chief prieſts and Phariſees, with their adherents; and therefore on the laſt great day of the feaſt, being met in council, (as appears from comparing ver. 32, 45, 50, 53.) they ſent their officers to apprehend him, and bring him before them, thinking to confute his pretenſions, and puniſh him. Inſtead of murmured in the 32d verſe, ſome verſions read whiſpered, or rumoured.

Ver. 33, 34. Yet a little while am I with you] While the rulers were taking counſel againſt him, Jeſus was preaching to the people concerning the improvement which it became them to make of his miniſtry among them: "Yet a little while, ſaid our Lord, and my miniſtry among you is at an end; you ought therefore, while it laſts, to make the beſt poſſible improvement of it; particularly you ſhould liſten to my ſermons with great attention, that you may have your minds ſtored with the truths of God before I go away: for after I am gone, you ſhall earneſtly deſire my preſence with you, but ſhall not obtain it: You ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall not find me." This ſeeking for the Meſſiah was general through the nation, during the calamities in Judea occaſioned by Titus and his armies, and has continued among the Jews ever ſince, in all the countries where they have been diſperſed: but to no purpoſe; for their Meſſiah having already appeared, it is in vain to expect another. By thus predicting his own death, our Lord inſinuated, that he both knew the preſent diſpoſition of the council, and foreſaw that they would ſoon put an end to his miniſtry, by taking away his life. Indeed, ſome ſuppoſe that our Lord ſpoke theſe words to the officers themſelves, who were ſent to take him; as much as to ſay, "I know the deſign on which ſome of you are come; but God will not permit you immediately to execute it: for yet a little while longer I am to continue, &c."—Where I am, thither ye cannot come, means, "You cannot come to heaven, where I am ſoon to be." The reaſon mentioned in the parallel paſſage, ch. viii. 21. ſhews this to be our Lord's meaning: "I go my way, and ye ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall die in your ſins: whither I go ye cannot come; becauſe ye ſhall die in your ſins:" or as it is expreſſed in this diſcourſe, "becauſe ye ſhall not find me, you cannot come to heaven." Dr. Heylin, after many celebrated critics, reads, Where I go, εἶμι, vado, inſtead of εἰμὶ, ſum, I am; changing the accent. The common reading, however, is juſtly defended by Grotius, who obſerves that εἶμι, to go, is a poetical word, ſeldom uſed by proſe writers. Beſides, our Lord's declaration, and the anſwer which the Jews made to it, are perfectly coherent, according to the common reading, Ye ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall not find me; and where I am,—namely, when you ſeek me,—thither you cannot come.

Ver. 35, 36. Will he go unto the diſperſed, &c.] Ελληνων, of the Greeks, by whom we are to underſtand here idolatrous Gentiles, and not Helleniſts, or Jews who uſed the Greek language; for theſe were the diſperſed among them. There appears therefore a ſarcaſm in theſe words beyond what has been commonly obſerved. They inſinuate, that if he was to go into foreign countries, to addreſs himſelf to the Jews there, who might be ſuppoſed not ſo well inſtructed as thoſe who lived in Judea and at Jeruſalem, he would not be able to make any proſelytes even among theſe; but would be conſtrained to apply himſelf to the ignorant and ſtupid Gentiles, to ſeek diſciples among them; which to be ſure appeared to theſe haughty ſcorners one of the moſt infamous circumſtances that could be imagined, and moſt incompatible with the character of the true Meſſiah. See Doddridge and Elſner.

Ver. 37—39. In the laſt day, &c.] It is commonly ſuppoſed, that while Jeſus was thus diſcourſing in the temple on the laſt and great day of the feaſt, the water from Siloam was brought into the womens court of the temple with the uſual ſolemnities, according to the directions of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, if we may believe the Jewiſh writers: Part of this water they drank with loud acclamations, in commemoration of the mercy ſhewn to their fathers, 38 He that believeth on me, as the ſcripture hath ſaid, out of his belly ſhall flow rivers of living water.

39 (But this ſpake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him, ſhould receive: for the Holy Ghoſt was not yet given; becauſe that Jeſus was not yet glorified.)

40 Many of the people therefore, when they heard this ſaying, ſaid, Of a truth this is the Prophet.

41 Others ſaid, This is the Chriſt. But ſome ſaid, Shall Chriſt come out of Galilee?

42 Hath not the ſcripture ſaid, That Chriſt cometh of the ſeed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was?

43 So there was a diviſion among the people becauſe of him.

44 And ſome of them would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him.

45 Then came the officers to the chief prieſts and Phariſees; and they ſaid unto them, Why have ye not brought him?

46 The officers anſwered, Never man ſpake like this man.

47 Then anſwered them the Phariſees, Are ye alſo deceived?

thers, who were relieved by the miracle of a great ſtream of water made to flow out of a rock, (ſee Pſ. lxxviii. 20.) when the nation was ready to die with thirſt in a ſandy deſart, where was neither river nor ſpring; and part of it they poured out as a drink-offering, which they accompanied with prayers to Almighty God for a plentiful rain to fall at the following ſeed-time; the people in the mean time ſinging the paſſage, Iſai. xii. 3. With joy ſhall ye draw water out of the wells of ſalvation. The expoſition of the Talmud, which aſſerts that this ceremony had reference to the pouring out of the Holy Ghoſt, ſhews the propriety of our Lord's addreſs, and his application of this circumſtance; for Jeſus, whoſe cuſtom it was to raiſe moral inſtructions from ſenſible occurrences, took this opportunity of inviting in the moſt ſolemn and affectionate manner all who were in purſuit whether of knowledge or happineſs, to come unto him and drink, in alluſion to the rite they were then employed about. He probably ſtood upon an eminence, ſo as to be conſpicuous, and ſpoke aloud, ſupplying the place of the trumpets uſed on theſe occaſions; and by this addreſs he taught them, that the effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt, repreſented by their pouring out the water, was not to be expected from their rites and ceremonies, but from a belief in the doctrine which he preached; for that by coming to him and drinking, he meant believing on him, is manifeſt from the context, and from ch. vi. 35. Further, to encourage them, our Lord promiſed them the gifts of his Spirit, which he repreſented under the image of a river flowing from their belly, to expreſs the efficacy and perpetuity of theſe gifts, together with the divine pleaſures which they produce, by quenching the deſires of thoſe who poſſeſs them, and fructifying others who come within their influence. See ch. iv. 14. Iſai. lv. 1. As the words of the 28th verſe are not to be found preciſely in the Scriptures, Theophylact, the Syriac verſion, and others relying on their authority, would have the ſentence pointed in ſuch a manner, that the clauſe as the Scripture hath ſaid, (or commanded, Matth ix. 5.) may be joined to he that believeth on me, and ſeparated from the words out of his belly, &c. According to this pointing, our Lord does not ſay that the Scripture promiſes rivers ſhall flow out of the believer's belly, but only that it commands men to believe on him:—He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath commanded. But it ſeems much more natural, with Grotius, to ſuppoſe, that here is a general reference to the ſeveral prophecies which refer to the effuſion of the Spirit by the Meſſiah, under the ſimilitude of pouring out water. See Iſai. lii. 15. xliv. 3. lviii. 11. Ezek. xxxvi. 23—27. Joel ii. 28. Zech. xiii. 1. xiv. 8. The reader will find Houbigant's interpretation of this place in the note on Numb. xxiv. 7. The flowing of rivers of living water out of the believer's belly is an idea taken from receptacles placed round ſprings, out of which great quantities of water flow by pipes; and perhaps there may be ſome alluſion here to the prominency of that capacious golden vaſe, from which the water at this feſtival was poured out in a large ſtream. This figure therefore repreſented the plenitude of ſpiritual gifts, to be poſſeſſed by believers, and the happy effects which they ſhould produce in the world. The faculty of ſpeaking all the different languages of the earth fluently, which was the firſt gift of the Spirit, qualifying them to preach ſuch doctrines of the Goſpel as the Spirit revealed to them, they were both watered themſelves, and in a condition to water the Gentiles, not with ſmall ſtreams, but with large rivers of divine knowledge; and ſo the land, which till then had been barren, was from that time forth to be exceeding fruitful in righteouſneſs unto God. Accordingly the Evangeliſt adds, by way of explication, But this ſpake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him ſhould receive; for the Holy Ghoſt was not yet given, becauſe that Jeſus was not yet glorified. The gifts of illumination and utterance were not yet communicated to believers, being what they received on the day of Pentecoſt, to fit them for converting the world. Neverthelеſs, if the univerſality of the invitation and promiſe inclines the reader to think, that on this occaſion our Lord had the ordinary influences of the Spirit alſo in his eye, the Evangeliſt's remark that the Holy Ghoſt was not yet given will not exclude them; becauſe even theſe might at that time be ſaid not to have been given, as they had been given but ſparingly, in compariſon of the plentiful diſtribution which was to be made of them to all believers after Chriſt's aſcenſion. Accordingly, the ordinary influences of the Spirit are often in Scripture repreſented as the conſequences and reward of faith; Gal. iii. 14. Epheſ. i. 12. And poſſibly in the words ſhall flow rivers of living water, our Lord might deſign a contraſt to the ſtream which at this time was poured out of the golden vaſe. The quantity taken out of the waters of Siloam was ſuch, as might be ſoon poured out and exhauſted; but out of thoſe believers on whom the Holy Ghoſt ſhould come, rivers of living water ſhould flow, whoſe effect and benefit ſhould never ceaſe as long as the world itſelf ſhould endure. There had been ſome drops, as it were, of this Spirit, which had fallen upon ſome of the Jewiſh nation before; but thoſe were no more to be compared with theſe rivers of water, than the waters of Siloam with the great river Euphrates. What was the ſpirit which Bezaleel had, when compared with that Spirit wherewith the Apoſtles were inſpired? What was that ſpirit of courage which was given to the judges, if compared with that which convinced the world of ſin, of righteouſneſs, and of judgement? What was that ſpirit of Moſes, communicated to the ſeventy elders, compared with that of the Son, which God hath ſhed abroad in the hearts of his people? What was that ſpirit of prophecy, which inſpired a few prophets, when compared with that pouring out of the Spirit upon all fleſh upon the day of Pentecoſt? But theſe rivers of water, though they began their courſe at Jeruſalem upon that day, as the fruit of the glorious and triumphant aſcenſion of Jeſus into heaven, yet they ſoon overflowed the Chriſtian church in other parts of the world; the ſound of that mighty ruſhing wind was ſoon heard in the moſt diſtant places, and the fiery tongues inflamed the hearts of many who never ſaw them. See on Lev. xxiii. 36. Numb. xxix. 35. Acts ii. 33. Macknight, Tremellius, and Stillingfleet's Sermons, vol. i. p. 355, &c.

Ver. 40—46. Many of the people therefore] Our Lord appears to have been diſcourſing as above, when the officers ſent by the council to apprehend him, ver. 32. came up; but as it was an uncommon topic, and he ſeemed to be ſpeaking with great fervency, their curioſity made them willing to hear him a little before they laid hands on him, ver. 44, 45. The eloquence and power with which he ſpoke ſtruck them; every word he had uttered being well choſen, aptly placed, and gracefully pronounced. There was not only a ſweetneſs in his ſermons which enchanted the ear, but a plainneſs, perſpicuity, and weight, which made the beauties of truth ſhine before the underſtanding with that luſtre which is peculiar to themſelves. Even theſe his enemies, who were come with an intent to lay violent hands on him, were deeply ſmitten: the greatneſs of his ſubject made viſible, as it were, by the divine ſpeaker, filled their underſtandings: the warmth and tenderneſs with which he delivered himſelf, penetrated their hearts: they felt new and uncommon emotions. In a word, being overwhelmed with the greatneſs of their admiration, they ſilently ſtood aſtoniſhed, condemning themſelves for having come on the errand, and after a while returned without accompliſhing it. Plutarch mentions it as a memorable proof of the extraordinary eloquence of Mark Anthony, when Marius ſent ſoldiers to kill him, that when he began ϖαραιτεισθαι τον θανατον, to plead for his life, he diſarmed their reſolution, and melted them into tears. But theſe officers are thus vanquiſhed merely by hearing Chriſt's gracious diſcourſes to the people; which is a circumſtance much more remarkable. They return in a kind of amaze, and inſtead of ſeizing him as their priſoner, or making a laboured apology for their failure, only break out into a pathetic exclamation, that no man in the world ever ſpake like him. This is a reflection which I hope we often make, as we read his diſcourſes. The officers were not the only perſons on whom this ſermon made a deep impreſſion: our Lord's hearers in general were greatly affected with it; for many of them gave it as their opinion that he was certainly one of the ancient prophets riſen from the dead, to uſher in the Meſſiah, ver. 40. Others declared, that they believed he was the Meſſiah himſelf, ver. 41. Nevertheleſs ſome of them, led away with the common miſtake that he was born in Nazareth, aſked with diſdain if the Meſſiah was to come out of Galilee? So there was a diviſion among them, σχισμα, a total diſſention and warm diſagreement among them. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 47—49. Are ye alſo deceived?] "Ye who have the advantage of knowing our ſentiments, and are acquainted with the idea which 48 Have any of the rulers or of the Phariſees believed on him?

49 But this people, who knoweth not the law, are curſed.

50 Nicodemus ſaith unto them, (he that came to Jeſus by night, being one of them,)

51 Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?

52 They anſwered and ſaid unto him, Art thou alſo of Galilee? Search, and look: for out of Galilee ariſeth no prophet.

53 And every man went unto his own houſe.

Ver. 48. Ch. xii. 42. Acts vi. 7. 1 Cor. i. 20. ii. 8.—V. 50. Ch. iii. 2. Gr. to him.—V. 51. Deut. i. 17. xvii. 8, &c. xix. 15. V. 52. Iſai. ix. 1, 2. Matth. iv. 15. Ch. i. 46.

which we entertain concerning this perſon; ſurely you cannot be ſo weak as to be thus infatuated. Pray conſider the conduct of thoſe who are moſt capable of judging on this point. Have any of the rulers, or any of the Phariſees of a more private ſtation, believed on him as the Meſſiah. Yet you know, theſe are moſt eminent for their acquaintance with religion, and the moſt authentic interpreters of the ſacred writings, in which it is contained. But this wretched herd of people, ver. 49.—ὁ ὄχλος οὗτος,—this rabble,—(ſo they affected to call Chriſt's friends) who know nothing of the true meaning of the law, are curſed with a judicial blindneſs, and given up to the moſt abſurd and fatal miſtake." This was downright railing. The force of the 49th verſe will appear more evident, when we reflect, that the rabbies and rulers amongſt the Jews piqued themſelves very highly upon the knowledge of the law, and very much deſpiſed the inferior people, who had neither leiſure nor abilities to make this acquiſition. The Jews were generally divided firſt into ſcribes, or teachers of the law; ſecondly, into diſciples, or ſtudents, who were ſcholars of their wiſe men, but neither rabbies nor teachers; and thirdly, into the people of the earth; here meant by the word ὄχλος, the rabble, the very ſcum of the earth, univerſally deſpiſed on account of their being illiterate. The reader will find inſtances of their contempt of the common people in Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. on the place, and Vitringa, Obſervat. Sacr. lib. iii. cap. 2.

Ver. 50, 51. Nicodemus ſaith unto them] From the preſence of Nicodemus, this appears to have been a meeting of the council whereof he was a member; for had it been a private cabal of the great men to take away Chriſt's life, Nicodemus, who was one of his diſciples, would never have joined them. It ſeems the council was met to try Jeſus on the charge of his being a falſe prophet; (comp. ver. 31, 32.) And as the prieſts had upbraided their ſervants with ignorance of the law, Nicodemus's reproof, ver. 51. was ſmooth and ſharp, "Doth our law, with which you boaſt ſo much acquaintance, judge and condemn any man before the magiſtrate appointed to execute it, ſummon him into his preſence, that he may hear from him, what he hath to ſay in his own defence, and know from credible witneſſes what he hath done to deſerve puniſhment?" See Deut. xvii. 8, 11. and xix. 15, &c. This reproof was the more poignant, as it was well founded; and in effect it amounts to a charge, that while they profeſſed ſuch a knowledge of the law, and zeal for it, they either knew not, or regarded not ſome of its plaineſt precepts, and were even unmindful of thoſe, which, as they were a court of judicature, were their peculiar concern. See Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 52. They anſwered—art thou alſo of Galilee?] Finding Nicodemus thus condemning their conduct, and ſpeaking favourably of Jeſus, they aſked him with an air of diſdain and ſurprize, mixed with fierceneſs, Art thou alſo of Galilee? "Art thou one of the ignorant low faction, which has leagued to ſupport a Galilean Meſſiah, in oppoſition to the law, which has determined the Meſſiah's nativity to Bethlehem? Search and look; for out of Galilee ariſeth no prophet." They meant, no Meſſiah, the prophet foretold by Moſes in their law; for they could not but know that Jonah was of Gath-hepher in Galilee, 2 Kings xiv. 25. that Nahum alſo was probably a Galilean; and that Tiſhbe, the town of Elijah the Tiſhbite, was likewiſe in Galilee; unleſs they were as ignorant of the Scriptures as they ſaid the common people were, ver. 48. Be this as it will, ſuch blind judges were theſe maſters of law and learning, that an argument which had no force againſt Jeſus, who was actually born at Bethlehem, weighed a great deal more with them, than all the ſolid proofs by which he ſo fully eſtabliſhed his miſſion.

Ver. 53. And every man went unto his own houſe] So that this ſhort plain queſtion of Nicodemus's ſpoiled all their meaſures, and broke up the council. A word ſpoken in ſeaſon, how good is it, eſpecially when God gives it his bleſſing! Our Lord having perfect knowledge of the deſigns of the council, left the city, and went to lodge in the mount of Olives, that he might be out of their reach. The firſt verſe of the next chapter is generally, by the beſt expoſitors, joined to this; and the particle δὲ, in that verſe, but Jeſus went, ſeems ſtrongly to point out the propriety hereof. See Luke xxi. 37. Bengelius, Wetſtein, &c.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VII.

We ſee how little the greateſt external advantages can do, without the divine bleſſing, when ſome of the neareſt relations of Chriſt himſelf, by whom he had been moſt intimately known, were not prevailed upon to believe in him, ver. 5. Who then can wonder if ſome remain incorrigible in the moſt regular and pious families? How much more valuable is the union to him, which is founded on a cordial and obedient faith, than that which aroſe from the bonds of nature; and how cautiouſly ſhould we watch againſt thoſe carnal prejudices, by which even the brethren of Chriſt were alienated from him!

Our Lord, we ſee, uſed a prudent care to avoid perſecution and danger, till his time was fully come, ver. 1—8. and it is our duty to endeavour, by all wiſe and upright precautions, to ſecure and preſerve ourſelves, that we may have opportunities for further ſervice. In the courſe of ſuch ſervice we muſt expect, eſpecially if we appear under a public character, to meet with a variety of cenſures. But let us remember, that Jeſus himſelf went through evil report and good report; by ſome applauded as a good man, by others condemned as deceiving the people, ver. 12. Learn we of our great Maſter, patiently to endure ſuch injurious treatment; always endeavouring ſo to behave ourſelves, that we may have a teſtimony in the conſciences of men, and in the preſence of God, that, after the example of our divine Forerunner, in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity, not with fleſhly wiſdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our converſation in the world. Then will our names be had in remembrance, and the honour and reward of our faithful obedience continue, when the remembrance of thoſe who reviled us is periſhed with them.

We may learn again, from our meek and humble Maſter, to refer the honour of all we know and do to the divine inſtructions communicated to us, and the divine grace working in and by us; that ſeeking the glory of God, we may have the ſureſt evidence that we are truly his, ver. 16—18. Integrity and uprightneſs will be a certain ſecurity to us, againſt dangerous miſtakes in matters of religion. If the light we already have be faithfully improved, we may humbly hope that more will be beſtowed; nor ſhall we then fail of convincing evidence, that the doctrine of the Goſpel is of God, ver. 17. For the experience of its power on our hearts, will check our paſſions, and deſtroy the prejudices which would prevent the truth from taking place in our minds.

Our Lord was reviled as a demoniac and a lunatic, ver. 20. But inſtead of rendering railing for railing, he replied in the words of gentleneſs and ſobriety. Thus ſhould we endeavour to conquer the rudeneſs of thoſe attacks we may meet with in his cauſe; that we may, if poſſible, remove the prejudices ſo fatal to thoſe who entertain them, and form men to that equitable and impartial judgement, which would ſoon turn all their cavils againſt Chriſt into admiration, praiſe, and obedience, ver. 21—24.

How confident is error in its own deciſions, and how vain in its ſelf-applauſes! Theſe unhappy people of the Jews, every way miſtaken, cenſure their rulers for a ſuppoſed credulity, in ſeeming, as it were, to acquieſce in Chriſt's claim to be the Meſſiah, and imagined themſelves, no doubt, exceeding wiſe in rejecting him, while they blindly took it for granted, he was the ſon of Joſeph; and had not patience to wait for the authentic ſtory of his miraculous conception, ver. 26, 27. Surely men had need to look well to the force of thoſe arguments, on which they venture their ſouls by rejecting the Goſpel.

Our Lord anſwered their ſecret reaſoning in a manner which might juſtly have alarmed them; charging them with ignorance of that God, whom they pretended to know, and whom with a preſumptuous confidence, they claimed as theirs: And would to God it may not be found at laſt, that many who have appeared moſt confident of their intereſt in the Lord, neither know him, nor are known by him! ver. 28. The bleſſed Jeſus, who is the brightneſs of his glory, and the expreſs image of his perſon, has the completeſt knowledge of the Father, ver. 29. May we be ſo wiſe, and ſo happy, as to ſeek inſtructions from him; that the eyes of our underſtanding may be enlightened, and the temper of our hearts proportionably regulated by all the diſcoveries of the divine Being which he makes.

How obſtinately and deſperately hardened were the hearts of thoſe, who, notwithſtanding all the proofs which Jeſus gave of his divine miſſion, were yet ſo far from hearkening to him, as to ſeek opportunities to deſtroy him! ver. 30—32. So dangerous and fatal is the prevalence of error, in ſuch as like not to retain God in their knowledge! How conſtantly ought we to pray, that God would preſerve us from a ſpirit of deluſion, and fill us with ſuch wiſdom, that we may know the things belonging to our peace; and being ready to receive the truth in the love of it, may acknowledge and attend to Chriſt, as ſent of God.

With what delight and thankfulneſs ſhould we liſten to the gracious proclamation of Chriſt, which he made in the temple, ver. 37. and a while after repeated from the throne of his glory, If any man thirſt, let him come unto me, and drink:—yea, whoſoever will, let him take of the water of life freely, Rev. xxii. 17. Bleſſed Jeſus, had we been allowed to have preſcribed to thee a form of words, in which thy kind purpoſes towards us ſhould have been expreſſed, what could we have invented more pathetic, more condeſcending, or more reviving?—May we thirſt for the bleſſings of thy grace, and in the confidence of faith, apply unto thee for them; and particularly for thoſe communications of thy ſpirit, which are ſo highly excellent and deſirable, and indeed ſo neceſſary for us. Supply us with them, we

CHAP. VIII.

Chriſt delivereth the woman taken in adultery: he preacheth himſelf the light of the world, and juſtifieth his doctrine; anſwereth the Jews, who boaſted of Abraham, and conveyeth himſelf from their cruelty.

JESUS went unto the mount of Olives.

2 And early in the morning he came again into the temple, and all the people came unto him; and he ſat down, and taught them.

3 And the ſcribes and Phariſees brought unto him a woman taken in adultery; and when they had ſet her in the midſt,

4 They ſay unto him, Maſter, this woman was taken in adultery, in the very act.

5 Now Moſes in the law commanded us, that ſuch ſhould be ſtoned: but what ſayeſt thou?

6 This they ſaid, tempting him, that they might have to accuſe him. But Jeſus ſtooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, as though he heard them not.

7 So when they continued aſking him, he lifted up himſelf, and ſaid unto them, He that is without ſin among you, let him firſt caſt a ſtone at her.

8 And again he ſtooped down, and wrote on the ground.

9 And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conſcience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldeſt, even unto the laſt; and Jeſus was left alone, and the woman ſtanding in the midſt.

Ver. 5. Lev. xx. 10. Deut. xx. 22.—V. 7. Deut. xvii. 7.

entreat thee, ſupply us in ſo rich an abundance, that we, in our different ſpheres, may ſupply others; that from us there may flow rivers of living water: ver. 38, 39.

Well might ſuch gracious words as thoſe of our Lord diſarm the rage of enemies and perſecutors, ver. 46. Let us add our teſtimony to theirs, and ſay, Never man ſpake as Jeſus ſpeaks. Let us hear him with calm and thankful attention, while his voice ſtill ſounds in his word. Happy they who know the joyful ſound. The Phariſees, like deaf adders, ſtopped their ears to the voice of the charmer, and while they cenſured the populace as a brutal herd, and gloried in their own ſuperior wiſdom, they rejected the council of God, ver. 48, 49. raſhly judging, without ſerious enquiry, and weakly borne down by vulgar, ſenſeleſs prejudices againſt names and places, which is all that the ſenate of Iſrael oppoſes to the ſolid arguments of Nicodemus, ver. 51, 52. That good man, already conſiderably improved by his interview with Jeſus, was undoubtedly confirmed in his adherence to him, by obſerving the methods of their oppoſition; and where magiſtrates arm their authority to overbear argument, they will probably, in the judgement of impartial men, produce a ſuſpicion at leaſt, that they know their cauſe to be incapable of a rational defence.

Chap. VIII. Ver. 5. Now Moſes in the law commanded] The law, Levit. xx. 10. Deut. xxii. 22. required in the general, that adultery ſhould be puniſhed with death, but did not determine the kind of it; only becauſe it is ordered, Deut. xxii. 23, 24. that the betrothed damſel guilty of adultery ſhould be ſtoned, it is ſuppoſed that in proceſs of time this kind of death was appropriated to ſuch offenders; and that the puniſhment of the married adultereſs, Lev. xx. 10. was interpreted to mean ſtrangling: Agreeably to theſe ſuppoſitions, it hath been conjectured, that the woman now before Jeſus was only betrothed; but the diſtinction has no foundation; for it is evident from Ezek. xvi. that the proper puniſhment of all kinds of adultery was ſtoning, ver. 38. I will judge thee, as women that break wedlock are judged; and ver. 40. They ſhall ſtone thee with ſtones. Beſides this we find Philo, and the ancient Chriſtian fathers, uſing the phraſes, "thoſe that were ſtoned," and "thoſe that were puniſhed for adultery," as ſynonimous terms. See Macknight, Grotius, and Selden de Uxor. Heb. cap. 11.

Ver. 6. This they ſaid, tempting him, &c.] The reaſon upon which they grounded their inſidious intention was, that had he declared againſt ſtoning the adultereſs, they certainly would have repreſented him to the people, as contradicting Moſes, and favouring adultery; hoping by that means to have leſſened his authority with them. On the other hand, had he ordered her to be ſtoned, it would have afforded a plauſible pretence for accuſing him to the governor, as a perſon who ſtirred up the people to rebellion; The Romans, who had now taken the life and death into their own hands, having new-modelled the laws of Judea according to their own juriſprudence; and in particular, not exerciſing ſuch ſeverity of puniſhment upon the women who were guilty of adultery. We may obſerve further, that the Jewiſh ſanhedrim ſat by licence from the Roman governor; and though they had a right to try capital cauſes, it was neceſſary that the ſentence they paſſed ſhould be recognized and allowed by the Romans; before it could be carried into execution. See ch. xix. 10. and Matth. xxvii. 2. For Chriſt therefore to have undertaken the deciſion of this caſe, would have rendered him immediately obnoxious to the Romans, as well as to the ſanhedrim; and had he condemned her, a new occaſion of offence muſt have ariſen in conſequence of that to Pilate, if execution had been ordered without application to him; and to the Jews, if Chriſt had directed ſuch an application to be made; ſo that the ſnare here was much the ſame with that afterwards laid for him, in the queſtion about the lawfulneſs of paying tribute. Matth. xxii. 17, &c. Jeſus fully knew their craft and wickedneſs, and regulated his conduct towards theſe depraved hypocrites accordingly; for he made them no anſwer. Perhaps, in this woman's caſe, there were ſome circumſtances tending to alleviate her guilt; ſuch as her paſt innocence, known to Jeſus, her preſent repentance, which he could eaſily diſcern, and the ſtrength of the temptations, by which ſhe had been hurried into the ſin. There may have been ſomething likewiſe in the characters of her accuſers, well known to him, which made it proper for them to ceaſe from the proſecution. Jeſus alſo might now, as on other occaſions, decline aſſuming the character and office of a civil magiſtrate. Laſtly, the perſons who demanded his opinion were by no means the judges to whom the execution of the law was committed; but Phariſees, who at bottom were groſs hypocrites, notwithſtanding they expreſſed the greateſt concern for the honour of the divine law. Whatever was the reaſon, Jeſus did not encourage this proſecution, but ſtooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground. The following words, as though he heard, or regarded them not, are wanting in the moſt valuable manuſcripts. Dr. Mill, therefore, Wetſtein, and ſeveral other printed editions of the Greek Teſtament, omit them. Were they admitted, they would cut off moſt of the conjectures which learned men have advanced reſpecting what Chriſt now wrote; a queſtion, which as it is impoſſible for us to determine, ſo is it idle to be ſolicitous about. See the next note. There was however moſt probably a language in the action itſelf, either to intimate that theſe hypocritical Phariſees ſhould be themſelves, as the prophet expreſſes it, Jeremiah xvii. 13. written in the earth, or that they were to attend to what is written; or that this woman's ſins would ſoon be pardoned and eraſed, as things written on the ſand or in the duſt, quickly are; but we pretend to determine nothing; ſaying only, with a great critic on theſe words, Neſcire velle quæ magiſter optimus neſcire nos vult, erudita inſcitia eſt. "To be willing to continue ignorant of what our great Maſter has thought fit to conceal, is no inconſiderable part of Chriſtian learning." See Bp. Fleetwood, p. 663. Beza, and Calmet.

Ver. 7. He that is without ſin among you, &c.] Alluding to the law, Deut. xvii. 7. which ordered that the hands of the witneſſes, by whoſe teſtimony an idolater was convicted, ſhould be firſt upon him, and afterwards the hands of all the people. We learn from the Miſchna, that the firſt ſtone, which was uſually large and fatal, was always thrown by the witneſs who had been inſtrumental to the conviction of a perſon. Many commentators are of opinion, that theſe were the very words which Jeſus wrote upon the ground, He that is without ſin, &c. Our Lord's meaning was, that "Perſons exceedingly zealous in getting puniſhment executed on others, ought to be free themſelves at leaſt from groſs ſins; for which cauſe, as you are all guilty of equal, or greater, or it may be the like offences, and deſerve the wrath of God, you ſhould ſhew mercy to this ſinner, who may, for aught you know, have fallen through the ſtrength of temptation, rather than of evil inclination, and who is now truly ſorry for her offence." It is evident that they ſhewed great partiality and malice againſt this woman; from their apprehending her only, and not the man, when the law condemned both; and they muſt have favoured his eſcape, as it is ſaid they were both taken in the fact. It is plain, however, that our Lord's certain knowledge of what the effect would be, at once vindicated the wiſdom of his putting the matter upon this iſſue, and freed him from the ſnare which was laid for him. See Lardner's Credibil. part i. vol. 1.

Ver. 9. Being convicted by their own conſcience] That is, Their conſcience ſmiting them with remorſe, becauſe that ſome time or other of their lives, they had been guilty of the very ſin, for which they propoſed to have this woman ſtoned, they went out one by one; an opportunity to withdraw being given them by our Lord's ſtooping down; and this they did, though when they firſt came, they were exceedingly incenſed againſt her. Inſtead of the eldeſt even unto the laſt, ſome would read, the moſt honourable, even unto the loweſt of them. There ſeems, however, no great occaſion for this alteration; for it would be abſurd to interpret the clauſe ſo rigorouſly, as to imagine that

10 When Jeſus had lifted up himſelf, and ſaw none but the woman, he ſaid unto her, Woman, where are thoſe thine accuſers? hath no man condemned thee?

11 She ſaid, No man, Lord. And Jeſus ſaid unto her, Neither do I condemn thee: go, and ſin no more.

12 Then ſpake Jeſus again unto them, ſaying, I am the light of the world: he that followeth me ſhall not walk in darkneſs, but ſhall have the light of life.

13 The Phariſees therefore ſaid unto him, Thou beareſt record of thyſelf; thy record is not true.

14 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Though I bear record of myſelf, yet my record is true: for I know whence I came, and whither I go; but ye cannot tell whence I come, and whither I go.

15 Ye judge after the fleſh; I judge no man.

16 And yet if I judge, my judgement is true: for I am not alone, but I and the Father that ſent me.

17 It is alſo written in your law, that the teſtimony of two men is true.

18 I am one that bear witneſs of myſelf, and the Father that ſent me, beareth witneſs of me.

that every particular perſon went out juſt according to his age. It ſeems only to intimate, that thoſe elders of the people who had been moſt eager in the proſecution, appeared under the moſt ſenſible confuſion, and were ſome of the firſt who left the aſſembly. And in this view it is very remarkable, eſpecially conſidering that they were now in the preſence of the multitude, before whom doubtleſs they would be deſirous to keep up the ſtricteſt appearance of virtue, in order to maintain their reputation and influence. When it is ſaid that Jeſus was left alone, it means, "left by all thoſe Scribes and Phariſees who had propoſed the queſtion;" many other perſons remained, to whom our Saviour directed his diſcourſe afterwards. See Whitby, Keuchenius, and Lardner as above.

Ver. 10, 11. Harb no man condemned thee] Hath no man puniſhed thee, in caſting the firſt ſtone at thee? For the critics obſerve, that κρινω and κατακρινω are frequently uſed in the ſenſe of chaſtiſing and puniſhing. "Neither do I condemn thee: I do not order that thou ſhouldeſt be now puniſhed; go, and ſin no more. Though I do not order thee to be puniſhed at this time, thou muſt not think that I approve of thy conduct. Thou haſt committed a great ſin; and as the meſſenger of God and friend of ſouls I warn thee, that thou beware of committing it any more; for ſuch enormous practices muſt ſubject thee to a ſeverer judgement from God than man can pronounce or inflict." The word αμαρτάνω, here rendered to ſin, is uſed by the moſt elegant Greek claſſics, as the correſponding word peccare is by the Latins, to ſignify the commiſſion of adultery, which ſtrongly intimates, that even the light of nature taught many of the heathens the exceeding ſinfulneſs of it. And this is the more worthy of notice, as not only the greateſt of their men, but according to their ſcandalous theology, the greateſt of their gods too, gave it all the ſanction it could poſſibly have from example. See Elſner's Obſervat. vol. i. p. 318. and Suicer. Theſaurus, vol. i. p. 205.

It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that the authenticity of this portion of the ſacred ſtory has been called into queſtion by ſome, becauſe it is wanted in the Syriac verſion, as well as in the Alexandrian and Bodleian copies, and in many of the oldeſt MSS. It is, however, found in many others of undoubted authority; and the learned reader, curious in ſuch queſtions, will find, in Dr. Mill, ſufficient arguments to prove its authenticity. St. Auſtin long ago rightly conjectured, that it moſt likely was dropped in ſome copies, for fear the ignorant vulgar might have taken occaſion from it to think lightly of ſins againſt the marriage-bed. Nevertheleſs, if it is truly underſtood, and eſpecially if the charge with which our Lord diſmiſſed this adultreſs is attended to, it will ſhew us that adultery is an heinous offence; an offence which Jeſus is ſo far from approving, that he has openly and expreſly condemned it, and conſequently every ſuch apprehenſion muſt be removed. Grotius is of opinion, that ſome who heard the ſtory from the Apoſtle's mouth, recorded it, with the approbation of Papias, and other eminent perſons in the church after St. John's death, thinking it too material a paſſage to be omitted; and that on this account ſome had it, and ſome had it not. Eraſmus conjectures, that it might be added by St. John, after ſome copies of his Goſpel had been taken; which firſt copies not having the ſtory, it was omitted in the copies taken from them; while copies taken from the latter manuſcript had the paſſage regularly. Dr. Worthington has copiouſly diſplayed this argument. The notice which Euſebius, Jerome, and other ancient writers have taken of the dubiouſneſs of this paſſage, with a few other inſtances of the like nature, ſhews that critical exactneſs with which they examined into the genuineneſs of the ſeveral parts of the New Teſtament; and ſo, on the whole, ſtrengthens the evidence of Chriſtianity, which is ſo inſeparably connected with the genuineneſs and purity of the New Teſtament. See Mill, Wetſtein, and Dr. Worthington's Sermon on ver. 3.

Ver. 12. I am the light of the world] In the tranſaction above related, Jeſus appears unſpeakably great, having diſplayed on the occaſion a degree of wiſdom, knowledge, goodneſs, and power vaſtly more than human. Wiſdom, in defending himſelf againſt the malicious attacks of his enemies; knowledge, in diſcovering the inviſible ſtate of their mind; power, in making uſe of their own ſecret thoughts and convictions to diſappoint their crafty intentions; and goodneſs, in pitying and not puniſhing inſtantly one who had been guilty of an atrocious act of wickedneſs; wherefore it was with ſingular propriety that, after this remarkable deciſion, addreſſing himſelf to his diſciples and the multitude, he called himſelf the Light of the world; in alluſion either to Malachi iv. 2. or to the bright ſhining of the ſun lately riſen, and now darting his beams with great luſtre and beauty upon them. "I am the Light of the world; I am the ſpiritual ſun, that diſpels the darkneſs of ignorance and ſuperſtition, with which the minds of men are overcaſt: for by my doctrine and example I ſhew clearly every where the will of God, and the way of ſalvation. But obſerve, this ſun ariſes in a few hours to deſcend again, and may fail many of you before your intended journey is diſpatched; whereas he that follows me, and governs himſelf by the dictates of my word and ſpirit, ſhall not be left to walk in the darkneſs of ignorance, error, and ſin, but ſhall have the light of life continually ſhining upon him, to diffuſe over his ſoul knowledge, holineſs, and joy, till he is guided by it to eternal happineſs." The reader will juſt recollect, to enter the better into the propriety and ſpirit of our Lord's words, that this was the morning after the concluſion of the feaſt of tabernacles. See ver. 2. and this diſcourſe probably might have been delivered before the morning ſacrifice, after which, no doubt, many would be ſetting out for their habitations in the country. Compare Iſai. xlii. 6. xlix. 6. Malachi iv. 2. Luke ii. 32. and the paſſages in the margin.

Ver. 14, 15. Though I bear record of myſelf] "Though I call myſelf the Light of the world, ye are not to imagine that I do it from a ſpirit of pride and falſhood. I give myſelf the title for no other reaſon but becauſe it truly belongs to me; and that it does ſo, you yourſelves would acknowledge, if you knew as well as I do by what authority I act, for what end I am come, and to whom I muſt return, after I have executed my commiſſion. But of theſe things you are intirely ignorant; nor can be otherwiſe, in regard that you judge after the fleſh. You judge of me according to outward appearances, and condemn me for this, among other things, that I judge no man. You think that I cannot be the Meſſiah, becauſe I do not deſtroy thoſe who oppoſe me, as you imagine the Meſſiah will do: but in this you are altogether miſtaken; for the deſign of the Meſſiah's coming is not to deſtroy, but to ſave mankind. See ch. iii. 17." It is to be obſerved, that the ſame carnal prejudices ſtill prevail in the minds of the Jews, and prevent their reception of Chriſt, they laying it down as a firſt principle that he is to be a great temporal prince and deliverer; and the admiſſion of falſe principles, which are conſtantly taken for granted, and never examined, will, it is to be feared, be attended with fatal conſequences to thouſands more. See Macknight, Clarke, and Doddridge.

Ver. 16—18. And yet if I judge] At the ſame time our Lord told them, that if he ſhould condemn any perſon for unbelief, ſuch condemnation would be juſt, becauſe his miſſion was true, being confirmed not by his own teſtimony only, but by the Father's alſo; and becauſe every ſentence of that kind which he ſhould paſs, would be pronounced by the authority, and agreeably to the will of his Father. "Yet if I judge, my judgement is true, that is, juſt and equitable; for I am not alone; nor do I expect you ſhould believe me ſolely on my own teſtimony, but I and the Father that ſent me; or, but the Father who ſent me is with me, concurring in the ſame teſtimony." This led him to ſpeak of the teſtimony which the Father bare to his miſſion. It is alſo written in your law, that the teſtimony of two men is true; "you could not juſtly complain, if I ſhould puniſh you for your unbelief in ſuch a caſe as this, ſince your own law directs you to believe every matter confirmed by the concurrent teſtimony of two witneſſes, as my miſſion evidently is; for I am one that bear witneſs of myſelf, ver. 18. not by words only, but by all the actions of my life, which are perfectly agreeable to the character of a meſſenger from heaven; and the Father that ſent me, beareth witneſs of me; that is, by the miracles which he enables me to perform." Dr. Clarke explains the 18th verſe thus: "The agreeableneſs of my doctrine 19 Then ſaid they unto him, Where is thy Father? Jeſus anſwered, Ye neither know me, nor my Father: if ye had known me, ye ſhould have known my Father alſo.

20 Theſe words ſpake Jeſus in the treaſury, as he taught in the temple: and no man laid hands on him; for his hour was not yet come.

21 Then ſaid Jeſus again unto them, I go my way, and ye ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall die in your ſins: whither I go, ye cannot come.

22 Then ſaid the Jews, Will he kill himſelf? becauſe he ſaith, Whither I go, ye cannot come.

23 And he ſaid unto them, Ye are from beneath; I am from above: ye are of this world; I am not of this world.

24 I ſaid therefore unto you, That ye ſhall die in your ſins: for if ye believe not that I am he, ye ſhall die in your ſins.

25 Then ſaid they unto him, Who art thou? And Jeſus ſaith unto them, Even the ſame that I ſaid unto you from the beginning.

26 I have many things to ſay, and to judge of you: but he that ſent me is true; and I ſpeak to the world thoſe things which I have heard of him.

27 They underſtood not that he ſpake to them of the Father.

28 Then ſaid Jeſus unto them, When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then ſhall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myſelf; but as my Father hath taught me, I ſpeak theſe things.

29 And he that ſent me, is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always thoſe things that pleaſe him.

30 As he ſpake theſe words, many believed on him.

to the known will of God, the correſpondence of my behaviour to the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and the miraculous works which God has enabled me to do, are undeniable proofs of my divine commiſſion."

Ver. 19. If ye had known me, &c.] "If you had any juſt notions of me, you would know who it is that I call my Father; that is to ſay, if you knew me to be the Meſſiah, you would know that my Father is God."

Ver. 20. Theſe words ſpake Jeſus in the treaſury] The treaſury was that part of the womens court where the cheſts were placed for receiving the offerings of thoſe who came to worſhip, (ſee Mark xii. 41.) and conſequently was a place of great concourſe, being reſorted unto even by the prieſts and rulers. Wherefore the Evangeliſt's remark, that the preceding converſation happened in the treaſury, gives us a great idea of our Lord's intrepidity; though he was in the midſt of his enemies, he ſpake boldly, not fearing them in the leaſt. It ſeems the providence of God ſo over-ruled the ſpirits of theſe wicked men, that none of them attempted to ſeize Jeſus, becauſe the time of his ſufferings was not yet come. See Macknight.

Ver. 21. I go my way, and ye ſhall ſeek me, &c.] Our Lord had ſaid this to them in a former diſcourſe, ch. vii. 34. and repeated it now, that it might make the deeper impreſſion upon them: His meaning here ſeems to be, that "after his aſcenſion into heaven, when the Roman armies were ſpreading deſolation and death in every corner of the land, they would earneſtly deſire the coming of the Meſſiah, in expectation of deliverance; but ſhould die for their ſins, and under the guilt of them, without any Saviour whatſoever, and be excluded for ever from heaven." Perhaps in this our Lord oppoſed a common error of the Jews, who imagined that by death they made atonement for all their ſins. Inſtead of in your ſins, ſome render εναμαρτια, in your ſin, that is, of unbelief. See Ezek. iii. 19.

Ver. 22, 23. Will he kill himſelf?] Chriſt having before ſpoken of going whither they could not come, the queſtion naturally ariſing is, not whether he would kill himſelf, ſay ſome, but whither he would go? And therefore, inſtead of αποκτενει, they ingeniouſly conjecture, that we ſhould read αποξενοι,—will he baniſh himſelf, or go into foreign parts? As ch. vii. 35. Will he go to the diſperſed among the Gentiles? But there are no manuſcripts to ſupport this conjecture, and our Lord's anſwer ſeems to confirm the reading of the text: Ye are from below, ver. 23, &c. "Such a vile inſinuation evidently ſhews what ſort of perſons you are, and from whence you have derived your original: Being from the earth, you are obnoxious to all the evil paſſions wherewith human nature is infeſted; and from what you feel in yourſelves, you fancy that I am capable of murdering myſelf; but your thought is fooliſh, as is evident from hence, that being actuated by no evil paſſion, I cannot have the leaſt temptation to commit ſo groſs an act of wickedneſs. My extraction is heavenly, and my mind pure, and therefore I cannot be guilty of ſelf-murder, or of any other ſin. See Tan. Faber, epiſt. ii. p. 159.

Ver. 24. If ye believe not that I am he, &c.] Ὅτι ἐγώ εἰμι, that I am; that is, "The perſon whom I have repreſented myſelf to be." There is evidently an ellipſis here, to be ſupplied by comparing the paſſage with ver. 12. See ch. xiii. 19. Mark xiii. 6. Acti xiii. 25. Some would read it, Ὅ, τι, to be what I am, as in ver. 25. Ὅ, τι καὶ λαλῶ ὑμῖν, I am what I told you. The common reading ſeems as agreeable to the ſcope of the diſcourſe: "If ye do not believe that I am the bread of life, the heavenly manna, the Light of the world, the Meſſiah, you ſhall die in your ſins." Some imagine that our Lord here claims the divine name I AM, Exod. iii. 14. as in ver. 58. where ſee the note. The repetition of the threatening here from ver. 21. is an aweful rebuke to the folly of their anſwer, ver. 22. as if our Lord had ſaid, "It very ill becomes you to trifle and amuſe yourſelves with ſuch ſilly and ſpiteful turns, when your life, even the life of your ſouls is at ſtake; and to talk of my killing myſelf, when by your unbelief and impenitence you are plunging yourſelves into death eternal." Thus do thoſe paſſages in our Lord's diſcourſes, which to a careleſs reader might ſeem flat tautologies, appear, on an attentive review, to be animated with a moſt penetrating ſpirit, and full of a divine dignity; a remark which will frequently occur, eſpecially in reading thoſe important diſcourſes of Chriſt, which St. John, through the infinite goodneſs of God to his church, has recorded, after they had been omited by the other Evangeliſts. See Le Clerc, Heylin, and Columes. Obſervat. Sacr. p. 123.

Ver. 25, 26. Even the ſame that I ſaid unto you, &c.] On ſuppoſition that this is the proper tranſlation of the paſſage, our Lord's meaning was, "I am that which I ſaid to you at the beginning of this diſcourſe, namely, the Light of the world. But Raphelius, who is followed by Doddridge and many others, very ingeniouſly propoſes to point the ſentence in ſuch a manner, as to give the following tranſlation: Truly, becauſe I am ſpeaking to you, I have many things to ſay and judge concerning you. It is well known that την αρχην in the Greek frequently ſignifies indeed, or truly. According to this tranſlation, the meaning is, "Becauſe I have long exerciſed my miniſtry among you, and you have not profited by it as you ought, I have many reproofs to give you, and a ſevere ſentence of condemnation to paſs upon you. Neverthelеſs, I ſhall wave them all at preſent, and tell you only one thing, that you may think upon it ſeriouſly, namely, that he who ſent me is truth and goodneſs itſelf; and that I ſpeak to the world nothing but what I have received from him, however dark or diſagreeable theſe things may be to perſons of your diſpoſitions. It may be proper juſt to obſerve to you, that ſome would read the clauſe, ver. 25. I am, as I ſaid to you, the beginning, that is, the perſon ſpoken of, Gen. i. 1. and elſewhere under that title. See Col. i. 18. Rev. i. 8. Ludovicus de Dieu reads it interrogatively, Do I now firſt ſpeak to you? The Vulgate ſeems to have read την αρχην ος και λαλω,—principium qui et loquor vobis; I am what from the beginning I ſaid I was. See Maldonat, Eraſmus, and Hottinger.

Ver. 28, 29. When ye have lift up the Son of man] "When you have crucified me, you ſhall know both who I am, and who my Father is. The miracles accompanying my death, my reſurrection from the dead, the effuſion of the Spirit on my diſciples, and the deſtruction of your nation, ſhall demonſtrate that I am the Light of the world, the Meſſiah; and that I do nothing by my own authority, but by my Father's direction, ſpeaking ſuch doctrines only as he has commiſſioned me to teach. Beſides, my Father is always with me; ver. 29. for though I ſhall be crucified as a malefactor, that diſaſter will not come upon me becauſe he has deſerted me. In no period of my miniſtry, not even at my death, will my Father leave me; for I always act agreeably to his will." See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 30. As he ſpake theſe words many believed on him] It ſeems probable, that by the phraſe of lifting up, the Jews did not underſtand our Lord's crucifixion, but his exaltation to the throne and kingdom of David. Hearing him therefore ſpeak of a temporal kingdom, as they 31 Then ſaid Jeſus to thoſe Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are you my diſciples indeed.

32 And ye ſhall know the truth, and the truth ſhall make you free.

33 They anſwered him, We be Abraham's ſeed, and were never in bondage to any man: how ſayeſt thou, Ye ſhall be madefree?

34 Jeſus anſwered them, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Whoſoever committeth ſin, is the ſervant of ſin.

35 And the ſervant abideth not in the houſe for ever: but the ſon abideth ever.

36 If the Son therefore ſhall make you free, ye ſhall be free indeed.

37 I know that ye are Abraham's ſeed; but ye ſeek to kill me, becauſe my word hath no place in you.

38 I ſpeak that which I have ſeen with my Father: and ye do that which ye have ſeen with your father.

39 They anſwered and ſaid unto him, Abraham is our father. Jeſus ſaith unto them, If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham.

40 But now ye ſeek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God: this did not Abraham.

41 Ye do the deeds of your father. Then ſaid they to him, We be not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God.

they ſuppoſed, they began now to think that he entertained ſentiments worthy of the Meſſiah; and on that account acknowledged him as ſuch, believing the doctrine he had delivered concerning his miſſion. Or, if this ſuppoſition is not admitted, and it is thought that they underſtood him in the proper ſenſe, we may reaſonably believe, that they felt their hearts impreſſed with what they heard from him in the whole preceding diſcourſe, as well as by obſerving his temper and conduct; ſeeing him bear the perverſeneſs of his enemies with ſo much patience; hearing him ſpeak of an ignominious and painful death with ſuch holy compoſure, and expreſſing ſo genuine and lively a ſenſe of his heavenly Father's approbation, and ſo ſweet a complacency in it. See Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 31, 32. If ye continue in my word, &c.] "If you perſevere in the belief and practice of my word, you are really my diſciples, and have a juſt title to that honourable appellation. Moreover, you ſhall be fully inſtructed in every doctrine of the Goſpel, called here and elſewhere, by way of eminence, truth; ſee ch. i. 17. and ſo being related to me as my diſciples, and underſtanding my Goſpel, you ſhall be made free, not only from the ſlavery of ſin, and all its conſequences, but from the ceremonial obſervances enjoined by Moſes; nay, you ſhall even have a juſt ſenſe, and high reliſh of civil liberty." Agreeably to which, it has ever been found in fact, that thoſe who underſtand the doctrines of Chriſtianity beſt, are the trueſt friends to the liberties of mankind." According to Sir Iſaac Newton, theſe words were ſpoken in a ſabbatical year, when at the feaſt of tabernacles, which was juſt about the beginning of the civil year, great numbers of ſervants were ſet at liberty; and he ſuppoſes that the anſwer of the Jews in the next verſe, is to be explained with a peculiar reference to this, and contains two diſtinct thoughts, "We be Abraham's ſeed, and conſequently had we ever been in bondage, we ſhould have been ſet at liberty at this ſeaſon, though Gentile ſlaves are ſtill detained; and beſides that, we never were in bondage to any man at all." See Newton on prophecy, p. 149.

Ver. 33. We be Abraham's ſeed, &c.] This in the literal ſenſe was abſolutely falſe; for at that very time they were in bondage to the Romans, and their anceſtors had been ſlaves firſt in Egypt, and afterwards in Aſſyria and Babylon: But the Jews meant to ſay, that they never had been in ſpiritual bondage, knowing it was only that of which Jeſus ſpake when he told them that the truth in which, as his diſciples, they had been inſtructed, ſhould make them free. It was therefore a freedom by truth, or a freedom in reſpect of religion, which they now aſſerted; they were the deſcendants of a noble and illuſtrious ſtock, who, during the worſt times, had preſerved ſentiments in religion and government worthy the poſterity of Abraham, and had not, by the hotteſt perſecution of the Syrian kings, been compelled to embrace heatheniſm.

Ver. 34. Whoſoever committeth ſin, &c.] Ποιει αμαρτιαν, doeth, or practiſeth ſin; to do, in the Hebrew dialect, imports not the preſent act only, but the habit of doing. See Epheſ. iii. 4, 8. Hence ſome render this, Whoſoever practiſes ſin, is the ſervant, Δουλος, the ſlave of ſin,—There are no greater ſlaves than thoſe who give themſelves up to a vicious kind of life, and to the gratification of their ſinful appetites. See Rom. vi. 16. 2 Pet. ii. 19. It is obſervable that our Lord, in reply, ſays nothing to remind them of the captivity of their anceſtors in Egypt or Babylon; for the queſtion was not, as we obſerved in the former note, about their freedom from theſe countries, but from error. About this time Caponius, a Roman knight, was named Procurator of Judea. The precarious privilege of puniſhing capitally was taken from them: They had a pagan governor, and juſtice was not adminiſtered by their own law, but by the Roman: Yet we find they account themſelves free; And why ſhould they not? when the queſtion between Jeſus and them was only, Who ſhould make them ſo, he or Abraham: The ſubject in hand was therefore only of their moral condition. See Divine Legat. book v. ſect. 3. and Saurin's ſerm. vol. vi. p. 342.

Ver. 35. And the ſervant abideth not in the houſe for ever] "As a ſlave cannot be ſo aſſured of his maſter's favour as to depend upon it, that he ſhall never be turned out of the family, ſince he is always his maſter's property, and in his power, to ſell or keep him as he ſhall think fit; ſo my Father can, when he pleaſes, turn you who are habitual ſinners out of his family, and deprive you of the outward œconomy of religion in which you glory; becauſe through ſin you have made yourſelves bondmen to his juſtice; whereas, if you will become God's children, you ſhall be ſure of remaining in his family for ever." The caſting out of Iſhmael, though a ſon of Abraham by the bondwoman, beautifully illuſtrates the remark, and the connection. Dr. Clagett, whoſe opinion is adopted by Dr. Clarke, thinks that Moſes was the ſervant here meant, which appears a very unnatural interpretation. See Clarke's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 4. and Guyſe.

Ver. 36. If the Son therefore ſhall make you free] "The only way to arrive at the relationſhip above-mentioned,—to become children of of God, is to ſubmit to the authority of his Son; believing his precepts, in which caſe the Son will adopt you as co-heirs with himſelf. If the Son ſhall make you free, ye ſhall be free indeed; free from the ſlavery of ſin, free to do good; free in reſpect of your right to the inheritance, and free in your poſſeſſion of preſent privileges; remaining in the houſe of God without danger of being ever thruſt out. Archbp. Tillotſon is of opinion, that here is an alluſion to a cuſtom which prevailed in certain cities of Greece, where the Son and heir had a right to adopt brothers, and give them the privileges of the family: But the alluſion, probably, is to ſomething more generally known; for as in all countries ſons ſucceed their fathers in the poſſeſſion of their eſtates, ſuch ſlaves as gained the good will of the ſon, by their obliging behaviour during his minority, were ſure to be well treated by him when he came to his eſtate; perhaps might in time obtain their freedom, and even ſome ſmall ſhare of the inheritance itſelf. See Archbp. Tillotſon's Works, vol. iii. p. 578.

Ver. 37. I know that ye are Abraham's ſeed] "I know that ye are the ſeed of Abraham by natural deſcent, as Iſhmael alſo was, but morally ye are the offspring of the devil; and in every reſpect unlike Abraham in your temper and diſpoſition; as is plain from hence, that many of you are endeavouring to kill me, becauſe I enjoin a greater degree of ſanctity than you are willing to acquire. The original, which we render, hath no place in you, ſignifies, non procedit in vobis;—nihil profecit vobis; profits you not,—hath no weight or influence upon you. Heylin renders it, has not admittance. Our Lord moſt probably ſpoke this, not to thoſe who believed on him, but to ſome others of the company; and the phraſe, they anſwered him, ver. 33. muſt only ſignify, that ſome of thoſe who were preſent made ſuch a reply. See Wolfius, and Elſner.

Ver. 40. Now ye ſeek to kill me, &c.] "If ye were the ſpiritual progeny of Abraham, ye would reſemble that great and good man in his righteouſneſs; and therefore, inſtead of ſeeking to take away the life of any one who is come to you from God with a revelation of his will, you would believe on him in imitation of Abraham; who for his faith in all the divine revelations, and his obedience to all the divine commands, however hard they were to fleſh and blood, was ennobled with thoſe moſt illuſtrious of all titles, the father of the faithful, and the friend of God." See Macknight, and Grotius.

Ver. 41. We be not born of fornication] The Jews, it ſeems, perceived at length that Jeſus talked not ſo much of natural, as of ſpiritual bondage; and replied, "In that reſpect undoubtedly we are the children of God, as we are not born of fornication;" alluding to the marriage covenant, which in Scripture is repreſented to have ſubſiſted between God and the Jewiſh nation; and by which their obligation to reverence, love, and obey him, was held forth to them in a lively manner, "We are neither idolaters ourſelves, nor are we ſprung of idolatrous anceſtors; and therefore, in reſpect of ſpiritual deſcent, we are, without diſpute, the children of God." Accordingly, God himſelf calls all the Jewiſh males his ſons, becauſe he was the huſband of their parents. See Ezek. xxiii. 37. Jer. iii. 4. Hoſea ii. 4.

42 Jeſus ſaid unto them, If God were your Father, ye would love me: for I proceeded forth, and came from God; neither came I of myſelf, but he ſent me.

43 Why do ye not underſtand my ſpeech? even becauſe ye cannot hear my word.

44 Ye are of your father the devil, and the luſts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, becauſe there is no truth in him. When he ſpeaketh a lie, he ſpeaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it.

45 And becauſe I tell you the truth, ye believe me not.

46 Which of you convinceth me of ſin? And if I ſay the truth, why do ye not believe me?

47 He that is of God, heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, becauſe ye are not of God.

48 Then anſwered the Jews, and ſaid unto him, Say we not well that that thou art a Samaritan, and haſt a devil?

49 Jeſus anſwered, I have not a devil; but I honour my Father, and ye do diſhonour me.

50 And I ſeek not mine own glory: there is one that ſeeketh and judgeth.

51 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, If a man keep my ſaying, he ſhall never ſee death.

52 Then ſaid the Jews unto him, Now we know that thou haſt a devil. Abraham is dead, and the prophets; and thou ſayeſt, If a man keep my ſaying, he ſhall never taſte of death.

53 Art thou greater than our father Abraham, which is dead? and the prophets are dead: whom makeſt thou thyſelf?

54 Jeſus anſwered, If I honour myſelf, my honour is nothing: it is my Father that honoureth me; of whom ye ſay, that he is your God:

55 Yet ye have not known him; but I know him: and if I ſhould ſay I know him not, I ſhould be a liar like unto you: but I know him, and keep his ſaying.

Ver. 42. I proceeded forth, and came from God] That is, "I proceeded originally, and do come from God as his meſſenger." This ſeems to be the proper diſtinction between the original words ἐξῆλθον and ἥκω. The LXX uſe the firſt of theſe words to expreſs the deſcent of children from their parents, Gen. xv. 4. xxxv. 11. Iſai. xi. 1. The form, in which the other ſtands, favours the rendering given, and may intimate not only Chriſt's firſt miſſion, but his exact attendance to every particular meſſage. See Doddridge, and Wolfius.

Ver. 43. Why do ye not underſtand my ſpeech, &c.?] The latter clauſe of this verſe may likewiſe be tranſlated and pointed interrogatively; Why do ye not underſtand my ſpeech, λαλιὰν,—the ſpiritual ſtile that I make uſe of? Is it becauſe you cannot hear my word? cannot give obedience thereto, it being contrary to your luſts? or, can you pretend to ſay, that I decline giving you the moſt publick and frequent inſtructions, or that thoſe inſtructions are unintelligible and obſcure? Your conſciences in general know the contrary."

Ver. 44. Ye are of your father the devil] "You inherit the nature of your father, the devil; and therefore you will gratify the luſts which you have derived from him. He was the enemy and murderer of mankind, and ever ſince has endeavoured to work their ruin; ſometimes by ſeducing them into ſin by his lies, and ſometimes by inſtigating them to murder thoſe whom God ſends to reclaim. Withal, having wholly departed from holineſs and truth, the habit of lying is become perfectly natural to him: Wherefore, being a liar, and the father of it, that is, the firſt and greateſt liar, when he ſpeaketh a lie, he ſpeaketh what is proper to himſelf." The words θέλετε ποιεῖν, rendered ye will do, imply a reſolute and obſtinate perſiſting in any habit or action, ch. i. 43. The account which Joſephus gives of the wickedneſs of the Jews about this time, abundantly vindicates the aſſertion of our Lord in this verſe from any appearance of undue ſeverity. See his Jewiſh War, b. v. ch. 10, &c. and Lardner's Credib. part. i. book i. chap. 6.

Ver. 45. And becauſe I tell you the truth] "True children of your Father, ver. 44. you diſbelieve me, becauſe, inſtead of ſoothing you in your ſins, and flattering you with lies, I tell you the truth; to which, like your father, you are utterly averſe."

Ver. 46, 47. Which of you convinceth me of ſin?] Can convict me of ſin? Heylin. The only reaſon for refuſing aſſent to a perſon is, either becauſe he is not deſerving of credit, or becauſe what he aſſerts is improbable. Our Lord ſhews that they could not object to him for either of theſe reaſons, but eſpecially the firſt; they could not convince him of ſin; they could not ſhew that his conduct and life were reproachable; they could not prove that his doctrine was falſe; they could not ſay, that he reproved them unjuſtly for their actions; and as therefore they could not but acknowledge that his doctrine and life were ſuch as became a meſſenger from God, he might well aſk them what was the reaſon why they did not believe on him. A queſtion, indeed, to which he gives a full reply in ver. 47. See alſo ver. 41.

Ver. 48, 49. Thou art a Samaritan, &c.] The Jews and Samaritans bore a mortal hatred to each other on account of religion, as we have frequently obſerved: Hence it came to paſs, that in common language, Couthi, or Samaritan, was uſed to ſignify not merely a Samaritan by country, but one by principle and diſpoſition; and ſo denoted frequently an inveterate enemy to the Jewiſh nation and religion, and a man of wicked morals. Thou art a Samaritan, and haſt a devil. Demoniac and madman, in the dialect of Judea, were ſometimes phraſes of one and the ſame import: Thus ch. x. 20. He hath a devil, is explained by Μαίνεται, He is mad: Not but our Lord's hearers might mean, that he ſpoke by the inſtigation of ſome evil ſpirit; for on other occaſions we find them attributing his miracles to Beelzebub; however, as it was highly provoking to the Iſraelites to be told that they were not the children of God, and as Jeſus had often in the courſe of this converſation diveſted them of that glory, nay, had expreſly called them the children of the devil, it is no wonder, conſidering the paſſions of evil men, that they now fell into a downright rage, and reviled him with the moſt opprobrious language. Diſregarding the reproach which they paſſed upon him in calling him a Samaritan, our Lord meekly anſwers, ver. 49. to the latter part of their charge, that he was neither a lunatic, nor actuated by a devil; that he honoured his Father, by delivering what he revealed, and by bearing a ſteady and conſiſtent teſtimony to the truth. Whereas they robbed him of that honour which belonged to him, by caſting ſuch opprobrious reflections upon him, and rejecting his doctrine. See ch. vii. 20.

Ver. 51. If a man keep my ſaying] Our Lord having before obſerved, that there is one who ſeeketh his glory, goes on to declare, that this God will not only finally glorify him, but will confer the higheſt honours and rewards on all his faithful ſervants. Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, if any one keep my word, he ſhall never ſee death, or ſhall not fall under eternal damnation, called elſewhere the ſecond death. Chriſt is elſewhere ſaid to have aboliſhed death, having deſtroyed the devil, and raiſed up Chriſtians with himſelf, and made him ſit with him in heavenly places. Death being thus overcome by the captain of our faith, cannot long retain his true diſciples: as for the ſecond death, it can have no power over them. See Locke's Reaſonab. of Chriſtianity,—2 Tim. i. 10. Heb. ii. 14. Epheſ. ii. 6.

Ver. 52, 53. Now we know that thou haſt a devil] "We know now for certain that thou art mad; for the moſt righteous perſons that ever lived, perſons who kept the commandments of God as perfectly as it is poſſible for men to do, are dead; even Abraham and the prophets: yet thou haſt hardineſs enough to ſay, If a man keep my ſaying, he ſhall never die." There is a great emphaſis on the word my in this place; the Jews uſing it to inſinuate both the folly and the fault of Chriſt's boaſting, as intimating that his word was more efficacious than that of God himſelf, which Abraham and the prophets heard, and yet were not able to procure an immunity from death for themſelves, far leſs for their followers. Many of the beſt copies read the laſt clauſe of the 52d verſe interrogatively: "Doſt thou, who art not to be compared with Abraham and the prophets, ſay, If a man keep my ſaying, &c?" See Grotius and Macknight.

Ver. 55. Yet ye have not known him, &c.] Though you profeſs to worſhip my Father as your God, you are ignorant of him: you neither form right conceptions of him, nor acknowledge him in the manner you ought to do; ſo that you give the lie to your profeſſion: and though you may think it vain-glory, yet I muſt tell you, that if I ſhould ſay, I do not think juſtly of him, nor acknowledge him

56 Your father Abraham rejoiced to ſee my day: and he ſaw it, and was glad.

57 Then ſaid the Jews unto him, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and haſt thou ſeen Abraham?

58 Jeſus ſaid unto them, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Before Abraham was, I am.

59 Then took they up ſtones to caſt at him: but Jeſus hid himſelf, and went out of the temple, going through the midſt of them, and ſo paſſed by.

Ver. 56. Luke x. 24.—V. 58. Iſai. xliii. 13.—V. 59. Ch. x. 31, 39. xi. 8. Luke iv. 30.

as he deſerves, I ſhould be a liar like unto you; for I both entertain proper apprehenſions of him, and obey his laws. Chriſt is not ſpeaking here of a ſpeculative, but of a practical knowledge of God.

Ver. 56. Your Father Abraham rejoiced, &c.] When the figurative word day is uſed not to expreſs the period of any one's exiſtence, but to denote his peculiar office and employment, it muſt needs ſignify that very circumſtance in his life, which is the characteriſtic of ſuch office or employment: but Jeſus is here ſpeaking of his peculiar office and employment, as appears from the occaſion of the debate, which was his ſaying, if any man keep my commandments, he ſhall never taſte of death; intimating thereby the virtue of his office as Redeemer. Therefore, by the word day, muſt needs be meant that characteriſtic circumſtance of his life; but that circumſtance was the laying it down for the redemption of mankind; conſequently, by the word day, is meant the great ſacrifice of Chriſt. But not only the matter, but the manner likewiſe of this great revelation is delivered in the text; Abraham rejoiced to SEE my day: this evidently ſhews it to have been made not by revelation in words, but by repreſentation in action. The Greek word rendered to ſee, is frequently uſed in the New Teſtament in its proper ſignification, for to ſee ſenſibly; but whether uſed literally or figuratively, it always denotes a full intention. That the expreſſion was as ſtrong in the Syriac language, as in the Greek of this hiſtorian, appears from the reply which the Jews made to our Lord: Thou art not yet fifty years old, and haſt thou SEEN Abraham? plainly intimated, that they underſtood the aſſertion of Abraham's ſeeing Chriſt's day, to mean a real beholding him in perſon. We may therefore conclude from the words of the text, that the redemption of mankind was not only revealed to Abraham, but revealed likewiſe by repreſentation; and we have ſhewn in the notes on Gen. xxii. that the command to offer up Iſaac was the very revelation of Chriſt's day, or of the redemption of mankind by his death and ſufferings. St. Chryſoſtom, in his comment on this place, ſays, "Chriſt, by the word day, ſeems to ſignify that of his crucifixion, which was typified in offering up of Iſaac and the ram." Eraſmus ſays likewiſe, "Jeſus meant, by theſe dark paſſages, that Abraham, when he was preparing to offer up his ſon Iſaac, ſaw our Lord's being delivered up to the death of the croſs for the redemption of mankind." And Dr. Hammond, after tranſlating the Greek words, which we render rejoiced to ſee my day, by was exceeding glad that he might ſee my day, proceeds thus to paraphraſe the text: "Becauſe you talk ſo much of Abraham, I will now ſay of him, that he having received the promiſe of the Meſſiah, Gen. xi. 35. did thereupon vehemently, and with great pleaſure of mind, deſire to look nearer into it; to ſee my coming into the world; and a revelation of it was made unto him, and in it, of the ſtate of the Goſpel; and he was heartily rejoiced at it." We are ſure that Abraham had in fact this deſire highly raiſed in him; the verb ηγαλλιάσατο, ſignifies to leap forward with joy, to meet the object of one's wiſhes, as well as to exult in the poſſeſſion thereof. Accordingly, the ancient verſions, particularly the Syriac, render it by words which expreſs earneſt deſire; and after them the beſt critics tranſlate it, earneſtly deſired ἵνα ἴδη, that he might ſee; which implies, that the period of his deſires was in the ſpace between the promiſe made, and the actual performance of it, by the delivery of the command, conſequently that it was granted at his requeſt. The text plainly diſtinguiſhes two different periods of joy; the firſt, when it was promiſed he ſhould ſee; the ſecond, when he actually ſaw: And it is to be obſerved, that according to the exact uſe of the word rendered rejoiced, which is noted above, it implies that tumultuous pleaſure which the certain expectation of an approaching bleſſing underſtood only in the groſs occaſions; and the word rendered was glad, that calm and ſettled joy which ariſes from our knowledge and acquieſcence in the poſſeſſion of it: but the tranſlators perhaps not apprehending that there was any time between the grant to ſee, and the act of ſeeing, turned it, he rejoiced to ſee. From the following words of this verſe it will appear, that Abraham, at the time when the command to ſacrifice his ſon was given, knew it to be that revelation he had ſo earneſtly requeſted. He ſaw it, and was glad. Thus our Lord plainly and peremptorily aſſumed the character of the Meſſiah. See Warburton's Div. Leg. book vi. ſect. 5. and his 2d vol. of Occaſional Remarks, p. 15.

Ver. 57. Thou art not yet fifty years old] Underſtanding what our Lord ſaid in a natural ſenſe, the Jews thought he affirmed that he lived in the days of Abraham; which they took to be ridiculous, as he was not yet fifty years of age: for they had no conception of his divinity, though he had told them ſeveral times that he was the Son of God. Chriſt was not now five and thirty; but Eraſmus thinks, that, worn with labours, he might appear older than he was. Lightfoot imagines, that as the Levites were diſcharged from the temple ſervice at fifty, (Numb. iv. 3, 23.) that age was proverbially uſed; as it certainly might have been without any ſuch inſtitution relating to them, it being uſual amongſt moſt nations to expreſs themſelves on ſuch occaſions by ſome round number.

Ver. 58. Before Abraham was, I am] "Before Abraham was born, I had a glorious exiſtence with the Father; and I am ſtill invariably the ſame, and one with him." Our Lord here, in the ſtrongeſt terms, aſſerts his proper divinity, declaring himſelf to be what St. John more largely expreſſes, Rev. i. 8. the alpha and omega, the beginning and the end, who is, and who was, and who is to come; the Almighty. See alſo Exod. iii. 14. Heb. i. 12. Eraſmus and Raphelius would have this clauſe tranſlated, Before Abraham was born, I was, εγω ειμι: but, notwithſtanding the niceſt critical diſtinctions, it muſt be acknowledged, that this is a very unuſual ſenſe of εγω ειμι, and the leſs neceſſary, as the proper and common tranſlation affords us a juſt and important ſenſe, and one to which none but the enemies of our Lord's divinity can object. It is indeed ſtriking to obſerve the unnatural ſenſe, to which they have recourſe who ſtumble at this text. The Socinians, with the moſt perverſe impropriety, render the paſſage thus: "Before Abraham was made Abraham, i. e. the father of many nations, in the ſpiritual ſenſe of the promiſe, I am the Meſſiah." Grotius, and others of too much learning not to diſcern the proper force of the words, are of opinion, that our Lord only affirms of himſelf, that he was before Abraham in the divine decree; but this ſenſe of the paſſage is trifling indeed, if our Lord was no more than a man, it being certain that all creatures, of whatſoever order, exiſted equally ſoon in the divine decree. Beſides, that our Lord did truly exiſt at the time mentioned in the text, is plain likewiſe from ch. xvii. 5. Nor is it to be imagined, that if our Lord had been a mere creature, he would have ventured to expreſs himſelf in a manner ſo nearly bordering on blaſphemy, refine upon this text as you pleaſe; or have permitted his beloved diſciple ſo dangerouſly to diſguiſe his meaning; a meaning indiſputably clear to every plain and unprejudiced reader, a full proof whereof is the manner in which his hearers now received it: for, filled with rage upon the blaſphemy, as they thought, of his claiming divinity to himſelf, they immediately prepare to inflict the puniſhment of a blaſphemer upon him, by ſtoning him.

Ver. 59. Then took they up ſtones] The Jews thinking Jeſus a blaſphemer, becauſe he made himſelf not only greater than Abraham, but equal with God, ch. v. 18. fell into a violent rage, as Dr. Clagett expreſſes it, reckoning him not worthy to be anſwered any other way than by an immediate and zealous attempt upon his life, they took up ſome of the ſtones which happened to be lying thereabouts for the reparation of the temple, and being in a great fury, were going with one accord to ruſh on him, and murder him. But Jeſus, making himſelf inviſible, paſſed through the crowd, and ſo eſcaped ſafe. Le Clerc thinks the word unhurt ſhould be ſupplied at the end of this verſe, to prevent a needleſs repetition; which perhaps was the reaſon that in ſeveral MSS. the whole latter clauſe is omitted, going through the midſt, &c. which ſome ſuſpect was added from Luke iv. 30. See Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. on the place, Mill, and Wetſtein.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

While Jeſus is teaching, his enemies addreſs him not only as an inſtructor, but a judge; and yet by this ſpecious form of honour and reſpect, they ſought only to enſnare and deſtroy him: So unſafe would it be always to judge of mens intentions by the firſt appearances of their actions, ver. 3—6. But our Lord, in his anſwer, united, as uſual, the wiſdom of the ſerpent, with the innocence and gentleneſs of the dove; and in his conduct to the criminal before him, ſhewed at once that tenderneſs and faithfulneſs, which might moſt effectually conduce to impreſs and reclaim her; Go thy way, and ſin no more. How ſhould all learn from hence to improve their eſcapes from danger, and the continual exerciſe of Divine Patience towards men, as an engagement to ſpeedy and thorough reformation! ver. 10, 11.

The force of conſcience, and the power of Chriſt over it, both ſo evidently conſpicuous in the preſent inſtance, (ver. 9.) teach us to reverence the dictates of our own minds, and to do nothing to bring them under a ſenſe of guilt. Through the ſecret energy of our Redeemer, they wrought ſo powerfully on theſe Phariſees, that, hypocritical and vain-glorious as they were, they could not ſo far command themſelves, as even to ſave appearances; but the eldeſt and graveſt among them were the firſt to confeſs their guilt, by withdrawing from the preſence of ſo holy a prophet, from the temple of God, and from the criminal whom they came to proſecute. A like conſciouſneſs of being ourſelves to blame, will abate the boldneſs and freedom of our proceedings with others for their faults, if, while we judge others, we are ſelf-condemned. Nor will the authority of a ſuperior age, or ſtation of life, bear us out againſt theſe inward reproaches.

Our bleſſed Redeemer is the Light of the world; ver. 12. With how much pleaſure ſhould we behold his rays! With how much chearfulneſs ſhould we follow, whitherſoever he leads us! as well knowing that we ſhall not then walk in darkneſs,—and God forbid

CHAP. IX.

The man that was born blind reſtored to ſight: he is brought to the Phariſees: they are offended at it, and excommunicate him: but he is received of Jeſus, and confeſſeth him. Who they are whom Chriſt enlighteneth.

AND as Jeſus paſſed by, he ſaw a man which was blind from his birth.

2 And his diſciples aſked him, ſaying, Maſter, who did ſin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?

3 Jeſus anſwered, Neither hath this man ſinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God ſhould be made manifeſt in him.

4 I muſt work the works of him that ſent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work.

5 As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world.

Ver. 3. Ch. xi. 4.—V. 4. Ch. v. 19. xi. 9. xii. 35.—V. 5. Ch. i. 5, 9. viii. 12. xii. 35, 46.

we ſhould ever chooſe to continue in it, as the ſhelter and ſcreen of wicked works.

It is our duty, with all candor and humility to regard and ſubmit to the teſtimony which the Father hath borne to the Son, in ſo clear and expreſs a manner: ver. 17, 18. Dreadful would be the conſequence of our refuſing to do it! The doom of theſe wretched Jews would be ours,—to die in our ſins; ver. 21. And oh, how inſupportable will that guilty burden prove in a dying hour, and before the tribunal of God! How will it ſink us into condemnation and deſpair!—In vain ſhall thoſe who now deſpiſe him, then ſeek admittance to the world where he is, whither they cannot come; and excluded from him, they muſt be excluded from happineſs.

This might juſtly have been our caſe long ſince; for ſurely he hath many things to ſay of us, and to judge concerning us, ſhould he lay judgement to the line, and righteouſneſs to the plummet. After his having been ſo long with us; yea, after we have, as it were, ſeen him lifted up, and ſet forth as crucified among us, ver. 25, 26. would to God his faithful admonition, ver. 28. might prevail to our conviction and reformation, that our everlaſting condemnation may not further illuſtrate the reaſonableneſs, nay, the neceſſity of it, and the madneſs of hardening our hearts againſt it! May we approve ourſelves the ſincere diſciples of Jeſus, by continuing in his word, (ver. 31.) and being faithful unto death, as ever we expect a crown of life!

Without this, external privileges will turn to but little account. The children of Abraham may be the children of Satan, and they are ſo, if they imitate the temper and works of the accurſed fiend, rather than of the holy patriarch. The devil was a liar and a murderer from the beginning, and all falſhood and malice are from him. It is our duty to pray earneſtly that we may be freed from them, and from the tyranny of every other ſin to which we have been enſlaved; that Chriſt the Son may make us free of his Father's family, and of his heavenly kingdom, then ſhall we be free indeed, and no more be reduced to bondage, ver. 36—44.

To prove ourſelves the children of God, we muſt be ready to hear and receive the words of our bleſſed Redeemer; the words of incarnate truth, and wiſdom, and love; whom none of his enemies could ever convict of ſin, nor ever accuſed him of it but to their own confuſion; (ver. 46, 47.) reſembling him in the innocence and holineſs of his life, we ſhall the more eaſily and gracefully imitate that courage and zeal with which he reproved the haughtieſt ſinners; and bore his teſtimony againſt the errors and vices of that degenerate age and nation in which he lived. See the Reflections on ch. vii. 20.

Chriſt honoured his father, and ſought not his own glory, ver. 49, 50. So ſhould we be careful of the honour of God, and then chearfully commit to him the guardianſhip and care of our reputation: We ſhall then certainly find that there is one who ſeeketh and judgeth in our favour.

It is a great and important promiſe which our Lord makes, ver. 51. If any one keep my word, he ſhall never ſee death. He is the reſurrection and the life; and is no leſs able than willing to make good what he hath here aſſured us. Strong therefore in the faith, let us give glory to God: though not only Abraham and the prophets, but Peter and Paul, and the other apoſtles are dead, yet this word ſhall be gloriouſly accompliſhed. Still they live to him, and ſhortly ſhall they be for ever recovered from the power of the grave. With them may our final portion be: and in the triumphant hope hereof, we may well ſet light by reproaches, clamours, and accuſations of prejudiced, ignorant, and ſinful men.

Adored be that gracious Providence which determined our exiſtence to begin in that happy day, which prophets and patriarchs deſired to ſee, and in the diſtant view of which Abraham exulted. Let it be alſo our joy: for Jeſus Chriſt is the ſame yeſterday, to-day, and for ever; the great and immutable I AM; nor could the heart of thoſe holy men fully conceive thoſe things which God had prepared for them that love him, and which he has now revealed unto us by his Spirit.

Chap. IX. Ver. 1. And as Jeſus paſſed by, he ſaw, &c.] Some would refer this to the laſt words of the foregoing chapter, and infer from hence the unſpeakable benignity of Jeſus, which no affronts or indignities of the Jews could weary out, or prevent from diſpenſing bleſſings. Others, however, ſeem with better reaſon to ſuppoſe this event not immediately conſequent to what is related in the former chapter. See Bengelius, Whiſton, Doddridge, and Chemnitz.

Ver. 2, 3. His diſciples aſked him, ſaying, &c.] Some have thought that the Jews having derived from the Egyptians the doctrines of the pre-exiſtence and tranſmigration of ſouls, (ſee Wiſd. viii. 19, &c.) ſuppoſed that men were puniſhed in this world for the ſins they had committed in their pre-exiſtent ſtate. From the account which Joſephus gives of this matter, it appears that the Phariſees believed that the ſouls of good men only went into other bodies, whereas the ſouls of the wicked, they thought, went immediately into eternal puniſhment:—an opinion ſomewhat different from that which the diſciples expreſſed on this occaſion. For, if they ſpake accurately, they muſt have thought that in his pre-exiſtent ſtate this perſon had been a ſinner, and was now puniſhed for his ſins then committed, by having his ſoul thruſt into a blind body. Nevertheleſs, from what they ſay we cannot certainly determine whether they thought that in his pre-exiſtent ſtate this perſon had lived on earth as a man, which is the notion Joſephus deſcribes; or whether they fancied he had pre-exiſted in ſome higher order of being, which was the Platonic notion. The diſciples might poſſibly have been acquainted with theſe principles; and might have put the queſtion in the text, on purpoſe to know our Lord's deciſion on ſo curious a ſubject; though for my own part, I am rather inclined to think that the diſciples were men of too little erudition to have imbibed doctrines of this ſort. "The apoſtles, ſays Theophylact after Chryſoſtom, had not received thoſe trifling notions of the Gentiles, that the ſoul can ſin in a pre-exiſtent ſtate, and ſo be puniſhed in another body, for the faults committed in a former one: For being plain fiſhermen, it is not to be ſuppoſed that they had heard theſe things, which were the doctrines of the philoſophers." Several kinds of diſeaſes, particularly blindneſs, were eſteemed by the Jews to be the puniſhments of ſin; and our Lord's diſciples, from the addreſs which he made to the paralytic at the pool of Beth-eſda, ch. v. 14. might be confirmed in this prejudice, and aſk him whether as this man was born blind, he muſt not be ſuppoſed to be puniſhed for the ſins of his parents. Another opinion was imbibed by the Jews during their captivity, that all their ſufferings deſcended upon them for the crimes of their fathers, and were wholly unmerited on their part. It was this opinion which drew from the pen of Ezekiel that ſevere remonſtrance, and animated vindication of the ways of Providence in his 18th chapter. Some remains of this opinion might have poſſeſſed the minds of the apoſtles. They fancied they ſaw in the man born blind, a caſe which could not be accounted for, but by ſuppoſing him to ſuffer for a parent's guilt. Maſter, who did ſin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? The queſtion they thought admitted but of one reply; the crime muſt precede the puniſhment: The puniſhment in this caſe commenced before there could beany perſonal guilt in the ſufferer: It muſt therefore deſcend from the parent's ſin. But our Lord ſhewed them that the caſe admitted of a very different ſolution; Jeſus anſwered, neither hath this man, &c. "Suffering is not in this caſe the effect of ſin. This is a particular caſe; an exception from the ordinary courſe of God's providence: This private calamity is permitted for a public good, to give me an opportunity of diſplaying to the world that divine power by which I act." See the note on ch. xi. 4. Macknight, Rotherham on the Origin of faith, and my 19th Diſcourſe on the Miracles, p. 387.

Ver. 4. I muſt work the works, &c.] Called in the preceding verſe the works of God,—while it is day; that is, "while I have an opportunity;" the night cometh, &c. "death is approaching, which as it puts a period in general to human labours, ſo will it cloſe the ſcene of ſuch miracles as theſe, and remove me from the converſe and ſociety men." It was now the ſabbath-day, and Jeſus was about to perform a miracle, in which a ſmall degree of ſervile work was to be done. Clay was to be made of earth and ſpittle, and the blind man's eyes were to be anointed with it; wherefore, before he began he told his diſciples, that they need not be ſurprized when they ſaw him perform miracles of that kind on the ſabbath; for though they might imagine that he could eaſily defer them till the holy reſt was expired, he had ſo little time to remain on earth, that he was obliged to embrace every opportunity of working miracles which offered. Beſides, Jeſus might chooſe to work this miracle on the ſabbath, knowing that the time when it was performed would occaſion it to be more ſtrictly enquired into by the Phariſees; and of conſequence would tend to make it more generally known, as we find was really the caſe. See Macknight, and Grotius.

Ver. 5. As long as I am in the world, &c.] Becauſe our Lord was going to confer ſight on a man who was born blind, he took occaſion from thence to ſpeak of himſelf, as one appointed to give light likewiſe to the darkened minds of men. Hence we learn that our Lord's miracles were deſigned, not only as proofs of his miſſion, but to be ſpecimens of the power which he poſſeſſed as Meſſiah. For example, by feeding the multitude with meat that periſhed, he ſig-

6 When he had thus ſpoken, he ſpat on the ground, and made clay of the ſpittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay,

7 And ſaid unto him, Go, waſh in the pool of Siloam, (which is by interpretation, Sent.) He went his way therefore, and waſhed, and came ſeeing.

8 The neighbours therefore, and they which before had ſeen him, that he was blind, ſaid, Is not this he that ſat and begged?

9 Some ſaid, This is he: others ſaid, He is like him: but he ſaid, I am he.

10 Therefore ſaid they unto him, How were thine eyes opened?

11 He anſwered and ſaid, A man that is called Jeſus, made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and ſaid unto me, Go to the pool of Siloam, and waſh: and I went and waſhed, and I received ſight.

12 Then ſaid they unto him, Where is he? He ſaid, I know not.

13 They brought to the Phariſees him that aforetime was blind.

14 And it was the ſabbath-day when Jeſus made the clay, and opened his eyes.

15 Then again the Phariſees alſo aſked him how he had received his ſight. He ſaid unto them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I waſhed, and do ſee.

16 Therefore ſaid ſome of the Phariſees, This man is not of God, becauſe he keepeth not the ſabbath-day. Others ſaid, How can a man that is a ſinner, do ſuch miracles? And there was a diviſion among them.

Ver. 6. Mark vii. 33. viii. 23. Or, ſpread the clay upon the eyes of the blind man.—V. 7. Neh. iii. 15.—V. 16. Ver. 33. Ch. iii. 2. Ch. vii. 12, 43. x. 19.

nified that he was come to quicken and nouriſh mankind with the bread of life, that ſovereign cordial and ſalutary nutriment of the ſoul. His giving ſight to the blind, was a lively emblem of the efficacy of his doctrines, to illuminate the blinded underſtandings of men. His healing their bodies, repreſented his power to heal their ſouls; and was a ſpecimen of his authority to forgive ſins, as it was a real, though but a partial removal of the puniſhment of ſin. His caſting out devils, was an earneſt of his final victory over Satan, and all his aſſociates. His raiſing particular perſons from the dead, was the beginning of his triumphs over death, and a demonſtration of his ability to accompliſh a general reſurrection; and to give no more examples, his curing all promiſcuouſly who applied to him, ſhewed that he was come not to condemn the world, but to ſave even the chief of ſinners. Accordingly, at performing theſe miracles, or ſoon after, when the memory of them was freſh in the minds of his hearers, we often find him turning his diſcourſe to the ſpiritual things which were ſignified by them, as in the caſe before us. See Macknight, Beza, my ſermons as above, and the Reflections on Matth. ix.

Ver. 6. He ſpat on the ground, &c.] We are not to imagine he did this becauſe it any way contributed towards the cure. Like the other external actions which accompanied his miracles, it was deſigned to ſignify to the blind man that his ſight was coming to him, not by accident, but by the gift of the perſon who ſpake to him. The general reaſon which Cyril has aſſigned for Chriſt's touching the lepers, his taking hold of the dead, his breathing on the apoſtles when he communicated to them the Holy Ghoſt, and ſuch like bodily actions wherewith he accompanied his miracles, may be mentioned here. He thinks that our Lord's body was by the inhabitation of the divinity, endued with a vivifying quality, to ſhew men in a viſible manner, that his human nature was by no means to be excluded from the buſineſs of their ſalvation. See the note on Mark vii. 32, 33. and the reflections on this chapter.

Ver. 7. Go, waſh in the pool of Siloam] Concerning theſe waters, the Evangeliſt obſerves, that their name Siloam, or according to the Hebrew orthography Shiloah, ſingnifies a thing that is ſent. This remark, Grotius, Dr. Clarke, and others, think was deſigned to inſinuate that Chriſt's command to the blind man was ſymbolical, teaching him, that he owed his cure to the Meſſiah, one of whoſe names was Shiloh, the ſent of God.—The waters here mentioned, came from a ſpring that was in the rocks of mount Zion, and were gathered into two great baſons; the lower called the pool of fleeces, and the upper Shiloah, Neh. iii. 15. becauſe the waters which filled it were ſent to them by the goodneſs of God, from the bowels of the earth; for in Judea ſprings of water being very rare, were eſteemed peculiar bleſſings. Hence the waters of Shiloah were made by the prophet a type of David's deſcendants, and among the reſt of Meſſiah; Iſai. viii. 5. and the two baſons which received theſe waters, are called wells of ſalvation, Iſai. xii. 3. Chriſt's benefits are fitly repreſented by the image of water; for his blood purifies the ſoul from the fouleſt ſtains of ſin, juſt as water cleanſes the body from its defilements. Moreover, his doctrine imparts wiſdom, and affords refreſhment to the ſpirit, like that which cool draughts of water impart to one who is ready to faint away with thirſt and heat. But, beſide the emblematical reaſon mentioned by the Evangeliſt, Jeſus might order the blind man to go and waſh in the pool of Siloam, becauſe there were generally great numbers of people there, who ſeeing the man led thither blind, having his eyes bedawbed with clay, muſt have gathered round him to inquire into the cauſe of ſo ſtrange an appearance. Theſe having examined the man, and found that he was ſtone-blind, they could not but be prodigiouſly ſtruck by his relation, when after waſhing in the pool, they ſaw the new faculty inſtantly imparted to him: eſpecially if his relation was confirmed by the perſon who led him, as in all probability it would be. For is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that his conductor was one of them who ſtood by when Jeſus anointed his eyes, and ordered him to waſh them in Siloam. Accordingly, when he went away, and waſhed, and came ſeeing, that is, walked by the aſſiſtance of his own eyes, without being led, the miracle was earneſtly and accurately enquired into by all his acquaintance, and ſo univerſally known, that it became the general topic of converſation at Jeruſalem, as the Evangeliſt informs us, ver. 8, 9. Nay, it was accurately examined by the litterati there, for the man was brought before them; they looked at his eyes; they enquired what had been done to them; they ſent for his parents, to know from them, if he had been really born blind; and they excommunicated the man, becauſe he would not join them in ſaying that Jeſus, who had cured him, was an impoſtor. The expreſſion at the end of this verſe, He came ſeeing, with eyes ſo remarkably ſtrengthened that they could immediately bear the light, is a great heightening of the miracle. Perhaps this man had been taught by the example of Naaman, not to deſpiſe the moſt improbable means, when preſcribed in the view of a miracle; yet it is plain he did not yet know that this was Jeſus of Nazareth, the Son of God; and ſo had no particular faith in him. See ver. 36. which ſhews, by the way, that ſuch a faith was not univerſally required as a condition of receiving a cure. See on Luke xiii. 4. Reland's Paleſtine, p. 857. Macknight, Beza, Whitby.

Ver. 8. Which before had ſeen him, &c.] Who had ſeen him before, when he was blind. Beza, Piſcator, Wetſtein.

Ver. 9. Others ſaid, he is like him] The circumſtance of having received his ſight, would give him an air of ſpirit and chearfulneſs, which would render him ſomething unlike what he was before, and might occaſion a little doubt to thoſe, who were not well acquainted with him. But ſee the reflections at the end of the chapter.

Ver. 11. I received ſight] Ἀνέβλεψα. A man born blind cannot be ſaid to recover or receive again his ſight, which is the direct meaning of this word; and therefore the compound muſt here be underſtood for the ſimple. It appears from this verſe, that the beggar knew that it was Jeſus who ſpake to him. Probably he diſtinguiſhed him by his voice, having formerly heard him preach; or he might know him by the information of the diſciples. Hence he chearfully ſubmitted to the operation, though in itſelf a very unlikely means of obtaining ſight.

Ver. 14. And opened his eyes] This phraſe ſhews that the man's blindneſs proceeded not from any fault or defect in the organs of viſion, but from his entire want of thoſe organs; his eyelids were grown together or contracted, as is the caſe of thoſe who are born without eyes. Hence Jeſus is ſaid to have opened the man's eyes, to intimate, that in this miracle, he made, rather than recovered his organs of viſion. Dr. Lightfoot has ſhewn, that anointing the eyes on the ſabbath-day with any kind of medicine, was forbidden to the Jews, by the tradition of the elders. It was certainly a malicious intention to expoſe Jeſus to the rage of the Sanhedrim, who are meant by the Phariſees; ver. 13, 15, &c. which occaſioned them to bring the blind man before them.

Ver. 16. Therefore ſaid ſome of the Phariſees] On hearing the man's account of the miracle, the Phariſees declared that the author of it muſt certainly be an impoſtor, becauſe he had violated the ſabbath in performing it. Nevertheleſs others of them, more juſt and candid in their way of thinking, gave it as their opinion, that no impoſtor could poſſibly do a miracle of that kind, becauſe it was too great and beneficial, for any evil being to have either the inclination or the power to perform it. If Nicodemus and Joſeph of Arimathea, both members of the Sanhedrim, were now preſent, they would naturally diſtinguiſh themſelves on this occaſion. Indeed, the obſervation ſeems perfectly in their manner. Gamaliel too muſt have been on their ſide, on the principles he afterwards avowed. See Acts v. 38, 39. and Chapman's Euſebius, chap. ii.

17 They ſay unto the blind man again, What ſayeſt thou of him, that he hath opened thine eyes? He ſaid, He is a prophet.

18 But the Jews did not believe concerning him, that he had been blind, and received his ſight, until they called the parents of him that had received his ſight.

19 And they aſked them, ſaying, Is this your ſon, who ye ſay was born blind? how then doth he now ſee:

20 His parents anſwered them, and ſaid, We know that this is our ſon, and that he was born blind:

21 But by what means he now ſeeth, we know not; or who hath opened his eyes, we know not: he is of age; aſk him: he ſhall ſpeak for himſelf.

22 Theſe words ſpake his parents, becauſe they feared the Jews: for the Jews had agreed already that, if any man did confeſs that he was Chriſt, he ſhould be put out of the ſynagogue.

23 Therefore ſaid his parents, He is of age; aſk him.

24 Then again called they the man that was blind, and ſaid unto him, Give God the praiſe: we know that this man is a ſinner.

25 He anſwered and ſaid, Whether he be a ſinner, or no, I know not: one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I ſee.

26 Then ſaid they to him again, What did he to thee? how opened he thine eyes?

27 He anſwered them, I have told you already, and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again? will ye alſo be his diſciples?

28 Then they reviled him, and ſaid, Thou art his diſciple; but we are Moſes' diſciples.

29 We know that God ſpake unto Moſes:

Ver. 17. Ch. iv. 19. vi. 14.—V. 22. Ch. vii. 13. xii. 42. xix. 38. Acts v. 13. Ch. xvi. 2.

Ver. 17. They ſay unto the blind man] He is ſo named, after having received his ſight, agreeable to the Scripture phraſeology. Thus Matt. x. iii. Matthew is called the publican, after he had left off that employment; and Matt. xxvi. 6. Simon is called the leper, after he was cured. The next clauſe ſhould be rendered, What ſayeſt thou of him, ſince he hath opened, or for having opened thine eyes? This queſtion was propoſed to the man, not ſo much to know his opinion, as to divert the members of the Sanhedrim from carrying on their altercation any further. The man's anſwer, that Chriſt was a prophet, contained not only a teſtimony of his being endued with a power of working miracles, but likewiſe that he had a right to diſpenſe with the ſtrict obſervation of the ſabbath; becauſe a prophet, according to their own traditions, was ſuppoſed to be inveſted with ſuch a power. See Macknight, and Beza.

Ver. 18. But the Jews did not believe, &c.] Nothing is more remarkable than the goodneſs of Providence, throughout this tranſaction, which turned the malice of the Jews to the praiſe of him, whom they wanted to prove an impoſtor, and whom they longed to deſtroy. The neighbours of the man who had known him to have been blind for many years,—his parents—the blind man himſelf, though intimidated by the Sanhedrim, before whom they were ſolemnly examined, all unanimouſly perſiſt in aſſerting the identity of the man, and his former blindneſs; and ſome of the Sanhedrim likewiſe, as appears from ver. 17. were convinced of the reality of the miracle. By ſuſpending their belief, the Jews brought forth all the proofs which could be brought to eſtabliſh the truth of the man's evidence, and to clear both him and Jeſus, from any ſuſpicion or ſhadow of colluſion. Their motive was malice, their intent was deſtruction; but the reſult was the eſtabliſhment of truth, and a glorious vindication of the character of Chriſt. See Tillotſon's Sermons, vol. ii. and the next note.

Ver. 22. Theſe words ſpake his parents becauſe, &c.] As the man who had been born blind knew who had opened his eyes; without doubt he had given his parents an account both of the name of his benefactor, and of the manner, in which he had conferred the great bleſſing upon him. Beſides, having repeated theſe particulars frequently to his neighbours, and acquaintance, ver. 11. we can conceive no reaſon why he ſhould conceal them from his parents. The truth is, they were ungrateful enough to Jeſus to conceal what they knew through a puſillanimous fear of the Jews, becauſe by an act of the court it was reſolved, that whoſoever acknowledged Jeſus to be the Chriſt, ſhould be excommunicated. The Jews had two ſorts of excommunication; one was what they called Niddai, which ſeparated the perſon under it four cubits from the ſociety of others, ſo that it hindered him from converſing familiarly with them, but left him free at that diſtance, either to expound, or hear the law expounded in the ſynagogue. See Buxtorff. in Voc. NIDDAI. p. 1306. There was another kind of excommunication called Shematta, from ſhem, which ſignifies a name in general; but by way of eminence was appropriated to God, whoſe aweful name denotes all poſſible perfection. Shematta therefore anſwers to the Syriac Maranatta,—The Lord cometh, a form of execration uſed by the Apoſtle, (1 Cor. xvi. 22.) and ſuppoſed to be derived from Enoch, becauſe St. Jude quotes a ſaying of his, which begins with the word Maranatta. ver. 14. Behold, the Lord cometh, with ten thouſand of his angels, to execute judgement upon all, &c. This kind of excommunication is ſaid to have excluded the perſon under it from the ſynagogue for ever. We have the form of it, Ezra x. 7. Neh. xiii. 25. being that which was inflicted on the Jews who refuſed to repudiate their ſtrange wives. It ſeems to have been the cenſure alſo which the council threatened againſt thoſe who ſhould acknowledge Jeſus to be the Meſſiah, and which they actually inflicted on the beggar; for the words εξιλαλον αυτον, ver. 34, 35. agree better to this kind than to the other. Probably alſo it was the Shematta which our Lord ſpeaks of, John xvi. 2. when he ſays to his diſciples, αποσυναγωγες ποιησεσινυμας,—They ſhall put you out of the ſynagogues. Selden has treated largely on the word αποσυναγωγος, in his tract, De Synedriis, lib. i. cap. 7. According to him, the ſynagogue from which perſons under this cenſure were excluded, was every aſſembly whatever, whether religious or civil; the excommunicated perſon not being allowed to converſe familiarly with his brethren, although he was not excluded either from public prayers or ſacrifices. But in this latter opinion, the learned writer has not many followers. The excommunications of the primitive Chriſtians ſeem to have reſembled thoſe of the Jews in ſeveral particulars; for they excluded excommunicated perſons from their religious aſſemblies, and from all communion in ſacred things; and when they reſtored them to the privileges of the faithful, it was with much difficulty, and after a ſevere and long penance.

Ver. 24. Give God the praiſe] "Give glory to God, in whoſe preſence you now are, by making a full confeſſion of your fraud and colluſion with this man; for we know that he is an impoſtor, and have all the reaſon in the world to believe that you are his accomplice." See Joſh. vii. 19. where the Jewiſh general adjures Achan in ſimilar terms to confeſs his ſin. As it is greatly for the honour of the Divine Omniſcience and Providence, that perſons who are guilty of crimes not fully proved againſt them, ſhould openly confeſs them, and not preſume againſt the dictates of conſcience to maintain their innocence, there is a great propriety in the phraſe, taken in this ſenſe. See Rev. xi. 13. There could not be a greater inſult on the character of our Redeemer, than to be pronounced a known ſcandalous ſinner by this high court of judicature; an infamy which has ſeldom, in any civilized country, fallen on any perſon not legally convicted. But how doth this infamy fall upon their own heads, when we recollect that they aſſerted without proof; that they admitted their own blind malice, inſtead of evidence. See Doddridge, and Locke's Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, p. 28.

Ver. 25. Whether he be a ſinner or no, I know not] That he is a ſinner, I know not. MS. In this anſwer of the beggar there is a ſtrong and beautiful irony, founded on good ſenſe, and therefore it muſt have been felt by the doctors, though they diſſembled their reſentment for a little while, hoping that by gentle means they might prevail with the man to confeſs the ſuppoſed fraud of this miracle. See the next note.

Ver. 27. He anſwered them, I have told you already] The reſiſtance of the rulers to the truth appeared ſo criminal to the man, that, laying aſide all fear, he ſpoke to them with great freedom: "I have told you already, and you did not hear, that is, believe; or as others would read it, perhaps more conſiſtently with the context, and ye did hear; or did you not hear?—wherefore would you hear it again?" &c. In this anſwer the irony was more plain and pointed: "Are you ſo affected with the miracle, and do you entertain ſo high an opinion of the author of it, that you take pleaſure in hearing the account of it repeated, from an inclination of profeſſing yourſelves his diſciples, who glory in being maſters and teachers?" See Macknight, Simon, Grotius, and Heylin.

Ver. 28, 29. But we are Moſes' diſciples, &c.] Hereby they craftily, but moſt maliciouſly and falſely inſinuated, that there was ſuch an oppoſition between Moſes and Jeſus, that it was impoſſible for the ſame perſon to be the diſciple of both. We know that God ſpake to Moſes, ſay they; but how did they know this?—Was it from the tradition they had received concerning him?—Was it from the intrinſic proofs which might be drawn from his writings? Or was it from as for this fellow, we know not from whence he is.

30 The man anſwered and ſaid unto them, Why, herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes.

31 Now we know that God heareth not ſinners: but if any man be a worſhipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth.

32 Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind.

33 If this man were not of God, he could do nothing.

34 They anſwered and ſaid unto him, Thou waſt altogether born in ſins, and doſt thou teach us? And they caſt him out.

35 Jeſus heard that they had caſt him out; and when he had found him, he ſaid unto him, Doſt thou believe on the Son of God?

36 He anſwered and ſaid, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him?

37 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Thou haſt both ſeen him, and it is he that talketh with thee.

38 And he ſaid, Lord, I believe. And he worſhipped him.

39 And Jeſus ſaid, For judgement I am come into this world, that they which ſee not, might ſee; and that they which ſee, might be made blind.

40 And ſome of the Phariſees which were with him heard theſe words, and ſaid unto him, Are we blind alſo?

41 Jeſus ſaid unto them, If ye were blind, ye ſhould have no ſin: but now ye ſay, We ſee, therefore your ſin remaineth.

from the miracles he wrought in confirmation of his miſſion? Conſider all theſe proofs with reſpect to Jeſus: They all looked upon John as a perſon of integrity, and ſome indeed honoured him with the title of a prophet; but John teſtified that Jeſus was the Lamb of God, the beloved Son of the Father, and that he had heard God himſelf declare as much, when Chriſt was baptized by him. The doctrines of Jeſus were equally worthy of a divine meſſenger with thoſe of Moſes; they were more ſpiritual, and conſequently more ſuitable to the nature of God, who is a ſpirit. They were intended not for one particular nation, and therefore more agreeable to the character of God, conſidered as the Father of mankind. The religion he eſtabliſhed was not local or temporal, like that of the Jews, nor on that account confined to a particular ſpot, or to be practiſed under particular circumſtances; but to be profeſſed every where, and to be extended throughout the habitable world. What ſtill more confirms our Saviour's divine miſſion is, that he was predicted in every link of the great chain of prophecies which runs through the Old Teſtament; and even Moſes himſelf ſpeaks of him as a law-giver, who ſhould ſuperſede his conſtitution, and ought to be heard by the latter Jews, as he himſelf had been by their fathers; yet notwithſtanding they ſay, they knew that God ſpake to Moſes, but had received no credentials to convince them of the divine miſſion of Jeſus. Again, if they believed the miſſion of Moſes on the evidence of miracles, credibly atteſted indeed, but performed two thouſand years before they were born, it was much more reaſonable, on their own principles, to believe the miſſion of Jeſus, on at leaſt equal miracles, wrought daily amongſt them, when they might in many inſtances have been eye-witneſſes to the facts; and one of which, notwithſtanding all their malice, they were here compelled to own, or at leaſt found themſelves utterly unable to diſprove. Their partiality herein was inexcuſable; nor was the inconſiſtency of this perverſe people leſs glaring: for at one time they make their knowing whence Jeſus was, an objection to his being the Meſſiah; and here they object to his being the Meſſiah, from their not knowing whence he was. But it is the nature of malice and of error always to confute and contradict themſelves. See ch. vii. 27, 28. and Doddridge.

Ver. 30, 31. The man anſwered] Utterly illiterate as he was;—and with what ſtrength and clearneſs of reaſon! Thus God had opened the eyes of his underſtanding, as well as his bodily eyes. "Why, herein is a marvellous thing, that ye,—the teachers and guides of the people, ſhould not know that a man, who hath wrought a miracle, the like of which was never heard of before, muſt be from heaven, ſent by God; for we, even we of the populace, know that God heareth not ſinners, ſo as to anſwer their prayers in this manner." This indeed was a truth univerſally allowed: Now they all knew that God had heard Jeſus by the work which he had wrought, which had been confirmed beyond any poſſibility: therefore it followed by plain conſequence, that Jeſus was not a ſinner, but of God, ſince otherwiſe he could do nothing. This argument was irrefragable. Inſtead of, and yet he hath opened, &c. ver. 30. the MS. reads though, &c.

Ver. 32, 33. Since the world began was it not heard] Philoſophers are unanimouſly agreed, that it is impoſſible to give ſight by any natural means to one who is born blind. And indeed the Jewiſh rabbies themſelves reckon it among the characteriſtics of the Meſſiah, that he ſhould open the eyes of the blind. The honeſt courage of this man, in adhering to the truth, though he knew the conſequence, ver. 22. gives him claim to the title of confeſſor; and it is unneceſſary to point out to any reader of this portion of Scripture the cloſeneſs, ſtrength, and clearneſs of his reaſoning. We may however learn from it, that a plain man, void of the advantages of learning and education, but who has honeſt diſpoſitions, is in a fairer way to underſtand truth, than a whole council of learned doctors, who are under the ſtrong influence of prejudice.

Ver. 35. Jeſus heard that they had caſt him out] Many harmoniſts ſuppoſe, that our Lord conferred the faculty of ſight on the blind man at the feaſt of Tabernacles, when he left Jeruſalem; and that returning thither at the feaſt of Dedication, he was then told that the council had excommunicated the man; at which time he reſolved to make him full amends for the injury he had ſuffered. Accordingly, having found him, he diſcovered himſelf to him as the Meſſiah, and invited him to believe on him. We have heretofore obſerved the caution uſed by our Lord in diſcovering to be the Meſſiah: here he makes uſe of a very unuſual degree of freedom, ver. 37. which may well be accounted for, by conſidering the extraordinary circumſtances of the caſe, this being the firſt inſtance in which any one had incurred the great inconvenience attending a ſentence of excommunication out of zeal for the honour of Chriſt. No doubt this paſſed privately between our Lord and the blind man, though preſently after others joined the converſation. See ver. 39.

Ver. 37, 38. Jeſus ſaid, &c.] This paſſage of the Goſpel well deſerves ſerious attention, as it is of great force to prove the divinity of our Saviour, who here declares himſelf in expreſs terms τον υιον τȣ Θεȣ, the true, eternal, only-begotten Son of God, ſo of neceſſity equal with God, even upon the conceſſion of the Phariſees; and as he abundantly proved himſelf by this mighty work, opening the eyes of a man born blind, by his own, and not any delegated power, a work the like to which was never even ſuppoſed to have been wrought by any man ſince the world began. See on ver. 32. Jeſus here, too, requires of the blind man to believe in him, the Son of God; but he who believes and puts his confidence in any creature, however great, however exalted, is accurſed by the declaration of God himſelf. See Jer. xxvii. 5. Jeſus therefore was God: Moreover, he admitted the worſhip and adoration of this man, which is due, and muſt be paid only to the one true God; Thou ſhalt worſhip the Lord thy God, and him only ſhalt thou ſerve. The God-man, corporeally preſent to the eyes of this perſon, not only required his faith, but admitted his worſhip; he muſt therefore either have been a notorious impoſtor, or the very and true God; God and man in one perſon. See my Sermons on the Miracles, vol. ii. p. 452.

Ver. 39. And Jeſus ſaid, For judgement, &c.] In theſe words, directed to the people who happened to be preſent, or to come up while Jeſus was talking with the blind man, our Lord alluded to the cure lately performed; but his meaning was ſpiritual, repreſenting not the deſign of his coming, but the effect which it would have on the minds of men. It would ſhew what character and diſpoſition every man was of. The humble, teachable, and honeſt, though they were as much in the dark with reſpect to religion, and the knowledge of the Scriptures, as the blind man had been with reſpect to the light of the ſun, ſhould be greatly enlightened by his coming: whereas thoſe who in their own opinion were wiſe, and learned, and clear-ſighted, ſhould appear to be, what they really were, blind, i. e. quite ignorant and fooliſh. See Macknight and Grotius.

Ver. 40, 41. Some of the Phariſees—heard theſe words] The Phariſees preſent, hearing him ſpeak thus, knew that he meant them in particular, eſpecially from the word ſee, in the former verſe, ſeers being a common appellation by which the wiſe and learned among them were diſtinguiſhed. As their ſect was held in great veneration by the common people, becauſe of their extraordinary ſkill in the law, they reply to our Lord with the greateſt diſdain, "Do you imagine that we are blind, like the rude vulgar? We, who are their teachers, and have taken ſuch pains to acquire the knowledge of the Scriptures?" See Acts xxii. 3. Jeſus told them, ver. 41. that they would not have been to blame for rejecting him, if they had not had faculties and opportunities to diſcern the proofs of his miſſion. In that reſpect they were not blind. Nay, he acknowledged that they were ſuperior to the vulgar in point of learning; but at the ſame time he aſſured them, that becauſe their hearts were averſe from receiving and acknowledging the truth they were altogether blind; and that an enlightened underſtanding greatly aggravates the guilt of a blind heart. What Jeſus ſaid to them, may be ſaid to every one; no error can excuſe from guilt, but what is invincible. By invincible error is meant that which ariſes from a natural incapacity of knowing better, or from the want of ſufficient and adequate means of knowledge: But in a moral conſtruction, an error may be ſaid to be invincible, that is not naturally and abſolutely unavoidable: or, in other words, it may be fairly preſumed, that all ſuch errors as it is not reaſonable to expect, taking in every circumſtance, that a perſon ſhould avoid, or which it was very probable he would fall into from his education, and the force of example, from the want of motives to examine, and helps to judge rightly, and ſeveral other advantages which might be enumerated; It may, we ſay, be fairly preſumed, that ſuch errors as theſe will be admitted as a good plea before the righteous and merciful tribunal of God, and be no more a bar for obtaining his favour, than if they ſprang from an incurable defect in the intellectual faculty, or the want of neceſſary light. So when it is affirmed, as above, that nothing but invincible error will excuſe us from guilt, the whole amounts to no more than this almoſt ſelf-evident truth, that nothing will intirely excuſe us, but what argues a thorough, unperverted, honeſt and good diſpoſition: nothing, in ſhort, that we might and ought to have prevented, and which is owing to the voluntary neglect and abuſe of our own powers. All voluntary error muſt on that very account be criminal error; and if error be criminal, only becauſe it is voluntary, it directly follows from hence, that the malignity of it muſt increaſe according to the degree in which it is voluntary; or, which is the ſame, it muſt always increaſe in proportion as it was in our power to have avoided it in our ſeveral ſtations, and with our reſpective abilities and advantages. From the argument here purſued, we may eaſily ſee that it was not, it could not be the intention of Chriſt in the words, if ye were blind, ye ſhould have no ſin, to repreſent all ignorance as abſolutely innocent; but that he only ſpeaks of ſuch inſtances of it as are involuntary and inſuperable, as ſpring from prejudices, which inſenſibly miſlead the mind into wrong judgements, and are conſiſtent with habital candour and integrity. The latter part of the paſſage ſuggeſts an obſervation of a different kind, namely, that ſins committed againſt knowledge are moſt highly aggravated; and that a corruption of manners, and increaſing wickedneſs in an enlightened age, are attended with peculiar circumſtances of reproach and infamy. To this the univerſal reaſon of mankind in every age hath agreed; nay, the reaſon even of the vicious part of mankind; which is a further argument why the knowledge and practice of religion ſhould ever be inſeparable; and that if we pretend to an enlightened mind, and right ſentiments of virtue and piety, and purſue at the ſame time immoral courſes, we are not only more criminal, but much more deſpicable, if our pretence be juſt, than either the vicious without knowledge, or the ignorant without vice. See Macknight, Elſner, and Foſter's Sermons, vol. 2.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CURE OF THE MAN BORN BLIND.

The man was born blind: This cure requires not art, but power; a power no leſs than infinite and divine. Such are we, O God, blind to all ſpiritual things: We want not ſight only, but eyes: It muſt be thou alone, who canſt make us capable of illumination.

The blind man ſat begging;—and where ſhould he thus ſit, but near the temple? Piety and charity ever dwell cloſe together; the two tables were both of one quarry: Then are we beſt diſpoſed to mercy towards our brethren, when we have either craved or acknowledged God's mercy to ourſelves. If we go to the temple to beg of God, how can they deny mites, who hope for talents?

Never did Jeſus move a foot, but to ſome purpoſe. He paſſed by, but his virtue ſtayed. The blind man could not ſee him, he ſees the blind man: His goodneſs prevents us, and yields better ſupplies to our wants. O Saviour, why ſhould we not imitate thee in this merciful improvement of our ſenſes? Woe be to thoſe eyes that care only to gaze upon their own beauty, pomp, or wealth; and cannot abide to glance upon the ſores of a Lazarus, the ſorrows of a Joſeph, the dungeon of a Jeremy, or the blind beggar at the temple's gate. O never turn thy face from any poor man, as thou wiſheſt that the face of the Lord God Almighty ſhould not be turned away from thee!

The diſciples ſee the blind man too, but with different eyes. Maſter, ſay they, who did ſin, this man or his parents, that he is born blind? In which ſhort queſtion there appear two truths and two falſhoods. It is true, that commonly man's ſuffering is for ſin; and that we may juſtly, and do often ſuffer, even for the ſins of our parents; but it is falſe, that a man could ſin actually before he was, or that he was before his being, or could before-hand ſuffer for his after ſins. In all likelihood that abſurd conceit of the tranſmigration of ſouls poſſeſſed the very diſciples;—how eaſily and how far may the beſt miſcarry with a common error! We are not thankful for our own illumination, if we do not look with charity and pity upon the groſs miſconceptions of our brethren.

Our Lord ſees, yet will he wink at this great error of his diſciples. We hear neither chiding nor conviction. He who could have enlightened their minds at once, as he did the world, will yet do it by due leiſure, and only contents himſelf here with a mild ſolution: Neither this man, nor his parents. O Saviour, we learn nothing of thee, if we learn not meekneſs. Thus the tender mother or nurſe doth not chide her little one becauſe he goes not well; but gives him the helping hand, that he may go better. It is the ſpirit of lenity that muſt reſtore and confirm the lapſed.

The anſwer is poſitive: neither the ſin of the man, nor of his parents, bereaved him of his eyes: There was an higher cauſe,—the glory which God meant to win unto himſelf by the event. The parents had ſinned in themſelves, the man had ſinned in his firſt parents; it is not the guilt of either that is guilty of this blindneſs. All God's afflictive acts are not puniſhments; ſome are for the benefit of the creature, whether for probation, or prevention, or reformation; all are for the praiſe either of his own divine power, or juſtice, or mercy.

It was fit ſo great a work ſhould be uſhered in with a preface: Thus the way being made, our Lord addreſſes himſelf to the miracle; a miracle not more in the thing done, than in the manner of performance.

The matter uſed was clay, ver. 6. What could be meaner, what more unfit, to all human apprehenſion? O Saviour, how often hadſt thou cured blindneſs by thy word alone; how oft by thy touch. Even thus, eaſily couldſt thou have acted here. For moſt aſſuredly the virtue muſt wholly be in thee, none in the means; the utter, the evident diſproportion of the help to the cure, adds glory and luſtre to the Divine Operator; and had not the Jews been more blind than the poor beggar whom thou curedſt, more hard and ſtiff than this attempered clay, they had in this one work ſeen and acknowledged thy divinity.

What muſt the blind man think, when he felt the cold clay upon the hollow ſockets of his eyes? Or, ſince he could not conceive what an eye was, what muſt the beholders think to ſee that hollowneſs thus filled up?—Is this the way to give eyes, to convey ſight? Why did not the earth itſelf ſee with this clay, as well as the man? What is there to hinder ſight, if this can produce it?——

Yet with theſe contrarieties muſt the faith be exerciſed, where God intends the bleſſings of a cure.

All things receive their virtue from divine inſtitution: Go, waſh in the pool of Siloam, is the injunction of this bleſſed Saviour; and had not the man repaired thither, no wonder if he had ſtill been blind. How ſhould a piece of wheaten bread, or a cup of wine, nouriſh the ſoul? How ſhould ſpring water waſh off ſpiritual filthineſs? How ſhould the fooliſhneſs of preaching ſave ſouls? How ſhould the abſolution of God's miniſter be more effectual than the breath of an ordinary Chriſtian?—Thou, O God, haſt ſet apart theſe ordinances; thy bleſſing is annexed to them; hence is the ground of all our uſe, and of their efficacy. Hadſt thou ſo inſtituted, Jordan would as well have healed blindneſs, and Siloam leproſy.

That the man might be capable of ſuch a miracle, his faith is ſet at work. He is led to the pool; he waſhes; he ſees. Oh what muſt this man think when his eyes were now firſt given him? What a new world around him! How muſt heaven and earth, and all the creatures have caught his wondering ſight; and not more pleaſe than aſtoniſh him! Lo! thus ſhall we be affected, and more, when the ſcales of our mortality being done away, we ſhall ſee, as we are ſeen; when we ſhall behold the bleſſedneſs of that other world, the glory of ſaints and angels, the infinite majeſty of the Son of God, and the incomprehenſible brightneſs of the all-glorious Deity.

It could not be but that many eyes had been witneſſes of this man's want of eyes. He ſat begging at one of the temple gates. His very blindneſs made him noted; deformities and infirmities of body more eaſily both drawing and fixing the eye, than an ordinary ſymmetry of parts.

Purpoſely, without doubt, did our Saviour make choice of ſuch a ſubject for his miracle: A man ſo poor, ſo publick; the glory of the work could not have reached ſo far, had it been done to the wealthieſt citizen of Jeruſalem; neither was it without a purpoſe that the act and the manner is doubted of, and inquired into by the beholders. Is not this he who ſat begging? Some ſaid, It is he; others ſaid, It is like him.

No truths have received ſo full proofs as thoſe which have been queſtioned. I marvel not if the neighbours, who having been uſed to ſee this dark viſage of the beggar led by a guide, and directed by a ſtaff, now ſaw him walking confidently alone, and looking them chearfully in the face, doubted whether this were he. The miraculous cures of God work a ſenſible alteration in men, not more in their own apprehenſion, than in the judgement of others. Thus it is in the redreſs of ſpiritual blindneſs; the whole habit of the man is changed; inſomuch, that now the neighbours can ſay, Some, Is this the man? Others, It is like him,—it is not he.

The late blind man ſoon reſolves the doubt, He ſaid, I am he. He who now ſaw the light of the ſun, would not ungratefully and unjuſtly

VErily, verily, I ſay unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the ſheep-fold, but climbeth up ſome other way, the ſame is a thief and a robber.

2 But he that entereth in by the door, is the ſhepherd of the ſheep.

3 To him the porter openeth; and the ſheep hear his voice: and he calleth his own ſheep by name, and leadeth them out.

4 And when he putteth forth his own ſheep, he goeth before them, and the ſheep follow him: for they know his voice.

5 And a ſtranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of ſtrangers.

6 This parable ſpake Jeſus unto them: but they underſtood not what things they were which he ſpake unto them.

7 Then ſaid Jeſus unto them again, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, I am the door of the ſheep.

unjuſtly hide from others the light of truth. O God, we are not worthy of ſpiritual ſight, if we do not proclaim thy mercies aloud on the houſe-top, and praiſe thee in the great congregation.

Man is naturally inquiſitive; and if there be any thing that tranſcends both art and nature, the more high and abſtruſe it is, the more buſy we are to ſearch into it. This thirſt after hidden, yea, and forbidden knowledge, did once coſt us dear; but where it is good and lawful to know, inquiry is commendable, as here in the Jews: How were thine eyes opened?——

He that was ſo ready to profeſs himſelf the ſubject of the cure, is no niggard in proclaiming its author; A man that is called Jeſus,—anointed mine eyes,—ſent me to waſh,—and now I ſee. He had heard Jeſus ſpeak; he felt his hand; as yet he could look no further; and hence he calls him a man: Upon his next meeting, he ſees God in this man. In matters of knowledge, we muſt be content to creep ere we can run: In vain ſhall we either expect a ſudden perfection in the underſtanding of divine matters, or cenſure thoſe who want it.

How did this man know what Jeſus did? he was then ſtone blind; what diſtinction could he yet make of perſons and actions? True; but yet the blind man wanted not the aſſiſtance of others eyes; their relation had aſſured him of the manner of his cure; and beſides this, the contribution of his other ſenſes gave him ſufficient warrant thus to believe and report. O Saviour, we cannot perſonally ſee what thou haſt done in the ſpiritual cure and redemption of our ſouls: But what are the monuments of thine Evangeliſts and Apoſtles, but the relations of the blind man's guide, what and how thou haſt wrought for us? On theſe we ſtrongly rely; theſe we do no leſs confidently believe, than if our very eyes had been witneſſes of what thou didſt, and ſufferedſt upon earth. Indeed faith could have no place, if the ear were not allowed worthy of as much credit as the eye.

How could the neighbours fail to aſk where he was who had wrought ſo ſtrange a cure? Yet may we reaſonably doubt that their ſolicitude intended him no favour; for, prejudiced againſt Chriſt, and partial to the Phariſees, they bring the late blind man before thoſe profeſſed enemies of the bleſſed Jeſus.

Our Lord had fixed upon the ſabbath for this cure: It is hard to find out any time wherein charity is unſeaſonable. We are all born blind; and the font of baptiſm is our appointed Siloam. No day can come amiſs; but ſtill God's inſtituted day is the propereſt for our waſhing and recovery.—And yet this circumſtance alone is ground of quarrel enough for theſe ſcrupulous, hypocritical, ſanctimonious wranglers, namely, that an act of mercy was done on that day, wherein their envy was but ſeaſonable. O blind guides! that ſtrain at the very ſhadow of a gnat, yet ſwallow a camel without heſitation, without remorſe!

I do not ſee the man, once reſtored, beg any more: No citizen of Jeruſalem was richer than he. I hear him firmly defending the gracious Author of his cure, againſt all the cavils of malicious Phariſees: I ſee him, as a reſolute confeſſor, ſuffering excommunication for the name of Chriſt, and maintaining to the laſt the innocence and honour of ſo bleſſed a Benefactor. I hear him read a divinity lecture to them who proudly ſat in Moſes' chair; yea, and convince them of blindneſs, who puniſhed him for ſeeing.

How can we fail to envy thee, O thou happy man, who of a begging patient, proveſt an intrepid advocate for thy Saviour! whoſe gain of bodily ſight, makes a glorious way for thy ſpiritual diſcernment! who haſt loſt a ſynagogue, and haſt found a heaven! who, abandoned of ſinners, and perſecuted on all hands, art received into favour and protection by the Lord of life and glory!

Chap. X. Ver. 1. Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, &c.] Our Lord having reproved the Phariſees in the foregoing chapter, for ſhutting their eyes againſt the evidence of his miſſion, continued the reproof by deſcribing the characters of a true and falſe teacher; leaving them, who had ſo unjuſtly excommunicated the beggar, to judge to which of the claſſes they belonged. Jeſus being now in the outer court of the temple, near the ſheep which were there expoſed to ſale for ſacrifice, the language of the ancient prophets came into his mind, who often compared the teachers of their own times to ſhepherds, and the people to ſheep; accordingly, in deſcribing the characters of the ſcribes and Phariſees, he made uſe of the ſame metaphor; ſhewing, that there are two kinds of evil ſhepherds or teachers. One, who inſtead of entering in by the door, to lead the flock out and feed it, enter in ſome other way, with an intention to ſteal, kill, and deſtroy; another, who though they may have entered in by the door, feed their flocks with the diſpoſitions of hirelings. For, when they ſee the wolf coming, or any danger approaching, they deſert their flocks, becauſe they love themſelves only. The Phariſees plainly ſhewed themſelves to be of the former character, by excommunicating the man that had been blind, becauſe he would not act contrary to the dictates of his reaſon and conſcience to pleaſe them. But though they caſt him out of their church, Chriſt received him into his; which is the true church, the ſpiritual incloſure, where the ſheep go in and out, and find paſture. That this parabolical diſcourſe was taken from the ſheep which were incloſed in little folds, within the outward court of the temple, whither they were brought by their ſhepherds to be ſold, is plain, becauſe our Lord ſpeaks of ſuch folds as the ſhepherd himſelf could not enter, till the porter opened to him the door, namely, of the temple. Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, he that entereth not by the door, &c. that is, "I aſſure you, whoſoever in any age of the church aſſumed the office of a teacher, without commiſſion from me, and without a ſincere regard to the edification and ſalvation of ſouls, was a thief and a robber; and in the preſent age he is no better, who aſſumes that office without my commiſſion; particularly without believing on me, and without intending my honour, and the good of my church:" For, as our Lord calls himſelf the door, ver. 9. entering by the door muſt ſignify acting by his commiſſion; which, at that time could not be done without believing on him, and regarding his intereſt. He therefore here condemns the ſcribes and Phariſees, who, by aſſuming to themſelves the right of teaching the people, had directly contrary to God's command, intruded into the province of the prieſts, who were appointed by God himſelf the public teachers, Lev. x. 11. whoſe lips were to preſerve knowledge, and at whoſe mouths the people were to ſeek the law. See Matth. xv. 13. and comp. Matth. xvi. 12. with xv. 6, 9. See alſo Macknight, and Sir Iſaac Newton on prophecy, p. 148. who ſuggeſted the interpretation above given; to which, however, it is but juſt to obſerve ſome have objected. "I cannot think, ſays an able commentator, whatever occaſion Chriſt might take from the ſight of the ſheep in the temple, to repreſent his people under that image, and himſelf as a ſhepherd, that he would deſcribe them like ſheep ſhut up in little folds to be ſold for ſacrifice; nor does the ſhepherd's leading them out, &c. ſeem to agree with this circumſtance. In countries where there were ſo many wild beaſts, it might be neceſſary to have the folds better ſecured than among us; and the chief ſhepherd might often leave a ſervant to watch them while thus ſhut up, and come himſelf to lead them out to paſture in the morning." The reader muſt judge what force there is in this objection: It ſeems to me moſt reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that our Lord, according to his uſual manner, took his general idea from the ſheep which were preſent in the temple; but by no means confined himſelf to the particular circumſtances of thoſe ſheep; carrying on his diſcourſe in a metaphorical manner, relative to the general and well-known cuſtoms of ſhepherds in that country.

Ver. 2—4. But he that entereth, &c.] "The teacher who believes on me, and acts by my commiſſion, is properly the ſhepherd; to him the door-keeper openeth;" that is, the perſon or perſons who have a right to admit paſtors open the door to him, and the ſheep hear his voice: The people of God, knowing him to be true paſtor, hearken unto him, and he calleth, &c. Our Lord here alludes to the cuſtoms of Judea; where the ſhepherds gave names to their ſheep, which anſwered to them as dogs and horſes do with us; following them to their paſture, and wherever their ſhepherds thought fit to lead them, who commonly went before them, playing on ſome muſical inſtrument. See Virg. Eclogue ii. ver. 23. The moral meaning of theſe circumſtances is, that every faithful miniſter of Chriſt, attends upon the duties of his miniſtry, making them his principal buſineſs; that he ſpends his time among his people; that he knows their characters and tempers; while true believers are obedient to his inſtructions, which the faithful paſtor delivers always with great plainneſs, concealing nothing, however diſagreeable to the corrupt inclinations of men. See Hammond, Queſnelle, and Calmet.

Ver. 7. I am the door of the ſheep] As our Lord's parable was not underſtood, he graciouſly proceeds to explain it to his audience; and in the firſt place he informs them that by the door he meant himſelf. I am the door of the ſheep. Perhaps this is a metonymy for I am the door of the ſheep-fold; or our Lord's meaning may have been, "I am not only the door, by which the ſhepherds muſt enter,—He, whoſe right alone it is to admit men to the office and dignity of ſhepherds; but I am alſo the door of the ſheep. It is by me that men enter into the ſpiritual incloſure of the church." It would be very impertinent to run a long parallel here between Chriſt and a door; the reſemblance plainly centers in this one circumſtance, that as a man muſt obſerve and paſs through the door, in order to his making an un-

8 All that ever came before me, are thieves and robbers: but the ſheep did not hear them.

9 I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he ſhall be ſaved, and ſhall go in and out, and find paſture.

10 The thief cometh not, but for to ſteal, and to kill, and to deſtroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

11 I am the good ſhepherd: the good ſhepherd giveth his life for the ſheep.

12 But he that is an hireling, and not the ſhepherd, whoſe own the ſheep are not, ſeeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the ſheep, and fleeth: and the wolf catcheth them, and ſcattereth the ſheep.

13 The hireling fleeth, becauſe he is an hireling, and careth not for the ſheep.

14 I am the good ſhepherd, and know my ſheep, and am known of mine.

15 As the Father knoweth me, even ſo know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the ſheep.

16 And other ſheep I have, which are not of this fold: them alſo I muſt bring, and they ſhall hear my voice; and there ſhall be one fold, and one ſhepherd.

ſuſpected entrance into a ſheep-fold: ſo he muſt maintain a proper regard to Chriſt, in order to his being a true teacher in the church; and muſt paſs as it were through Him, or by his authority into that office. It is by a ſimile very near reſembling this, that Chriſt elſewhere calls himſelf the way, ch. xiv. 6. See Doddridge.

Ver. 8. All that ever came before me] "All thoſe who in former times aſſumed the characters of teachers of religion, without commiſſion from me, are thieves and robbers." Here, as in many other inſtances, our Lord's words are very elliptical, and muſt be filled up from what goes before. The gloſs we have ventured to give is taken from ver. 1. and ſeems altogether neceſſary, becauſe it does not clearly appear from hiſtory, that any one among the Jews aſſumed the title of Meſſiah before our Lord came. It is true that Theudas and Judas of Galilee are mentioned by Gamaliel as having given themſelves out for perſons of note; Acts v. 37. But with reſpect to Judas, it is evident from Joſephus that he did not aſſume the title of Meſſiah: he only gave riſe to a political faction, whoſe diſtinction was, that they would pay no taxes to the Romans, or any foreign power. And from the character which the Jewiſh doctors give of Theudas, it does not appear that he called himſelf the Meſſiah. Like Judas of Galilee, he only pretended to be ſome extraordinary perſon, who had eminent ſkill in the law, and taught opinions contrary to thoſe which were commonly received. Perhaps he called himſelf a prophet, to give his doctrines the greater weight, and pretended to work miracles. But if this ſenſe of the paſſage be not admitted, we may ſuppoſe, that by them who came before him, our Lord meant the Scribes and Phariſees, his contemporaries; who often came to try him, and when he was in Jeruſalem at the feſtivals, watched him, and tempted him with enſnaring queſtions, hoping to expoſe him as an impoſtor. Theſe trials Jeſus very properly expreſſed by the figure of coming before him, in alluſion to his having called himſelf the door of the ſheep, the door through which they entered into the the fold, as is plain from ver. 1. "All the ſhepherds that ever came before me, to examine and prove me, are thieves and robbers." The reaſon why he gave them this character he had explained in ver. 1. Though they had heard his doctrines, and ſaw his miracles, they would not allow themſelves to be convinced; or if they were convinced, they would not yield to their conviction; would not acknowledge him as the Meſſiah, and receive their commiſſion to teach mankind from him; but oppoſed him, and refuſed to enter by him, the door, into the ſheep-court, the viſible church. Being therefore evil ſhepherds, the people would not follow them; many believing on Jeſus, in ſpite of all that the Scribes and Phariſees could do to prevent it. Nor is the conſtruction of the words in the original unfavourable to this interpretation; for the prepoſition ϖρο is applied to place as well as time: thus Acts v. 23. ϖρο θυρων, and Luke vii. 27. ϖρο ϖροσωπȣ, Job iv. 16. ϖρο οφθαλμων μȣ. See Macknight. Dr. Waterland, after Elſner, reads the verſe, all that ever have paſſed beſide me, &c. but there does not appear to be any proper authority for this rendering of ϖρο εμȣ.

Ver. 9. By me if any man enter in] "If any man believeth on me, he ſhall become a true member of God's church on earth, and ſhall from time to time receive ſuch inſtructions as ſhall nouriſh his ſoul unto eternal life." Our Lord here ſeems to allude to the common paſtures, and to the method of grazing ſheep in the eaſt. They were confined in the folds by night, to ſecure them from wolves and wild beaſts; but were let out to graze in the day-time, when the danger from thoſe animals was not ſo great. See 1 Sam. xviii. 16. Zeger, and my 9th Sermon on the Parables, p. 411.

Ver. 10. The thief cometh but to ſteal, &c.] "I am no thief or robber, as you may eaſily know, by conſidering that the intention of ſuch is only to ſteal, and kill, and deſtroy the flock. They aſſumed the character of teachers divinely commiſſioned, for no other reaſon but to promote their own intereſt, at the expence of their ſouls: whereas I am not come merely to give you life, but to give it more abundantly than it is given by Moſes in the diſpenſation of the law." Perhaps the phraſe more abundantly may refer alſo, or at leaſt ultimately, to the proviſion which Chriſt has made for the future and eternal happineſs of his people." I am come, that they might have life now by their enterance into my church and fold, through me, the door of the ſheep; and that they might have a more abundant life of glory, when they go out and depart from the preſent life of grace; and for this life of grace they ſhall find ſufficient paſture and ſupport in the appointed means; for the life of glory, the lamb himſelf in the midſt of the throne, ſhall feed them. See Pſ. xxiii.

Ver. 11, 12. I am the good ſhepherd] "I am not an hireling ſhepherd, appointed by the owner to take care of the flock; but I am the good ſhepherd, promiſed Iſai. xl. 11. Ezek. xxxiv. 23, &c. and the proprietor of the ſheep; as is evident from hence, that I chearfully endanger my life for the ſafety of the flock: whereas an hireling, propoſing nothing but his own gain, when he ſees the wolf coming, deſerts the ſheep, becauſe, inſtead of loving them, he loves himſelf, and will not expoſe himſelf to any danger on their account; ſo that the beaſt of prey, without any reſiſtance, tears ſome of the flock to pieces, and diſperſes the reſt." From hence it plainly appears to be the duty of every miniſter of the Goſpel to reſide in ordinary with his flock; for if approaching danger is no excuſe for his fleeing away, and leaving them, far leſs will intereſt, or pleaſure, or any leſſer matter be an excuſe for ſuch unfaithfulneſs. See Macknight, Lamy, and Queſnelle.

Ver. 13. The hireling] It is not the barely receiving of hire which denominates a man an hireling,—(for the labourer is worthy of his hire, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the judge; yea, and the Lord hath ordained, that they who preach the Goſpel ſhould live of the Goſpel;) but it is the loving of hire; the loving of hire more than the work;—working for the ſake of hire. He is an hireling who would not work were it not for the hire; to whom this is the great, if not the only motive of working. O merciful God! if a man who works only for hire is ſuch a wretch,—a mere thief and robber, what is he who continually takes the hire, and yet does not work at all!

Ver. 14, 15. I know my ſheep, and am known, &c.] Know here, as in many other paſſages of Scripture, implies much more than a mere ſpeculative knowledge;—a knowledge of love and approbation. The force of the paſſage therefore is this: "Being the good ſhepherd, and the owner of the ſheep, I am ſo careful and ſolicitous in attending my flock, that I not only know every particular ſheep, ſo as to be able to claim it, in whoſe poſſeſſion ſoever it happens to be, but I know every thing relating to my ſheep. I know the circumſtances wherein they are placed, am well acquainted with their wants, and can judge of what aids they ſtand in need. Beſides, I love them all with an ardent affection, and approve of their obedience to me, becauſe, though imperfect, it is ſincere: And as I know, love, and approve my ſheep, ſo I am known and beloved of them in return; for they have juſt apprehenſions of my dignity and character. In particular, they know that I am their ſhepherd, and a Saviour ſent from God; that I am able to feed them with knowledge, to deliver them from the puniſhment of ſin, and to beſtow on them everlaſting life. And this our knowledge and love of each other is like that which ſubſiſts between the Father and me. "I know my ſheep, and am known of mine, (ver. 15. even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father;—for ſo the paſſage ſhould be read;) and as a proof of the greatneſs of my love, I will lay down my life for the ſheep, which no hireling will ever do." See Macknight and Grotius.

Ver. 16. And other ſheep I have] "To convince you that I know my ſheep, and am known of them, I tell you, that I have other ſheep beſide the Jews; I have ſheep among the Gentiles: for I know thoſe in every country, whoſe honeſty of diſpoſition will make them capable of obeying the Goſpel. Theſe I will bring into my church, and they ſhall know me, and ſhall diſtinguiſh my voice from that of a ſtranger; they ſhall chearfully ſubmit to my laws, and there ſhall be one flock, (ϖοιμνη,) and one ſhepherd; there ſhall be but one viſible church, when the Gentiles are converted, conſiſting of them and the Jews: As there is but one ſhepherd to feed and govern them, there ſhall be no more any middle wall of partition." The incorporating the Gentiles into a church with the Jews, was indeed a grand event, worthy ſuch particular notice; and it deſerves remark, that they are here called the ſheep of Chriſt, even while they were yet in ignorance and idolatry, as he intended at length to bring them home. See Wolfius and Doddridge.

17 Therefore doth my Father love me, becauſe I lay down my life, that I might take it again.

18 No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myſelf. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father.

19 There was a diviſion therefore again among the Jews for theſe ſayings.

20 And many of them ſaid, He hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him?

21 Others ſaid, Theſe are not the words of him that hath a devil. Can a devil open the eyes of the blind?

22 And it was at Jeruſalem the feaſt of the dedication, and it was winter.

23 And Jeſus walked in the temple in Solomon's porch.

24 Then came the Jews round about him, and ſaid unto him, How long doſt thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Chriſt, tell us plainly.

25 Jeſus anſwered them, I told you, and ye believed not: the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witneſs of me.

26 But ye believe not, becauſe ye are not of my ſheep, as I ſaid unto you.

Ver. 17, 18. Therefore doth my Father love me] "Nothing can ſhew the great regard I have for the ſalvation of mankind in a ſtronger light, than my laying down my life to promote and ſecure it; and this is ſo correſpondent with the operations of infinite goodneſs, eſſential to my Father, that he cannot but look upon me as an object of infinite love, even on that account. Inſtead of that I might take it again, we may render the words ſo as to take it again; for had our Lord laid down his life, and remained under the power of death, it could not have been concluded that he had made a ſufficient atonement, or that God was reconciled to mankind, by his ſacrifice of himſelf: but as he laid down his life ſo as to reſume it again, it was evident his death had atoned for the ſins of mankind, and that he who had conquered death, was able to ſave and reſcue thoſe from the power of death who died in his faith. Further we may obſerve, it was neceſſary that the ſufferings of Chriſt ſhould be voluntary, to become either meritorious or juſt; whence it is that he adds ſo emphatically, no man taketh my life from me, ver. 18. but I lay it down of myſelf; I have power to lay it down, &c. which gives us a noble idea of our Lord's dignity and perſon. But this idea is heightened, when it is conſidered, that he had not only power to lay down his life, but likewiſe could take it again. As a mortal, death was common to him with other men; but what mortal, though he ſhould willingly ſacrifice his life, could have it in his power to reſume it? That our Lord voluntarily reſigned his life, evidently appeared from the ſtrong cry uttered juſt before his death, with which the centurion was ſo much affected, Luke xxiii. 47. That he had full power and authority to do ſo, will appear, becauſe he had life in himſelf, ch. v. 26. and likewiſe becauſe he reſumed his life after he had quitted it. Our Lord adds, This commandment, or commiſſion, have I received of my Father. "I do not lay down my life, or riſe again from the dead, without the appointment of my Father; with reſpect to both, I act in ſtrict conformity to the divine will." Our Lord's receiving this commiſſion is not to be conſidered as the ground of his power to lay down and reſume his life; for this he had in himſelf, as having an original right to diſpoſe thereof, antecedent to the Father's commiſſion: but this commiſſion was the reaſon why he thus uſed his power in laying down his Life. The preſent paſſage affords a full anſwer to the infidel objection, that by allowing ſo much merit to the death and love of Chriſt, we greatly detract from the love of God the Father; for as the redemption of the world by the Son may be inferred from this verſe, as in ſtrict conſiſtence with the decree and diſpenſation of the Father, ſo the benevolence, goodneſs, and mercy of the Father appear to have conſpired together for this great end; and how much ſoever we acknowledge as owing to the merits of the Son, we owe no leſs to the Father, whom St. John, with great propriety, characteriſes as love, in 1 Ep. iv. 8. See Doddridge, Sherlocke, and Leland.

Ver. 19—21. There was a diviſion therefore] What our Lord ſaid affected the minds of the Jews differently; for ſome of them cried out, that he was poſſeſſed and mad, and that it was folly to hear him. Others, judging more impartially of him and his doctrine, declared, that his diſcourſes were not the words of a lunatic, nor his miracles the works of a devil. Moreover, they aſked his enemies, if they imagined any devil was able to impart the faculty of ſight to a man that was born blind,—alluding to the aſtoniſhing cure which Jeſus had lately performed: Can a devil open the eyes of the blind? St. Chryſoſtom's gloſs is bold and nervous: "He not only formed the eyes which he opened, but he likewiſe gave them the faculty of ſight; which is a proof that he likewiſe animated them: for without the operation of the ſoul, a ſound eye cannot poſſibly ſee."

Ver. 22, 23. It was—the feaſt of the dedication] As this feaſt was in winter, it could not be obſerved in commemoration of the dedication of the temple by Solomon, which happened in the month Ethanim, which anſwers to our September. 1 Kings viii. 2. Nor could it be the dedication of the temple by Nehemiah, which was in the ſpring. Ezra vi. 15. But it was that which was kept in honour of the purification of the temple by Judas Maccabeus. This reſtoration of the worſhip of God was a very joyful event to every religious Iſraelite, and being conſidered as a new dedication, a great regard was paid to the feſtival inſtituted in commemoration of it. The feſtival itſelf went by the name of Lights, in alluſion to the ceremony of burning a great number of lights at the doors of their houſes. They celebrated this feaſt for eight days ſucceſſively, beginning on the 25th of the month Caſleu, 1 Macc. iv. 56. and lix. 2. Macc. x. 5, 8. But the latter half of that month falling in with the firſt half of our December, it was winter, and commonly bad weather at this feaſt; wherefore, to avoid the inclemencies of the ſeaſon, Jeſus (who ſcrupled not to attend the feaſt, though it was of human inſtitution) walked in Solomon's portico, which was a ſtately fabric, incloſing part of the court of the Gentiles. When Solomon built the temple, finding the area of mount Sion too ſmall to anſwer his magnificent plan, he filled up a part of the adjacent valley, and built this portico over it; which was a noble ſtructure, conſiſting of three rows of pillars, of exquiſite workmanſhip, and was called "The Royal Portico." It was ſupported by a wall four hundred cubits high, conſiſting of ſtones of a vaſt bulk, each ſtone being ſaid to be twenty cubits long, and ſix high. Joſephus ſpeaks of it as continuing even to the time of Albinus and Agrippa, which was ſeveral years after the death of Chriſt. See on Matth. xxiv. 2. Acts iii. 11. v. 12. Joſeph. Antiq. b. viii. ch. 3. b. xii. ch. 7. the Obſervations on the Sacred Scriptures, p. 109. and Lightfoot's Temple Service.

Ver. 24. Then came the Jews round about him, &c.] As our Lord was walking in Solomon's porch, the Jews came and required him to put them out of doubt, whether or no he was the Meſſiah: He well knew that they came not for real information, as it was not lawful for them to put any man to death, all they wanted was ſufficient matter to accuſe him before the ruling power: For this they watched, of this they were ſo anxiouſly deſirous, and this made them ſo earneſt for a declaration in expreſs words from his own mouth, that he was the Meſſiah. It was not that they would have believed in him any more for ſuch a declaration of himſelf, than they did for his miracles, or other ways of making himſelf known, which it appears they underſtood very ſufficiently. But they wanted plain, direct words, ſuch as might ſupport an accuſation, and be of weight before an heathen judge. If thou be the Meſſiah, tell us plainly; i. e. in direct words, ſuch as expreſs the thing without a figure, and without any reſerve; for, that St. John uſed the word rendered plainly in that ſenſe, we learn from ch. xi. 11—14. Locke.

Ver. 25. Jeſus anſwered them, I told you, &c.] "I have in effect told you over and over;"—for what our Lord had juſt been ſaying of himſelf in the preceding verſes, as the good ſhepherd, was in ſenſe equivalent to a declaration of his being the Meſſiah: Further, he had already performed thoſe miracles which were to characteriſe and diſtinguiſh the Meſſiah, ſuch as cleanſing the lepers, curing the blind, &c. and if they had but followed the dictates of their own rabbies, or of their own unprejudiced reaſon, they muſt have acknowledged that he had ſufficiently eſtabliſhed his claim to the title of the Meſſiah. See Grotius and Whitby.

Ver. 26—28. But ye believe not, &c.] "The reaſon why you diſbelieve me, is not becauſe the proofs of my miſſion are inſufficient, but becauſe you are not of an humble teachable diſpoſition, free from worldly paſſions, and willing to receive the doctrine which comes from God. Perſons of this character eaſily know by the nature of my doctrine and miracles who I am,—conſequently are ſoon diſpoſed to follow me; and I, on my part, readily acknowledge and receive them, and beſtow eternal life upon them, (ver. 27) As I ſaid unto you, my ſheep hear my voice, &c." for ſo the paſſage ſhould be read. See ver. 4, 14, 16. And they ſhall never periſh, &c. ver. 28. "Though you maliciouſly endeavour to hinder men from believing on me, neither you, nor the powers of darkneſs, by whom you are actuated, ſhall be able to do it: Neither ſhall any one,—ουδεις,—any enemy or evil one, (referring principally to the grand enemy of ſouls) pluck or ſnatch them,—αρπαζει,—out of my hand." Our Lord ſtill alludes to the diſcourſe he had had before this feſtival. As if he had ſaid, "My ſheep are they who, 1. hear my voice by faith; 2. are known, that is, approved by me, as loving me; and 3. follow me, keep my commandments with a believing, loving heart. And to thoſe who, 1ſt. truly believe, [obſerve, three promiſes are annexed to three 27 My ſheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me:

28 And I give unto them eternal life; and they ſhall never periſh, neither ſhall any pluck them out of my hand.

29 My Father which gave them me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.

30 I and my Father are one.

31 Then the Jews took up ſtones again to ſtone him.

32 Jeſus anſwered them, Many good works have I ſhewed you from my Father; for which of thoſe works do ye ſtone me?

33 The Jews anſwered him, ſaying, For a good work we ſtone thee not; but for blaſphemy; and becauſe that thou, being a man, makeſt thyſelf God.

34 Jeſus anſwered them, Is it not written in your law, I ſaid, Ye are gods?

35 If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, and the ſcripture cannot be broken;

36 Say ye of him, whom the Father hath ſanctified, and ſent into the world, Thou blaſphemeſt; becauſe I ſaid, I am the Son of God?

37 If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not.

38 But if I do, though you believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him.

39 Therefore they ſought again to take him: but he eſcaped out of their hand,

40 And went away again beyond Jordan, conditions] I give eternal life." He does not ſay, I will give, but I give; for he that believeth, hath everlaſting life. "Thoſe whom, 2d. I know truly to love me, ſhall never periſh, provided they abide in my love. 3d. Thoſe who follow me, neither men nor devils can pluck out of my hand." See Whitby, and the Sermon on the Parables above quoted.

Ver. 30. I and my Father are one] The Arians affirm that the ſenſe of this paſſage is, "My Father and I are the ſame, in power and in will; ſo that if you oppoſe my will, you oppoſe his; and if you take my ſheep out of my hand, you muſt at the ſame time overcome him, and take them out of his hand likewiſe." But if we attend not only to the obvious meaning of theſe plain and ſtrong words, compared with other paſſages of Scripture, but to their connection alſo, and the ſenſe in which the Jews evidently took them, they utterly ſubvert the whole Arian ſcheme, and ſo fully demonſtrate the divinity of our bleſſed Redeemer, that they be fairly left to ſpeak for themſelves, without any laboured comment. How widely different that ſenſe is in which Chriſtians are ſaid to be one with God, ch. xvii. 21. will ſufficiently appear by conſidering how flagrantly abſurd and blaſphemous it would be to draw that inference from their union with God, which Chriſt does from his. St. Auguſtin hath well obſerved, that this is a very ſtrong text to prove the divinity of Chriſt. "Mark in it, ſays he, both are, and one;—and you will be ſafe as well from Scylla as Charybdis. "One" delivers you from Arius, who denies the eternal divinity of Chriſt: "Are" delivers you from Sabellius, who denies a diſtinction of perſons in the Godhead." See for a proof of this ſame point, Iſai. ix. 6. Jer. xxiii. 6. Micah v. 2.

Ver. 31—33. Then the Jews took up ſtones] As a full proof in what ſenſe our Lord's hearers underſtood him, we find that they took up ſtones, and were going to kill him, in obedience, as they ſuppoſed, to the law, Lev. xxiv. 14. which ordered the blaſphemer to be ſtoned. Our Lord remonſtrates againſt this violent proceeding in terms the moſt ſtriking and pathetic. "In confirmation of my miſſion from my Father, I have worked many miracles, all of a beneficent kind, and moſt becoming the perfection of him who ſent me. I have fed the hungry, I have healed the lame, I have cured the ſick, I have given ſight to the blind, I have caſt out devils, I have raiſed the dead; for which of all theſe are ye going to ſtone me?" —But they perverſe, and never to be perſuaded, reply, "We are going to puniſh thee with death for no good work, but for blaſphemy; for though thou art a man, weak and mortal as we ourſelves are, thou arrogantly aſſumeſt to thyſelf the power and majeſty of God, and by laying claim to the incommunicable attributes of the Deity, makeſt thyſelf God." This they took to be the plain meaning of his aſſertion; that He and the Father were one, ver. 30.

Ver. 34. Is it not written, &c.] The Jews divided the Old Teſtament in various manners; ſometimes, as we have before obſerved, into the writings of Moſes, the Pſalms, and the prophets; and at other times only into the law and the prophets; comprehending the prophets, only the writings of thoſe who were properly ſo called; but under the law, not only the five books of Moſes, but likewiſe Pſalms, Proverbs, and hiſtorical books. Our Lord alludes to this latter diviſion; for the words are found in Pſ. lxxxii. 6. I ſaid, Ye are gods. The Jewiſh magiſtrates were God's deputies in an eſpecial manner, becauſe the people whom they governed were his peculiar people, and becauſe in many inſtances they were expreſly called by him to undertake the fatigues of government, and had an afflatus, or inſpiration of the ſpirit for that end. Thus the high-prieſts derived their dignity from God, and were poſſeſſed of the Urim and Thummim, by which they enquired of the Lord, and for any of the people to rebel againſt the ſentence of the high-prieſt or judge, pronounced by Urim, was juſtly reckoned rebellion againſt God, and puniſhed with death, Deut. xvii. 8—13. When Moſes choſe the ſeventy elders to aſſiſt him in the diſtribution of juſtice, God put his Spirit upon them, and they propheſied, Numb. xi. 17, 25. Joſhua, who ſucceeded Moſes by divine appointment, is ſaid to have been a man in whom the Spirit was, Numb. xxvii. 18. Many of the Judges were raiſed up by God, and had his Spirit; and when Saul was anointed king, the Spirit of God came upon him, and he propheſied, 1 Sam. x. 6, 10. See Macknight, Wall, and on Pſalm lxxxii. 6.

Ver. 35, 36. If he called them gods, &c.] "If in the Scripture, the authority of which you all acknowledge, they to whom the commandment of ruling God's people was given, are called gods, and the Sons of God, on account of their high office, and the inſpiration of the Spirit, which was beſtowed on them but ſparingly, can you with reaſon ſay of him whom God ſent into the world on the grand errand of ſaving the human race, and whom he hath ſet apart for that work, by giving him the Spirit without meaſure: (ch. iii. 34.) Thou blaſphemeſt, becauſe he ſaid I am the Son of God." Some give the argument another turn, thus, If they to whom the word of God, or the revelation of his will came, are called Gods in Scripture, how dare you ſay to the word of God himſelf, whom the Father hath ſanctified and ſent into the world; that is, by whom all the various revelations of the divine will have been made to men;—how dare you ſay to ſuch a perſon, on ſuch an occaſion, Thou blaſphemeſt? Knatchbull, Le Clerc, and others, contend that the tranſlation of the words before us ſhould be, If he called them Gods, againſt whom the word of God is pronounced. They imagine their conjecture is favoured by the paſſage in the Pſalms, to which our Lord alludes; I have ſaid, Ye are gods, and all of you are children of the Moſt High; but ye ſhall die like men; and it muſt be owned that the reaſoning in this light is likewiſe concluſive: "If the Scripture, which cannot err, gives the title of gods to mortal and ſinful men, why ſhould you reckon guilty of blaſphemy, Me, whom the Father hath ſanctified, and ſent into the world on ſo grand a deſign, becauſe I aſſume to myſelf a title which ſo juſtly belongs to me, of the Son of God?" Jeſus was charged here by the Jews with aſcribing divinity to his human nature; and in reply, he ſhews, that calling himſelf the Son of God, did not imply that; and that his works proved ſuch an union of his human nature with the divine, as he had aſſerted; than which no anſwer could have been more wiſe and pertinent. See Hammond, Macknight, Calmet, and Knatchbull.

Ver. 38. That ye may know and believe] "That ye may know that I neither do, nor ſay any thing, but by my Father's authority; for the Father and I are ſo intimately and entirely united, that every thing I ſay and do, is in reality ſaid and done by him, and he approves of it accordingly." See ver. 30.

Ver. 40. And went—into the place where John, &c.] To Beth-abara; ch. i. 28. See alſo the latter part of the note on Luke iii. 3. Our Lord ſeems to have remained in the country of Peræa, till he came into Judea to raiſe Lazarus from the dead; that being the next particular mentioned by our Evangeliſt, and if ſo, the time of Chriſt's abode in the country beyond Jordan muſt have been conſiderable. There is a peculiar beauty in this ſuppoſition; for, allowing it to be juſt, the people dwelling on the other ſide of Jordan, enjoyed the doctrine and miracles of our bleſſed Saviour, as well as the inhabitants of Judea, Samaria, the Galilees, the countries on the eaſt ſide of the lake, and thoſe lying far north about Tyre and Sidon, and Cæſarea Philippi; whereas, according to the common opinion, Jeſus did not exerciſe his miniſtry in Peræa for any length of time at all. The reader will find a particular deſcription of Peræa, in Joſephus's Jewiſh War, b. iii. c. 2.

into the place where John at firſt baptized; and there he abode.

41 And many reſorted unto him, and ſaid, John did no miracle: but all things that John ſpake of this man, were true.

42 And many believed on him there.

CHAP. XI.

Chriſt raiſeth Lazarus four days buried. Many Jews believe. The chief prieſts and Phariſees gather a counſel againſt Chriſt. Caiaphas propheſieth. Jeſus hideth himſelf. At the paſſover they enquire after him, and lay wait for him.

NOW a certain man was ſick, named Lazarus, of Bethany, the town of Mary and her ſiſter Martha.

2 (It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whoſe brother Lazarus was ſick.)

Ver. 40. Ch. i. 28.—V. 41. Ch. iii. 30.——V. 1. Luke x. 38, 39.—V. 2. Matth. xxvi. 7. Mark xiv. 3. Ch. xii. 3.

Ver. 41, 42. John did no miracle] John was not endued with the power of working miracles, that the authority of Jeſus might be more conſpicuous and unqueſtionable. We ſee from hence how ſtrong a confirmation of our Lord's miniſtry was judiciouſly derived by the people from that of John. Our Lord's public life was now drawing towards a concluſion; yet he had a great deal ſtill to do. This was the reaſon that he did not conceal himſelf, as in the beginning of his miniſtry, but preached conſtantly in the places of greateſt reſort, and confirmed his doctrine by many miracles, which he ſuffered to be publiſhed every where. Accordingly, the ſucceſs of his miniſtry in the country beyond Jordan was anſwerable to the power wherewith it was accompanied: Many believed on him there. See Macknight and Grotius.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. X.

Chriſt, the great Redeemer of the world, is and ſhould always be regarded by us, as the door, the only door of entrance into his fold; from whom all true teachers deſerve their authority, and to whom they muſt direct their adminiſtrations. It ſhould be the care of paſtors that they enter by this door, and that they learn their duty ſo plainly ſuggeſted here, namely, to know their ſheep, and to take as particular notice as they can of each perſon committed to their charge, and that they go before them in all the paths of duty; for what could the greateſt enemy of the flock do worſe, than to lead them by example into the paths of deſtruction?

Happy ſouls who are entered in by this door! their ſafety, their comfort is ſecure; they enjoy a holy liberty and plenty, and going in and coming out they find paſture. If we are ſtrangers to that entertainment and refreſhment which ariſes from the divine ordinances, thoſe green paſtures which Chriſt hath provided for his ſheep in the wilderneſs, we have much reaſon to fear that we belong not to his flock. He came, that his ſheep might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly; ver. 10. that greater proviſion might be made for their inſtruction and conſolation now, till they are brought to thoſe better paſtures he intends for them above. Oh that his grace may prepare us for them! for then his hand will certainly conduct us to them, nor need we fear the darkeſt paſſage in our way. Chriſt is the good ſhepherd of our ſouls, which we muſt humbly commit to his care and guidance, as ever we deſire they ſhould be ſafe and happy, ver. 11. We have known his kind regard to the flock, in expoſing and laying down his life for them, and he hath not laid it down in vain. Even when the ſword of the Lord was awakened to ſmite him, he fell not ſo as to riſe no more; but as in this great and good work he voluntarily laid down, ſo he has alſo reſumed his life, ſtill bearing in his heart the ſame concern for his flock, and uſing his renewed life and exalted dignity for their ſecurity and happineſs. ver, 17, 18.

We are of thoſe other ſheep, of whom he ſpake, ver. 16. who were not originally of the fold, but by his grace are now brought in to the great ſhepherd and overſeer of ſouls. Senſible of the high privileges we enjoy, duty and gratitude ſhould continually incline us to pray, that the boundaries of his fold may be ſtill more extended, and the whole number of his elect accompliſhed; that the flock may at length appear together, and may be conducted by him to the regions of that immortal life which he determines to give it. It is worthy of remark, that we here ſee our lord Jeſus at a feſtival appointed by human authority, in commemoration of a national deliverance, ver. 22. He came from Galilee to obſerve it in the temple, though it was winter, and brought with him at all times a heart glowing with the moſt ardent and amiable zeal for the honour of God, and the ſalvation of men, even of thoſe who were ſtudying to enſnare and deſtroy him.

What prudence, mingled with ſpirit and ſweetneſs, runs through his anſwers to them! What ineſtimable bleſſings does he propoſe, to invite them to enter into his fold! May we never forget theſe gracious words; may we ever be intitled to all the comfort of them; I give unto my ſheep eternal life, and they ſhall never periſh, neither ſhall any pluck them out of my hand, ver. 28. Lord, may we be found in the number of thoſe ſecure and happy ſouls, even of thoſe who know thee, who obey thy voice, and follow thee whitherſoever thou leadeſt them by thine example, thy providence, thy ſpirit. Then may we look on our eternal life and happineſs as inviolably ſecure. Safely indeed may we truſt it in his hands, who could ſay, in ſo ſublime and ſo glorious a ſenſe, I and the Father are one. The enemies of our ſalvation muſt triumph then over Omnipotence itſelf, before they can wreſt the ſheep of Chriſt out of his hands; nor will his fidelity to God, or his love to them, ſuffer them to be ſeduced by fraud, any more than deſtroyed by violence, ver. 27—30.

Bleſſed ſituation of thy little flock! O thou faithful, thou compaſſionate, thou almighty Shepherd, gather thou our ſouls with theirs, and never ſuffer us to forget of how great importance it is that we ſtill continue near thee, that we look up to thee for our defence and ſafety, and confide not in our own power and wiſdom, but in thine.

Who could have imagined that any heart could have been ſo baſe as to have intended evil, or any hands ſo cruel as to have armed themſelves with inſtruments of death againſt ſuch a perſon, while ſpeaking ſuch words as theſe?—Yet behold theſe Jews do it, and that even in ſo ſacred a place as the temple itſelf, as the genuine offspring of thoſe who ſlew the prophet and the prieſt of the Lord even at his altar. Compare Matth. xxiii. 31—35. and Luke xi. 48—51. Our Lord's wiſe and gentle reply diſarmed them for a few months; and the divine care and power in an extraordinary manner provided for his eſcape, and once more reſcued him from their murderous hands, ver. 31—39.

Happy the inhabitants of the country about Jordan, to which he retired, eſpecially in that they knew the day of their viſitation. The teſtimony of John the Baptiſt is now recollected to excellent purpoſes, though he himſelf was mouldering in his tomb; nor is there any thing which a faithful miniſter will more earneſtly deſire, (O eternal God, may it be the happineſs of thy unworthy ſervant!—) than that even while dead, he may yet ſpeak, for the honour of the adorable Jeſus, and the ſalvation of ſouls.

Chap. XI. Ver. 1. Now a certain man was ſick] About this time a friend of Chriſt, named Lazarus, was afflicted with a dangerous ſickneſs, ἀσθενῶν,—at Bethany, a village about two miles from Jeruſalem, but at a great diſtance from the place where our Lord now was. See the laſt chapter, ver. 40. Bethany is ſuppoſed to have taken its name from a tract of ground in which it ſtands; ſo called from a Greek word, Αθηνη, ſignifying the fruit of the palm-tree, which grew there in great abundance; though others, with greater propriety, derive it from two Hebrew words ſignifying the houſe of obedience, or the houſe of grace. It was a conſiderable place in our Saviour's time, ſituated at the foot of the mount of Olives, near two miles eaſtward of Jeruſalem; but at preſent it is a very mean village. Modern travellers inform us, that, at the entrance into it, there is an old ruin, called "The caſtle of Lazarus," ſuppoſed to have been the manſion-houſe where he and his ſiſters lived. Near it, at the bottom of a ſmall deſcent, is a ſepulchre, ſaid to be that of Lazarus, and held in great veneration by the Turks, who uſe it for an oratory, or place of prayer. It has been thought that Lazarus was younger than his ſiſters, and that this villa, or country-ſeat, was their property; for that they were people of ſome opulence, is manifeſt as well from this hiſtory, as from other parts of the Goſpel. This remarkable miracle was omitted by the former Evangeliſts, as is ſuppoſed, becauſe Lazarus was living when they wrote, and their mentioning it might have endangered his life. Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory informs us, that Lazarus was now thirty years old, and that he lived thirty years after Chriſt's aſcenſion.—But farther, while the fact was recent, it did not require ſo particular a notice, as there were perſons enough then living to atteſt it; but when John wrote his Goſpel, Lazarus being dead, as well as moſt of the witneſſes, it was proper to record ſo remarkable a fact, which might otherwiſe have been loſt to the world. This miracle is related more at large than any other of Chriſt's miracles, ſays Henry, not only becauſe there are many circumſtances of it ſo very inſtructive, and the miracle itſelf is ſo ſtrong a proof of Chriſt's miſſion, but becauſe it was an earneſt of that which was to be the crowning proof of all,—Chriſt's own reſurrection. See my 20th Sermon on the Miracles, p. 461.

Ver. 2. It was that Mary which anointed, &c.] Becauſe the Evangeliſt characteriſes Mary, the ſiſter of Lazarus, by her action of anointing the Lord's feet, Grotius imagines, that the three anointings mentioned in the Goſpels, are one and the ſame: but the anſwer is obvious. John having mentioned one anointing only, chap. xii. 3, &c. ſhe is ſufficiently known by that character to all who have read his hiſtory: yet, if any one ſhould ſay, that the Evangeliſt does not mean to diſtinguiſh her from the other Marys, he would perhaps ſpeak the truth, becauſe, to have called her the ſiſter of Lazarus was ſufficient for that purpoſe, her anointing is mentioned on this occaſion, only to inform the reader how much and tenderly ſhe loved the Lord, who doubly repaid all the kindneſſes ſhewn to 3 Therefore his ſiſters ſent unto him, ſaying, Lord, behold, he whom thou loveſt is ſick.

4 When Jeſus heard that, he ſaid, This ſickneſs is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby.

5 Now Jeſus loved Martha, and her ſiſter, and Lazarus.

6 When he had heard therefore that he was ſick, he abode two days ſtill in the ſame place where he was.

7 Then after that, ſaith he to his diſciples, Let us go into Judea again.

8 His diſciples ſay unto him, Maſter, the Jews of late ſought to ſtone thee; and goeſt thou thither again?

9 Jeſus anſwered, Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day, he ſtumbleth not, becauſe he ſeeth the light of this world.

10 But if a man walk in the night, he ſtumbleth, becauſe there is no light in him.

11 Theſe things ſaid he: and after that, he ſaith unto them, Our friend Lazarus ſleepeth; but I go that I may awake him out of ſleep.

12 Then ſaid his diſciples, Lord, if he ſleep, he ſhall do well.

13 Howbeit, Jeſus ſpake of his death: but they thought that he had ſpoken of taking of reſt in ſleep.

14 Then ſaid Jeſus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead.

15 And I am glad for your ſakes, that I

Ver. 4. Ch. ix. 3. Ver. 40.—V. 6. Ch. x. 40.—V. 8. Ch. x. 31.—V. 9. Ch. ix. 4.—V. 10. Ch. xii. 35.—V. 11. Matth. ix. 24.

him, as in this very inſtance: notwithſtanding he did not go into Judea immediately, on receiving the ſiſter's meſſage. See Macknight and Grotius.

Ver. 3. His ſiſters ſent unto him] The modeſty of his ſiſters, and their confidence in Chriſt's affection for their brother appears very great. They do not deſire the Lord to come to him; they do not deſire him to heal their brother at a diſtance, as he had done other perſons who were in a dangerous condition. They only inform him that their brother, who happily enjoyed a place in his affection, was dangerouſly ill, and they leave it to the dictates of his own wiſdom, and the warmth of his own love, to determine what meaſure to purſue. As I have dwelt at large upon this miracle in a practical view in the ſermon upon it, above quoted, I ſhall here once for all refer the reader to it.

Ver. 3. This ſickneſs is not unto death] Com. Matt. ix. 24, and Mark, v. 39. All that our Lord could poſſibly mean here was, that this ſickneſs of Lazarus was not deſigned to end in his death, conſidered as a final removal from this world, and indeed, he ſo fully explains afterwards what he meant by this ambiguous ſpeech, that nothing reaſonable can be objected to it: but it is a remarkable inſtance of the candour and fidelity of the Evangeliſts here, and in the places above quoted, ſo exactly to record the very words of Jeſus; though malice might ſo cavil at them. The verſe might be thus paraphraſed, "Lazarus is permitted to be ſick by the ſpecial providence of God; not that he deſigns to take him out of the world by death, as he doth other men, but that the Son of God might be glorified, by ſhewing his almighty power in raiſing him from the dead; hereby declaring, that he hath given to the Son to have life in himſelf, and to quicken whom he will; and therefore that he could fulfil his promiſe made to them who believed in him, that he would raiſe them up at the laſt day. So Chriſt expounds it himſelf in the 25th and 26th verſes. We may remark from the words, but for the glory of God, that the Son, &c. which are parallel to thoſe in ch. ix. 3. that the glory of God the Son, and God the Father, is one and the ſame; and it is obſervable, after that our Saviour ſpoke the words concerning the blind man, that the works of God, &c. he adds, I muſt work the works of him that ſent me, while it is day; plainly declaring that he himſelf was God; which is fully proved by his proclaiming himſelf the Light of the world. See Chryſoſtom, and Theophylact's comment on the place, where the like argument is urged, though more fully, in proof of our Lord's divinity.

Ver. 5. Now Jeſus loved Martha, &c.] On account of their unfeigned piety towards God, their friendſhip and affection towards each other, and their faith in him as the Meſſiah. See ver. 27. The Evangeliſt mentions the love which Jeſus bore to Mary, and her ſiſter, and Lazarus, before he informs us, that, after receiving the meſſage he ſtayed two days, without ſtirring from the place where he was. His deſign in this might be, to inſinuate that our Lord's delaying ſo long after the meſſage came, did not proceed from want of concern for his friends, but had happened according to the counſels of his own wiſdom. Had he gone as ſoon as the meſſenger from Martha arrived, there would have been nothing more in the recovery of Lazarus, than in that of Simon's mother, or of many ſick perſons whom he had reſtored to health. Had he cured him without going to him, no greater effect of power would have been ſhewn in this miracle, than in the cure of the centurion's ſervant. And might not the Jews, who lived at a diſtance from the ſcene of this tranſaction, have queſtioned either the reality of Lazarus's ſickneſs, or have imputed his cure to a colluſion between him and Jeſus, eſpecially as there was ſo ſtrong an intimacy between them? Had Jeſus gone immediately after his death, and raiſed him either in his chamber, or as he was carrying to the ſepulchre, it might have been ſaid that his death was a mere pretence; or if it were granted that there was no fraud, it might have been alledged that he was only in a fit or trance, and recovered luckily from it juſt as Chriſt pretended to raiſe him. Nay, even upon the ſuppoſition that the reſtoring Lazarus to life before his interment, ſhould have been granted to have been a real and proper reſurrection, it would have afforded no ſtronger proofs than the reſurrection of the widow's ſon: But the length of the time which Lazarus lay in the grave, puts his death beyond all poſſibility of doubt, removed every ſuſpicion of fraud, and ſo afforded Jeſus a fit opportunity of diſplaying his love to Lazarus, as well as his own almighty power, by his unqueſtionable reſurrection from the dead. Our Lord might alſo have a further view in thus heightening the circumſtances of this miracle. The time of his own death being ſo near, he might intend hereby to convince his diſciples, that as he had life in himſelf, and could recal thoſe to life who had been dead ſo long as to putrify and become offenſive, it was equally poſſible for him to raiſe himſelf after his own death, according to the intimations with which he always accompanied the predictions of his dying. Our Lord's delay, it is true, kept Lazarus's ſiſters in the moſt painful ſuſpence, and at laſt pierced them with the affliction of ſeeing their brother die; yet they muſt, in the end, think themſelves abundantly recompenſed by the evidence accruing to the Goſpel from this aſtoniſhing miracle, as well as by the inexpreſſible ſurpriſe of joy which they felt on receiving their brother again from the dead. See Macknight, Grotius, and Lardner.

Ver 9, 10. Jeſus anſwered, &c.] In anſwer to the fears and remonſtrances of his diſciples, Jeſus replies, That as the hours of the day are appointed for the various works neceſſary to human life, and as he who travels in the day-time need not be afraid of ſtumbling, becauſe he has the ſun, the light of this world, to ſhew him the way; even ſo the man who has a ſeaſon allotted him for performing God's works, and at the ſame time the light of the divine call requiring him to engage in it, need not be afraid of any danger to which he is expoſed in the performance of it; God, whom he ſerves, being always ready to preſerve him: But if any man undertakes God's work at an improper ſeaſon, or without a call, ver. 10. he may juſtly be afraid of the danger he expoſes himſelf to thereby. "By theſe words, ſays Cocceius, our Lord reminds his diſciples, that he is the Light of the world, and that as long as he is in the world, he muſt neceſſarily ſhine; and that there is no danger if they walk with him. He alſo hints hereby the ſtated time fixed for him to be in the world, and the conſequent darkneſs of thoſe who ſhould reject his light, and not walk in it, which they ſhould enjoy always, who obeyed his word, and followed his example. See ch. ix. 4, 5. Inſtead of there is no light in him, ver. 10. Dr. Waterland reads, in it.

Ver. 11. Our friend Lazarus ſleepeth] Our Lord might chooſe the expreſſion, Lazarus ſleepeth, partly out of tenderneſs, as being leaſt ſhocking, when he ſpoke of ſo dear a friend; and it may alſo be conſidered as an inſtance of that modeſty which characteriſes all our Lord's actions. He does not immediately ſay, "He is dead, and I go by my almighty power to burſt the bonds of the ſepulchre, and to command him back to life again;" but, avoiding all parade and oſtentation, he chooſes the ſimpleſt and humbleſt expreſſion which can be thought of: It is likewiſe remarkable, that, after uſing the expreſſion, Lazarus ſleepeth, our Lord adds, with the greateſt propriety, I go, that I may awake him; But afterwards, when he ſays he is dead, ver. 14. he there ſtops, conſiſtent with the ſame modeſty, and mentions nothing of his reſtoring him to life; that he might not ſeem chargeable with the leaſt ſhadow of oſtentation. See Blackwall's Sacred Claſſics, vol. i. p. 297. and Lardner's admirable Vindication of this miracle.

Ver. 12. Lord, if he ſleep, he ſhall do well] The diſciples underſtanding our Lord's words in a literal ſenſe, replied, that they took Lazarus's ſleeping as a favourable ſymptom of his ſpeedy recovery; and by ſaying ſo, they inſinuated that there was no need of their going into Judea on this account, to the hazard of their own, as well as of their Maſter's life.

Ver. 15. And I am glad for your ſakes, &c.] "I am glad for your ſakes was not there, to the intent ye may believe; nevertheleſs, let us go unto him.

16 Then ſaid Thomas, which is called Didymus, unto his fellow-diſciples, Let us alſo go, that we may die with him.

17 Then when Jeſus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days already.

18 (Now Bethany was nigh unto Jeruſalem, about fifteen furlongs off:)

19 And many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother.

20 Then Martha, as ſoon as ſhe heard that Jeſus was coming, went and met him: but Mary ſat ſtill in the houſe.

21 Then ſaid Martha unto Jeſus, Lord, if thou hadſt been here, my brother had not died.

22 But I know, that even now, whatſoever thou wilt aſk of God, God will give it thee.

23 Jeſus ſaith unto her, Thy brother ſhall riſe again.

24 Martha ſaith unto him, I know that he ſhall riſe again in the reſurrection, at the laſt day.

25 Jeſus ſaid unto her, I am the reſurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet ſhall he live:

26 And whoſoever liveth and believeth in me, ſhall never die. Believeſt thou this?

V. 18. That is, about two miles.—V. 24. Luke xiv. 14. Ch. v. 29.—V. 25. Ch. vi. 35. Ch. iii. 36. 1 John v. 10, &c.

ſakes, that I was not in Judea before he died; for had I been there, and recovered him, your faith in me as the Meſſiah muſt have wanted that great confirmation, which it will receive by your beholding me raiſing him again from the dead. Nevertheleſs,—(rather therefore, αλλα, ſee Acts x. 20. xxvi. 16.) to confirm your faith, and to maniſeſt the great deſigns of God, let us go unto him." Thus Jeſus, who could have raiſed up Lazarus without opening his lips, or riſing from his ſeat, leaves the place of his retirement beyond Jordan, and takes a journey into Judea, where the Jews lately attempted to kill him. The reaſon was, his being preſent in perſon, and raiſing Lazarus to life again, before ſo many witneſſes, at Bethany, where he died, and was well known, would be the means of bringing the men of that and future ages to believe in his doctrine, which is ſo well fitted to prepare them for a reſurrection to life eternal, an admirable proof and emblem of which, he gave them in this great miracle. See Lardner's Vindication, p. 118.

Ver. 16. Then ſaid Thomas,—Let us alſo go] "When Jeſus had dedeclared his reſolution to go into Judea, Thomas, who is called Didymus, conceiving nothing but deſtruction from ſuch a journey, yet unwilling to forſake his bleſſed Maſter, ſaid, Let us alſo go, that we may die with him. For he knew the inveteracy and malice of his countrymen to be ſo great, that nothing ſeemed more certain to them than ſuch an event; and therefore he generouſly propoſed that they ſhould not forſake, but go, and lay down their lives with their beloved Maſter. Some have ſuppoſed that Lazarus is the antecedent to him in this paſſage; "Let us go, and die with Lazarus, our dear departed friend." And others, conſidering the great incredulity of Thomas, have ſuppoſed theſe not the words of faith and affection, but of uneaſineſs and deſpair, as if Jeſus was leading them on to deſtruction, and it was beſt to end ſo miſerable and perſecuted a life. The firſt appears to me the moſt rational and conſiſtent interpretation. Thomas is always diſtinguiſhed by the name of Didymus, that is, Twin, or Two-fold; to ſhew, ſay ſome, the twins ſtruggling in him, of faith and unbelief, of fleſh and ſpirit.

Ver. 17. He had lain in the grave four days] As a day or two at leaſt muſt have been ſpent in making preparations for the funeral, and as Lazarus, when Jeſus came, had been already buried four days, he could not well have been leſs than five days dead when our Lord arrived. An additional circumſtance to illuſtrate the miracle. See on ver. 5.

Ver. 18, 19. Now Bethany was nigh unto Jeruſalem] The Evangeliſt mentions the vicinity of Bethany to Jeruſalem, and ſpeaks of the company of friends that were with the two ſiſters, to ſhew that by the direction of Providence this great miracle had many witneſſes, ſome of whom were perſons of note, and inhabitants of Jeruſalem. See on ch. xii. 5. Our Saviour might have delayed his coming, amongſt other reaſons, in order to meet a greater number of perſons aſſembled to condole with the ſiſters; and as theſe gueſts had met for that purpoſe, it is evident they could not be any parties with Jeſus in raiſing Lazarus from the dead: for the very end of their coming ſhewed that they had no apprehenſion of his being recalled to life; and the place from whence they came makes it probable, that they were rather enemies than friends to Jeſus, and the ſequel of the narrative ſhews, that they were really ſo. The general time of mourning for deceaſed relations, both among Jews and Gentiles, was ſeven days: During theſe days of mourning, their friends and neighbours viſited them, to condole with and comfort them. Many therefore, in ſo populous a part of the country, muſt have been going to and coming from the ſiſters, while the days of their mourning for Lazarus laſted. The concourſe too would be the greater, as it was the time of the paſſover, and beſides a great multitude now attended Jeſus in his journey. See Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. Beza, and Calmet.

Ver. 20. Then Martha, as ſoon as ſhe heard] It ſeems the news of our Lord's coming, reached Bethany before him; for Martha having heard of it, went out to meet him, being of a more active diſpoſition, and a more ſanguine temper than her ſiſter, who continued in the houſe: being abſorbed in grief, and perhaps retired to an inner apartment, Mary was not ſo much in the way to be informed of the arrival of Jeſus, as her ſiſter was, who being buſied in the management of the family, muſt naturally have been the firſt perſon to hear the joyful news. Comp. Job ii. 8. Ezek. viii. 14. and Matth. xxvii. 61.

Ver. 21, 22. Then ſaid Martha unto Jeſus] Martha's intention no doubt was to welcome Jeſus; but being in an exceſs of grief, the firſt thing ſhe uttered was a complaint, that he had not come ſooner; imagining that he could not cure her brother while at a diſtance from him, ſhe thought, that, by delaying to come, he had neglected to ſave her brother's life: Lord, if thou hadſt been here, &c. Thus Martha, in one reſpect, betrayed a mean notion of our Lord's power; though in another, her faith aimed at ſomething very high; for ſhe immediately added, But I know, &c. ver. 22. inſinuating, that ſhe believed his prayer might yet reſtore her brother to life: However, as ſhe thought he could not of himſelf raiſe the dead, ſhe founded her hopes not on his own power, but on the power of God, to be exerted at his interceſſion. It ſeems ſhe had not heard of the reſurrection either of Jairus's daughter, or of the widow of Nain's ſon; or, if ſhe had heard of them, ſhe might think her brother's reſurrection more difficult than theirs, as he had been ſo long in a ſtate of death. See Doddridge and Lightfoot.

Ver. 23—26. Jeſus ſaith unto her, Thy brother ſhall riſe again] Our Lord's meaning was, that he ſhould be raiſed immediately, (ſee ver. 40.) according to her deſire; yet, as the thing was ſo great, and beyond even her own expectation, ſhe durſt not underſtand him in any ſenſe that favoured her wiſhes; (See ver. 24. and on Matth. xxviii. 17.) therefore, to cheriſh her weak faith, and as it were to raiſe her by gradual ſteps to the belief and acknowledgment of his ſovereign power, our Lord ſaid unto her, in the moſt emphatical words, I am the reſurrection and the life. "I am the author of the reſurrection, and of the life which followeth upon the reſurrection; therefore I am able to raiſe the dead at any time, and as well now as hereafter. He that believeth in me, as thy brother did, though he were dead, yet ſhall he live, provided I pleaſe to raiſe him; and whoſoever liveth and believeth in me, ſhall never die, if I am pleaſed to prevent him from dying." That this was Chriſt's meaning, is evident from what he added: Believeſt thou this? For as Martha had declared her firm expectation of her brother's reſurrection at the laſt day, ſhe actually declared her belief of the reſurrection of all good men to eternal life, and particularly of ſuch as believed in Jeſus; and therefore, had he been ſpeaking of their reſurrection, he needed not have aſked, if ſhe believed what he ſaid. Beſides, in Scripture, we find many general expreſſions of this kind, which muſt be limited by the ſubject to which they are applied. See ch. xiii. 36. It is true, this queſtion may be referred to the firſt ſentence, which our Lord ſpake, thus: "Believeſt thou that I am the reſurrection and the life?" For though Martha believed that there was to be a general reſurrection, ſhe might not know that Jeſus was to be the author of it. Yet even upon this ſuppoſition, his words muſt be underſtood as above, becauſe the only view with which he could on this occaſion declare that he was the reſurrection and the life, or require Martha to believe it, was to make her ſenſible that he could raiſe any dead perſon inſtantly, and prevent any living perſon he pleaſed from dying. See Macknight. There are others who give a more ſpiritual interpretation to this paſſage. The reader will find this ſubject enlarged upon in the ſermon on the Miracles before quoted, p. 500, &c. Dr. Doddridge paraphraſes the paſſage thus: "I am the reſurrection and the life; by me the general reſurrection ſhall be accompliſhed, and by me a moſt glorious and happy life ſhall be given to all my people, and be maintained even to eternal ages. He, therefore, that believes in me, though he were dead, yet ſhall he ere long live again, and his re-animated body ſhall be again united to that ſoul, which, in its ſeparate ſtate, continues its dependance on my power and faithfulneſs; and even at preſent I can looſe the bands of death; and though thy brother is now holden by it, I can recal him when I pleaſe to life. And every one that is now living, and believes in me, ſhall never die; death 27 She ſaith unto him, Yea, Lord, I believe that thou art the Chriſt the Son of God, which ſhould come into the world.

28 And when ſhe had ſo ſaid, ſhe went her way, and called Mary her ſiſter ſecretly, ſaying, The Maſter is come, and calleth for thee.

29 As ſoon as ſhe heard that, ſhe aroſe quickly, and came unto him.

30 Now Jeſus was not yet come into the town, but was in that place where Martha met him.

31 The Jews then which were with her in the houſe, and comforted her, when they ſaw Mary that ſhe roſe up haſtily, and went out, followed her, ſaying, She goeth unto the grave, to weep there.

32 Then when Mary was come where Jeſus was, and ſaw him, ſhe fell down at his feet, ſaying unto him, Lord, if thou hadſt been here, my brother had not died.

33 When Jeſus therefore ſaw her weeping, and the Jews alſo weeping which came with her, he groaned in the Spirit, and was troubled, 34 And ſaid, Where have ye laid him? They ſay unto him, Lord, come, and ſee.

35 Jeſus wept.

36 Then ſaid the Jews, Behold how he loved him!

37 And ſome of them ſaid, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have cauſed that even this man ſhould not have died?

38 Jeſus therefore again groaning in himſelf, cometh to the grave, (It was a cave, and a ſtone lay upon it.)

Ver. 27. Matth. xvi. 16. Ch. iv. 42. vi. 69.—V. 33. Gr. he troubled himſelf.—V. 35. Luke xix. 41.—V. 37. Ch. ix. 6.

ſhall be ſo diſarmed and transformed, that it ſhall hardly deſerve the name; the better part of the believer being immediately conveyed to immortal life and glory, and the body only keeping a while in the duſt, till I come to awaken it to everlaſting vigour and joy." See ch. v. 24. viii. 51. 2 Tim. i. 10. Heb. ii. 14. xii. 22, 23. Epheſ. ii. 6. and Vitringa's Obſerv. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 7.

Ver. 27. I believe that thou art the Chriſt] By replying that ſhe believed him to be the promiſed and expected Meſſiah, Martha inſinuated, that ſhe confided implicitly in every thing he ſaid; and that there was no inſtance of power whatſoever which he was pleaſed to claim, that exceeded her belief. She began, it ſeems, to entertain ſome confuſed expectations of her brother's immediate reſurrection: afterwards, when ſhe conſidered the greatneſs of the thing more deliberately, many doubts aroſe; ver. 39. At preſent, however, having ſome hope, ſhe did not invite Jeſus to go home with her; but leaving him in the place where ſhe had met him, ſhe ran, and called her ſiſter to come out, as it appears from the latter part of ver. 28. he had ordered her; for he deſigned that Mary and her companions ſhould likewiſe have the honour and pleaſure of being preſent at this ſtupendous miracle.

Ver. 29—31. As ſoon as ſhe heard that] Mary no ſooner heard the joyful news of the arrival of Jeſus, than ſhe roſe, and went to him, without ſpeaking a word to the company of friends, who, becauſe ſhe was of a ſofter diſpoſition, paid eſpecial attention to her grief; for they remained with her in the houſe after Martha was gone out, and when ſhe went out, they followed her, fearing that ſhe was going to the grave, to indulge her melancholy there: Nay, they even wept with her, when they ſaw her weep, as ſhe ſpake to Jeſus, ver. 33. It was very cuſtomary with the ancients to retire to the ſepulchres of their deceaſed friends, and weep there; and as thoſe ſepulchres were out of the town, and frequently near the road, it is probable that the place where Jeſus ſtayed was near the ſepulchre of Lazarus. The preſent circumſtance tended alſo to the illuſtration of this miracle; for by means hereof, the Jews who were come from Jeruſalem were brought out to the grave, aud made witneſſes of the reſurrection of Lazarus, who, probably, had they known that Mary was only gone out to meet Jeſus, would not have accompanied her, through the hatred which they commonly bore to him. See Eraſmus, and Elſner's Obſervat. vol. i. p. 330.

Ver. 32. She fell down at his feet] When Mary came to Jeſus, ſhe fell down at his feet, and expreſſed herſelf juſt as Martha had done, only ſhe wept as ſhe ſpake. Her affliction is deſcribed, though in few words, yet in thoſe the moſt natural and pathetic; and her proſtration performed without reſerve before the Jews, is a remarkable inſtance of the veneration ſhe had for Chriſt.

Ver. 33. When Jeſus therefore ſaw her weeping, &c.] There never was a more ſtriking picture of diſtreſs than that before us. The two affectionate ſiſters abſorbed in grief, the numerous ſympathetic crowd bathed in tears, and the Son of God himſelf ſo affected, that he re-echoed their groans, and voluntarily afflicted himſelf with their diſtreſs. His compaſſionate heart could not contemplate the affliction of the two ſiſters and their friends, without having a deep ſhare in it: He groaned deeply, (ſee Luke x. 21.) being grieved to find that his friends entertained a ſuſpicion of his loving them leſs than their great love to him might claim, and was troubled. In the Greek it is, He troubled himſelf, ἐτάραξεν ἑαυτὸν, opening his mind to a ſet of melting and painful ideas. His affections were wholly in his own power; he voluntarily ſuſtained ſorrow now, as he voluntarily embraced death afterwards.

Ver. 34. Where have ye laid him?] Our Lord propoſed this queſtion, in order to deliver the minds of Martha and her ſiſter from the ſuſpence with which they were now tortured; and he propoſed it before the multitude, to convince that there was no fraud in the intended miracle. We cannot ſuppoſe that our Lord, who knew without any information that Lazarus was dead, was ignorant of the place of his ſepulchre: But when we admit the two reaſons offered above, we muſt own that the queſtion was both kind and wiſe. See Lardner, and Smallbrooke on the Miracles.

Ver. 35. Jeſus wept] It appeared on this occaſion that our bleſſed Lord was poſſeſſed of the moſt delicate ſenſibility of human paſſions; for when he beheld Martha and Mary and their friends around him all in tears, the tender feelings of love, of pity, and of friendſhip ſo moved him, that he mingled his ſympathetic tears with theirs: Jeſus wept. In this grief of the Son of God there was a greatneſs and generoſity, not to ſay an amiableneſs of diſpoſition, infinitely nobler than that which the Stoic philoſophers aimed at in their ſo much boaſted apathy. It would be eaſy to deſcant on this ſtriking inſtance of our Lord's philanthropy; but this is not the place for ſuch diſcuſſions: And indeed what Chriſtian heart can be inſenſible to the force of this ſtriking example? We obſerve only, that the power which Jeſus exerted on this memorable occaſion did not more ſtrongly evince him to be the Son of God, than the tears which he ſhed conduced to demonſtrate that he was the Son of man; a moſt merciful and compaſſionate man, touched with the feeling of our infirmities.

Ver. 36—38. Then ſaid the Jews, Behold, &c.] Our Lord's tears had alſo another uſe; they cauſed thoſe who ſaw them, to wonder the more at the death of Lazarus, and conſequently to doubt of his divine power, who prevented it not; whence the ſubſequent miracle, as leſs expected by them, became the more wonderful. Then ſaid the Jews, Behold how he loved him! They perceived, that his was no affected grief, but the real teſtimony of a ſincere regard; and they could not but conclude that this regard for Lazarus was great indeed, when no ties of blood, relationſhip, or neceſſity, but undiſſembled friendſhip only cauſed the generous woe; others, however, of a more malevolent, and envious turn of mind, interpreted this circumſtance to our Lord's diſadvantage. For, according to their mean way of judging, they fancied that he had ſuffered Lazarus to fall under the ſtroke of death, for no other reaſon but want of power to reſcue him; and thinking the miracle, ſaid to have been wrought on the blind man at the feaſt of tabernacles, at leaſt as difficult as the curing of an acute diſtemper, they called the former in queſtion, becauſe the latter had been neglected; "If, ſay they, he has really opened the eyes of the blind, might he not have preſerved this man from death?" Theſe perverſe and obſtinate people were not perſuaded by all the wonderful works which Jeſus had done, neither would they be convinced by the great miracle he was about to perform. They were to ſee him raiſe one to life and health again, who had been four days in the grave; yet ſo hard were their hearts, that many of them would perſiſt in their infidelity ſtill. Jeſus, who knew the diſcourſes which they now held among themſelves in private concerning him, was likewiſe fully acquainted with the hardneſs of their hearts, and, at the ſame time, foreſaw the miſeries in which their unbelief would involve them; that unbelief, which yields not to his power, ſo ſoon as death itſelf. The thought of all theſe things afflicted him, and made him groan deeply within himſelf as he went to the ſepulchre; which, according to the uſual manner of burying with the Jews, was hewn out in a cave, and a ſtone was placed at it; i. e. at the door of the cave, as was the caſe in our Lord's ſepulchre. See on Luke xxiv. 4. Bengelius, Maundrell's Travels, p. 79. and Sandy's Travels, p. 196.

39 Jeſus ſaid, Take ye away the ſtone. Martha, the ſiſter of him that was dead, ſaith unto him, Lord, by this time he ſtinketh: for he hath been dead four days.

40 Jeſus ſaith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldeſt believe, thou ſhouldeſt ſee the glory of God?

41 Then they took away the ſtone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jeſus lifted up his eyes, and ſaid, Father, I thank thee that thou haſt heard me.

42 And I knew that thou heareſt me always: but becauſe of the people which ſtand by, I ſaid it, that they may believe that thou haſt ſent me.

43 And when he had thus ſpoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth.

44 And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jeſus ſaith unto them, Looſe them, and let him go.

45 Then many of the Jews which came to Mary, and had ſeen the things which Jeſus did, believed on him.

46 But ſome of them went their ways to Ver. 40. Ver. 4.—V. 42. Ch. xii. 30.—V. 44. Ch. xx. 7.—V. 45. Ch. ii. 23.

Ver. 39. Jeſus ſaid, Take ye away the ſtone] Our Lord, as Bp. Hall obſerves, could with infinite eaſe have commanded the ſtone to roll away of itſelf, without employing any to remove it. But he judiciouſly avoided all unneceſſary pomp and parade, and mingled all the majeſty of this aſtoniſhing miracle with the moſt amiable modeſty and ſimplicity. Beſides, he thus removed every the minuteſt ſuſpicion of fraud, for they who removed the ſtone would have, from the putrefied ſtate of the body, ſufficient evidence that it was there; while all who were preſent might, and no doubt did, ſee it lying in the ſepulchre, when the ſtone was removed, before Jeſus gave the commanding word, Come forth. Martha, yet weak in faith, yet ſtruggling with doubt, in a painful agitation, with a variety of paſſions, ſays to Jeſus, "Lord, it will be offenſive to thee, the putrefied body of my dear dead brother cannot be fit for thee to approach; by this time he certainly ſmelleth,—ὄζει,—for he hath been four days in the grave;" not four days dead only, as we render it; for the word dead is not in the original, being improperly ſupplied by the tranſlators τεταρταῖος, quatriduanus, one who has continued in any ſtate or place four days. Martha's meaning therefore was, that her brother had been in the grave four days, as is plain likewiſe from ver. 17. Providence directed Martha to mention this circumſtance before Lazarus was raiſed, that the greatneſs of the miracle might be manifeſt to all who were preſent: for if her brother had been buried four days, he muſt have been dead, as we before obſerved, at leaſt five; for we are to remember that in theſe hot countries, the dead ſooner grow offenſive, and cannot be kept ſo long unburied as with us. Dead bodies, ſays Dr. Hammond, after a revolution of the humours, which is compleated in ſeventy-two hours, naturally tend to putrefaction, and the Jews ſay that by the fourth day after death, the body is ſo altered, that one cannot be ſure it is ſuch a perſon. This, therefore, has been aſſigned as one reaſon why Chriſt ſhould riſe the third day, becauſe he was not to ſee corruption. See Maimonides, Lightfoot, and Henry.

Ver. 40. Said I not unto thee, &c.?] Either Jeſus had ſaid more to Martha than is recorded, or poſſibly theſe words may be collected from the meſſage which Jeſus ſent, ver. 4. and from what he ſaid, ver. 25, 26. but we are not to ſuppoſe that in theſe hiſtories we have an account of every word that was ſpoken. See ch. xxi. 25.

Ver. 41, 42. And Jeſus lifted up his eyes, and ſaid] On many occaſions Jeſus had publickly appealed to his own miracles, as the proofs of his miſſion; but he did not ordinarily make a formal addreſs to his Father before he worked them; though to have done ſo would have ſhewn from whence he derived his authority. Nevertheleſs, being about to raiſe Lazarus from the dead, he prayed for his reſurrection, to make the perſons preſent ſenſible, that in working his miracles, he acted by the aſſiſtance not of devils, as his enemies maliciouſly affirmed, but of God; and that this miracle in particular could not be effected without an immediate interpoſition of the divine power. The Evangeliſt, it is true, does not ſay directly, either that Jeſus prayed, or that he prayed for this end; but the thankſgiving which he tells us he offered up implies both. "Father, I thank thee, that thou haſt heard me, and I knew that thou heareſt me always: I did not pray for mine own ſake, as if I had entertained any doubt of thine empowering me to do this miracle, but I prayed for the people's ſake; to make them ſenſible that thou loveſt me, and haſt ſent me, and art continually with me." By this prayer and thankſgiving, therefore, Jeſus has indirectly taught us, that his own reſurrection from the dead is an infallible proof of his divine miſſion. No power inferior to that of God's being able to accompliſh a work of this kind. See Macknight, and the Reflections.

Ver. 43. And when he had thus ſpoken, he cried, &c.] The dead man heard the voice of the Son of God, and came forth immediately; for he did not revive ſlowly and by degrees, as the dead child did, which was raiſed by the prophet Elijah. But the effect thus inſtantly following the command, plainly ſhewed, whoſe the power was that revived the breathleſs clay. If our Lord had not intended this, inſtead of ſpeaking, he might have raiſed Lazarus by a ſecret inward volition. As the people preſent were not ſo much as dreaming of a reſurrection, they muſt have been greatly ſurpriſed when they heard our Lord pray for it. The cry, Lazarus, come forth, muſt have aſtoniſhed them ſtill more, and raiſed their curioſity to a prodigious pitch. But when they ſaw him, who had been putrefying in the grave four days, come forth alive and in perfect health, they could not but be agitated with many different paſſions, and overwhelmed with inexpreſſible amazement.

Ver. 44. And he that was dead came forth] It would have been the leaſt part of the miracle, had Jeſus made the rollers, with which Lazarus was bound, to unlooſe themſelves from around his body, before he came forth: But he brought him out juſt as he was lying, and ordered the ſpectators to looſe him, that they might be the better convinced of the miracle. Accordingly, in taking off the grave clothes, they had the fulleſt evidence, both of his death and reſurrection; for on the one hand the manner in which it is ſuppoſed he was ſwathed, (ſee on ch. xix. 40.) muſt of itſelf have killed him in a little time, had he been alive when buried, and conſequently have demonſtrated beyond all exception, that Lazarus was ſeveral days dead, before Jeſus called him forth. Some, however, ſuppoſe, that the body was not bound over with bandages, but only wrapped up in a large linen cloth, tied at the hands and feet, [Κειρίαις, a word which Phavorinus explains by ἐπιτάφιοι δεσμοὶ, ſepulchral bands,] not altogether, perhaps, unlike what is cuſtomary with us; and this is the more probable, as we may reaſonably conclude, both from the words of Martha, ver. 39. and from this verſe, that Lazarus was not embalmed, when it was uſual to make uſe of ſuch bandages. However, be this as it may, in taking off the grave clothes, the linen might offer both to their eyes and ſmell abundant proofs of his putrefaction, and by that means convince them, that he had not been in a deliquium, or ſwoon, but was really departed. On the other hand, by his lively countenance appearing when the napkin was removed, his freſh colour, his active vigour, and his briſk walking, they who came near him and handled him were made ſenſible that he was in perfect health, and had an opportunity to try the truth of the miracle by the cloſeſt examination. It may be proper juſt to reply here, to a difficulty ſuggeſted upon this hiſtory of Lazarus's reſurrection. It is ſaid that when Jeſus called upon Lazarus to come forth, he came out bound hand and foot; but deiſts talking of this miracle, commonly aſk with a ſneer, how could he come out of a grave, who was bound in that manner? The anſwer, however, is obvious. The reader is firſt deſired to conſider the form of the Jewiſh ſepulchres, as deſcribed in the note on Luke xxiv. 4. and then to reflect that the Evangeliſt means not that Lazarus walked out of the ſepulchre; but that lying on his back, he raiſed himſelf into a ſitting poſture, then putting his legs out of his niche or cell, ſlid down and ſtood upright on the floor; all which he might eaſily do, notwithſtanding his arms were bound cloſe to his body, and his legs were tied ſtrait together by means of the ſhroud and rollers, or bandages, or whatever they were with which he was confined. Accordingly, when he was come forth, it is ſaid that Jeſus ordered them to looſe him, and let him go; a circumſtance plainly importing, that the hiſtorian knew that Lazarus could not walk till he was unbound. If the Jews buried as the Egyptians did, the napkin did not cover the face of Lazarus, but only went round his forehead, and under his chin; ſo that he could eaſily ſee; but even on ſuppoſition that it was wound about his face, he could eaſily have raiſed himſelf out of his niche without ſeeing, in the manner above deſcribed. See Macknight, Doddridge, Phavorinus, and Ward's Diſſert. p. 150.

Ver. 45, 46. Then many of the Jews—believed] Conſidering the nature and circumſtances of this great miracle, it ought to have ſilenced the peeviſhneſs of cavilling, might have overcome the obſtinacy of prejudice, and ſhould have put to ſhame the impudence of malice; for the deliberate and purpoſed delay of Chriſt, his declaration of Lazarus's death, and prediction of his reſurrection, the variety and multitude of the perſons who were witneſſes, the accidental circumſtances which led them to be preſent, the conſequent faith of many Jews who were there, (by no means prejudiced in favour of Jeſus, or diſpoſed to believe in him) as well as the acknowledgement made of the reality of this miracle to the Jewiſh ſanhedrim, are ſuch teſtimonies, as muſt place this wonderful event be-the Phariſees, and told them what things Jeſus had done.

47 Then gathered the chief prieſts and the Phariſees a council, and ſaid, What do we? for this man doeth many miracles.

48 If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him: and the Romans ſhall come and take away both our place and nation.

49 And one of them, named Caiaphas, being the high prieſt that ſame year, ſaid unto them, Ye know nothing at all,

50 Nor conſider that it is expedient for us, that one man ſhould die for the people, and that the whole nation periſh not.

51 And this ſpake he not of himſelf: but being high-prieſt that year, he propheſied that Jeſus ſhould die for that nation;

52 And not for that nation only, but that alſo he ſhould gather together in one the children of God that were ſcattered abroad.

53 Then from that day forth they took counſel together for to put him to death.

54 Jeſus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews; but went thence unto a country near to the wilderneſs, into a city called Ephraim, and there continued with his diſciples.

55 And the Jews paſſover was nigh at hand: and many went out of the country up to Jeruſalem before the paſſover, to purify themſelves.

yond the power of cavil or contradiction: Wherefore, we cannot help being ſurpriſed to find that the cry, Lazarus, come forth, did not produce on all who were preſent, an effect ſome way ſimilar to that which it had on Lazarus: It raiſed him from the natural death, and might have raiſed the moſt ſtupid of the ſpectators from the ſpiritual, by working in them the living principle of faith. It afforded, however, a dreadful confirmation of that weighty truth, If they hear not Moſes and the prophets, neither will they be perſuaded, though one roſe from the dead. Every reader muſt be ſenſible that there is ſomething incomparably beautiful in the whole of our Lord's behaviour on this occaſion; after having given ſuch an aſtoniſhing inſtance of his power, he did not ſpeak one word in his own praiſe, either directly or indirectly. He did not rebuke the Jews for having in former inſtances maliciouſly detracted from the luſtre of his miracles, every one of which derived additional credit from this inconteſtable wonder. He did not ſay how much they were to blame for perſiſting in their incredulity, though he well knew what they would do; he did not inſinuate, even in the moſt diſtant manner, the obligations which Lazarus and his ſiſters were laid under by this ſignal favour: He did not upbraid Martha and Mary with the diſcontent they had expreſſed, at his having delayed to come to the relief of their brother. Nay, he did not ſo much as put them in mind of the mean notion they had entertained of his power; but, always conſiſtent with himſelf, he was on this, as on every other occaſion, a pattern of perfect humility and abſolute ſelf-denial. It is beautiful to obſerve the gradation, in the reſurrections of the dead performed by our Lord: The firſt perſon he raiſed, Jairus's daughter, had been in the ſtate of death only a few hours; the ſecond, the widow of Nain's ſon, was raiſed as his friends were carrying him out to burial; but when Jeſus recalled Lazarus to life, he had been in the grave no leſs than four days; and therefore, according to our apprehenſions, his reſurrection was the greateſt of the three: The whole power of death was accompliſhed upon him, and "the whole power of the reſurrection ſhewed forth in him," as Peter Chryſologus remarks. See his Sermons, Smallbrooke's Vindication, vol. ii. p. 394. Lardner, p. 79. and Theophylact.

Ver. 47, 48. Then gathered the chief prieſts and Phariſees a council] The account which was given of Lazarus's reſurrection raiſed the indignation of the rulers to the higheſt pitch. They aſſembled the ſanhedrim, or great council of the nation forthwith, and, after conſultation, blamed one another for having ſuffered Jeſus to go ſo long unpuniſhed; but this miracle being too evident to be denied, as indeed all his miracles were, they did not, even in their moſt private conferences, ſay or inſinuate to one another, that their diſpleaſure and oppoſition proceeded from his paſſing falſe miracles upon the ignorant vulgar; they rather condemned him upon the truth and notoriety of his miracles, pretending that they were deſigned to eſtabliſh a new ſect in religion, which might endanger not their church only, but their ſtate; our place, τον τοπον, our temple, (ſee Acts vi. 14. xxi. 28.) and nation. Thus, though the Phariſees were his ſworn enemies, they could not help giving him an ample teſtimony, even in full court. If we let him thus alone, ſay they, all men will believe on him, &c. "If we do not beſtir ourſelves to prevent it, the common people, aſtoniſhed at his miracles, will certainly ſet him up for Meſſiah; and the Romans, on pretence of their riſing in rebellion, will take away both our liberty and religion." They entered therefore into a reſolution of putting Jeſus to death at all hazards. But thoſe politicians were taken in their own craftineſs; for while they propoſed, by killing Jeſus, to avoid the deſtruction of their temple and city, the ſin which they committed in killing the Prince of Life was ſo great, that God, in his juſt indignation, made the very people, whoſe reſentment they propoſed to avoid by this wicked meaſure, the inſtruments of his vengeance. He brought the Roman armies againſt them, who deſtroyed thoſe murderers, and burnt up their city; leaving, in that dreadful cataſtrophe, an aweful warning to all ſtateſmen to beware of proſecuting unjuſt meaſures, on pretence of conſulting the good of the nation whoſe affairs they direct. Again, the members of the Jewiſh council were not all unanimous in their reſolution of putting Jeſus to death. Some of them, who were his diſciples, (ſee ch. xii. 42.) particularly Nicodemus, and Joſeph of Arimathea, urged the unlawfulneſs of what they purpoſed to do, from the conſideration of his miracles and his innocence; but the high-prieſt Caiaphas treated Chriſt's friends in the council with contempt, as a parcel of weak ignorant people, who were unacquainted with the nature of government, "which, ſaid he, requires that certain acts of injuſtice ſhould not be ſcrupled at, when they are expedient for the ſafety of the ſtate." See Macknight.

Ver. 49—52. And—Caiaphas, being the high-prieſt that ſame year, ſaid, &c.] It is well known that the high-prieſthood among the Jews was not annual; but the many revolutions about this period might juſtify the preſent manner of ſpeaking, which ſignifies no more, as ſome think, than in thoſe days, or at that time. See Luke iii. 2. Others, however, imagine, that the expreſſion is emphatical; that year, that memorable year, in which Chriſt was to die; it was the laſt and chief of Daniel's ſeventy weeks, the fortieth year before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and was celebrated for various cauſes in the Jewiſh hiſtory. As God was wont anciently to communicate his oracles to the high-prieſt cloathed with the pontifical garments, ſo he inſpired the words, ver. 50. into Caiaphas, who now bare that office, though he was not ſenſible himſelf of the inſpiration, and meant what he ſaid in a different ſenſe from what God intended ſhould be ſignified by it; and thus he gave unawares as clear a teſtimony to the prieſtly, as Pilate did to the kingly office of Chriſt. By the children of God, ver. 52. are meant his true worſhippers, not only amongſt the Jews, but likewiſe amongſt all nations in the world, who were to be gathered, through Chriſt, into one flock, one glorious and happy ſociety. See ch. x. 16. Lightfoot, and Lardner's Credibil. vol. ii. part 1.

Ver. 53. Then from that day forth they took counſel] The Evangeliſt does not tell us what the meaſure was which they pitched upon for this purpoſe; only from the laſt verſe of the chapter, it ſeems probable, that they agreed to iſſue out a proclamation againſt Jeſus, promiſing a reward to any who would ſhew where he was, that they might take him. Macknight.

Ver. 54. Into a city called Ephraim] The ſituation of Ephraim has not yet been determined; all that John ſays of it is, that it ſtood in a country near the wilderneſs; perhaps he meant the wilderneſs which is ſaid to have gone up from Jericho to Beth-el, Joſh. xvi. 1. For Joſephus mentions Ephraim as not far from Beth-el. Euſebius, in his Onomaſticon, upon the word Αγγαι, the ancient Ai, tells us, that Beth-el lay in the road from Jeruſalem to Sichem in Samaria, at the diſtance of twelves miles from Jeruſalem. The ſame author ſays, that Ephraim was a larger city, eight miles from Jeruſalem towards the north. See Reland's Palæſt. Illuſtr. and Joſephus's war. b. v. ch. 8.

Ver. 55. To purify themſelves] As a variety of circumſtances might happen to multitudes, which would require purification, ſo ſome ſort of cleanſing required no leſs than ſeven days; and the vows of the Nazarites likewiſe required ſome time. Compare 2 Chron. xxx. 17. Some would render the laſt clauſe of the 56th verſe, What think ye? Will he not come to the feaſt?

56 Then ſought they for Jeſus, and ſpake among themſelves, as they ſtood in the temple, What think ye, that he will not come to the feaſt?

57 Now both the chief prieſts and the Phariſees had given a commandment that, if any man knew where he was, he ſhould ſhew it, that they might take him.

CHAP. XII.

Jeſus excuſeth Mary, anointing his feet. The people flock to ſee Lazarus: The chief prieſts conſult to kill him. Chriſt rideth into Jeruſalem. Certain Greeks deſire to ſee Jeſus: he foretelleth his death. The Jews are generally blinded: yet many chief rulers believe, but do not confeſs him: therefore Jeſus calleth earneſtly for confeſſion of faith.

Ver. 56. Ch. vii. 11.

REFLECTIONS ON THE RAISING OF LAZARUS,

Ver. 15—46.

There is a time when we muſt preach Chriſt on the houſe-top, as well as a time when we muſt ſpeak him as it were in the ear, and with the lips ſhut. Doubtleſs Martha was greatly overjoyed at the preſence of Chriſt, and though ſhe knew how equally welcome it would be to her ſiſter, yet ſhe doth not proclaim it aloud in the open hall, but ſecretly whiſpers the pleaſing tidings in her ſiſter's ear. The Maſter is come, and calleth for thee. What an happy word, what an high and honourable favour was this! that the Lord of life, that the divine Ambaſſador ſhould perſonally come, and call for Mary; yet are they ſuch, as may not be appropriated to her alone. Thou comeſt ſtill to us, O Saviour, if not in thy bodily preſence, yet in thy ſpiritual. Thou calleſt us ſtill, if not in thy perſonal voice, yet in thine ordinances; and it is our fault if we do not, as this good woman did, ariſe quickly, and come to thee. Her friends were there about her, who came purpoſely to condole with her; her heart was full of heavineſs; her hopes were now, alas! all at a low ebb; and yet, ſoon as ever ſhe hears the mention of Chriſt coming, of Chriſt calling her, ſhe forgets friends, brother, grief, cares, and haſtens to his preſence.

Such good women were well worthy of kind friends: Theſe, knowing the value, and hearing of the death of Lazarus, came over to comfort the ſad pair. Charity, together with the common practice of their nation, calls them to this amiable duty. How grievous was that complaint,—I looked for ſome to comfort me, but there was none! It is ſome kind of eaſe in ſorrow to have partners; as a burden is lightened by many ſhoulders, or as clouds ſcattered into many drops eaſily vent their moiſture in the air; even the very preſence of friends is a ſweet abatement of grief.

Theſe friendly neighbours, ſeeing Mary haſten forth, make haſte to follow her: It was but a loving ſuſpicion, ver. 31. ſhe is gone to the grave to weep. They well knew how apt ſenſible minds are to take all occaſions to renew their ſorrows; every object around affects them. When ſhe ſaw but the chamber of her dead brother, ſtrait ſhe muſt think that there her Lazarus was wont to lay, and then ſhe wept afreſh; when the table was ſpread, "there Lazarus was wont to ſit," and then new tears ariſe; when the garden appeared, "there Lazarus had wont to walk," and then again ſhe weeps. How much more do theſe ſympathetic friends ſuppoſe the paſſions would be ſtirred with the ſight of the grave, when ſhe muſt needs think, "there is Lazarus, an inanimate, diſſolving lump of clay!" Their indulgent love, however, miſtook Mary's errand: Kind as they were, their thoughts were much too low: While they ſuppoſe her going to a dead brother, ſhe is haſtening on the wings of affection to a living Saviour, the Lord of life.

Both the ſiſter's met Chriſt; not both in one poſture. Mary is ſtill noted, as for more paſſion, ſo for more ardent devotion: She that before ſat at the feet of Jeſus, now falls proſtrate at thoſe feet. Where the heart is affected with an aweful acknowledgement of majeſty, the body cannot but bow.

Even before all her neighbours of Jeruſalem, doth Mary thus ſink down in humility before her Saviour. It was no leſs than excommunication for any one to confeſs him; (ch. ix. 22. xii. 42.) yet good Mary, fearleſs of the informations that might be given by theſe Jewiſh obſervers, adores him, and in her ſilent geſture ſays as much as her ſiſter had ſpoken before, Thou art the Chriſt, the Son of God. Thoſe who would give Chriſt his right, muſt not ſtand upon ſcrupulous fears. Are we naturally timorous?—Who do we not fear the denial, the excluſion of the Almighty? O let us remember, Without are the fearful! Rev. xxi. 8.

Her humble proſtration is ſeconded by a remarkable complaint; Lord, if thou hadſt been here, my brother had not died! Both ſhe and her ſiſter, as with one voice, betray both ſtrength and infirmity of faith; ſtrength, in aſcribing ſo much power to Chriſt, that his preſence could preſerve from death; infirmity, in ſuppoſing the neceſſity of a preſence for this purpoſe. It is a weakneſs of faith to meaſure ſucceſs by means, and means by preſence, and to tie effects to the concurrence of both, when we deal with an Almighty Agent. O Saviour, while thou now ſitteſt glorioufly in heaven, thou doſt no leſs impart thyſelf to our ſouls, than if thou ſtoodſt viſibly by us, than if we ſtood locally by thee. No place can make a difference of thy virtue and thy aid.

This was Mary's moan: Her ſilent, yet not unſeen ſuit, is returned with a ſilent anſwer. No notice is taken of the error in her expreſſion; all the reply we hear from the bleſſed Redeemer, is a compaſſionate groan within himſelf, and an inquiry, Where have ye laid him? He who knew, in abſence, that Lazarus was dead, now aſks where he is buried: Not out of need, but of will; that as in his ſorrow, ſo in his inquiry he might depreſs himſelf in the opinion of the ſtanders by; unwilling to fix their minds upon the expectation of ſome marvellous thing, till the grand fiat ſhould announce it, and raiſe the ſleeping Lazarus from his tomb.

They were not more glad of the queſtion, than ready for the anſwer,—Come and ſee. It was their manner to lay up the dead bodies of their friends, like the Egyptians, with great reſpect: More coſt was wont to be beſtowed on ſome of their graves, than on their houſes. Here, as neither aſhamed nor unwilling to ſhew the decency of their ſepulchre, they ſay, Come and ſee.

Never was our Saviour more ſubmiſſively dejected than now, immediately before he would approve and exalt the Majeſty of his Godhead. To his groans, and inward grief, he adds his tears; JESUS wept! Well indeed might the Jews conſtrue them up to their true ſource, and cry, See how he loved him! And well had it been, could they have reſted there, without ſo unworthily miſconſtruing as they did his motives, ver. 37. Could not he that opened the eyes of the blind, &c?

It is not improbable that Jeſus, who before groaned in himſelf for compaſſion of their tears, now groaned for their incredulity. Nothing could ſo much afflict the Saviour of men, as the ſins of men; no injury goes ſo deep as our ſpiritual provocations of God. Wretched men, why ſhould we grieve the good Spirit of God in us? Why ſhould we make Him groan for us, who died to redeem us?

With theſe groans, O Saviour, thou comeſt to the grave of Lazarus; the door of that houſe of death was ſtrong and impenetrable: Thy firſt word was, Take away the ſtone. O weak beginning of a mighty miracle! If thou meanteſt to raiſe the dead, how much eaſier had it been for thee to remove the grave ſtone? One grain of faith, even in thy diſciples, were enough to remove mountains; and doſt thou ſay, Take away the ſtone?—But, it was ever thy juſt will that we ſhould do what we may. To remove the ſtone, or to untie the napkin, was in their power; this therefore they muſt do: To raiſe the dead was out of their power; this therefore thou wilt do alone: Our hands muſt do their utmoſt, ere thou wilt put to thine.

In ſpight of all the unjuſt diſcouragements of nature, Chriſt's command muſt be obeyed; Martha may doubt, but Chriſt hath ſpoken, and ſhall he not make it good? Whatever the good woman's ſtaggering faith may ſuggeſt, the glory of God is concerned, and it muſt now be diſplayed: The ſtone is removed; all impediments give way; all hearts are ready for the reſult: The Saviour addreſſes himſelf to the miracle.

His eyes begin, they are lift up to heaven: His tongue ſeconds his eye; yet we hear of no prayer, but of thanks for hearing; Father, I thank thee, &c. Thy will, O Saviour, was thy prayer. Words expreſs our hearts to men, thoughts to God: Well didſt thou know, out of thy ſelf-ſameneſs with the Father, that the grant muſt keep pace with the idea of thine intention. I knew that thou heareſt me always, but this I ſaid for their ſakes, that they might believe.

But hark! the word is paſt, Lazarus come forth! Why did the Saviour thus loudly lift up his voice?—Was it that the ſtrength of the call might anſwer to the meaſure of the affection; ſince we faintly require what we care not to obtain, and vehemently utter what we earneſtly deſire?—Or was it to ſignify that Lazarus's ſoul was called from far;—ſince the ſpeech muſt be loud, that ſhall be heard in the other world? Or was it in relation to the ſleeping ſtate of his body; ſince thoſe who are in the deadneſs of deep ſleep, cannot be awakened without a loud call?—Or was it in repreſentation of that laſt loud trumpet's ſummons, which ſhall ſound into all graves, and raiſe all fleſh from their duſt for ever?—Even ſo ſtill, Lord, when thou wouldeſt raiſe a ſoul from the death of ſin, and grave of corruption, no ſtill, ſmall voice will ſerve. Thy ſtrongeſt commands, thy loudeſt denunciations of judgement, the ſhrilleſt and ſweeteſt promulgations of thy mercies, are but enough to arouſe the ſlumbering faculties.

Here was no ſuit to the Father, no adjuration to the deceaſed, but a flat, an abſolute injunction, Come forth! O Saviour, that is the voice which I ſhall once hear ſounding into the bottom of my grave, and raiſing me from my duſt. That is the voice which ſhall pierce the rocks, and divide the mountains, and fetch up the dead from the loweſt caverns of the deep. Thy word made all; thy word ſhall repair all. Hence, far hence, all ye diffident fears!—He whom I truſt is Omnipotent.—Behold, he that was dead came forth!

Thou didſt not only, O Saviour, raiſe the body of Lazarus, but the faith of the by-ſtanders. O clear emblem, irrefragable argument of our reſurrection alſo! If Lazarus did thus ſtart up from death, at the bleating of this Lamb of God, that was now daily preparing for THEN Jeſus, ſix days before the paſſover, came to Bethany, where Lazarus was, which had been dead, whom he raiſed from the dead.

2 There they made him a ſupper; and Martha ſerved: but Lazarus was one of them that ſat at the table with him.

3 Then took Mary a pound of ointment of ſpikenard, very coſtly, and anointed the feet of Jeſus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the houſe was filled with the odour of the ointment.

4 Then ſaith one of his diſciples, Judas Iſcariot, Simon's ſon, which ſhould betray him,

5 Why was not this ointment ſold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?

6 This he ſaid, not that he cared for the poor; but becauſe he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein.

7 Then ſaid Jeſus, Let her alone: againſt the day of my burying hath ſhe kept this.

8 For the poor always ye have with you; but me ye have not always.

9 Much people of the Jews therefore knew that he was there: and they came, not for Jeſus' ſake only, but that they might ſee Lazarus alſo, whom he had raiſed from the dead.

10 But the chief prieſts conſulted, that they might put Lazarus alſo to death;

11 Becauſe that by reaſon of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jeſus.

Ver. 2. Matth. xxvi. 6. Mark xiv. 3.—V. 3. Luke x. 38, 39. Ch. xi. 2.—V. 6. Ch. xiii. 29.—V. 8. Matth. xxvi. 11.—V. 9. Ch. xi. 44.

the ſlaughter, how ſhall the dead be rouſed hereafter in myriads from their graves, at the roaring of that glorious and immortal Lion, whoſe voice ſhall ſhake the powers of heaven, and move in trembling horror the very foundations of the earth?

Chap. XII. Ver. 1. Then Jeſus came to Bethany, &c.] This was in his way to Jeruſalem; and he might chooſe to ſtop here, in order to renew the idea of the reſurrection upon the minds of his diſciples, by carrying them once more to the houſe of one who had been raiſed from the dead by him; and this was the more neceſſary, as the time was very near, when he ſhould put their faith to the proof, with reſpect to this article, by his own death. See Eraſmus, and Grotius.

Ver. 2. There they made him a ſupper] It was cuſtomary for the Jews to entertain their friends in a more noble manner than uſual, about ſix or ſeven days before the paſſover, and it was in compliance with this cuſtom, as well as out of a particular reſpect to Jeſus, who had conferred ſo great a bleſſing on them, that Lazarus and his ſiſters made this entertainment. It was no derogation to Martha that ſhe ſerved at table, for it was not uſual with the women to ſit at table with the men at entertainments of this kind. Beſides, it was incumbent upon her,—a peculiar mark of eſteem and reverence, on account of the miracle he had wrought in favour of her family. The ſitting of Lazarus at the table, ſerved to ſhew the reality of the miracle wrought at his tomb; that it was not a ſpectre or illuſion which then preſented itſelf to their ſight; and that Lazarus was not only reſtored to life, but likewiſe to perfect health. See Grotius, and Calmet.

Ver. 3. Then took Mary a pound of ointment] This ſupper is ſuppoſed by many to have been the ſame with that mentioned Matth. xxvi. 6. and Mark xiv. 3. but, upon examination, they will appear to have been different. This happened in the houſe of Lazarus, that in the houſe of Simon the leper: At this, Mary the ſiſter of Lazarus anointed our Lord's feet, and wiped them with her hair; at that, a woman, not named, poured the ointment on his head. Here Judas only found fault with the action; there he was ſeconded by ſome of the reſt. It ſeems all the diſciples but Judas ſuffered this firſt anointing to paſs without cenſure; but when they ſaw ſo expenſive a compliment repeated, and that within a few days the one of the other, they joined with him in blaming the woman, and might think themſelves warranted to do ſo, as they knew that their Maſter was not delighted with luxuries of any kind. After the anointing mentioned by St. Matthew, Judas went and bargained with the prieſts to deliver his Maſter into their hands; yet two days before the paſſover they conſulted among themſelves how they might take him by ſubtilty. This deliberation was abſolutely unneceſſary, if the anointing mentioned by St. Mathew had been the ſame with that in St. John; for the anointing being expreſly fixed by St. John to the ſixth day before the paſſover, the bargain which Judas ſtruck with the prieſts to betray his Maſter, is of courſe fixed to the ſame day, having happened immediately after the anointing: if ſo, the prieſts, ſix days before the paſſover, knew of a method to take Jeſus by ſubtilty, and therefore had no occaſion formally to conſult about it two days before the paſſover. In fine, the place in the hiſtory which St. Matthew hath aſſigned to his anointing, implies that it happened two days before the paſſover; whereas the anointing mentioned by St. John is expreſly ſaid to have been ſix days before that feaſt. Compare Matth. xxvi. 1—4, and 14. Thus it evidently appears, that our Lord was anointed with ſpikenard three different times during the courſe of his miniſtry; once in the houſe of Simon the Phariſee, once in the houſe of Lazarus, and once in the houſe of Simon the leper. That this honour ſhould have been done him ſo often, need not be thought ſtrange; for in thoſe countries it was common, at entertainments, to pour fragrant oils on the heads of ſuch gueſts as they deſigned to diſtinguiſh with marks of extraordinary reſpect. The cuſtom is alluded to Pſ. xlv. 7. God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladneſs above thy fellows. Where this piece of civility was ſhewn, it was an expreſſion of the higheſt complacency, and produced great gladneſs in the perſon who was the object of it. Hence, beſides the emblematical reaſon of the ceremony, it was fitly made uſe of at the inſtalment of perſons into high offices: And therefore, becauſe the only begotten Son of God was to ſuſtain greater dignities, and execute more important offices than ever were ſuſtained or executed among men, and was fitted for them by more extraordinary endowments than men poſſeſſed; having the Spirit given him without meaſure, He had the name of the Meſſiah, or the Anointed-one, appropriated to him by way of eminence; He was anointed with the oil of gladneſs, infinitely above his fellows,—the other kings, and prieſts, and prophets, whom God from time to time had raiſed up, and honoured with the title of his anointed-ones. See Macknight, Whitby, Lightfoot, and Le Clerc.

Ver. 5. Sold for three hundred pence] The Roman penny, which is here ſpoken of, was equal to ſeven pence halfpenny of our money; three hundred of theſe pence therefore amounted to about nine pounds, ſeven ſhillings, and ſix-pence ſterling. From the value of the ointment it would appear, that Lazarus and his ſiſters were perſons of a better ſtation than ordinary, (ſee on ch. xi. 1.) otherwiſe they could not have afforded ſo coſtly a preſent, nor would Jeſus have accepted it at their hands. Beſides, this conjecture is confirmed by the kind of company which came from the city to comfort the two ſiſters on the death of their brother. The Evangeliſt calls them the Jews; a word which he commonly makes uſe of to denote the principal inhabitants of Jeruſalem. The action of Mary, and the office which Martha ſuſtained at this feaſt, are by no means inconſiſtent with their ſuppoſed ſtation; for they muſt think they could not put ſufficient honour on one, whom they eſteemed ſo highly, and to whom they were ſo much indebted. If the ſtation of Lazarus was, as we ſuppoſe, better than common, the miracle of his reſurrection muſt for that reaſon have been the more illuſtrious. See Macknight and Grotius.

Ver. 6. And bare what was put therein] And carried off what was put into it. Wat. This tranſlation of Dr. Waterland's is after Elſner, who refers to John xx. 15. Matth. iii. 11. viii. 17. for inſtances of ſuch an uſe of the word ἐβάσταζεν: But it by no means appears that the word is ever uſed in a bad ſenſe. The meaning here ſeems to be, that Judas had not only the keeping of the bag at that time, but that it was his ſtated office to take care of it, and manage its ſtock. Dr. Heylin renders the clauſe very well thus: And bearing the purſe, had in his keeping what was put into it. See Elſner's Obſervat. vol. i. p. 333.

Ver. 7. Againſt the day of my burying, &c.] The Jews firſt waſhed the corpſe all over with water, after it was laid out, Acts ix. 39. and then anointed it with liquid ſpices, or odours, as appears from this apology which our Lord makes for Mary; for the full import whereof, ſee the note on Matth. xxvi. 10. and Ward's 35th Diſſertation.

Ver. 9—11. Much people of the Jews therefore] Bethany being within two miles of Jeruſalem, the news of the arrival of Jeſus ſoon reached the city, and drew out great numbers of the citizens; for they had a laudable curioſity to ſee the man who had been raiſed from the dead, and the ſtill more wonderful man who had raiſed him. When they came and ſaw Lazarus, many of them believed, i. e. were convinced both of Lazarus's reſurrection, and of the divinity of Chriſt's miſſion. But the news of their believing, together with the reaſon of it, being currently reported in Jeruſalem, came to the Ears of the chief prieſts, and incenſed them to ſuch a degree, that they reſolved to kill not Jeſus only, but, if poſſible, Lazarus alſo. They went away, ver. 11. means, "from Jeruſalem to Bethany."

12 On the next day, much people that were come to the feaſt, when they heard that Jeſus was coming to Jeruſalem, 13 Took branches of palm-trees, and went forth to meet him, and cried, Hoſanna: Bleſſed is the King of Iſrael that cometh in the name of the Lord!

14 And Jeſus, when he had found a young aſs, ſat thereon; as it is written, 15 Fear not, daughter of Sion: behold, thy king cometh, ſitting on an aſs's colt.

16 Theſe things underſtood not his diſciples at the firſt: but when Jeſus was glorified, then remembered they that theſe things were written of him, and that they had done theſe things unto him.

17 The people therefore that was with him when he called Lazarus out of his grave, and raiſed him from the dead, bare record:

18 For this cauſe the people alſo met him, for that they heard that he had done this miracle.

19 The Phariſees therefore ſaid among themſelves, Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? behold, the world is gone after him.

20 And there were certain Greeks among them, that came up to worſhip at the feaſt:

21 The ſame came therefore to Philip, which was of Bethſaida of Galilee, and deſired him, ſaying, Sir, we would ſee Jeſus.

22 Philip cometh and telleth Andrew: and again, Andrew and Philip tell Jeſus.

23 And Jeſus anſwered them, ſaying, The hour is come, that the Son of man ſhould be glorified.

24 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.

25 He that loveth his liſe, ſhall loſe it;

Ver. 12. Much people, who were come to the feaſt, &c.] The news of our Lord's approach having reached the city, great numbers of the people, who were come from the country to attend the feaſt, and who had a favourable opinion of his character, went forth with palm-branches in their hands, the uſual emblems of victory and triumph, to welcome him as the Meſſiah to the capital. See the notes on the parallel places.

Ver. 14. And Jeſus, when he had found a young aſs, ſat thereon, &c.] 'Ευρὼν δε. Now Jeſus having found a young aſs, ſat, &c. For the Evangeliſt does not mean that Jeſus was ſaluted by the multitude from Jeruſalem before he mounted; but his meaning is, that Jeſus was riding when they ſaluted him: Or, becauſe Jeſus ſent for the aſs, 'Ευρὼν may be tranſlated having procured; in which ſenſe ευρισκειν is ſometimes uſed. See Beza on Matth. xvi. 25.

Ver. 16. Theſe things underſtood not the diſciples] Though the diſciples believed him to be the Meſſiah, yet there were many occurrences of his life, which they underſtood not at the time when they happened, to be foretold of the Meſſiah; but which, after his aſcenſion, they found exactly to quadrate with, and to be accompliſhments of thoſe predictions. Locke.

Ver. 17, 18. The people therefore, &c.] Becauſe the forwardneſs which the multitude now ſhewed to acknowledge Jeſus as the Meſſiah was altogether extraordinary, the Evangeliſt aſſigns the cauſe thereof. The witneſſes of the reſurrection of Lazarus zealouſly beſtirred themſelves on this occaſion; they had publiſhed the miracle far and near; they were many in number, and perſons of reputation. Hence their report gained univerſal belief, and drew out an innumerable multitude to meet Jeſus. A circumſtance which, as the hiſtorian obſerves, gave great credit to the miracle, to which they bare record, or gave their teſtimony, as it proved what ſenſe the people of the age and country where it was performed had of it. Some would render theſe verſes, Now the multitude that was with him bare record, that (οτι) he called Lazarus from the grave, and raiſed him from the dead; and upon this account the multitude met him, becauſe they heard that he had done this miracle. See Wetſtein and Mill.

Ver. 20. And there were certain Greeks] After the conqueſt of Darius by Alexander, all his ſucceſſors of different nations were called Greeks, from whence came the name of "the Grecian monarchy," otherwiſe called, "the Syro-macedonian." Thus Antiochus Epiphanes is ſaid to have reigned in the hundred and thirthy-ſeventh year of the kingdom of the Greeks, 1 Macc. i. 10. St. Paul likewiſe often diſtinguiſhes all other nations from the Jews by the name of Greeks, Rom. i. 16. ii. 9. x. 12. and the greater part of Syria was, in our Saviour's time, called Greece by the Jews. Hence, when he was in the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and a woman beſought him to caſt the evil ſpirit out of her daughter, ſhe is called a Greek, a Syrophœnician by nation, Mark vii. 26. and theſe Greeks, who were deſirous to ſee Jeſus, were probably of the ſame nation, and known to Philip, who is here ſaid to have been a native of Bethſaida in Galilee, a neighbouring country, for which reaſon they might particularly apply themſelves to him. Dr. Waterland, and the MS. before me, inſtead of Greeks, read Gentiles. However, as all the Gentiles were thus named by the Jews Ελληνες, it denoted their religion, rather than their country; but in the preſent inſtance, the perſons called Greeks were not idolatrous Gentiles; for their buſineſs at the feaſt, which was to worſhip, ſhews that they were proſelytes to the Jewiſh religion, and that they cheriſhed expectations of the Meſſiah. See Acts ii. 5. viii. 27. xiii. 43. and Ward's 28th Diſſertation.

Ver. 21. We would ſee Jeſus] This tranſaction appears to have been in the paſſover-week, when Chriſt taught daily in the temple, but retired to Bethany in the evening with his diſciples. So that by ſeeing him, ιδειν, cannot barely be meant ſeeing his perſon, which they might have done with the reſt of the multitude while he was teaching them; and conſequently there could be no reaſon for them to apply to Philip upon that account, or for him to inform Andrew, and for them again to acquaint Jeſus with ſuch a requeſt. However, it is not improbable, from the circumſtances of the narrative, that this requeſt was made in the temple, upon their meeting with Philip there; and that what they deſired was, an admiſſion to Jeſus in ſuch a manner, as to hear him perfectly, and be informed of his doctrine, while he thus taught in publick. It is not indeed expreſſy ſaid whether this requeſt was granted or not; but it is very reaſonable to ſuppoſe that it was: for as it was not the effect of mere curioſity, whenever our Saviour met with a diſpoſition in any perſons to receive his inſtructions, he was always ready to encourage it; and as his diſcourſe which immediately follows, concerning the extenſive and ſalutary ends of his approaching death, and the conditions of embracing his Goſpel, which was ſoon after to be publiſhed among all nations, Gentiles as well as Jews, ſeems very well adapted to theſe Greeks, among the reſt of his hearers; ſo it evidently appears, from ſeveral things ſaid to have accompanied it, that it was made to a mixed multitude in the temple. See Ward as above.

Ver. 22. Philip cometh, and telleth Andrew, &c.] From Philip's not venturing to introduce the men himſelf, it ſeems probable that there was ſome difficulty in the caſe. Perhaps they were only "proſelytes of the gate," who, according to cuſtom, could not be admitted into the company of Jews. See Acts x. 28. and Whitby on ver. 20.

Ver. 23, 24. And Jeſus anſwered them] If we ſuppoſe that our Lord ſpoke theſe words as the Greeks were introducing to him, the following diſcourſe will diſcover many a latent beauty. Our Lord might enlarge perhaps on ſome of the hints in this diſcourſe, and if his hearers took a due notice of them, and made a proper report on their return home, it might prepare the way for the Apoſtles, when they came, by their preaching, more fully to unfold and illuſtrate theſe important doctrines. Our Lord here declares, that the appointed time was now at hand, when he ſhould be honoured by the converſion of all the Gentiles, an earneſt whereof they now had, in the approach of the preſent Greeks: At the ſame time he told them, that he was to ſuffer death before he arrived at this glory; and illuſtrated the neceſſity of his dying by the ſimilitude of grain caſt into the earth, ver. 24. "As the only way to make grain produce fruit, is to bury it in the ground; ſo the moſt proper method of bringing about the converſion and ſalvation of the world is, that I die, and be buried." Our Lord's reſurrection, (to omit other things) that grand miracle on which the truth of Chriſtianity is founded, and by which the converſion of the world was effected, happened in conſequence of his death. Dr. Heylin renders the 24th verſe more clearly thus: If the grain of wheat that falls into the ground dieth not, it remains there a ſingle grain; but if it die, it becometh very fruitful.

Ver. 25, 26. He that loveth his liſe, &c.] He told them further, that as he, their Maſter, was to ſuffer before his exaltation, ſo muſt they, his diſciples, expect the like; for which reaſon they were to expect perſecution, firmly reſolving to loſe even life itſelf, after his example, when called to do ſo; and in that caſe he promiſed them a ſhare in his crown and glory. Thus tacitly inſinuating, that the

and he that hateth his life in this world, ſhall keep it unto life eternal.

26 If any man ſerve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there ſhall alſo my ſervant be: If any man ſerve me, him will my Father honour.

27 Now is my ſoul troubled; and what ſhall I ſay? Father, ſave me from this hour: but for this cauſe came I unto this hour.

28 Father, glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, ſaying, I have both glorified it, and will glory it again.

29 The people therefore that ſtood by, and heard it, ſaid that it thundered: others ſaid, An angel ſpake to him.

30 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, This voice came not becauſe of me, but for your ſakes.

31 Now is the judgement of this world: now ſhall the prince of this world be caſt out.

32 And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.

33 (This he ſaid, ſignifying what death he ſhould die.)

34 The people anſwered him, We have heard out of the law, that Chriſt abideth for ever: and how ſayeſt thou, The Son of man muſt be lifted up? who is this Son of man?

35 Then Jeſus ſaid unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, leſt darkneſs come upon you: for he that walketh in darkneſs, knoweth not whither he goeth.

36 While ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light.

ſtrangers would be greatly diſappointed, if their deſire of converſing with him proceeded from a hope of recommending themſelves to earthly preferments through his favour. By the indefinite expreſſions our Lord here makes uſe of, "If any one would ſerve me, would wiſh to be of my houſhold, let him follow, &c." he ſtrongly intimates, that his kingdom was to be of a very extenſive nature; and that not only the proſelytes of righteouſneſs, but thoſe of the gate, and even the idolatrous Gentiles themſelves, might, on their believing the Goſpel, be admitted to its privileges. See the paſſages in the Margin, and on Luke xiv. 26.

Ver. 27, 28. Now is my ſoul troubled] Having taken a view of his own ſufferings, and propoſed them as an example to his diſciples, the proſpect moved him to a great degree, and he diſcovered to them the conflict which he felt in his boſom: "Now is my ſoul troubled; and what ſhall I ſay?, Shall I ſay, Father, ſave me from this hour? (for ſo the paſſage evidently ſhould be read and pointed.) No, I will not ſay this, ſince for this very cauſe I came unto this hour." Our Lord's application to his heavenly Father on this occaſion, ſhews us what is the beſt method of eaſing the mind in deep diſtreſs; at the ſame time that he expreſſed an intire reſignation to the divine will, he has taught us, that although the weakneſs of human nature may ſhrink at the firſt thoughts of ſuffering, his diſciples are not to yield; but ought to fortify themſelves by juſt reflections on the wiſdom of God, and on the happy end he propoſes by their afflictions. Our Saviour adds, "Father, glorify thy name;" which ſome conſider as a further expreſſion of reſignation, importing that he was willing to ſubmit to whatever the Father ſhould judge neceſſary for the manifeſtation of his perfections: "For this cauſe came I unto this hour; therefore, O Father, do to me as it ſhall ſeem good to thy divine wiſdom, for the glorification of thy name in the redemption of mankind." The anſwer, however, which was given to this part of Chriſt's prayer, ſuggeſts another meaning; namely, that he begged of God the Father to demonſtrate, perhaps by an immediate interpoſition, the truth of his miſſion: a full proof thereof being altogether neceſſary for vindicating the honour of God. Accordingly, the words were no ſooner ſpoken, than a voice from heaven was heard, anſwering diſtinctly to this ſenſe of them: I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. "I have glorified it by the miracles which thou haſt already performed, and will continue to glorify it by other miracles yet to be performed." The further glorification of the name of God, promiſed to Jeſus by the voice, ſignified the honour which ſhould accrue to God from the new proofs wherewith his miſſion was to be adorned; particularly the great miracles of his reſurrection from the dead, of the effuſion of the Spirit on the firſt converts, and of the converſion of the Gentile world to the Chriſtian religion. See Macknight, Beza, and Calmet.

Ver. 29. The people therefore—ſaid that it thundered] The ſound of this voice was evidently preternatural, being ſtrong and loud as thunder; but at the ſame time ſo articulate, that all who heard Jeſus pray, underſtood what it ſaid. The word rendered voice, and that rendered thunder, are uſed promiſcuouſly by the inſpired writers, according to the Hebrew idiom, wherein the word koloth, voices, uſually ſignifies thunder. Thunder generally attended a voice from heaven: In alluſion to which, perhaps, the voice itſelf was called by the ancient Jews bath-kol, or "the daughter of the voice," being uſhered in with thunder, and as it were produced from it. Hence the bath-kol, the only way by which God revealed his will after the Babyloniſh captivity, is uſed by the Jews to expreſs the will of God revealed in thunder from heaven. This will ſerve to explain the different ſentiments of the people concerning this circumſtance. Some of them ſaid It thunders; and others, that an angel ſpake; each of them declaring the truth ſo far as there was thunder joined with the voice from heaven; though that voice was of one much greater than an angel. See Rev. iv. 5. viii. 5. and Matth. iii. 17. Elſner has ſhewn, that the heathens eſteemed ſudden thunder as a ſign that a prayer then offered met with the moſt favourable regard. Dr. Lightfoot has well obſerved, that our Saviour had thrice the teſtimony of a voice from heaven; firſt, when he entered on his public miniſtry, as the high-prieſt of our profeſſion at his baptiſm; Matth. iii. 17. the ſecond time, when a command was given to hear him, as the great prophet of the church, at his transfiguration; Matth. xvii. 5. And now again, when he had made his publick entry into Jeruſalem as a king. See Hammond, Calmet, and Elſner's Obſervat. vol. i. p. 334.

Ver. 30. This voice came not becauſe of me] Dr. Heylin renders this better, This voice came not for my ſake, but for yours. It is literally, This voice came not for me, but for you. "Not to aſſure me of the love of the Father, but to confirm you in the belief of my miſſion; that you may not be offended at the treatment I ſhall meet with, or quit your hope in me, on account of the ſufferings which are coming upon me."

Ver. 31—33. Now is the judgement of this world] The ſubject of our Lord's prayer, and the anſwer which he received, naturally led him to meditate on the happy effects of his coming into the world; namely, the deſtruction of Satan's kingdom, and the exaltation of men with himſelf into heaven. Theſe grand events afforded a proſpect very reviving, amidſt the melancholy thoughts which now afflicted his ſoul. Wherefore, that his diſciples might ſhare with him in the comfort of them, he foretold them, as the neceſſary effects of his ſufferings, "Now is the judgement of this world; the time of the deſtruction of wickedneſs is come: Now ſhall the prince of this world be caſt out. The devil who has ſo long reigned in the hearts of the children of diſobedience is about to be dethroned: (comp. Epheſ. ii. 2. and 2 Cor. iv. 4.) And I, if I be lifted up, &c. ver. 32."—Our Lord cannot be ſuppoſed in this paſſage to talk of his own death as a thing uncertain; and therefore ἐὰν ὑψωθῶ ſhould be tranſlated, when I am lifted up; a ſenſe which ἐὰν ſometimes bears. See Deut. vii. 1. Judg. vi. 3. LXX. Dr. Heylin gives a ſomewhat different interpretation of this paſſage. "It appears from ver. 27. ſays he, that our bleſſed Saviour had been in great trouble on account of his approaching ſufferings, by which he was to redeem the world. He was now about to accompliſh that great work; therefore he ſaith, Now is the criſis of this world; wherein its fate would be decided, the uſurper ejected, and the Redeemer eſtabliſhed in the acquiſition he makes of it by his death. When I ſhall be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men to myſelf. To be lifted up from the earth, is an Hebraiſm to ſignify dying; we have met with it twice before in this Goſpel; and that it was then familiar, and commonly underſtood, appears from the immediate anſwer of the Jews, who uſe it in the ſame ſenſe. "We are taught by the law, ſay they, that the Chriſt is to live for ever. Why then do you ſay, that the Son of man muſt be lifted up; i. e. die." They meant only death in general; for that was all the phraſe imported. But our Lord made uſe of this, rather than other phraſes which were equivalent, becauſe it ſo well ſuited the manner of his death on the croſs. See Whitby, Maſſie's Vernacula Sacra, p. 8. More's Theological works, p. 207. and the note on ch. vi. 44.

Ver. 34—36. The people anſwered him] The people, on hearing Jeſus affirm that he was to be lifted up, or crucified, told him, that was Theſe things ſpake Jeſus, and departed, and did hide himſelf from them.

37 But though he had done ſo many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him:

38 That the ſaying of Eſaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he ſpake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?

39 Therefore they could not believe, becauſe that Eſaias ſaid again,

40 He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they ſhould not ſee with their eyes, nor underſtand with their heart, and be converted, and I ſhould heal them.

41 Theſe things ſaid Eſaias, when he ſaw his glory, and ſpake of him.

42 Nevertheleſs, among the chief rulers alſo, many believed on him; but becauſe of the Phariſees they did not confeſs him, leſt they ſhould be put out of the ſynagogue:

43 For they loved the praiſe of men more than the praiſe of God.

44 Jeſus cried, and ſaid, He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that ſent me.

45 And he that ſeeth me, ſeeth him that ſent me.

46 I am come a light into the world, that whoſoever believeth on me ſhould not abide in darkneſs.

47 And if any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to ſave the world.

48 He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have ſpoken, the ſame ſhall judge him in the laſt day.

49 For I have not ſpoken of myſelf; but the Father which ſent me, he gave me a commandment, what I ſhould ſay, and what I ſhould ſpeak.

50 And I know that his commandment is life everlaſting: whatſoever I ſpeak therefore, even as the Father ſaid unto me, ſo I ſpeak.

was inconſiſtent with the character of the Meſſiah, who, according to the law, (ſo they named the whole of their ſacred writings) was never to die. Who then is this Son of man? "What ſort of a Meſſiah muſt he be, who is to die, in immediate contradiction to the voice of the prophets? (See Pſ. lxxxix. 29. cx. 4. Iſai. ix. 7. Dan. ii. 44. vii. 14.)—Is he a different perſon from the Meſſiah whom we have been taught to expect, under the title of the Son of man?" This was a real and important difficulty; but it was fit ſome obſcurity ſhould for the preſent be left upon it, leſt the plainneſs of the prediction ſhould have prevented its accompliſhment. Our Lord therefore gave the diſcourſe a uſeful turn, and a few days more proclaimed the myſtery which he had before revealed to his Apoſtles in private, when he ſat out on his laſt journey to Jeruſalem. See Matth. xx. 18, 19. ch. viii. 12. xi. 9, 10. and Rom. xi. 25.

Ver. 38. That the ſaying of Eſaias the prophet, &c.] So that the ſaying—was fulfilled, &c. Wat. Heylin, Jeffryes, &c. See the note on Iſai liii. 1. The phraſe Hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? is thought by ſome to allude to the habit generally worn by the eaſtern people, and eſpecially by perſons of rank, which was a long robe without ſleeves; ſo that when the arm was ſtretched out, to perform any action which required ſtrength, it would appear uncovered, Iſai. lii. 10. In this connection, it ſeems ſtrongly to imply, that whenever true faith is produced in the mind, it is to be conſidered as the effect of a divine energy. See Epheſ. i. 19. Col. ii. 12. Doddridge, and Vitringa.

Ver. 39, 40. Therefore they could not believe] That is, By the juſt judgement of God, for their obſtinate and wilful reſiſtance to the truth, they were ſo hardened, that the doctrine and miracles of our Lord could make no impreſſion on them, as Iſaiah had foretold, ch. vi. 9, 10. where ſee the note, and alſo on Matth. xiii. 14. The meaning therefore is, not that the prophecy of Iſaiah is the cauſe of their unbelief, but that their unbelief was the accompliſhment of Iſaiah's prophecy. See Clarke's Sermons, vol. viii. ſerm. 5. The Evangeliſt, in this quotation, has not confined himſelf exactly to the words of the prophet, but the ſenſe is plainly the ſame; and nothing was more uſual with the Jews than to quote Scripture in this way. See Surenhuſius de Formulis allegandi, p. 367.

Ver. 41. Theſe things ſaid Eſaias, when, &c.] He uttered theſe remarkable words, when in viſion he ſaw the glory of the Son of God, and the manifeſtations which he was to make of the divine counſels, and deſcribed the effect which theſe manifeſtations were to have upon his hearers; for which reaſon they are a prophetical deſcription of the men of the age in which Jeſus lived. We have obſerved, in the note on Iſai. vi. 1. that from this paſſage Chriſt is evidently proved to be the Jehovah: but the reader deſirous to ſee this argument in its full force, is referred not only to the authors there quoted, but particularly to the excellent Bp. Pearſon on the Creed, p. 125.

Ver. 44. Jeſus cried, &c.] To ſtrengthen the faith of thoſe who believed on him, and to inſpire them with courage to confeſs him, (ſee ver. 42.) our Lord cried, and ſaid in the temple, "My doctrine is ſo evidently from God, that he who believeth on me may more properly be ſaid to believe on God, by whoſe authority I preach; (ſee ch. vii. 16.) And he that ſeeth me, &c. ver. 45. he that ſeeth the miracles which I perform, ſeeth the operation of his power, by whoſe authority I act." See ch. x. 37, 38. Dr. Waterland reads ver. 44. Not on me only, but, &c.

Ver. 46—48. I am come a light, &c.] "I am the light of the world, ſent down from heaven, to diſpel the darkneſs of ignorance, ſuperſtition, and wickedneſs, and to reveal the will of God, and the way to eternal life and happineſs clearly and fully. Whoſoever therefore believes on me, ſhall not want ſufficient means to direct him in the knowledge of all divine truths, and in the practice of all holineſs and righteouſneſs unto everlaſting life. Nevertheleſs, they who reject the inſtructions, and the offers of ſalvation which I give, ſhall not paſs unpuniſhed; for the doctrine that I have preached ſhall bear witneſs againſt them at the day of judgement; and becauſe it has aggravated their ſin, it will heighten their puniſhment." Inſtead of believe, ver. 47. Dr. Heylin reads practice; "for this diſcourſe, ſays he, was to thoſe who in ſome ſort did believe, (ver. 42.) but with ſo defective a faith, that they had not the courage to own it, which is a principal point of practice. I have therefore choſen to follow the Vulgate, which is authorized by all other ancient verſions, and many of the moſt authentic Greek MSS." The ſame learned writer tranſlates the 48th verſe thus: He who deſpiſes me, and does not embrace my doctrine, hath one that judgeth him; or rather, hath that which judgeth him. The doctrine which I have delivered, that ſhall be his judge at the laſt day.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XII.

We ſee how happily Mary improved by ſitting at the feet of Jeſus, and what evidence ſhe gave of her having choſen the better part. Like her, with humble thankfulneſs, We ſhould beſtow our very beſt on him, who has given us that beſt, as well as every thing beſide. She gladly poured out her choiceſt ointment on him, whoſe name is, to every true believer, far more fragrant than ointment poured forth. How does her generous love ſhame thoſe, who, laviſh in every ſelfiſh gratification, grudge the leaſt expence in the cauſe of Chriſt and their ſouls!

When we are relieving our neceſſitous fellow-creatures, we are as it were anointing the feet of Jeſus; we are indeed performing a ſervice more acceptable than any thing of this kind could be, in itſelf. Let us remember, that we have the poor always with us, and that they are permitted to continue among us, that we may do them good whenever we pleaſe. Far be it from us to imagine, that what we ſo ſpend is waſte. They who would not ſhare in the guilt and puniſhment of Judas, ſhould ever abhor the vile hypocriſy, of making a pretended concern for the poor a cloke for an opportunity of enriching themſelves with their ſpoils; than which nothing can be more infamous, or have a more direct tendency to mingle the curſe of a righteous and almighty God with all that a man poſſeſſes. Jeſus waſheth the diſciples feet: exhorteth them to humility and charity: he foretelleth and diſcovereth to John by a token, that Judas ſhould betray him: commandeth them to love one another: and forewarneth Peter of his denial.

NOW before the feaſt of the paſſover, when Jeſus knew that his hour was come, that he ſhould depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.

ture was this of cruelty and folly! What was his crime, or what could be their hope? From what death could not Chriſt have delivered him, or from what tomb could he not have recalled him? Yet ſomething like this is the madneſs of all who hate and perſecute others, for being the trophies of the Redeemer's victory and grace. But let not his ſervants fear; their Redeemer is ſtrong; the Lord of hoſts is his name; his work is perfect, and the day and hour is approaching, in which his triumph over all his enemies ſhall be ſo compleat, that his friends ſhall be for ever ſecure, not only from being deſtroyed, but from being alarmed by them. [For Reflections on our Lord's entrance into Jeruſalem, ſee thoſe on Matth. xxi.]

Who can wonder at the deſire which theſe Greeks expreſſed, ver. 20, 21. to ſee ſo celebrated a perſon as Jeſus was? We may reaſonably believe, that there was much more than mere curioſity in it, and that at length they ſaw him with believing eyes, and, according to his prediction, glorified him, by a cordial acceptance of his Goſpel. His diſciples, we ſee, were ready to introduce them; and ſurely every faithful miniſter of Chriſt will undertake the taſk with pleaſure, when he ſees ſouls awakened by divine grace, and inquiring after Jeſus with affectionate concern.

Bleſſed be God, it has already, in many inſtances, been ſeen, that, by the death of Chriſt, an immortal ſeed was ſown, which has multiplied in all ages, and is ſtill multiplying. O that it might have a greater increaſe! One would think, that words ſo gracious as theſe ſhould promote that increaſe, and operate upon every heart, to produce a love to him ſufficient to conquer every danger and oppoſition which may be met with in his cauſe. Behold the promiſe which he has left upon record; "If any man, be he ever ſo mean and unworthy, will but faithfully ſerve and follow me, whatever his former wanderings and rebellions may have been, where I am, there ſhall alſo my ſervant be." Happy ſtate indeed! not only, like theſe Greeks, to have a tranſient ſight of Chriſt, but to be for ever with him!

How admirable is the love and ſteadfaſtneſs of our Redeemer, who procured ſo great a happineſs for us at ſo dear an expence, and even when his innocent ſoul was troubled, in the view of his ſufferings, inſtead of declining them, met them with joy! How ſhould it animate us to renew that general comprehenſive petition, than which none can be more ſuitable to us, with regard to all the divine diſpenſations, Father, glorify thy name. "Glorify thyſelf, O Lord; and to that great end, diſpoſe of us as thou pleaſeſt; for we ſhould abhor ourſelves, if we could have any intereſts ſeparate from thine." ver. 27, 28.

We may be aſſured as certainly as by a voice from heaven, that this great end ſhall be anſwered; and in this we ſhould rejoice. Behold, the prince of this world is caſt out. Behold, Satan is vanquiſhed by Chriſt, and Jeſus is lifted up on the croſs, for a ſtandard to all the nations. Behold the attractive magnet, by which all men are to be drawn, by which all his choſen people ſhall be brought to him, and ſo raiſed up to heaven itſelf. Let us look unto him from the ends of the earth, and labour with our cold hearts to kindle that lively and ardent affection which we owe to Him, who was crucified for us. ver. 31, 32.

How neceſſary is the operation of divine grace to conquer the prejudices of a ſinful heart,—ſince even the preaching of Chriſt himſelf, enforced by all his ſtupendous miracles, could not overcome thoſe prejudices of it; and how cautious ſhould ſinners be, that they do not ſtop their ears to the joyful ſound of the Goſpel, and ſhut their ears againſt this glorious light, leſt God ſhould leave them to their deluſions, and in his righteous judgement ſeal them up under final blindneſs and intemperance. Then will they never be converted and healed; but die with that poiſon in all the faculties of their ſouls, which will make them for ever reſtleſs and miſerable. ver. 37—40.

Can we find words ſufficient to expreſs the madneſs of theſe Phariſees, who, when they are convinced in their conſciences that Jeſus was the Chriſt, would not confeſs that conviction, and publickly pay their homage to him, becauſe they loved the praiſe of men more than the praiſe of God? ver. 42, 43. Strange infatuation of the human mind, that it ſhould be capable of believing there is a God, and yet of preferring the creatures before him! and ſhould ſometimes imagine the vain breath of popular applauſe or popular cenſure ſo conſiderable, as that God ſhould be offended, to pleaſe man; and all the honours and rewards of his heavenly preſence loſt, to ſecure a little regard from thoſe who are periſhing in their crimes, and will, ere long, be themſelves the objects of everlaſting ſhame and contempt!

Moſt important is that proclamation which our Lord made in the temple, as is ſtill making to us in his word. Believing in him, we believe in the Father; and ſeeing him, we ſee the Father, ver. 44, 45. Let us be ready therefore to receive him, out of regard to his divine authority, as well as with a view to our own happineſs; for without him we can have no acceſs unto the Father, nor can we ever ſee him as a reconciled God. The ſacred light which he diffuſes around him, (ver. 46,) is not intended merely to amuſe our eyes with pleaſing ſpeculations, but to animate our hearts with holy affections, and to guide our feet into the way of peace. If we deſire therefore to eſcape an abode in eternal darkneſs, and to ſee everlaſting light, we muſt faithfully follow it, otherwiſe we are condemned already; and that word which he ſpake, ver. 48. will become to us a ſavour of death unto death, and will judge us, in the laſt ſolemn and dreadful day, when it ſhall ſentence thoſe, who would not be ſaved by it. If we are wiſe, therefore, we ſhall diligently make that word the rule of our life now, which will then be the rule of judgement; we may moſt comfortably venture our eternal All on the exact veracity of it. Chriſt has perfectly fulfilled the commiſſion he received from his Father, as one that was faithful to him who appointed him; and ſtands ſo compleatly approved in his ſight, that our only hope is, that we alſo may be accepted in him, and find mercy and grace for his ſake, ver. 49, 50.

Chap XIII. Ver. 1. Now before the feaſt of the paſſover] The obſervation with which John uſhers in this part of his hiſtory, may be conſidered as a kind of preface to the five ſubſequent chapters of his Goſpel. Before the feaſt of the paſſover, means before they began the paſſover ſupper. See Luke xxii. 14, 15. Unto the end, means the end of his life. Knowing that his ſufferings were at hand, the proſpect of them did not make our gracious Maſter forget his diſciples. They rather quickened his friendſhip; for he indulged the tendereſt feelings of love on this occaſion, and after the manner of a departing friend, expreſſed his kindneſs in the moſt affectionate manner.

Ver. 2. And ſupper being ended, &c.] And being at ſupper. MS. See ver. 4 and 26. By our verſion an Engliſh reader would be led to apprehend, that the paſchal ſupper was over, before the ſubſequent act of condeſcenſion was performed by our Saviour; and that the clauſe in the parentheſis is referred to the devil's tempting Judas during its celebration. But the tranſlation above given is perfectly agreeable to the original, and to the context; and as it was the cuſtom with the Jews to waſh themſelves before they began to eat, it is on every account right to interpret the expreſſion in that ſenſe. And with regard to the words in the parentheſis, the particle βεβληκότος, rendered having put, is of the perfect tenſe, and denotes an action done at ſome paſt time; and the particle ἤδη, rendered now, often ſignifies already, or before: So that what Chriſt ſays here concerning Judas, may refer to what had paſſed between him and the chief prieſts, after the reproof given him at the ſupper in Bethany; and therefore, when John ſays afterwards, ver. 27. that after the ſupper Satan entered into Judas, the meaning muſt be, that he was then again incited by the devil to execute the treachery which he had before reſolved upon, by a like inſtigation of the ſame evil ſpirit: See ver. 27. Lightfoot, Whitby, and Ward's 29th Diſſertation.

Ver. 3. Jeſus knowing, &c.] This circumſtance is premiſed to ſet the humility of Chriſt in the moſt conſpicuous light: And what could have contributed more to this purpoſe, than to conſider that Jeſus, though of ſuch tranſcendent dignity, as to be inveſted with the government of all things, as having exiſted in heaven before he appeared on earth, and as ſure of returning to heaven again, to reign there; yet deſcends to the mean office of a ſlave, and waſhes the feet of his own diſciples; an action, which might juſtly excite our wonder, if we had not proofs of his much greater humiliation in making himſelf of no reputation, for the great work of human redemption. We cannot wonder at his girding himſelf with the towel, when we reflect that he took upon him the form of a ſervant. We cannot wonder at his pouring water into the baſon, to waſh his diſciples' feet, when we recollect that he ſhed his own moſt precious blood, to waſh away the ſins of mankind. See St. Auguſtin on John, and Queſnelle.

Ver. 4. He riſeth from ſupper] As it is here aſſerted that Chriſt roſe from ſupper, we muſt allow that in ſome ſenſe ſupper was begun. Probably, the antepaſt had been taken, which is mentioned by the Jews as preceding the paſchal lamb. They tell us that it was then uſual for the maſter of the family to waſh his hands, and if we are rightly informed, the Jews continue this cuſtom ſtill. By laying

5 After that, he poureth water into a baſon, and began to waſh the diſciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded.

6 Then cometh he to Simon Peter: and Peter ſaid unto him, Lord, doſt thou waſh my feet?

7 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto him, What I do thou knoweſt not now; but thou ſhalt know hereafter.

8 Peter ſaith unto him, Thou ſhalt never waſh my feet. Jeſus anſwered him, If I waſh thee not, thou haſt no part with me.

9 Simon Peter ſaith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but alſo my hands and my head.

10 Jeſus ſaith to him, He that is waſhed, needeth not ſave to waſh his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all.

11 For he knew who ſhould betray him; therefore ſaid he, Ye are not all clean.

12 So after he had waſhed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was ſet down again, he ſaid unto them, Know ye what I have done to you?

13 Ye call me Maſter, and Lord: and ye ſay well; for ſo I am.

14 If I then, your Lord and Maſter, have waſhed your feet; ye alſo ought to waſh one another's feet.

15 For I have given you an example, that ye ſhould do as I have done to you.

16 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, The ſervant is not greater than his lord; neither he that is ſent, greater than he that ſent him.

17 If ye know theſe things, happy are ye if ye do them.

18 I ſpeak not of you all: I know whom I have choſen: but that the ſcripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel againſt me.

19 Now I tell you before it come, that when it is come to paſs, ye may believe that I am he.

Ver. 6. Gr. he. See Matth. iii. 14.—V. 8. Ch. iii. 5. 1 Cor. vi. 11. Epheſ. v. 26. Tit. iii. 5. Hebr. x. 22.—V. 10. Ch. xv. 3. V. 11. Ch. vi. 64.—V. 13. Matth. xxiii. 8, 10. 1 Cor. viii. 6. xii. 3. aſide his garments, is meant his upper garments; which the Jewiſh prieſts uſed to pull off, when employed in bringing the victims, frankincenſe, and other things requiſite for ſacrifice. See the note on Luke xvii. 8. Ainſworth on Exod. xii. 8. and Grotius.

Ver. 6. Then cometh he to Simon Peter] The word rendered then, does not imply either that Jeſus came firſt to Peter, or that he had waſhed any other perſon before him; but is uſed in the ſame ſenſe as the Engliſh particle now, without any reſpect to time or order, and only to imply that a minute detail was going to follow. There is great emphaſis in the word Thou in this verſe. Lord, doſt Thou waſh My feet? "Thou, who art the Son of God, the Meſſiah, and conſequently the King of the Jews, ſhalt thou waſh my feet, who am but a poor fiſherman, who am thy diſciple, and what is ſtill more degrading, an unworthy ſinner?" See Grotius, and Eraſmus.

Ver. 7. Hereafter] Μετα ταῦτα;—after theſe things; and accordingly, our Lord, after he had finiſhed the waſhing, explains the meaning of this ſymbolical action.

Ver. 8. If I waſh thee not, thou haſt no part with me] "If thou doſt not ſubmit to all my orders implicitly, thou art not my diſciple;" or, as others underſtand it, "Unleſs I cleanſe thee from the pollution of ſin, emblematically repreſented by the waſhing thee with water, Thou art none of mine."

Ver. 9, 10. Simon Peter ſaith, &c.] St. Peter underſtanding Chriſt's words literally, ſuppoſed that his being waſhed was neceſſary to his partaking with him in the felicity of his reign; he deſired therefore that not his feet only, but alſo his hands and his head, that is, his whole body might be waſhed. Jeſus ſaid, He that is waſhed, or rather, "he who has been bathed,—Ο λελουμένος,—need not after that waſh any part of his body, except his feet, which in coming out of the bath may have been dirtied." This he ſaid in alluſion to their cuſtom of bathing themſelves before the ſupper, and with a deſign to teach us, that perſons converted do not after that ſtand in need of an entire change of mind; but only to cleanſe themſelves from the particular ſins, which they happen to commit through infirmity; for that our Saviour ſpoke of a ſpiritual waſhing is evident from his adding, and ye are clean, but not all. "Ye are men of holy and virtuous diſpoſitions; only ye are not all of you ſo." This was ſo direct an application to the conſcience of Judas, that he could not but be convinced that our Lord knew the inmoſt receſſes of his mind; and, if he had not been exceedingly obdurate, was ſufficient to have prevented him from putting his infamous ſordid project into practice. Some have obſerved, that Judas did not decline the honour of having his feet waſhed, as Peter did,—and have conſidered it as an inſtance of his pride: But, if the diſcourſe between Chriſt and Peter happened before he came to Judas, it had been indecent for Judas to renew an objection which had juſt been over-ruled; and if Chriſt came to Judas before Peter, he might be unwilling to be the firſt to diſpute the point, leſt Chriſt ſhould confound him by enquiring, whether he declined it from a conſciouſneſs of any peculiar unworthineſs. Guilt naturally ſuggeſts ſuch ſuſpicions and precautions. See Doddridge, Macknight, Grotius, and Elſner's Obſervat. vol. i. p. 337.

Ver. 14. If I then—have waſhed your feet, &c.] This was, even to a proverb, one of the loweſt offices of menial attendants. See 1 Sam. xxv. 41. and Grotius. Dr. Evans well obſerves, (Chriſtian Temper, vol. i. p. 81.) that our Lord choſe this kind office, though not neceſſary in itſelf, more ſtrongly to impreſs the minds of his diſciples, and to ſhew that they ought to regard not only the neceſſary preſervation, but the mutual comfort of each other.

Ver. 15. For I have given you an example] "I have ſet you a pattern of humility, to recommend that indiſpenſably neceſſary grace to you:" and it muſt be acknowledged, that nothing ſhews us more effectually the neceſſity of this grace, than its being recommended to us by ſo high an example: A recommendation, which in the preſent circumſtances was peculiarly ſeaſonable; for the diſciples having heard Jeſus ſay, that the kingdom of God was at hand, (Luke xxii. 18.) their minds were ſo fired with ambitious paſſions, that before they aroſe from ſupper, they fell into an hot contention about ſharing the principal poſts in the kingdom. It may be proper to obſerve, that ſome have underſtood theſe words, as ordaining this to be a continued rite amongſt Chriſtians; and Barclay inſiſts in his Apology, p. 467. that this ceremony of waſhing the feet, has as much to recommend it for a ſtanding ordinance of the Goſpel, as either baptiſm, or the breaking of bread. But though ſome anciently conceived the practice to be thus enjoined, and the Moravian churches ſtill retain it; yet as no ſuch rite as this has ever generally prevailed in the Chriſtian world, and as in many places and circumſtances it would be an inconvenience, rather than a kindneſs to do it for our friends; the words of our Lord, ſo plainly capable of another and more important ſenſe, are not to be interpreted with ſo much ſtrictneſs. Our Lord deſigned to teach his diſciples the great leſſon of humble love, as well as to confer inward purity upon them; and hereby he teaches us, firſt, in every poſſible way to aſſiſt each other in attaining that purity: ſecondly, to waſh each other's feet, by performing all ſorts of good offices to each other; even thoſe of the loweſt kind, when the neceſſity of any calls for them. See Itigii Diſſert. de Pedilavio, &c. Cave's Primitive Chriſtianity, b. ii. c. 14. and in the Religious Ceremonies, vol. i. p. 417. may be ſeen into what a farce this ceremony of waſhing the feet is turned on ſome occaſions.

Ver. 19. Now I tell you before it come, &c.] "The hint in the preceding verſe merits your particular notice; for I have given it you before I am betrayed, to convince you, that from the beginning it was determined in the divine decree, and foreknown by me to be ſo; and to prevent your calling my miſſion in queſtion on that account." See Pſ. xli. 9. One way of knowing whether the interpretation of a prophecy be true, is to learn the time when that interpretation was made. For if it particularly and expreſly be declared the event that was ſuppoſed to be imported in the prophecy, before the event happened, or could poſſibly be foreſeen by human ſagacity, the truth of the interpretation is juſtified by the event. One and the ſame Spirit muſt be thought to inſpire the prophet and the interpreter. His ſkill, where he applies other prophecies to preſent circumſtances which they ſuit, may be truſted to;—and this is the very ſtate of many of Chriſt's interpretations. He pointed out ſeveral prophecies to his diſciples, and even to the Jews. He told them, "thus the prophet writes, and thus it ſhall be fulfilled," and it was fulfilled accordingly; though the fulfilling of moſt of them was out of his own power, and depended on the free choice of others, with whom he could not combine;—the Jews and the Romans were the inſtruments to accompliſh them.

20 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, He that receiveth whomſoever I ſend, receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that ſent me.

21 When Jeſus had thus ſaid, he was troubled in ſpirit, and teſtified, and ſaid, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, That one of you ſhall betray me.

22 Then the diſciples looked one on another, doubting of whom he ſpake.

23 Now there was leaning on Jeſus' boſom, one of his diſciples, whom Jeſus loved.

24 Simon Peter therefore beckoned to him, that he ſhould aſk who it ſhould be of whom he ſpake.

25 He then lying on Jeſus' breaſt, ſaith unto him, Lord, who is it?

26 Jeſus anſwered, He it is to whom I ſhall give a ſop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the ſop, he gave it to Judas Iſcariot, the ſon of Simon.

27 And after the ſop, Satan entered into him. Then ſaid Jeſus unto him, That thou doeſt, do quickly.

28 Now no man at the table knew for what intent he ſpake this unto him.

29 For ſome of them thought, becauſe Judas had the bag, that Jeſus had ſaid unto him, Buy thoſe things that we have need of againſt the feaſt; or, that he ſhould give ſomething to the poor.

30 He then, having received the ſop, went immediately out: and it was night.

31 Therefore when he was gone out, Jeſus ſaid, Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him.

32 If God be glorified in him, God ſhall alſo glorify him in himſelf, and ſhall ſtraightway glorify him.

Ver. 20. Matth. x. 40. Luke x. 16. —V. 21. Matth. xxvi. 21. Mark xiv. 18. Luke xxii. 21. Ch. xii. 27. Acts i. 17. 1 John ii. 19.—V. 23. Ch. xix. 26. xx. 2. xxi. 7. xx. 24.—V. 26. Or, morſel.—V. 27. Luke xxii. 3. Ch. vi. 70.—V. 29. Ch. xii. 6. V. 32. Ch. xvii. 1, 5, 6. Ch. xii. 23.

them. His end in all this was, to convince them of the truth of his interpretations; for otherwiſe he might foretel the ſame events, without regard or reference to their prophecies. But now, as he ſaid to his diſciples on the occaſion before us, I tell you before it come to paſs, &c. Chriſt had juſt told them, Ye are clean, but not all:—I ſpeak not of you all;—but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, &c. The text he cites is in Pſ. xiv. 9. which he applies to Judas, as a prediction of his treachery. "And this, ſaith he, I take notice of beforehand, as the ſenſe of that Scripture, that when you ſee it happen, you may believe that I am the Meſſiah, againſt whom the Pſalmiſt propheſied ſuch falſeneſs ſhould be committed." Whether this pſalm was ſpoken of Judas in a literal or typical ſenſe, it matters not; Chriſt interprets it of Judas, and the event correſponding with his interpretation, is a vindication of it. While as yet no outward token of Judas's villainy did appear, and the deſign was begun to be formed only in his mind, even then he warned his diſciples, that the Scripture muſt be fulfilled, concerning the apoſtaſy of this Son of perdition. See Chandler's Vindication, p. 349.

Ver. 21. He was troubled in ſpirit] As the thought of the perfidy of Judas preſented itſelf immediately after our Lord had given the diſciples in general ſuch a ſincere token of his love, the treachery of one of them could not but be very afflicting to him; which was the reaſon that he complained of it to the reſt at table, declaring with great concern that one of them ſhould betray him. See on Luke x. 21. Inſtead of ſhall betray, Dr. Waterland reads will.

Ver. 23. Now there was leaning on Jeſus' boſom] That is, "There ſat next to Jeſus at table." The phraſe only expreſſes the then cuſtomary poſture at meals. This diſciple was John, the memory of whoſe ſweet diſpoſition, and other amiable qualities, is perpetuated in the peculiar love which Jeſus bare to him. The word νεύει, in the next verſe rendered beckoned, might be more exactly rendered nodded: He intimated his deſire by a motion of his head.

Ver. 26. He it is to whom I ſhall give a ſop] See the note on Matth. xxvi. 20. The word rendered ſop, ψωμίον, implies the lower cruſt, or a piece broken off the lower cruſt of bread; it is often uſed for a morſel, or a few crumbs of bread. From the kind and ſmallneſs of the piece which was offered him, as well as from its being dipped in the ſauce, deſcribed in the note above referred to, it is probable that Jeſus put it into the traitor's mouth; for to cut a morſel, and dip it in ſauce, is the action of one who is going either to put it in his own mouth, or into the mouth of another; and what increaſes the probability of this conjecture is, that the devil is ſaid to have entered into Judas upon his receiving the ſop; and after the ſop, Satan entered into him, that is, took poſſeſſion of him, and hurried him on to the execution of the crime he had reſolved upon. Becauſe it was not cuſtomary to give a morſel into the mouth of any perſon at table, Judas, whoſe evil diſpoſition prompted him to put the worſt conſtruction upon every thing, might take it as a reproof of his gluttony, eſpecially if it was done while he was eating. Accordingly, thinking himſelf much affronted, the devil laid hold on his paſſion, and impelled him to execute the impious project which his covetouſneſs had firſt ſuggeſted to him. See Macknight, Heſychius, Ainſworth, and on ver. 30.

Ver. 27—30. And after the ſop, &c.] See the note on ver. 2.—After the account which St. Luke gives us of Chriſt's delivering the euchariſtical bread and wine to his diſciples, it is added, But behold the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table. chap. xxii. 21. From whence ſome interpreters have thought that Judas was preſent likewiſe at that ſupper, and partook of it with the reſt of the diſciples; whereas St. John expreſsly ſays, that having received the ſop, he went immediately out; and this being given him at the paſchal ſupper, he could not be preſent at the euchariſt which followed it. In order therefore to reconcile theſe accounts, it ſeems neceſſary to ſuppoſe, that St. Luke has not obſerved the order of time as to this circumſtance; but choſe firſt to mention together what related to the two ſuppers, and then to ſubjoin that circumſtance concerning Judas, which only reſpected the former. This will appear further, by laying together in one view the principal circumſtances recorded by the ſeveral Evangeliſts, with relation to the treachery of Judas, which Chriſt thought fit to diſcover to the reſt of his diſciples at the paſchal ſupper. After they were ſeated, Jeſus ſaith to them, One of you ſhall betray me, ver. 21. Upon this they ſay to him, one by one, Is it I? Mark xiv. 19. and Peter beckoning to John to aſk Jeſus of whom he ſpake, Jeſus anſwered him ſoftly, by ſaying, to whom I ſhall give this ſop, &c. ver. 26. It ſeems alſo as if Judas, upon receiving the ſop, aſked that queſtion with a low voice, Maſter, is it I? and Jeſus anſwered him in the ſame manner, thou haſt ſaid; Matt. xxvi. 24. Then, after the ſop Satan entered into Judas; upon which Jeſus, who knew this, ſaid, What thou doeſt, do quickly: ver. 27. of this chapter. This probably was ſpoken with an audible voice; ſince it immediately follows, Now, &c. ver. 28, 29. It is plain from hence, that what paſſed before, between Jeſus and Judas, was ſpoken ſoftly; for had the other diſciples known that he had been charged with treachery, they could never have imagined that Jeſus would afterwards have employed him in any affair, in which they were all concerned. As what paſſed therefore during the ſupper at the houſe of Lazarus, ſeems to have induced Judas, by the inſtigation of the devil, to engage in his treachery; ſo another occurrence in this paſchal ſupper, might by means of the ſame wicked agent excite him to put it into execution. See Ward's 29th Diſſert. Mr. Macknight has illuſtrated this particular in the following manner: "Becauſe Judas's going out happened ſoon after Jeſus had put the morſel into his mouth,—nothing intervening but the inſtitution of the ſacrament, and the diſpute of the diſciples with Judas, both which might have been over in leſs than a quarter of an hour;—John, who has omitted the inſtitution of the ſacrament, and the diſpute, connects the two thus, He then, having received the ſop, went out ſoon; εὐθέως,—ſo the word ſignifies, 3 John v. 14. Thus the ſeemingly inconſiſtent accounts given by the Evangeliſts of the manner in which Jeſus diſcovered Judas's treachery, are eaſily reconciled." Inſtead of immediately, the M. S. before me reads preſently.

Ver. 31, 32. Therefore, when he was gone out] Our Lord's ſufferings were now at hand, Judas being gone out for a band of ſoldiers to apprehend him. After he was departed, Jeſus took occaſion to meditate upon the glory which would accrue both to himſelf and to God from thoſe ſufferings, and ſpake of it to his diſciples, ver. 31. Moreover he told them, that having already glorified God by the paſt actions of his life, and being about to glorify him yet further, by his ſufferings and death, which would diſplay his perfections, particularly his infinite love to man, in the moſt ſtriking and amiable light, He was in his turn to receive glory from God; meaning, that in his human nature he was to be exalted next to God in dignity and power, and that his miſſion from God, was immediately to be ſupported by irrefragable atteſtations. Seeing God is glorified in him, (for ſo εἰ ὁ Θεὸς, ἐδοξάσθη, ſhould be rendered) God will alſo glorify him in himſelf, and will ſpeedily glorify him. See Beza, Caſaubon, Macknight.

33 Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye ſhall ſeek me: and as I ſaid unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come, ſo now I ſay unto you.

34 A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye alſo love one another.

35 By this ſhall all men know that ye are my diſciples, if ye have love one to another.

36 Simon Peter ſaid unto him, Lord, whither goeſt thou? Jeſus anſwered him, Whither I go, thou canſt not follow me now; but thou ſhalt follow me afterwards.

37 Peter ſaid unto him, Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? I will lay down my life for thy ſake.

38 Jeſus anſwered him, Wilt thou lay down thy life for my ſake? Verily, verily, I ſay unto thee, The cock ſhall not crow, till thou haſt denied me thrice.

Ver. 34. A new commandment I give] Our Lord calls this a new commandment, not becauſe mutual love had never been enjoined on mankind before, but becauſe it was a precept of peculiar excellence: for the word new, in the Hebrew language, denotes excellence and truth. See Pſ. xxxiii. 3. Mark i. 27. Rev. ii. 17. and the reaſon of the idiom ſeems to have been, that novelty often has the ſame effect upon the mind with excellence, rendering an object acceptable, and raiſing admiration. That the term new does not always relate to time, is evident from the uſe of it in Xenophon, who calls the laws of Lycurgus καινοτατοι νομοι, very new laws, ſeveral hundred years after they were made; becauſe though they had been commended by other nations, they had not been practiſed by them. Our Lord called this a new commandment alſo, becauſe they were to exerciſe it under a new relation, according to a new meaſure, and from new motives. They were to love one another in the relation of his diſciples, and with that meaſure and degree of love which he had ſhewn to them. See 1 John iii. 16. Withal, they were to love from the great motive of his love to them, and in order to prove themſelves his genuine diſciples by the warmth of their mutual affection. Some have thought that this expreſſion—a new commandment—ſignifies no more than merely a renewed commandment: but it certainly contains a ſtrong and lively intimation that the engagements to mutual love, peculiar to the Chriſtian diſpenſation, are ſo ſingular and ſo cogent, that all other men, when compared with its votaries, may ſeem uninſtructed in the ſchool of friendſhip; and Jeſus may appear, as it were, the firſt profeſſor of that divine ſcience. Dr. Clarke well obſerves, that our Lord ſeems to have laid this peculiar ſtreſs upon philanthropy, as if it was the principal part and great deſign of religion, and as if he had a particular view to that general corruption and deſtruction of true Chriſtianity, which the want of it would cauſe amongſt thoſe who ſhould call themſelves his church. Perhaps our Lord may here inſinuate a reflection, not only on the party ſpirit which then prevailed ſo much amongſt the Jews, but likewiſe on the emulations and contentions among the Apoſtles themſelves, which mutual love would eaſily have cured. In this ſenſe, it is unhappily ſtill a new commandment to us, who generally act as if we had not yet time to learn, or even to read it. See Raphel. Annot. ex Xenophon, and Clarke's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 297.

Ver. 35. By this ſhall all men know that ye are my diſciples] "By loving one another ſincerely and fervently, you ſhall prove yourſelves my diſciples, to the conviction of mankind, who cannot but be ſenſible that love is a diſtinguiſhing feature in my character. This will be the moſt acceptable, the moſt ornamental token of your relation to me; and I recommend it to you as the nobleſt badge of your profeſſion." It is well known, that the founders of new ſocieties always appoint ſome peculiar ornament, ſign, or mode of living, by which their followers may be known from others, our Lord ſeems to allude here to that cuſtom, "Let love be the diſtinguiſhing badge of your profeſſion." And ſo highly were the primitive Chriſtians celebrated for this virtue, that the writer of the Acts informs us, ch. iv. They were all of one heart, and one mind. And the ancient apologiſts for Chriſtanity inform us, that the perſecuting heathens themſelves could not help crying out in rapture, on obſerving the prevalence of this grace amongſt them, "See how theſe Chriſtians love one another!" See Tartullien apolog. cap. 39. Minut. Felix, p. 81, &c. and the eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians.

Ver. 36. Thou canſt not follow me now] We may gather from hence, that the declaration, ver. 33. Whither I go, ye cannot come, is one of thoſe general propoſitions, whereof there are many in Scripture, which were ſpoken with a limitation not expreſſed. Here we are directed to add the limitation thus: Whither I go, ye cannot come now; for they were all, equally with Peter, to follow Jeſus afterwards, by ſuffering a violent death. Our Lord, in the next words, Thou ſhalt follow me afterwards, ſeems obliquely to hint, that what he afterwards further ſignified, in his command to Peter after his reſurrection, when he ordered him to follow him, ch. xxi. 18, 19. namely, that Peter ſhould die on the croſs for his ſake, which ancient hiſtory aſſures us he did. See Grotius, and Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. iii. c. 1. For the remainder of the chapter, the reader is referred to the parallel places.

REFLEXIONS ON THE BETRAYING OF CHRIST.

Ver. 21—30. comp. with Matth. xxvi. 14—25.

Such an eye-ſore were Chriſt, who raiſed Lazarus, and Lazarus, when raiſed, to the envious prieſts, ſcribes, and elders of the Jews, that they conſult to murder both. While either of them lives, neither can the glory of that miracle die, nor the ſhame of its malicious cavillers. How happy had it been for this parlour-council of Caiaphas, had they but ſpent half thoſe thoughts upon their own ſalvation, which they miſemployed upon the deſtruction of the innocent! But mean are the motives, and the reſult muſt be baſe and deteſtable. Treachery muſt do that, which power would have attempted in vain.

Who ſo fit for their purpoſe among the domeſtics of Chriſt, as he, who bare the bag, and loved immoderately what he bare?—That heart which hath once enſlaved itſelf to yellow and white earth, may be made any thing. Affianced as he was openly to Chriſt, ſtill Judas is mammon's ſervant. How could he but hate that maſter whom he formally profeſſed to ſerve, who really ſtooped to ſerve privily that maſter whom Chriſt, on all occaſions, profeſſed to hate!

Wretched Judas, whether ſhall we more abhor thy treachery, or wonder at thy folly? Had thy wretched chapman been able to fetch down thoſe ſtarry ſpangles of heaven, and to have put them into thy venal graſp, what had this been, to weigh with a God? The time was when he that ſet thee at work could ſay, All the kingdoms of the earth and their glory are mine, I will give them to whom I will;—and all theſe will I give thee: Had he now made thee that offer, it might have carried ſome color of a temptation: but to tender ſo invaluable a commodity for thirty poor ſilverlings, was no leſs mean than wicked.

How unequal is this woful bargain! He that would value Mary's ointment, beſtowed on the feet of Chriſt, at 300 pieces, now ſells his maſter, on whom thoſe precious odors were ſpent, at thirty. Worldly hearts, as the old adage expreſſes it, are indeed penny-wiſe, and pound-fooliſh. They know how to ſet high prices upon this world's traſh; but for heavenly things, or the God who owns them, theſe they ſhamefully undervalue.

The bargain is driven, the price is paid; and Judas returns, and looks no leſs ſmoothly upon his maſter and his fellows, than if he had done them no diſſervice: He was not now firſt an hypocrite: The paſſover is at hand, no man more buſy to prepare for, more devoutly forward to receive it, than Judas!—O the fooliſhneſs, the obduracy of this ſon of perdition! How many proofs had he formerly ſeen of his maſter's omniſcience?—And yet ſo blind is ſinful man—the miſcreant dares to plot a ſecret villainy againſt his perſon, and then to face him, calmly, as if all were well. While he, however, thinks fit to conceal his treachery, our Saviour choſe not to conceal his preſcience of the fact. Verily, I ſay unto you, that one of you ſhall betray me.

And did not Judas, think ye, bluſh,—and grow pale,—and caſt down his guilty eyes, and turn away his troubled countenance, at ſo alarming an intimation? Alas! cuſtom of ſin ſo ſteels the brow, it is incapable of any relentings. Could the other diſciples have diſcerned any change in any face there, they had not been ſo ſorrowfully affected with the charge. How intentively their eyes are bent upon each other, as if they would pierce through thoſe windows down into the boſom: with what ſelf-confidence, with what mutual jealouſy, do they peruſe each others foreheads! At length, as rather willing to diſtruſt their own innocence, than their maſter's aſſertion, ſee how each trembles to ſay, Lord, is it I?—"It is poſſible there may lurk ſecret wickedneſs in ſome blind corner of the heart. It is poſſible that time and temptation, working upon our corruption, may draw us into ſuch ſin, as we could not beforehand conceive. Whither may we not fall, if left to our own ſtrength?"—It is both wiſe and holy to fear the worſt:—Lord, is it I?

Oh the mad infatuation of ſin! Judas can ſit by, and hear his maſter ſay, Woe be to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed: Good were it for that man, had he never been born: yet is his countenance unſhaken, unappalled. O Judas, didſt thou ever hear aught but truth fall from thoſe lips?—How then durſt thou perſiſt in the purpoſe of ſo damnable a villainy? Alas! reſolved ſinners run on ſo deſperately in their wicked courſes, and have ſo bent their eyes upon the profit or the pleaſure of their miſchievous projects, that they will not ſee hell and eternal miſery, though they continually lie open before them in the way.

As if that ſhameleſs man meant to out-brave all accuſations, and out-face his own heart, he dares to aſk with the reſt, Maſter, is it I? No diſciple ſhall more zealouſly decry that perfidy than he who foſters it in his own breaſt. His fellows think him honeſt, and all

CHAP. XIV.

Chriſt comforteth his diſciples with the hope of heaven: profeſſeth himſelf the way, the truth, and the life; and one with the Father: aſſureth their prayers in his name to be effectual: requeſteth love and obedience: promiſeth the Holy Ghoſt the Comforter: and leaveth his peace with them.

LET not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe alſo in me.

2 In my Father's houſe are many manſions: if it were not ſo, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

3 And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myſelf; that where I am, there ye may be alſo.

4 And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know.

5 Thomas ſaith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goeſt; and how can we know the way?

Ver. 1. Ch. xvi. 22.—V. 2. Ch. xiii. 33, 36.—V. 3. Ver. 18, 28. Acts i. 11. Ch. xii. 26. xvii. 24.

is well, while he can be well eſteemed. Reputation,—ſtrange as the paradox may appear,—is the only care of falſe hearts: Not truth of being,—not conſcience of merit:—So they may but ſeem fair to men, they care not how foul they are to God.

But he, whoſe piercing eye ſees things as they are, can peremptorily convict the impudence of this hollow queſtioniſt with a direct affirmation, Thou haſt ſaid. Fooliſh traitor, couldſt thou then think that thoſe eyes of thine would endure the beams of the ſun: Haſt thou yet enough? Thou ſuppoſedſt thy crime unknown; to men it was ſo. Had thy maſter been no more, it had been ſo to him. But this avowed knowledge ſhall argue him divine; nor canſt thou eſcape its obſervance: for there is not any creature which is not manifeſt in his ſight, but all things are naked, and expoſed to the eyes of him with whom we have to do.

As yet the charge was private; either not heard or not obſerved by the other diſciples: it ſhall be whiſpered to one, and at leaſt known to all. Peter's zeal would not let him dwell under the danger of ſo doubtful an imputation. He is anxious to know the man; his ſigns aſk what his voice dares not; the beloved diſciple well underſtands this ſilent language, and ventures to cloath Peter's thought in words. Lord, who is it that betrays thee? ver. 25.

That which was timorouſly demanded, is graciouſly anſwered, ver. 26. How loath was our Saviour to name him, whom he was not unwilling to point out? In the ſame language, wherein Peter aſked the queſtion of John, doth our Lord ſhape the anſwer; what a beckoning demanded is anſwered by a ſop. Surely a ſtander-by would have thought this man well with his maſter, and have conſtrued this act, as they did his tears for Lazarus, Behold, how he loveth him!—But the outward gifts of God, (alarming conſideration!) are not always proofs of his love; yea, ſometimes are beſtowed in diſpleaſure. So fooliſh are they, who, meaſuring God's affection by temporal benefits, are ready to applaud proſpering wickedneſs, and to grudge outward bleſſings to thoſe who are incapable of better. See Pſ. lxxiii.

After the ſop, Satan entered into Judas, ver. 27. Favours ill uſed make the heart more guilty, and capable of further evil; that wicked ſpirit commonly takes occaſion by any of God's gifts to aſſault us the more eagerly: after our ſacramental morſel, if we be not the better, we are ſurely the worſe. Thus Satan took advantage by the ſop, of a further poſſeſſion, who had twice before made a palpable entry into his falſe heart; firſt in his covetouſneſs, and next in his damnable plot of conſpiracy againſt Chriſt; as in every groſs ſin which we entertain, we give harbour to that evil one, ſo at every growth in wickedneſs, new hold is taken by him of the heart. At firſt Satan entered to make the houſe of Judas's heart his own: now he enters it as being his. The firſt purpoſe of ſin opens the gates to Satan; conſent admits him into the entry; full reſolution of ſin gives up the keys into his hands, and puts him into abſolute poſſeſſion. What an awakening conſideration to every ſerious heart! Let him that thinketh he ſtandeth, take heed leſt he fall.

O the admirable meekneſs of this lamb of God! We ſee not a frown; we hear not a check; but what thou doeſt, do quickly, is his ſingle teſtimony of knowledge, correction, and reproof againſt the falſe diſciple. Why do we ſtartle, and redden at our petty wrongs, and ſwell with anger, and break into furious revenges upon every occaſion, when the pattern of our patience, the captain of our ſalvation, lets not fall one harſh word, even upon ſo foul an apoſtate?

Judas hears him, and departs. That ſteely heart relents not: the confirmed treator knows his way to the high-prieſt's hall, and to the garden. The watch-word is given,—Hail maſter! and a kiſs: Yet more hypocriſy; yet more preſumption is practiſed, on the foundation of the Saviour's lenity. O the impudence of a hardened ſinner! That tongue which hath agreed to ſell his maſter, dares to ſay hail; and thoſe lips which have paſſed the vile compact of his death, dare offer to kiſs him, whom they have covenanted to kill. It was the divine charge of old, kiſs the ſon, leſt he be angry: O Saviour, thou hadſt reaſon to be angry with this kiſs; the ſcourges, the thorns, the nails, the ſpear of thy murderers were not ſo piercing, ſo painful, as this touch of Judas. All theſe were in this alone: the ſtabs of an enemy cannot be ſo grievous, as the ſkin-deep wounds of a diſciple. See ver. 18. and Zech. xiii. 6.

Chap. XIV. Ver. 1. Let not not your heart be troubled] Jeſus not only forewarned his diſciples of the great trial that was coming upon them, and commanded them to arm themſelves againſt it, (See Luke xxii. 35—38.) but he ſpoke a long diſcourſe, wherein he animated them to ſuſtain that trial manfully, and comforted them under the diſmal apprehenſions which it might raiſe in them. They were to ſee him crucified whom they had acknowledged as the Meſſiah; wherefore having been always accuſtomed to conſider immortality and temporal dominion, as the characteriſtics of their deliverer, and great worldly proſperity as the privilege of his ſubjects;—the death of their maſter, and the perſecutions befalling themſelves, could not fail to give a violent ſhock to their faith. But, that the force of theſe blows might be weakened, our Lord foretold his own ſufferings, and thereby made it evident, that he voluntarily ſubmitted to them. Withal, to reconcile their minds to the thoughts of his ſufferings, he diſtinctly explained the end of them in this diſcourſe. Let not your heart be troubled, &c. "Be not diſcompoſed with the thoughts of thoſe temptations which are to come upon you. As you believe in God, the almighty preſerver, and governor of the world, who is able to deliver you out of all your diſtreſſes; you ought to believe in me; who am not only ſent by God, but being appointed governor and judge of the world, can both protect you from evil, and reward you plentifully, for whatever loſſes you may ſuſtain on my account." Some would render the Greek of the laſt clauſe, Believe in God, and believe alſo in me: They urge that it appears moſt natural to render πιστευέτε, alike in both places; and it is certain that an exhortation to faith in God in Chriſt, would be very ſeaſonable, conſidering how weak and defective their faith was. See ver. 9. Eraſmus, and Calmet.

Ver. 2. In my father's houſe, &c.] Our Lord here has been thought by ſome to allude to the various apartments in the temple, and the vaſt numbers of people lodged there. Perhaps the alluſion may be more general to the palaces of kings, and the various apartments there; μοναὶ, ſignifies quiet and continued abodes, and therefore ſeems happily expreſſed by our Engliſh word manſion; the etymology and import of which is juſt the ſame. This text does not ſeem to give the leaſt ſupport to the opinion of thoſe who infer that there are different degrees of happineſs in a future ſtate. Our Saviour ſeems only to intend the encouragement, and comfort of his diſciples, by aſſuring them, that in the place whereto he was going before them, there was ample room to receive them, and every thing to accommodate them in the moſt delightful manner. When the glory of heaven is ſpoken of as prepared before the foundation of the world, (Matt. xxv. 34.) this only refers to the divine purpoſe; but as that was founded in Chriſt's mediatorial undertaking, (Epheſ. i. 4—6.) it might properly be ſaid, that when Chriſt went into heaven, as our high-prieſt, to preſent, as it were, his own blood before the father on our account, and as our fore-runner to take poſſeſſion of it, he did thereby, prepare a place for us. Which the apoſtle to the Hebrews, xi. 23, 24. expreſſes by his purifying, or conſecrating the heavenly places, in which we are to dwell, which would have been conſidered as polluted, by the entrance of ſuch ſinful creatures into them, as the tabernacle, when new-made was, by having paſſed through the hands of ſinners; on which account an atonement for the altar itſelf, which was conſidered as moſt holy, was the firſt act performed in it when it was opened; (Exod. xxix. 36, 37.) and an atonement for the whole tabernacle, as polluted by the acceſs of ſinners to it, was to be repeated annually. Lev. xvi. 16. It may not be improper to obſerve, that the word τοπος, is often tranſlated room, as in Luke ii. 7. xiv. 10, 22. 1 Cor. xiv. 16. And thus the ſignification here may be, that Chriſt went to heaven to make room for them, or to remove thoſe things out of the way which obſtructed their entrance. This may at leaſt be included; though the word ετοιμασαι, may perhaps expreſs ſtill more. It is the ſame term which is uſed of John the Baptiſt, the fore-runner of our Lord. See Matt. iii. 3, &c. Doddridge, Le Moyne, and Heinſius.

Ver. 3. I will come again and receive you] The idea of a fore-runner is preſerved, who, after he had prepared for the entertainment of a gueſt, uſed to return, in order to introduce him into the houſe where the preparations were made for him. This coming, ultimately refers to Chriſt's ſolemn appearance at the laſt day, to receive all his ſervants to glory; yet it is a beautiful circumſtance, that the death of every particular believer, conſidering the univerſal power and providence of Chriſt, may be regarded as Chriſt's coming to fetch him home. See the note on Luke xii. 37—40.

Ver. 5. Lord we know not whither thou goeſt] "We know not where thy father's houſe ſtands, and conſequently cannot know the way to it." It is probable that Thomas might think that Chriſt intended tended to remove to ſome ſplendid palace on earth, to ſet up his court there for a while, before he received his people to the celeſtial glory: for it is certain that his thoughts, as well as thoſe of the reſt of the diſciples, principally turned upon a temporal kingdom.

6 Jeſus ſaith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me.

Ver. 6. I am the way, the truth, and the life] Our Lord, moſt probably, had here in view the metaphors which he formerly uſed, I am the door of the ſheep, chap. x. 7. I am the bread of life. chap. vi. 35. And therefore, it might well have been expected, that having ſo lately delivered the ſame ſentiments, the diſciples ſhould have underſtood him now. Some have ſuppoſed the form of expreſſion before us to be an Hebraiſm, whoſe meaning is, I am the true and living way; as Dan. iii. 7. all the people, the nations, and languages, ſignifies, people of all nations and languages. But in whatever manner we reſolve the ſentence, its meaning is the ſame; namely, "faith in me, and obedience to my commandments, will lead you to the father's houſe, where I am going. They are the only true road to the manſions of felicity." See chap. i. 4, 14, 17. v. 33.

Ver. 7. If ye had known me, ye ſhould have known, &c.] "If you had an adequate idea of my character, from the miracles I have performed, and from the marks of goodneſs, juſtice, and wiſdom, which manifeſt themſelves in my life and doctrines, you could not have been ignorant of my Father, becauſe his attributes are the ſame; and he being in his nature inviſible, by ſeeing me, and the manifeſtation of the divine perfections in me, you have as true a ſight of him as poſſible."

Ver. 8. Lord ſhew us the father] Philip hearing our Lord's words, ſays to him with a pious ardour, becoming his character, "Lord, do but ſhew us the Father, and bring us to the ſight and enjoyment of him, and it is happineſs enough for us. We deſire no more, and reſign every other hope, in compariſon of this." This ſeems a very probable ſenſe of this paſſage. One cannot apprehend that Philip, or any other of the Apoſtles, thought the Father viſible, and therefore aſked for a viſion of the Father in a corporeal form. If Philip deſired any thing more than what is aſſerted in the paraphraſe above given, it could have been only to ſee, like Moſes, the inacceſſible light wherein God dwells, the acknowledged ſymbol of his preſence in heaven. Some have imagined that, Shew us the Father, means no more than, "Declare to us in a clear and explicit manner, who the Father is."

Ver. 10, 11. Believeſt thou not that I am in the Father, &c.] It is remarkable that Philo, ſpeaking of the Logos, has this expreſſion: That "He is the Father's houſe, in which he dwells;" which is not only very ſimilar to the paſſage before us, but to the Apoſtle's words, Col. ii. 9. In him dwells all the fullneſs of the Godhead bodily. Markland would read the latter part of the 10th verſe thus: I ſpeak not of myſelf, but the Father that dwelleth in me ſpeaketh: He doth the works: For the doctrine and the miracles, ſays this learned critick, are two different articles. The words rendered or elſe, εἰ δὲ μὴ, in ver. 11. would be more properly rendered but if not. Dr. Heylin, upon this verſe, obſerves, that the whole Trinity acts in each individual Chriſtian in ſuch meaſure as he is ſuſceptible of its operations. Thus Chriſt in the father, and the Father in him, are the internal ground of faith; the works are external; both are valued, but the former preferable. See Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. iii. p. 559.

Ver. 12. He that believeth on me, &c.] It is evident in fact, that though this promiſe be expreſſed in indefinite language, it muſt be limited in ſome ſuch manner as follows: "He that believes in me, that is, many of my diſciples in theſe early ages, and each of you in particular, ſhall receive ſuch an abundant communication of the Spirit, that the miraculous works which I perform, he ſhall perform alſo; yea, works, in ſome reſpect, greater than theſe ſhall he perform, becauſe I go to my Father, who has thought fit to reſerve the moſt ſtupendous gifts of the Spirit to honour my return into glory." How fully Jeſus performed this promiſe, is plain from the hiſtory of the Acts throughout, particularly ch. v. 17. where we find that the very ſhadow of Peter paſſing by, cured the ſick on whom it fell, and who were laid in the ſtreets for that purpoſe: as alſo, ch. xix. 12. which informs us, that handkerchiefs and aprons, which had touched the body of Paul, being applied to the ſick and poſſeſſed, baniſhed both the diſeaſes and the devils. Nor ſhould we, on this occaſion, forget the gift of languages beſtowed on the Apoſtles, and which they were enabled to communicate to others. Yet, if theſe miracles are not thought to ſhew greater power than Chriſt exhibited, we may refer the greatneſs whereof he ſpeaks to the effects which they were to produce on the minds of men. For, in that reſpect the miracles of the Apoſtles were vaſtly ſuperior to thoſe of Chriſt, converting more people in one day, than was done by all the miracles that Jeſus performed during the courſe of his miniſtry. They converted thouſands at once, made the Goſpel to fly like lightning through the world, and beat down every thing that ſtood in oppoſition to the faith of their Maſter. See Macknight, Grotius, and Calmet.

Ver. 13. And whatſoever ye ſhall aſk] Though here again the promiſe is conceived in general terms, nevertheleſs the ſubject treated of directs us to underſtand it particularly of the miracles to be wrought in confirmation of the Goſpel. See ch. xvi. 23. "Whatſoever you ſhall aſk in my name, under the influence of the Spirit, and ſubſervient to the great end of your life and miniſtry, I will certainly do it." The Jews commonly begged of God, in their prayers, that he would bleſs their nation for the ſake of Abraham, Iſaac, Jacob, or David; in alluſion to which, our Saviour teaches his diſciples a new form, and enjoins them to aſk in his name, or for his ſake. See Macknight, and Grotius, who is for connecting this and the 12th verſe together thus: Becauſe I go to my Father; and will do whatſoever ye ſhall aſk in my name, for glorifying the Father in the Son. The next verſe ſeems not to be genuine. It has been rejected by Chryſoſtom and Nonnus. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 15. If you love me, keep my commandments.] The term of loving God, in Scripture, but eſpecially in the New Teſtament, is with great propriety taken from that expreſſion of love, which conſiſts in doing ſuch things as are eſteemed grateful or beneficial to the object beloved; but as our endeavours cannot advance either the benefit or happineſs of God, and our doing things that are grateful to him conſiſts in performing what he commands; therefore our obedience to the will and commands of God, in the moſt perfect manner is ſtiled loving him; becauſe the beſt, if not the only way of demonſtrating our love to God is, to endeavour to pleaſe him; and we cannot pleaſe him, but by obeying him. Hence the love of God is uſed, in ſome places, as ſynonimous to the keeping his commandments, as will appear from comparing Exod. xx. 5. Deut. v. 9. Our bleſſed Lord therefore, perceiving that his diſciples hearts were melted with the prediction of his departure, nobly comforts them, by telling them, that their obedience would be a far more grateful ſign of their affection to him, than any ſorrow they could ſhew. See Hammond, Grotius, and Stanhope's Epiſtles and Goſpels.

Ver. 16, 17. He ſhall give you another Comforter] Another Advocate. Wat. The word παράκλητον ſignifies an advocate, or a monitor, as well as a comforter; and it is evident that the bleſſed Spirit contained each of theſe characters; yet, as the diſcourſe before us is of the conſolatory kind, the term Comforter ſeems to have been made uſe of with great propriety by our tranſlators. Toland ſays, (Nazarenus, p. 13.) "It is by no contemptible criticiſm that the Mahometans, inſtead of παρακλητον, read περικλυτον; that is, the illuſtrious, which anſwers to mohammed in the Arabic language, and ſo urge this as a prophecy of that impoſtor:" yet he would probably have thought this criticiſm, which has not the countenance of one ſingle MS. very contemptible in any but the enemies of chriſtianity. Our Lord promiſes that this Comforter ſhall abide with them, not for a little time, as he has done, but for ever; and he calls him The Spirit of Truth, to which the world is ever averſe; and, blinded with ſenſuality, will neither diſcern his operations, nor partake of his joys. "But ye know him, becauſe he is with you, in ſome meaſure, already, enabling you to work miracles, and becauſe he ſhall be given you much more abundantly hereafter;" alluding particularly to the day of pentecoſt; from which time forth the Spirit dwelt with the Apoſtles, and was in them. See Macknight, Heylin, and Doddridge.

Ver. 18. I will not leave you comfortleſs] 'Ορφανὺς, orphans. He had called them his dear children.—τεκνια,—ver. 33. of the laſt chapter. Elſner juſtly obſerves, that the caſe of thoſe who have loſt the preſence and patronage of ſome dear friend, though not in ſtrict propriety a father, is elegantly and tenderly expreſſed by the word ὀρφανοὺς. Comp. 1 Theſſ. ii. 17. in the Greek, and See Elſner's Obſervat. vol. i. p. 341. and Heylin. I will come to you, means, "by my ſpiritual preſence;" and will viſit you with the moſt valuable tokens of my conſtant care.

Ver. 19. Yet a little while] A little while indeed, for he was crucified the next day: And he more particularly declares, that he would not appear to the Jewiſh nation in general after his reſurrection, but only to his diſciples. He adds, "Becauſe I live, by riſing from the dead, ye ſhall live alſo,—by riſing from the dead." See Wall's critical notes, and Macknight.

Ver. 20. At that day ye ſhall know] The words rendered and I, have a peculiar elegance, which cannot be underſtood without adding the word ſo in the tranſlation; accordingly the verſe would run thus: At that day ye ſhall know, that as I am in the Father, and you in me, ſo alſo I am in you. The verſe conſiſts of two parts, as the effects of Chriſt's reſurrection. Firſt, they ſhall know that Chriſt is in his Father, that is, was really ſent by him, and varied not from the commiſſion which he had given him. Secondly, they ſhall know, that Chriſt continues in them, communicates his power to them, and hath not forſaken them, as by his death they might ſuſpect: they would be convinced to the contrary by his reſurrection, by his abiding and converſing with them for forty days after, by his going to heaven to prepare a place for them, and by his ſending his Spirit to them, to fit them to be his ſucceſſors; by his in-dwelling to ſupply the Lord's preſence, and to adminiſter every degree of comfort, light, and power, which would be requiſite to render their afflictions ſupportable, and their miniſtry ſucceſsful. After his reſurrection, the diſciples could no longer doubt that Chriſt came from God, or want any conviction of the intercourſe between Him and his Father, and when they ſaw the ſucceſs of their miniſtry, the Spirit itſelf bearing them witneſs by ſigns and wonders, and enabling them to undertake the arduous, the glorious taſk, by the gift of tongues, they could not queſtion their inſpiration, nor could they doubt whether Chriſt was preſent to them with his grace, and co-operating with them by his Spirit and power. Thus were they experimentally taught, to underſtand ſomewhat of that myſtical union which is between the Father and the Son, and likewiſe between Him and the church, or ſociety of Chriſtian believers. See Bp. Atterbury's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 194.

Ver. 22, 23. Judas ſaith unto him, (not Iſcariot)] It is obſervable, that Judas Iſcariot was ſo finiſhed a hypocrite, that we never find him ſaying one word of Chriſt's temporal kingdom, though probably the hope of preferment and gain in it, was the chief conſideration which engaged him to follow our Lord. The perſon here ſpoken of was Judas, the ſon of Alpheus, the brother of James the leſs, and a near relation of our Lord himſelf. See on Matth. x. 3. Being ſo nearly related to Jeſus, he might think himſelf peculiarly concerned to enquire into the meaning of an aſſertion which ſeemed inconſiſtent with the proſpect of a temporal kingdom, in which perhaps he might expect ſome eminent office; and as, according to the notions they had conceived of the Meſſiah, he was to appear to all the Jews, nay, to the whole world, and was to take unto himſelf univerſal empire; our Saviour's laſt words, ver. 21. ſurpriſed and perplexed them not a little. Our Lord, therefore, in reply to Judas, told him, that he ſpake chiefly of a ſpiritual manifeſtation, ſuch as the Father and He make of themſelves to true believers, even on earth, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, who dwells in them as his temples, 1 Cor. iii. 16. for through the influences of the Spirit of God believers are enlightened with the knowledge of the perfections of God, and with juſt views of the character and office of his Son. Moreover, by the ſame influences, they are ſanctified for an habitation of God, Epheſ. ii. 22. who makes his abode with them, that is to ſay, who fills them with all peace and joy in believing, and with the moſt elevating hopes; and in conſequence of their ſanctification, ſheds abroad in their hearts a ſenſe of his love, and by ſo doing, gives them prælibations of heaven while on earth. The latter clauſe of this verſe is remarkable; for had our Lord been a creature, though of the higheſt rank, it would have been blaſphemy in him to have joined himſelf in this manner with God. My Father will love him, and We will come unto him, and make our abode with him. See Wolfius, Macknight, and Doddridge.

Ver. 24. And the word, &c.] Through the word. MS.

Ver. 25, 26. Theſe things have I ſpoken] "I have ſpoken theſe things during my perſonal preſence chiefly, becauſe my time with you is ſhort; and tho' you may not juſt now underſtand many of the particulars mentioned by me, you ſhall have perfect knowledge of them afterwards; for my father will give you the Holy Spirit to ſupply my place; and he ſhall be a παρακλητος, a monitor or inſtructor, to you, (ſee ver. 16.) teaching you every article of the Chriſtian faith, and bringing to your remembrance all the things that I have ever ſaid to you in the courſe of my miniſtry."

Ver. 27. Peace I leave with you] "Peace be to you," was the common ſalutation and compliment mutually given by the Jews to each other at meeting and parting. But altho' this compliment implied a wiſh of every thing that could make one happy, it was often uſed without any meaning. At beſt, it was but a wiſh, however ſincere, and had no real efficacy in making him to whom it was given happy. But in the mouth of Jeſus, by whoſe wiſdom and power the affairs of the world are governed, a farewel wiſh was a matter of a very different kind: His peace, his parting bleſſing, would draw down all manner of felicity upon thoſe who were the objects of it. Accordingly, he encouraged his diſciples from that conſideration, under the proſpect of his departure; deſiring them not to be in the leaſt anxious about what was to befal them after he was gone. See the note on Matth. x. 13.

Ver. 28. For my Father is greater than I] That is, "than I am, conſidered in my mediatorial capacity." Theſe words afford a ſtrong argument for the proper divinity of our Lord; for had he been a mere man, or even a creature of the higheſt order, the compariſon would have been fooliſh and impertinent. See Macknight, and Waterland on the Trinity.

loved me, ye would rejoice, becauſe I ſaid I go unto the Father: for my Father is greater than I.

CHAP. XV.

The conſolation and mutual love between Chriſt and his members, under the parable of the vine. A comfort in the hatred and perſecution of the world. The office of the Holy Ghoſt, and of the apoſtles.

I AM the true vine, and my Father is the huſbandman.

Ver. 28. See ch. v. 18. Phil. ii. 6.—V. 29. Ch. xiii. 19.—V. 30. Ch. xii. 31.—V. 31. Ch. x. 18.

Ver. 29. I have told you before it come to paſs] "I have foretold my removal from hence, my return to the Father, and the deſcent of the Spirit, in order that when theſe things happen, your faith, inſtead of being ſhaken, may be confirmed." It is very judiciouſly obſerved by Dr. Jenkins, in his excellent defence of Chriſtianity, that "when miraculous events are alſo the accompliſhment of prophecies, the degree of evidence ariſing from them is the greateſt that can poſſibly be conceived."

Ver. 30, 31. Hereafter I will not talk much with me] "I ſhall not have much opportunity to talk with you after this; becauſe the devil is now exciting his emiſſaries to take away my life; in which he will ſucceed. However, be aſſured, that I ſhall undergo the puniſhment of death; not becauſe I deſerve it, for he hath nothing in me;—no guilt of mine to give him power over me, nor any inward corruption to take part with his temptation: But I undergo this death, to ſhew the world, how much I love the Father, ver. 31. for in this I act according to his expreſs commandment. Ariſe, therefore; let us go hence. Let us, in conformity to the divine will, go away to the place where I ſhall be betrayed, that I may enter on my buſineſs." Accordingly, he finiſhed the paſſover with ſinging an hymn, and went out to the mount of Olives. See Matth. xxvi. 30. As our Lord foreknew the danger to which he expoſed himſelf by this motion, nothing can give a greater illuſtration of the voluntary manner in which he encountered death, than the intrepidity and magnanimity of theſe few words, Ariſe: Let us go hence. The preſent paſſage appears rather more clear in Dr. Heylin's tranſlation: For the prince of the world is coming; not that he has any claim in me, [any power over me, Wat.] v. 31. But only that the world may know, &c.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XIV.

How noble a cordial has our Lord provided to relieve all the troubles of our hearts! the ſtrength of which ſhall continue to the remoteſt ages; even faith in his Father, and in him, ver. 1. May that divine and operative principle be confirmed by what we have been now reading!——

It is ſtriking to obſerve, with what an holy familiarity our Lord ſpeaks of the regions of glory. Not like one dazzled and overwhelmed with the brightneſs of the idea; but as accuſtomed and familiarized to it by his high birth. In my Father's houſe are many manſions, ver. 2. Delightful, and reviving thought!—and many inhabitants in them, who, we hope, through grace, will be our companions there, and every one of them increaſe and multiply the joy.

It was not for the Apoſtles alone, that Chriſt went to prepare a place: He is entered into heaven as our forerunner; and we, if we are believers indeed, may be ſaid, by virtue of our union with him, to ſit together in heavenly places in him. It is our duty and our happineſs continually to be tending thither in more affectionate deſires, and more ardent purſuits. We know the way, we hear the truth; may we alſo feel the life! By Chriſt, as the true living way, may we come to the Father: In Chriſt may we ſee Him, and have our eyes and hearts opened to thoſe beams of the divine glory, which are reflected from the face of his only-begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth!

Has he been thus diſcovered to us, as our Father and our God?—Let it ſuffice us. Let it diffuſe a ſacred and laſting pleaſure over our ſouls, though other deſirable objects may be veiled or removed; and engage us to maintain a continual fellowſhip with the Father, and with his Son Jeſus Chriſt. ver. 4—9.

We are invited to this by every declaration of his readineſs to hear and anſwer our prayers; and although thoſe miraculous powers are ceaſed, whereby the Apoſtles were enabled to equal, or even to exceed the works of their Maſter, yet, as we have ſo many important errands to the throne of grace, in which the glory of God, and the ſalvation of our ſouls is concerned, let us come with a holy boldneſs to it; in dependance on Jeſus, that great High Prieſt over the houſe of God, who is paſſed into the heavens, and amidſt all the grandeur of that exalted ſtate, regards his humble followers on earth, and ever appears under the character of their Advocate and Friend. ver. 12—14.

If we are not entirely ſtrangers to the divine life, we cannot ſurely read ſuch diſcourſes as theſe before us, ver. 15—21. without feeling ſome warm emotions of love to Chriſt: And if indeed we feel them, we ſhall ſeriouſly conſider how they are to be expreſſed. Our Lord directs us to do it in the moſt ſolid and moſt acceptable manner, by a conſtant care to keep his commandments; and certainly ſuch commandments as his cannot be grievous to a ſoul that truly loves him. The more we live in the practice of them, the more chearfully may we expect the abundant communication of his Spirit to animate and ſtrengthen us.

If we are Chriſtians indeed, we cannot in any circumſtance of life look on ourſelves as helpleſs and abandoned orphans, ver. 18. Human friends may forſake us, but Chriſt will come to us: He will manifeſt himſelf to the eye of faith, though to the eye of ſenſe he is inviſible: and his heavenly Father will love us, and watch over us for our good: Yea, he will come and dwell in the obedient ſoul, by the gracious tokens of his intimate and inſeparable preſence. Do we any of us experience this bleſſing? We have ſurely reaſon to ſay that by way of admiration, which the Apoſtles ſaid by way of eminence. "Lord, how, and whence is it, that thou wilt manifeſt thyſelf to us, and not to the world? What have we done to deſerve theſe gracious and diſtinguiſhing manifeſtations? Nay, how much have we done to forfeit them?—Even more than many from whom they are with-held. ver. 21—23.

With what unutterable joy ſhould we review this rich legacy of our dying Lord! Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you, ver. 27. Lord, evermore give us this peace; peace with God, peace with our own conſciences, peace with our fellow-creatures: For if thou wilt give quietneſs, who can cauſe trouble? How ſerenely then may we paſs through the moſt turbulent ſcenes of life, when all is quiet and harmonious within! Thou haſt made peace through the blood of thy croſs; may we preſerve the precious purchaſe, and ineſtimable gift, inviolate, till it iſſue in everlaſting peace! In this let our hearts be encouraged; in this let them rejoice; and not in our own happineſs alone, but alſo in that of our now glorified and exalted Redeemer. As the members of his body, we ought certainly to maintain a pleaſing ſympathy with our head, and to triumph in his honour and felicity as our own. If we love Chriſt, we ſhould rejoice, becauſe he is gone to the Father, ver. 28. The ſame conſideration may in its degree comfort us, when our pious friends are removed. If we love them with a rational and generous friendſhip, and are not too much influenced by ſelfiſh affections, under that ſpecious name, our joy for their exaltation will greatly temper the ſorrow which our own loſs muſt give us.

Our Lord uttered the words ver. 30. in the near view of a grievous aſſault from the prince of this world, who is the prince of darkneſs. But there was no corruption in him to take part with the enemy. Too much, alas! does he find in us to abett his temptations. Let us earneſtly pray, that the grace of Chriſt may be ſufficient for us, and that as his love to the Father engaged him to go through this painful conflict with the tempter, his love to us may make us partakers of his victory. In His name let us ſet up our banners, and the powers of hell ſhall flee before us.

Chap. XV. Ver. 1. I am the true vine] Our Lord having gone with his diſciples to the mount of Olives, (ſee the laſt note of the former chapter) ſpent the remaining hours of his miniſtry in preaching to his diſciples a long and excellent ſermon, recorded in this and the following chapter. He began with the parable of the vine, taken from the vines that were growing around them on the Mount of Olives. In this parable he taught them the excellency of his religion, and the nature of the relation they ſtood in to him by their profeſſion thereof. Morever, he explained to them the advantages which accrued to them from this relation. As the branches of the vine draw nouriſhment, and are made fruitful by their union to the ſtock, and by the care of the dreſſer, ſo the diſciples of Chriſt, by the belief of his religion, by the influences of the ſpirit, and by the care of Providence, are made fruitful in holineſs. Dr. Clarke and others rightly ſuppoſe, that in this paſſage our Lord alludes to Pſ. lxxx. 8. Iſai. v. 3—7. where the Jewiſh church is repreſented under the figure of a vine, and God's peculiar care thereof is ſet forth by the care which an huſbandman takes of his vineyard: Wherefore, by calling himſelf on this occaſion the true vine, Jeſus inſinuated, that whereas the Jewiſh church and people had hitherto been the peculiar care of God, they were to be ſo no longer: From this time forth, all ſuch as aſſociated together in the joint profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion, and who, perhaps, in alluſion to this parable, were called by the Apoſtle the body of Chriſt, were to be the true church of God, and the object of his care, of whatever nation or country they might be. See ch. i. 9. iv. 32. Grotius, Macknight, and Raphel. Annot. p. 141.

2 Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away: and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.

3 Now ye are clean through the word which I have ſpoken unto you.

4 Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itſelf, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me.

5 I am the vine, ye are the branches: He that abideth in me, and I in him, the ſame bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing.

6 If a man abide not in me, he is caſt forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and caſt them into the fire, and they are burned.

7 If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye ſhall aſk what ye will, and it ſhall be done unto you.

8 Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; ſo ſhall ye be my diſciples.

9 As the father hath loved me, ſo have I loved you: continue ye in my love.

10 If ye keep my commandments, ye ſhall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love.

11 Theſe things have I ſpoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full.

12 This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you.

Ver. 2. Every branch in me, &c.] "Though by the outward profeſſion of my religion you become members of the true church of God, you muſt never forget, that this of itſelf is not ſufficient to entitle you to the favour of God, the great Maſter of this diſpenſation; You muſt anſwer the end for which it is given, by bringing forth fruit; otherwiſe he will cut you off, depriving you of all the advantages which true diſciples reap from the ſincere profeſſion and practice of the Chriſtian religion." Our Lord told them further, that as the huſbandman prunes the bearing branches of his vines; ſo God among other methods, ſuffers the lovers of virtue to be ſpoiled of the conveniences of this life, for no other reaſon but that their virtue may grow the ſtronger, and become the more fruitful. Every branch that beareth fruit he pruneth it, (ſo the word ſhould be rendered) cuts off from it every thing ſuperfluous, that it may bring forth more fruit. "In the courſe of his providence, my Father ſends a variety of afflictions upon every one who ſincerely makes profeſſion of my religion, and who diligently endeavours to obey its precepts; ſpoiling him of the temporal enjoyments which engage his affections, and render him unfruitful." This paſſage ſuggeſts a very ſublime and important thought; namely, that one of the nobleſt rewards which God can beſtow on former acts of obedience, is to make the ſoul yet more holy, and fit for further and more eminent ſervice; though it ſhould be by ſuch painful afflictions as reſemble the pruning of a vine. Jeſus ſaid theſe things to reconcile his diſciples to the perſecutions which were coming on them. Perhaps alſo he had in his view the other methods which God makes uſe of for purifying his people; for in the following verſe, he repreſents his diſciples as cleanſed or pruned, through the word he had ſpoken unto them. We may juſt obſerve, that the unfruitfulneſs of the branches ſpoken of in this verſe, and their being cut off on that account, prove that by being in him, our Lord meant no more, than being by outward profeſſion members of his church, which is his body; whereas, if he had been ſpeaking of what divines call "the myſtical union of believers with Chriſt," ſuch branches could neither be unfruitful nor cut off. See Heylin, Doddridge, and Macknight.

Ver. 3. Now ye are clean, &c.] "The doctrine I have preached to you, by the bleſſing of God has cleanſed you from any evil affections; has inſpired you with holy deſires; and invigorated you with good reſolutions: ſo that, like the pruned branches of the vine, you are fitted to bring forth fruit."

Ver. 4, 5. Abide in me, and I in you] "Continue ſtedfaſt in the belief and profeſſion of my religion, and be diligent in the practice of its precepts, and I will abide in you; for this is the method to derive from me all needful ſupplies, particularly the influences of my Spirit, ch. xiv. 26. the comfort of my preſence, xiv. 23. the protection of my providence, xiv. 27. and the direction of my word, xv. 7." As the branch cannot bear fruit of itſelf, &c. no more can ye, &c. "Your continuing in the belief, profeſſion, and practice of my religion, is as neceſſary to your performing good works, as the continuing of the branches in the vine is to their fruitfulneſs. To make you ſenſible of this was what I propoſed, when I told you that I am the true vine, and you the branches, ver. 5. I muſt therefore repeat it again, that ſincerity in the belief, ſtedfaſtneſs in the profeſſion, and diligence in the practice of my religion, followed as they always are with my bleſſing and aſſiſtance, are the only means of making a man remarkably fruitful in holineſs. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the ſame bringeth forth much fruit: for without me,—χωρὶς ἐμȣ,—ſeparate from me,—(in alluſion to the vine and its branches)—you can do nothing. If you apoſtatize from me, and are deprived of my influences, you can do nothing for your own ſanctification and ſalvation." See Macknight, and Clarke.

Ver. 6. If a man abide not in me] "To ſhew you further the neceſſity of abiding ſtedfaſtly in the belief and profeſſion of my religion, I would propoſe to your conſideration the dreadful effects and puniſhment of apoſtacy. By apoſtacy you ſeparate yourſelves from me, and deprive yourſelves of all the advantages which accompany the belief and practice of my religion; particularly the influences of my Spirit, the direction of my Word, the protection of my Providence, the pardon of your ſins, and the enjoyment of heaven. Nor is this all: You ſhall be puniſhed as apoſtates; for you ſhall be caſt out of the preſence of God, and gathered into hell, where you ſhall be burned as withered branches, as perſons fit only for the flames." The loppings of the vines, in thoſe countries where they are cultivated, are carefully gathered, and make a conſiderable part of their fuel. Grotius thinks, that in this verſe Jeſus points out to the Apoſtles in an obſcure manner the crime and puniſhment of Judas, one of their own number, as an example and warning to them. See his note, and Ezek. xv. 2, 4.

Ver. 7. If ye abide in me, &c.] Our Lord having thus exhorted the twelve, as diſciples, or private Chriſtians, proceeds to give them directions as Apoſtles, or preachers commiſſioned by him to teach his religion to the reſt of mankind. The clauſe, my words abide in you, together with the promiſe, aſk what ye will, and it ſhall be done unto you, ſhew that Jeſus is here ſpeaking to the twelve in their peculiar character of Apoſtles. "If ye abide in me, in the ſincere profeſſion and practice of my religion, and my words abide in you; if you faithfully teach mankind my doctrines and precepts, notwithſtanding the difficulties you may meet with in this work, you ſhall aſk what you will, &c. you may aſk any miracle you pleaſe, in confirmation of your authority, and it ſhall be granted unto you." See ver. 16. and ch. xiv. 30. But though this be the primary meaning of the paſſage, it may certainly, in a limited ſenſe, be underſtood alſo of the pious prayers of all true Chriſtians. See Clarke.

Ver. 8. Herein is my Father glorified] "As the end for which my Father has given the diſpenſation of the Goſpel to men, is to make them faithful in holineſs, You my Apoſtles, by preaching the true knowledge thereof through the world, and by reforming yourſelves and others, will do honour to God's wiſdom and goodneſs, in beſtowing this diſpenſation upon you. Moreover, by your diligence in preaching and practiſing my Goſpel, you will ſhew yourſelves to be real diſciples to me, who am the author of the Goſpel, and who have choſen you to be my aſſiſtants in ſpreading the knowledge of it through the world."

Ver. 9. Continue ye in my love] Or, "Keep your place in my affection: Continue to deſerve my love." So again in the next verſe, As long as ye keep my commandments, ye ſhall continue in my love; i. e. "I ſhall continue to love you; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and thereby continue the object of his love." Heylin.

Ver. 11. Theſe things have I ſpoken] "I have ſpoken theſe things, hoping they will influence you to keep my commandments, whereby you will continue the objects of my love; and in the conſciouſneſs thereof will be filled with the ſame kind of joy which I feel from obeying my Father's commandments, and from the conſciouſneſs of his love. I have ſpoken theſe things likewiſe, that your eternal joy may be full in heaven, where you ſhall ſhine as ſtars, becauſe you have turned many to righteouſneſs." Dr. Waterland and many others tranſlate the paſſage thus: Theſe things have I ſpoken unto you, that my joy in you may remain, &c. "I have ſpoken theſe things, hoping that by your diligence in obeying them, I ſhall always have cauſe to rejoice, on account of your behaving as my Apoſtles and diſciples ought to behave; and you cauſe to rejoice in my friendſhip, in the honour I have conferred on you, and in the eternal poſſeſſion of heaven." See Wall's Critical Notes, and Grotius.

Ver. 12. This is my commandment] "As I told you before, ch. xiii.

13 Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

14 Ye are my friends, if ye do whatſoever I command you.

15 Henceforth I call you not ſervants; for the ſervant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you.

16 Ye have not choſen me, but I have choſen you, and ordained you, that ye ſhould go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit ſhould remain: that whatſoever ye ſhall aſk of the Father in my name, he may give it you.

17 Theſe things I command you, that ye love one another.

18 If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you.

19 If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but becauſe ye are not of the world, but I have choſen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.

20 Remember the word that I ſaid unto you, The ſervant is not greater than his lord. If they have perſecuted me, they will alſo perſecute you; if they have kept my ſaying, they will keep yours alſo.

21 But all theſe things will they do unto you for my name's ſake, becauſe they know not him that ſent me.

34.—the chief of all the commandments which I enjoin you, whether as Apoſtles or private Chriſtians, is, that ye love one another. I do not mean after the hypocritical manner of the world,—who often love in word, and in tongue, while nothing is more remote from their heart;—but in the ſincere, tender, conſtant manner of my love to you." Our Lord was thus earneſt in preſſing them to mutual love, not only becauſe the great deſign of his Goſpel is to promote mutual love, but becauſe this virtue, exerciſed by the Apoſtles among themſelves, and towards all mankind, was one great means of making their preaching ſucceſsful; juſt as the immenſe love of Chriſt to men will always have a great influence in drawing them to him. "They who are ſenſible of the great importance of this precept, ſays Dr. Heylin, will not think the repetition of it here tautology."

Ver. 13, 14. Greater love hath no man than this] "My love to you is ſtronger than death; for I will lay down my life for you; a greater degree of love than this never exiſted in the world; this is the love I bear towards you, and which I recommend as the pattern of your love to one another. Ye are my friends, ver. 14. thoſe for whom I will lay down my life, if ye do what I have commanded you." Jeſus had commanded them, ver. 12. to love one another, as he loved them; in ver. 13. he informs them, that he loved them ſo, as to lay down his life for them: Wherefore, in this 14th verſe he tells them, he would reckon them his friends, if they laid down their lives for one another; that being the thing he commanded them, by enjoining them to love one another, after the pattern of his love to them. The plain propoſition of this precept might have terrified the Apoſtles; but to inſinuate it in the beautiful manner our Lord has done, was altogether neceſſary for the direction of them, who, by preaching the Goſpel, were to put their lives in jeopardy every hour; and who, at laſt, were to loſe their lives in that cauſe, for the benefit of the world. See Macnight. A commentator on the 14th verſe obſerves, "Mark the condition upon which you are my friends:—if you do what I command you. This is a thunder-bolt for antinomianiſm: Who then dares aſſert, that God's love does not at all depend on man's works?"

Ver. 15. Henceforth I call you not ſervants] "Though the diſtance that is between you and me, and your obligations to obey me, might have warranted me to treat you as ſervants, and particularly to conceal from you my counſels and deſigns, I have not acted in this manner towards you; but I have treated you as friends uſe to be treated. I have admitted you into all the familiarities of friendſhip; for I have communicated to you, as far as was convenient, and as much as in your preſent circumſtances you could bear, the moſt important of thoſe gracious counſels, which my Father, as the expreſſion of his friendſhip, imparted unto me: Nay, I have commiſſioned you to reveal them to the world, and have made you not only my friends, but my aſſiſtants in the great work of ſaving the world. From this conſideration therefore, as well as out of gratitude to me, you ought to lay down your lives in the cauſe." See the next note. Mr. Locke, in his "Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity," p. 105. refers this to the caution with which our Lord had ſpoken of his being the Meſſiah, ſome inſtances of which have been already pointed out. See on ch. iv. 26.

Ver. 16. Ye have not choſen me] "You have not, as principals in this affair, adopted me your aſſociate; but I, the great author of the Goſpel, have adopted you my aſſociates, to ſhare with me in the honour and happineſs of giving a new and ſaving religion to the world. For I have ordained you my Apoſtles, that you ſhould go out into the world, fraught with the doctrines of ſalvation, by the preaching of which you ſhall produce a general reformation, both in the opinions and manners of the heathens, greatly to the glory of God, inaſmuch as the Chriſtian religion, thus planted by you, ſhall remain to all ages. Further, I have cloathed you with the dignity of my Apoſtles, that whatſoever miracle you ſhall aſk of God, for the confirmation of your doctrine, or for the ſucceſs of it, The conſideration of your character, and the end for which you aſk it, may induce him to grant it; eſpecially if, in your prayers, you plead the relation you ſtand in to me, as Apoſtles." See on ver. 7. What our Lord ſays, that He ordained them that they ſhould go, and bring forth fruit, was a ſecurity to them, that they ſhould be preſerved from immediate danger, and that their life ſhould be guarded by Providence till ſome conſiderable ſervices had been accompliſhed by their means. When he adds, that your fruit ſhould remain, he may allude to the cuſtom of keeping rich and generous wines a great many years; ſo that in ſome caſes, (which was eſpecially applicable to the ſweet eaſtern wines,) they might prove a cordial to thoſe, who were unborn when the grapes were produced. In this view there is a beautiful propriety in the repreſentaion, which we hope will be particularly felt, when theſe reviving chapters are read. See Doddridge, Elſner, and Calmet. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt clauſe, So that whatever, &c. I will give it you. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 17, 18. Theſe things I command you] Ἐντέλλομαι ὑμῖν, I inculcate upon you. "I have explained to you the high nature and vaſt importance of your office, as my Apoſtles; and I have put you in mind of my loving you, ſo as to die for you, that I may inſpire you with ardent love to one another; and you will need the help of this principle much in the execution of your office. It will animate you to be diligent; it will inſpire you with fortitude; it will enable you to lay down your life in the cauſe; for that you will meet with oppoſition and perſecution while you preach the Goſpel, is certain: But this cannot ſurpriſe you, when you conſider how I your Maſter have been hated and perſecuted by the Jews." Dr. Lardner would render the original of the laſt clauſe, ver. 18. it hated me your chief, —ἐμὲ πρῶτον ὑμῶν, which certainly makes the expreſſion more lively, and exactly parallel to Matth. x. 24, 25. Thus ὧν πρωτος ειμι εγω, is well tranſlated, of whom I am chief, 1 Tim. i. 15. See Lardner's Credibil. part i. vol. 2. p. 639. and Wolf.

Ver. 19. If you were of the world, &c.] "If your diſpoſitions and actions were like thoſe of the bulk of mankind; if you flattered men in their vices, and framed your doctrines into a conſiſtency with their paſſions and intereſts, no doubt you would meet with general approbation, and be much careſſed: But becauſe your diſpoſitions and actions are very different from thoſe of the world, and becauſe I have ſeparated you from ſecular affairs, and commiſſioned you to oppoſe all falſe religions, to reprove mens vices, and to preſs the neceſſity of a general reformation, therefore the bulk of mankind every where will hate and perſecute you." This verſe ſeems a ſtrong intimation that even in nations which profeſs Chriſtianity, if true religion fall, as it poſſibly may, to a very low ebb, they who exert themſelves remarkably for the revival of it, muſt, on the very principle here laid down, expect hatred and oppoſition; and that the paſſages in Scripture relating to perſecution are not ſo peculiar to the firſt ages, and to Chriſtians living in idolatrous countries, as ſome have ſuppoſed. It would be happy if the narrow-minded malignity to be found in ſome profeſſing Chriſtians againſt their brethren, did not too plainly illuſtrate this remark. Men will probably experience the truth of it, in proportion to the degeneracy of thoſe around them, and to the vigor and reſolution with which they bear their teſtimony againſt prevailing errors and vices; yet it is certain that the imprudence and bigotry of ſome very good men, have ſometimes made matters worſe than they would otherwiſe have been, and perhaps have irritated the vices of their enemies, ſo as in part to have been acceſſary to their own damage, and the much greater miſchief of thoſe who have injured them. See Doddridge and Eraſmus.

Ver. 20. If they have kept my ſaying] Dr. Waterland, after Gataker, Knatchbull, &c. reads this, If they have watched my talk, they will alſo watch yours; but the common tranſlation ſeems far preferable.

Ver. 21. But all theſe things will they do, &c.] "None of the evils which you ſhall ſuffer on my account, or the Goſpel's, will flow from any deficiency in the evidences of my miſſion, or from any fault that can juſtly be found with the Goſpel. They will all flow from your perſecutors,

22 If I had not come, and ſpoken unto them they had not had ſin: but now they have no cloke for their ſin.

23 He that hateth me, hateth my Father alſo.

24 If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had ſin: but now they have both ſeen, and hated both me and my Father.

25 But this cometh to paſs, that the word might be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cauſe.

26 But when the Comforter is come, whom I will ſend unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he ſhall teſtify of me, 27 And ye alſo ſhall bear witneſs, becauſe ye have been with me from the beginning.

perſecutors, being ignorant of the nature and perfections of the true God, who has ſent me into the world, and of the doctrines of religion publiſhed to them under former diſpenſations."

Ver. 22. If I had not come and ſpoken, &c.] "The ignorance of the Jews in particular will not however excuſe them, (ſee the laſt note,) ſince they have had more than ſufficient means of information. If I had not appeared in perſon among them, agreeably to their own prophecies, and proved my miſſion by arguments which puts it beyond all reaſonable doubt, they would not have been ſo much to blame for rejecting the Goſpel: They had not had ſin; that is, their ſin would have been comparatively much leſs than it now is: (ſee on ch. 41.) But now that all the things foretold by Moſes and the prophets are fulfilled in me; now that my Goſpel is every way worthy of God, and that my miſſion from God is ſufficiently proved by my miracles, they have no plea whatever [πρόφασιν] to palliate or excuſe their unbelief."

Ver. 23. He that hateth me, &c.] How much is it to be wiſhed, that thoſe who make light of Chriſt, while they pretend a great veneration for the Father, would ſeriouſly attend to this weighty admonition, leſt haply they be found even to fight againſt God! Acts v. 39.

Ver. 24. If I had not done among them] "If I had not done among them ſuch extraordinary works as no other man ever did,—not even their prophets, or Moſes himſelf,—they had not had any degree of ſin, comparable to that which they now lie under: But now, as they have rejected my ſuperior miracles, which they have ſeen with their own eyes, at the ſame time that they acknowledge the evidence of thoſe which Moſes wrought, of which they have heard only by diſtant report, They manifeſt ſuch an obdurate perverſeneſs of temper, that I may truly ſay, they have both ſeen and hated both me and my Father; and God himſelf will juſtly reſent and puniſh it as an indignity, which ſhews their enmity to him." The words of the blind man, ch. ix. 32. are a fine comment on the firſt part of this verſe: Since the world began, was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind.

Ver. 25. That the word might be fulfilled] "Be not ſurpriſed, that I, who am the Meſſiah, have been rejected of the Jews; It hath happened according to the prediction of their own prophets, and particularly that of David, Pſ. xxxv. 19." See alſo Iſai. liii. 3—9. Dan. ix. 26. and Zech. xii. 10.

Ver. 26. But when the Comforter is come] "For your encouragement, however, I aſſure you, that they will not always continue thus obſtinately bent againſt me and my religion. When he who is to comfort you under all your troubles by the aid he will afford you, and who on that account is juſtly ſtiled the Comforter; when this divine perſon is come, whom I will ſend unto you from the Father, to remain always with you, He ſhall bear witneſs to me and to my religion ſo effectually, that many of the Jews ſhall be converted." Our Lord ſays of this Spirit of truth, that he proceedeth,—εκπορευεται,—from the Father. Now, though all who underſtand the original language know that the word here uſed ſignifies no more than to go out, interpreters are greatly divided about the meaning of it in this ſentence. Some think it denotes what in later times has been called "the eternal proceſſion of the Holy Spirit," whereby the manner of his ſubſiſtence is defined, as that of the Son is by the word "generation." In particular, the ancient Greek church, from this text, maintained, that the Holy Spirit derives his ſubſiſtence from the Father only; whereas the Latins have ever affirmed, that he proceeds equally from the Father and the Son. Beza is of opinion that the eternal emanation of the Holy Ghoſt is by no means handled here, but only the effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt on the Apoſtles; ſo that he who formerly remained with God, came as it were out from him in his gifts ſhed down on the Apoſtles. Whatever be in this, it is certain that the Greek word ſignifies only to go out, and it is never uſed any where elſe to ſignify an eternal emanation of the Holy Spirit. To conclude, concerning this emanation it may be proper to obſerve, that they who aſſert it do not mean thereby any thing corporeal, but an emanation ſuitable to the ſpirituality of the divine nature; the manner of which, as it is not revealed to us, can neither be diſcovered nor explained by reaſon. See Macknight, Bp. Pearſon on the Creed, and Clagett on the Holy Spirit.

Ver. 27. And ye alſo ſhall bear witneſs] "In proceſs of time mens eyes ſhall be opened, to diſcern the authority of your teſtimony. They ſhall give credit to your reports concerning me, becauſe you have been my companions from the very firſt, conſequently eye and ear-witneſſes of all that I have done and ſaid; ſo that, after a while, you ſhall bear witneſs concerning me, and preach my religion far more ſucceſsfully, than it will be in your power to do at the beginning." See on 1 John i. 1.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XV.

From this diſcourſe every ſincere reader may learn to regard Chriſt at all times as the ſpiritual Head, from whom life and vigor are to be derived to all his people. By the exerciſe of an unfeigned faith it behoves all ſuch to abide in him, as the true vine, always ſenſible that without him we can do nothing; that all things are poſſible to him who believeth; but that, if we are in him by an external profeſſion only, we are not only in danger of being cut off, and taken away, but ſhall, in the end be caſt into the fire. ver. 1, 4—6.

May we rather be throughly purged and pruned, though it were with the moſt painful diſpenſations of Providence, if by this means our fruitfulneſs may be promoted, to the glory of God, and the benefit of the world! May his word operate daily upon us, to cleanſe us from our remaining pollutions!—And if we thus deſire to be clean, let us take heed to our way, according to the tenor of that word. ver. 2, 3, 8.

We ſee our encouragement to pray; it is Chriſt who offers it; and taking it at his hand, we need never be diſmayed, nor yield to unbelieving ſuſpicions. As the Father hath loved Chriſt, ſo doth he alſo love his people. Be it our care then to preſerve and cultivate this ſacred affection; and, whatever it may coſt us, to endeavour for a continuance in his love, and to avoid whatever would forfeit the invaluable bleſſing; making it, above all things our care to keep his commandments. ver. 7—9.

Chriſt always obſerving the will of his heavenly Father, cannot but always and invariably continue the object of his love and delight. May our conduct be the tranſcript of his glorious pattern; ſuch, as that he may ſee reaſon to rejoice in us, and then we alſo ſhall have the ſureſt foundation for a ſublime and ſolid joy! ver. 10, 11.

The Son of God condeſcends to ſpeak under the character of a friend; O with what humble gratitude ſhould ſinful man attend to his gracious words! Behold, he lays aſide the majeſty of a ſovereign, to aſſume this more tender and endearing relation: Surely then our overflowing hearts muſt enquire, "Bleſſed Jeſus, what ſhall we do, to expreſs the friendſhip incumbent on our ſide?"—Let us but obſerve what he has here declared, and truſt his fidelity for its acceptance; Ye are my friends indeed, if ye do whatſoever I command you. Lord, we will gladly run the way of theſe thy commandmeuts, when on this nobleſt principle thou ſhalt have enlarged our hearts. ver. 14, 15.

Jeſus, the friend of ſinners, hath loved us with an affection ſo unexampled, as hath approved itſelf ſtronger than death; and, in return, he requires us to love one another, after the pattern of his bleſſed example. How gracious a command! how divine a ſtipulation! how merciful, not to our fellow-creatures only, but to ourſelves alſo; who muſt infallibly feel the benefit of ſuch a practice, both in the delight inſeparable from the interchange of benevolent affections, and the circulation of thoſe kind and friendly offices, which, degenerate as human nature may be, few are ſo abandoned as not to endeavour to repay. ver. 12, 13.

Who would not imagine that the whole admiring world muſt feel and obey the charm, thus mercifully applied by the Son of God? Yet, inſtead of this, behold, they even hate Chriſt, and perſecute his ſervants for his ſake, though without a cauſe, and againſt the ſtrongeſt engagements to mutual charity and tenderneſs. Miſerable creatures! who by a neceſſary conſequence, whatever they may fondly imagine, hate by ſo doing the Father alſo, and ſtand continually expoſed to all the terrors of an almighty enemy. ver. 18, 23, 24.

Where is the wonder if the world hate us, or who after this ſhall regard its harſheſt injuries? If we are of that choſen number, who are not of the world, let us remember that neither is the ſervant greater than his Lord. But ſurely the oppoſition which the Goſpel brings with it is nothing, when compared with thoſe bleſſings which it entails by an everlaſting covenant upon all who faithfully embrace it. Were the ſufferings and difficulties attending it a thouſand times greater than they are, we ought at any rate to eſteem the pearl of price, as the moſt happy purchaſe of the ſoul; and daily to be returning our moſt thankful acknowledgements, that Chriſt was pleaſed to ſend forth his apoſtles, qualified with ſuch a knowledge of himſelf, aſſiſted by ſuch power from his Holy Spirit, and appointed to go, and to bring forth ſuch fruit, as ſhould remain to the remoteſt ages. ver. 19, 20, 26.

Through his guardian care it ſtill remains, and we truſt ſhall for ever remain abundantly in the world! Oh may it flouriſh more and more amongſt us! May its efficacy on our hearts and lives be more univerſally apparent! And may divine grace convince thoſe who now reject

CHAP. XVI.

Chriſt comforteth his diſciples againſt tribulation by the promiſe of the Holy Ghoſt, and by his reſurrection and aſcenſion; aſſureth them that their prayers made in his name will be acceptable to his Father. Peace in Chriſt, and in the world Affliction.

THESE things have I ſpoken unto you, that ye ſhould not be offended.

2 They ſhall put you out of the ſynagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whoſoever killeth you will think that he doeth God ſervice.

3 And theſe things will they do unto you, becauſe they have not known the Father, nor me.

4 But theſe things have I told you, that when the time ſhall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And theſe things I ſaid not unto you at the beginning, becauſe I was with you.

5 But now I go my way to him that ſent me; and none of you aſketh me, Whither goeſt thou?

6 But becauſe I have ſaid theſe things unto you, ſorrow hath filled your heart.

7 Nevertheleſs, I tell you the truth; It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will ſend him unto you.

8 And when he is come, he will reprove the world of ſin, and of righteouſneſs, and of judgement:

9 Of ſin, becauſe they believe not on me;

10 Of righteouſneſs, becauſe I go to my Father, and ye ſee me no more;

reject and oppoſe the kingdom of Chriſt within them, that amidſt of ſuch various evidences of his having come, and done, and ſpoken unto them, as none other man ever did,—they have no cloak for their ſin: For alas! with whatever fond excuſes ſuch may venture to amuſe themſelves and others, it will but too quickly appear, as the prophet emphatically expreſſes it, that the bed is too ſhort to ſtretch themſelves upon, and the covering too narrow to wrap themſelves in it. See ver. 22. and Iſai. xxviii. 20.

Chap. XVI. Ver. 1. Theſe things have I ſpoken, &c.] “The things which I have now told you, concerning the hatred of the world, the reaſon of that hatred, the diſhonour done by it to God, the puniſhment wherewith it ſhall be followed, and the ſupernatural aſſiſtance which you ſhall receive,—I have ſpoken to keep you from taking offence at the further diſcoveries I am going to make of the evils to which you will be expoſed, and to prevent your being overcome by thoſe evils when they befal you.” See the next note.

Ver. 2. They ſhall put you out of the ſynagogues] That is, “They ſhall excommunicate you.” See the note on ch. ix. 22. and 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Inſtead of, He doeth God ſervice, Dr. Waterland renders the original, offereth a ſacrifice to God. The word λατρέια ſignifies all the different parts of divine worſhip, and ſo muſt be determined to particulars by the circumſtances. Here it ſignifies ſacrifice, as Dr. Waterland has rendered it, becauſe it is joined with προσφέρειν, a word which conſtantly denotes the offering up of ſacrifice. See Rom. xii. 1. This gives a beautiful turn to our Lord's ſentiment. “The time ſhall come, when the killing you ſhall be thought a part of the worſhip of God, and equally meritorious and acceptable with the offering of ſacrifices.” This paſſage intimates, as Archbp. Leighton obſerves on the text, that the ſervants of Chriſt ſhould be conſidered not only as ſheep for the ſlaughter, but as ſheep for the altar too. See Acts viii. 1. ix. 1. xxiii. 14, &c. and Leighton's Sermon xvii. p. 302.

Ver. 3. And theſe things will they do, &c.] “The Jews will excommunicate you, and kill you, and in ſo doing will think they ſerve God, becauſe they are ignorant of his will concerning the abolition of the Jewiſh œconomy, and the eſtabliſhment of the new diſpenſation: Alſo, becauſe they do not know me to be the Meſſiah, and miſtake the nature of my religion:” For, ſeeing Jeſus is here ſpeaking of the Jews, as is plain from ver. 2. he cannot be ſuppoſed to ſay that they did not know God in general, but only that they did not know his will concerning the Goſpel. See Macknight.

Ver. 4. Theſe things I ſaid not, &c.] From Matth. x. 17—28. it appears that Jeſus foretold, with ſufficient plainneſs, the perſecutions which his apoſtles and diſciples were to meet with after his death. Wherefore the original, here rendered Theſe things I ſaid not unto you at the beginning, muſt ſignify, “I did not inculcate theſe things upon you from the beginning;—I did not inſiſt upon them, becauſe the leſſon would come time enough before my departure.” Or, by theſe things we may underſtand the Jews' ignorance of God's deſigns, and their ignorance of Jeſus as the Meſſiah; particulars, which he had juſt now mentioned as the cauſes why the Jews would perſecute his apoſtles, and which, no doubt, were more afflicting to the latter, than the perſecutions themſelves; becauſe theſe perſecutions they ſuppoſed would end in the enjoyment of the kingdom; whereas the rejection of their Maſter cut off their hopes all at once.

Ver. 5. But now I go my way] “But now that my miniſtry is drawing towards a concluſion, and I am going to him that ſent me, I could no longer defer ſpeaking of theſe things to you. In the mean time I cannot but take notice, that though I mentioned to you my departure once before, (ch. xiii. 33.) none of you has enquired of me the reaſons of my departure, nor the effects of it.” That this is the true meaning of the paſſage may be gathered from ch. xiii. 36. where we find St. Peter expreſly aſking our Lord whither he was going. But it ſeems neither Peter nor the reſt had thought more of the matter; for which Jeſus here juſtly blames them, as his departure was an event of ſo great importance to his apoſtles.

Ver, 7. Nevertheleſs, I tell you the truth] “Though you have not aſked the reaſons of my going away, I will declare them to you. It is neceſſary, even on your account, that I depart; becauſe, if I do not aſcend into heaven, and take poſſeſſion of my mediatorial kingdom, the Comforter, by whoſe aſſiſtance, as I told you before, ch. xv. 26. you are to convert the world, will not be given you: Whereas, if I depart, and take poſſeſſion of my kingdom, I will ſend him unto you, as the firſt fruits of the exerciſe of my kingly power.” The word παράκλητος, (ſee ch. xiv. 16.) ſignifies not only a comforter, but an advocate. Among the Romans, it was uſual for thoſe who had any great law-ſuit, to call their relations and friends to their aſſiſtance, who in this office were named advocati. Theſe attended the parties in the court; ſome aſſiſting them with counſel, others pleading for them, and others barely by their preſence giving weight to their cauſe. Hence the word came not only to ſignify an advocate, who pleads the cauſe of another, but a counſellor, a friend, a patron. In this paſſage the Holy Ghoſt is called παράκλητος, or advocatus, in the largeſt ſenſe; becauſe he was to eſpouſe the apoſtle's cauſe, to accompany them wherever they went, to defend them from the attacks of their enemies, and to plead for them by their apologies, which he inſpired them to deliver in their own behalf; and by the miracles which he enabled them to work in confirmation of their miſſion; ſo that he was in the propereſt ſenſe their friend, counſellor, advocate, patron, and protector. See on 1 John ii. 1. Macknight, Mintert, Tillotſon's Works, vol. iii. p. 287, &c. and Clarke's Serm. xv. vol. 8. Inſtead of, But if I depart, the MS. reads, But when, &c.

Ver. 8. And when he is come, he will reprove] He will convince, &c. Wat. “He will convince the world of their ſin, of my righteouſneſs, and of my title to government.” This deſcription of the office of the Holy Ghoſt ſeems to be taken from the office of an advocate at the bar, who, by producing witneſſes, and pleading upon the proof, ſhews his adverſary to be guilty of the crimes laid to his charge; or clears the innocence of his client falſely accuſed, and procures juſtice to be executed upon the guilty. See the following notes.

Ver. 9. Of ſin, becauſe, &c.] “When the Comforter comes, he will, by the miraculous effuſion of his gifts, convince the world of the ſin they commit in diſbelieving me; who, though abſent, am able to confer ſuch extraordinary powers on my miniſters.” Accordingly we find that multitudes of the Jews were thus convinced, Acts ii. 37.

Ver. 10. Of righteouſneſs, becauſe, &c.] “The Comforter, by teaching you the true nature of the Meſſiah's kingdom, and making you explain it to the world, will convince the Jews more eſpecially of the fitneſs of my leaving the world, of my going to the Father, and of my not returning any more till the laſt day.” That this is the meaning of the paſſage appears from the preceding and ſubſequent verſes, in which the latter clauſes are explicatory of the former. For, as the ſin of which the world was to be convinced, was that of their not believing on Chriſt, and the judgement was that of the prince of this world; ſo the righteouſneſs of which they were to be convinced, muſt have been the righteouſneſs of Chriſt going away, and of the diſciples ſeeing him no more: And to ſay the truth, conſidering how firmly the Jews expected that their Meſſiah was to erect a 12 I have yet many things to ſay unto you, but ye cannot bear them now.

13 Howbeit, when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he ſhall not ſpeak of himſelf; but whatſoever he ſhall hear, that ſhall he ſpeak: and he will ſhew you things to come.

14 He ſhall glorify me: for he ſhall receive of mine, and ſhall ſhew it unto you.

15 All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore ſaid I, that he ſhall take of mine, and ſhall ſhew it unto you.

17 Then ſaid ſome of his diſciples among themſelves, What is this that he ſaith unto us, A little while, and ye ſhall not ſee me: and again, a little while, and ye ſhall ſee me: and, Becauſe I go to the Father?

18 They ſaid therefore, What is this that he ſaith, A little while? we cannot tell what he ſaith.

19 Now Jeſus knew that they were deſirous to aſk him, and ſaid unto them, Do ye enquire among yourſelves of that I ſaid, A little while, and ye ſhall not ſee me: and again, a little while, and ye ſhall ſee me?

20 Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, That ye ſhall weep and lament, but the world ſhall rejoice: and ye ſhall be ſorrowful, but your ſorrow ſhall be turned into joy.

21 A woman when ſhe is in travail, hath ſorrow, becauſe her hour is come: but as ſoon as ſhe is delivered of the child, ſhe remembereth no more the anguiſh, for joy that a man is born into the world.

22 And ye now therefore have ſorrow: but I will ſee you again, and your heart ſhall rejoice; and your joy no man taketh from you.

temporal kingdom, and to remain with them for ever on earth, it was abſolutely neceſſary that the Holy Spirit ſhould have been ſent to convince them of the fitneſs of his departure out of the world.

Ver. 11. Of judgement, becauſe, &c.] "In the laſt place, when the Holy Ghoſt cometh, he will convert men from idolatry, to the knowledge and practice of true religion; and by thus victoriouſly depriving them of that dominion which he hath hitherto exerciſed over the minds of men, he will convince the world of judgement. He will demonſtrate not only that the world is governed by God, (ſo the word judgement is often uſed) but that all power in heaven and earth is given unto me, who by my Spirit have dethroned the devil. Moreover, this preſent puniſhment of the prince of this world, will be an earneſt and proof of that judgement, which at the laſt day I will execute upon him, and all his adherents." See ch. xii. 31. Luke x. 8. and Macknight. The reader deſirous of ſeeing this paſſage of Scripture more fully explained, will find ample ſatisfaction in Archbp. Tillotſon's Sermons, as above quoted, in Archbp. Sharpe's Sermons, vol. v. and in Wharton's Sermons, vol. ii.

Ver. 12. I have yet many things to ſay to you] Theſe other things to which our Lord refers, might probably relate to the abrogation of the ceremonial law, to the doctrine of juſtification by faith, the rejection of the Jews, the calling of the Gentiles, and the like, which might have given ſome offence to the diſciples, till their remaining prejudices were removed. However, the prudence of Chriſt in this reſpect, is an excellent pattern for miniſters; and they have need to pray earneſtly for the inſtructions and aſſiſtances of the Spirit of God, that they may neither forget nor abuſe it. Doddridge.

Ver. 13. When he, the Spirit of truth, is come] The perſonality of the Holy Ghoſt is ſtrongly and inconteſtably marked by the mention of his coming, being ſent, guiding, &c. &c. as well as by the particularity in the original, wherein the word rendered he, ἐκεῖνος, is of the maſculine gender, though the word rendered Spirit, τὸ πνεῦμα, is neuter. But on this ſubject we refer the reader, with great pleaſure, to Dr. Ridley's excellent ſermons on the divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, &c. preached at Lady Moyer's lectures. Inſtead of ſhall not ſpeak, &c. Dr. Waterland reads will not, &c. and ſo in the two next verſes. Dr. Heylin obſerves upon the preſent verſe, that "the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, are conſidered as three ſubordinate Maſters in the breaſt of believers. The internal agency of the Holy Ghoſt, is commonly admitted; that of the Father and the Son, as repreſented in this Goſpel, greatly deſerves to be attended to."

Ver. 15. He ſhall take of mine] He will receive of mine, λήψεται, the ſame word as in ver. 14. and conſequently the tranſlation ſhould be the ſame in both places. "Be not ſurprized that I ſaid unto you, He will receive of mine, &c. for the whole treaſures of the Father's wiſdom belong to me." See Col. ii. 3. Thoſe who oppoſe the divinity of Chriſt ſeem to be at a loſs for an explication of this paſſage. Le Clerc tells us it is highly figurative;—that the ſubject treated of is ſuch as cannot be underſtood by reaſon;—that the manner of it is not revealed;—and therefore that it is not poſſible to mark preciſely the proper ſenſe of every expreſſion. Such are the ſhifts to which the eſpouſers of an hypotheſis are reduced!

Ver. 16. A little while, and ye ſhall not ſee me] Our Lord hinted to them, that it was their intereſt, as well as their duty, to rivet all theſe things in their memory, becauſe they were his dying words. A few hours would put an end to his life; and though he was to riſe again from the dead, he was to remain but a very little while with them upon earth; for he was ſoon to aſcend into heaven, and be ſeated at the right-hand of God. Inſtead of, becauſe I go to the Father, ſome would read, when I go, &c. ὅτι ὑπάγω. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 17, 18. What is this that he ſaith] There are ſo many paſſages in the preceding diſcourſe relating to Chriſt's going to his Father, that it is a ſtrange inſtance of the dullneſs of the Apoſtles that they did not underſtand him. Perhaps it is recorded on purpoſe to ſhew us what an alteration the teaching of the Spirit made in them afterward. It is indeed difficult to imagine what could perplex them, unleſs it were that they ſuſpected the words in ver. 16. might intimate, that after Jeſus had gone to the Father, and made a ſhort ſtay there, he would come again, and ſettle an earthly kingdom;—and they might deſire an explication in this view. Accordingly, after having told them, that though they were ſorrowful, he would come and ſee them again after his reſurrection, ver. 20,—22. and would introduce them to a ſtate of comfortable converſe with God by prayer, and a joy, of which none could deprive them, ver. 22—27, He adds, ver. 28. that he was quickly leaving the world, to go and reſide with the Father, from whom he came; thereby gently intimating, that no temporal reign, the conſtant object of their hopes, was to be expected: And if we ſuppoſe him thus to have glanced obliquely at the moſt ſecret ſentiments of their hearts, it will account for that confeſſion of his omniſcience, which immediately follows the 28th verſe, (ver. 29, 30.) the reaſon of which would not appear merely from his diſcovery that they doubted about ſomething, as their countenances and whiſpers might ſhew this. See Doddridge, and "The Sequel to the Trial of the Witneſſes," p. 57, &c. Dr. Heylin remarks upon this paſſage, that Thoſe who are in the deſerted ſtate here ſpoken of, think this little while of a tedious length; they are apprehenſive that it will never end: But let them, as well as they can, animate their hopes, by reflecting that the Maſter calls it a little while. It will be found a ſhort time indeed, compared with the happy eternity, to which it is the paſſage.

Ver. 21, 22. A woman when ſhe is in travail] "The ſtate of mind you will be in, when the events happen of which I am ſpeaking, cannot be deſcribed better, than by comparing it to the condition of a woman in travail. During her labour ſhe hath exquiſite pain, becauſe the birth approaches; but as ſoon as ſhe is delivered, ſhe forgets her anguiſh, being filled with joy that ſhe has brought one of the human ſpecies into the world. Juſt ſo, you my diſciples will be in the greateſt diſtreſs during the time of my departure; but as I am to riſe again from the dead, and to aſcend into heaven, you will forget your ſorrow, and rejoice exceedingly; and from that time forth, your joy ſhall be of ſuch a kind, as that it ſhall not be in the power of men to rob you of it." As this promiſe will be for ever accompliſhed to all Chriſt's faithful ſervants, ſo it is pleaſing to obſerve how St. Paul, in his more abundant afflictions, atteſts his experience of its truth, when he ſays, As ſorrowful, yet always rejoicing, 2 Cor. vi. 10 and mentions his ſhare in the joy of Chriſtians, as a moſt important and ſacred oath. 1 Cor. xv. 31.

Ver. 23. In that day ye ſhall aſk me nothing] "You ſhall not enquire any thing of me, οὐκ ἐρωτήσετε:—" One great ſource of your joy, in the period I am ſpeaking of, will be, that your underſtanding ſhall be enlarged thing: Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, Whatſoever ye ſhall aſk the Father in my name, he will give it you.

24 Hitherto have ye aſked nothing in my name: aſk, and ye ſhall receive, that your joy may be full.

25 Theſe things have I ſpoken unto you in proverbs: but the time cometh, when I ſhall no more ſpeak unto you in proverbs, but I ſhall ſhew you plainly of the Father.

26 At that day ye ſhall aſk in my name: and I ſay not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you:

27 For the Father himſelf loveth you, becauſe ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God.

28 I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.

29 His diſciples ſaid unto him, Lo, now ſpeakeſt thou plainly, and ſpeakeſt no proverb.

30 Now are we ſure that thou knoweſt all things, and needeſt not that any man ſhould aſk thee: by this we believe that thou cameſt forth from God.

31 Jeſus anſwered them, Do ye now believe?

32 Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye ſhall be ſcattered, every man to his own, and ſhall leave me alone: and yet I am not alone, becauſe the Father is with me.

larged and enlightened; ſo that you ſhall have no need of my perſonal preſence with you, nor any occaſion to aſk queſtions concerning intricate points, as you find yourſelves obliged to do now: And whenever you ſtand in need of inſtruction, or aſſiſtance, or any other bleſſing, whether for the propagation of the Goſpel, or your own ſalvation, the Father will immediately ſupply you with it, upon your aſking it in my name." See Calamy on the Trinity, p. 154. and the next note.

Ver. 25. Of the Father] From the Father. Παρα τȣ πατρος: Nonnus.

Ver. 26. At that day ye ſhall aſk in my name] This is the fifth time our Lord enjoined his Apoſtles to offer up their petitions in his name. See ver. 23, 24. ch. xiv. 13. and xv. 16. The frequency of the injunction ſhews the importance of the matter injoined; for whether we underſtand Jeſus as ſpeaking of the things requiſite to the converſion of the world, or of ſuch things as are neceſſary to the ſalvation of individuals, it is evident that the great end of the mediation of Chriſt is, to impreſs mankind with a deep ſenſe of their own ſinfulneſs, which makes them unfit to approach the divine preſence directly, and of the merit and efficacy of Chriſt's death, whereby they have acceſs to God. Wherefore, by the form of our devotions, theſe great doctrines of our religion are continually inculcated upon us. When our Lord ſays, And I ſay not unto you, that I will pray the Father, his meaning is, "Do not think that I ſhall ſolicit the Father on your behalf, as if he was unwilling to beſtow upon you the bleſſings you want: No; the Father himſelf bears a warm love towards you, chiefly on account of your love to me, and your faith in me;"—not (let us obſerve) on account of any predilection or predeſtination from all eternity.

Ver. 28. I came forth from the Father, &c.] "To conclude, The true and proper meaning of my diſcourſe to you at this time, and particularly of the expreſſion which appeared ſo obſcure to you, is, that as I was commiſſioned by the Father, and came into the world, to reveal his will to mankind; ſo, having finiſhed that work, I now leave the world, and return to the Father, from whom I came." Macknight.

Ver. 29, 30. His diſciples ſaid] "We acknowledge that now thou ſpeakeſt in ſuch a manner as we can underſtand; for what thou ſayeſt is by no means dark, like the things before delivered. Moreover, by what thou haſt now ſpoken, we clearly perceive that thou knoweſt the hearts of men; and that in converſing with men, thou haſt no need that they ſhould tell thee their thoughts by any queſtion. In ſhort, thy knowledge of our hearts fully convinceth us that thou art come from God." It ſeems, through the whole of this diſcourſe, Jeſus had obviated the objections and anſwered the queſtions which his diſciples were going to propoſe, or would gladly have propoſed to him. See ver. 19. and on ver. 17.

Ver. 32. Every man to his own] Εις τα ιδια: To his own habitation and employment. Dr. Heylin renders it, Every man to take care of himſelf.

Ver. 33. Theſe things have I ſpoken] "I have told you theſe things, that you may have conſolation in the proſpect of the benefits you are to receive, a laſting peace, and ſerenity of ſoul, by the exerciſe of your faith in me; and thus, free from all anxiety and perturbation, may not be terrified when the afflictions draw nigh which are to overtake you. The truth is, you will have great tribulation in this preſent life, becauſe the malice of men will every where purſue you; nevertheleſs, be not diſcouraged; rather take heart by reflecting how, through conſtancy and patience, I have overcome the malice of the world, and that I am able to make you overcome it in like manner alſo." See Macknight and Calmet.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XVI.

How great is the ignorance and folly of thoſe, who perſecute their brethren in the name of the Lord, and kill his children under the pretence of offering him an acceptable ſacrifice! Thus were the Apoſtles treated by thoſe Jews, who knew not the God for whom they profeſſed all this flaming zeal. Let us bleſs God that we are providentially ſheltered from thoſe effects of it, which might otherwiſe bear ſo hard upon us; while we diligently watch over our hearts, that no irregular affections, no uncharitable ſentiments may work or harbour there. ver. 2, 3.
